She didn't appear the way she had because she wanted to. The clothing was her choice, yes, but the bags under her eyes and the general gloominess was the result of her extreme fatigue.

Her job was maintaining Master vision and translation. The latter job was basically the same as any translation software's. She would translate the many languages spoken by the cosmopolitan Masters from all over the Earth into the language used in Dendro, and do the reverse when it had to be done. Nuance, tone, volume... all was always done perfectly, but it was relatively simple. The problem was that she was doing it for potentially millions of Masters at once, which would be more than enough to overheat the usual supercomputer.

However, if asked, she would surely say that it was the easy part of her job. What kept her busiest was the management of Master vision.

A Master could choose between three types of vision: realistic, CG, and anime. She had to create the visuals for potentially millions of Masters in real time and project them into their visions, which would instantly make the usual supercomputer explode. Even this Infinite Embryo was on the verge of dying despite her supreme calculation abilities.

"Sakuga is... so hard..."

The greatest burden came from drawing for those who'd chosen the anime style visuals. It demanded far more effort than either realistic or CG visuals, and had to be delivered without a split-second of lag. It was actually the least used of the three kinds of visuals, but the users were extremely vocal, complaining on the internet about how the food didn't look right or how they didn't like the artstyle. It was quite disheartening, considering how hard she was trying.

"...Whose idea... was this... again...? Who said... that we should add... anime visuals... to reach a... wider audience...?"

For a moment, she tried to remember which colleague was responsible for her hardships, but even that required more calculating power than she could afford, so she just stopped thinking.

"...Meow..."

On her knees, there was one of Cheshire's clones, sitting there like a plush toy. No colleague could help with her work, so he was there as small source of comfort. This was basically animal therapy. Cheshire actually knew who suggested adding the anime visuals, but he didn't say anything to prevent a potential battle between colleagues.

Anyway, thanks to the hard work of the control AIs, Infinite Dendrogram continued to run smoothly.

The End

A Story for Another Time

August, 2043, Noz Forest

It happened on a certain day, in a certain forest. There was an adorable little princess. Her name was Theresia. She was the third princess of the kingdom, so she was very much a princess. She was now in a forest because she'd been kidnapped by an evil slime.

"I will now commit serious crimes in the kingdom to become a villain. I thought about what would be a 'serious crime' and chose to kidnap you," the evil slime spoke pure insanity as he committed the crime and kidnapped the princess.

But there was a scary monster in the forest many would call an "UBM." She was in big trouble. The princess prepared for the worst, but it turned out that she didn't have to. A man in a costume and a hamster showed up to save her.

The details made it an intense, breathtaking adventure, but that was a story for another time. The chaotic battle ended with the monster's defeat and the evil slime's retreat after he fixed his sights on the man in the costume. Since this event, the man in the costume would be targeted by the evil slime many times. Slimes sure were sticky, huh?

The incident had been resolved, and the princess was now riding a big hamster while a man in a wolf costume was walking next to her.

If you ignored certain factors, this would be like a page straight out of a fairytale. However, it might actually be a psycho-horror scene. After all, the man in the costume walking next to her was in an awful state.

The fight against the evil slime and the monster left him without an ear, made his right eye dangle out, and opened a hole next to the left eye that showed the man inside. There was also blood in many places on him. Some of it wasn't his, some was. Honestly, he looked like a slasher straight out of a horror game, and the mere sight of him could make children cry.

However, the princess, who was quite tough for a few reasons, didn't show much of a reaction. The problem now was that, even though she was okay, if he was to take her to the city, they would think that he was responsible. In fact, they would probably arrest him even without the princess.

"Hrmm..."

Despite acting like a goof most of the time, the man in the costume was actually perceptive enough to know that himself, so he did something to fix it.

"Lemme change. Woof," he said before changing into a store-bought bear costume.

It had a bow tie on it, making him look like an amusement park mascot.

"..."

The princess looked unexpressive, but upon closer look, you could see a faint smile on her face. She wasn't bothered by a costume straight out of a horror flick, but she couldn't hide her preference for cuteness.

Maybe I should ask, she thought, deciding to ask her father for similar costumes.

The princess would go on to do exactly that, and since it was extremely rare for her to request for things, it affected not only her father, but sisters, as well. She received a huge number of costumes, but that was a story for another time.

At any rate, the princess was safely brought back to the castle. This was how the fates of the princess, the man in the costume, and the evil slime began to intertwine. As for what it would eventually bring... that, too, was a story for another time.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 12 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 11
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2019 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2019 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2019 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2020 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: April 2020

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
12. The Forms of Love

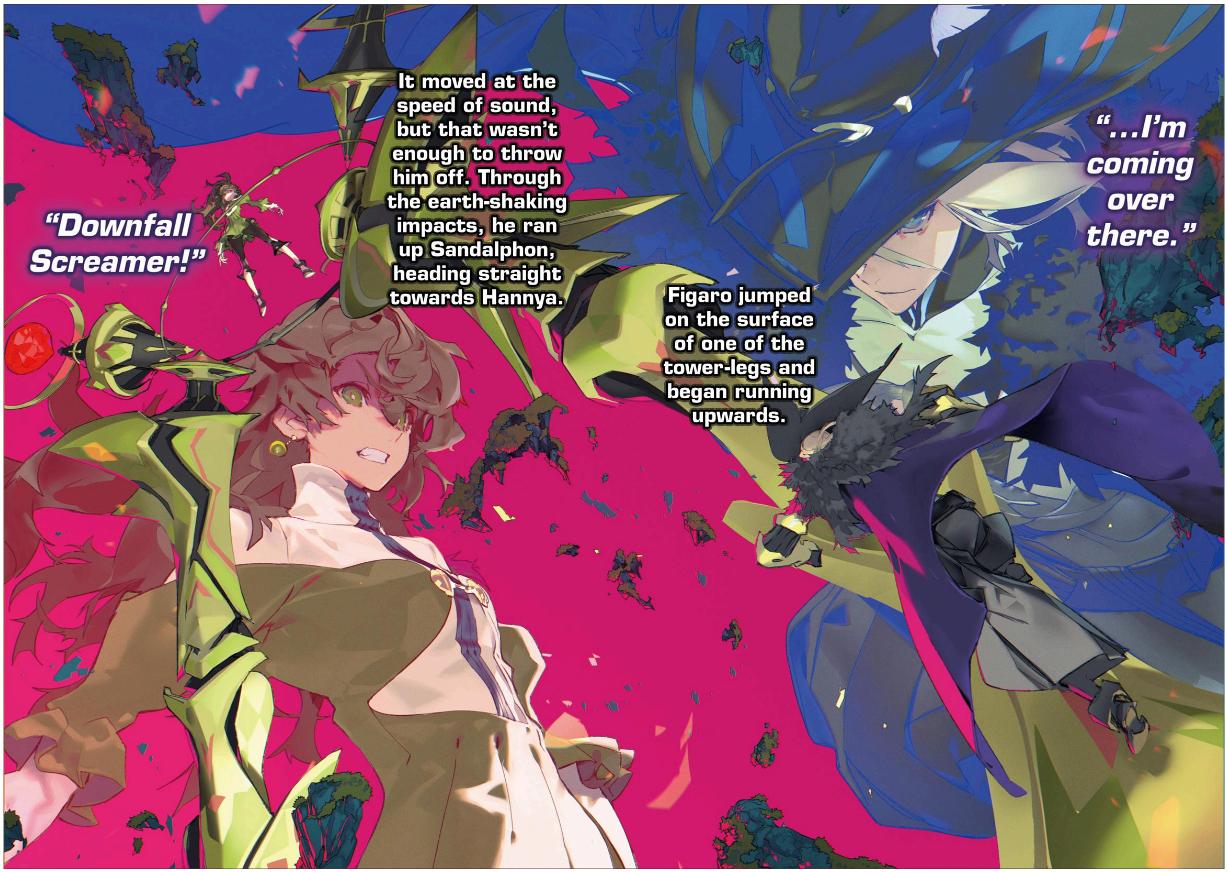
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
12. The Forms of Love

Infinite Dendrogram

12. The Forms of Love

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



"Downfall Screamer!"
It moved at the speed of sound, but that wasn't enough to throw him off. Through the earth-shaking impacts, he ran up Sandalphon, heading straight towards Hannya.
Figaro jumped on the surface of one of the tower-legs and began running upwards.
"...I'm coming over there."

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of what is right that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.

Nemesis

Nemesis

A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword, a halberd, a shield, and a pinwheel. She's a bit of a glutton, too.

Figaro

Figaro / Vincent Myers

A master who holds the esteemed position of being Altar's #1 duelist. As the Over Gladiator, he's rarely seen away from the arena. While he's generally a calm and gentle man, the heat of battle transforms him into something far more brutal.

Azurite

Altimia Azurite Altar

First princess of the Kingdom of Altar, and holder of the Sacred Princess job.
After she encountered Ray, she started to change her feelings towards masters like him.

B3

Barbaroy Bad Burn / Kozue Fujibayashi

Once the leader of a notorious PK clan, B3 also happens to be Ray's real-life senior at college. While she's usually a dependable and studious girl, she switches into a far more crude and boisterous persona when her PK instincts take over.

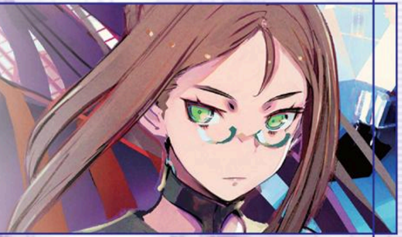


Table of Contents

Cover
Color Illustrations

Opening: Correspondence Between a Certain Man and Woman
Chapter One: The Three Horrors and the Extras
Chapter Two: Battle for the Penultimate Throne
Interlude: The One Who Arrives and the One Who Finds
Chapter Three: The Start of the Festival
Chapter Four: To Each Their Own Duels of Love
Chapter Five: The Lion and the Bomb
Chapter Six: The Fuse
Chapter Seven: The End of the Festival and the Explosion
Chapter Eight: A Story Written in the Sky
Chapter Nine: The ■■■■■■■■ of Figaro
Epilogue

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Opening: Correspondence Between a Certain Man and Woman

???

February 14th, 2044.

“Figaro,

This is Hannya. I’m using the email address you gave me.

Is this reaching you? I’m writing this trying not to worry that you might have given me a fake address. I hope you’re getting this, but I don’t know what to do if you don’t.

Right now, I’m following what your friend told me and going to Legendaria. I’ll come see you again after crushing my ex and that bitch who took him from me.

I’m thinking of bringing over a homemade cake when I do. Look forward to it.”

“Hannya,

This is Figaro. Yes, it’s reaching me.

I’m also looking forward to seeing you again.

I like cakes, too. My little brother often brings them to me as presents or even bakes them himself. I can’t handle intense, spicy foods, so I’m relatively fond of sweet stuff. I can’t wait to try your cake.”

February 15th, 2044.

“I have some bad news... I went to Legendaria and stomped on my ex and the homewrecker, but then the crowd ganged up on me and now I’ve got the death penalty.

Also, I can’t use the save points anymore because I’m ‘wanted.’

I’m in the ‘gaol’ right now. Apparently, I won’t be able to leave for over a whole in-game year.

...Sorry. Now I can’t see you for a long time.

You won't be able to wait that long, huh?"

"The gaol, eh? This is the first time someone I know got sent there.
Oh, don't worry about taking a whole year to be discharged. I'm sure I'll still be here then.
I'll wait for you to leave (so we can duel) for as long as I have to.
Though, I'll be able to catch up to you in power in the meantime. You'll grow stronger yourself, of course, but I'll do even better.
I have a major ranked match coming up, too."

February 16th, 2044.
"Thanks, Figaro. I'm really happy that you'll wait for me (in the name of love.)
I'll go see you in Infinite Dendrogram no matter what.
And oh yeah, you're a ranker! That's amazing.
By the way, you mentioned my strength. Should I be trying to raise my level or evolve my Embryo, too?"

"Of course."

"Okay. I'll grow stronger here in the gaol, then go see you right after I'm discharged.
Ohh, I can't wait for that moment. Just thinking about it is too much.
It's so far away, but (because of love!) the wait is going to be unbearable!"

"Yeah. I want to see (and duel) you, too. I hope it doesn't take too long for you to be released."

April 18th, 2044.
"Figaro, congratulations on becoming the duel champion! I saw your duel online! I already knew the outcome, but watching it still had me in suspense. Just so you know, I cheered at my screen when you won! Seriously, congratulations!"

"Thanks, Hannya. Because of this, I've finally become Over Gladiator.

It's the Superior Job of the gladiator grouping, so we're now on the same job tier. Now, if my Embryo would just evolve into a Superior Embryo, like your Sandalphon did last week, we would be a perfect match (in a duel.) I can't wait for when you're discharged in a year."

"Same here. I can't wait to stand by you (in the wedding hall.)"

November 11th, 2044.

"I heard about the Gloria thing and your friend. Tell me if there's anything I can do to help. Though, I know there's not much I can do by email. Ohh, why can't I be outside at a time like this...?"

"...Thanks, Hannya."

February 14th, 2045.

"It's now been a whole year since we started talking like this. I'm spending my days in the gaol roasting food, couples, and people who say inexcusable things. I'm satisfied with my life, but every day feels about the same, which is just making me want to see you more and more.

By the way, you said you were wondering, so I'm pleased to tell you that we have a new Superior here in the gaol.

First there was me and Fu'uta, then we got Sechs, and now we've got a boy called 'Candy.'

He was a real nuisance with all the viruses he spread in here, but he calmed down once Sechs and I beat him. Now he's shut himself in some dungeon.

His prison term is so long, he'll probably be in here until Dendro's servers shut down.

Though, the same can probably be said about everyone here besides me."

"Always the homemaker, huh? Thanks for the info, by the way. I was wondering about it because a wanted Superior that was heading towards Altar suddenly vanished. I guess the rumors are right, then — another PK got him. They might already know, but I'll inform DIN, just in case.

My days are also just about the same recently. I... wasn't able to participate in the war last month, either.

Like I mentioned before, it seemed to have given Shu a lot to think about. Though, it's understandable, considering his reasons for not participating. Right now, he's out on a journey, leveling up and gathering special rewards.

...Oh yeah. We're both bothered by our monotonous lives, so let me mix things up a little.

My name is Vincent Myers.

Weird, huh? We've been in touch for over a year, but didn't even know each other's names.

Hannya, if you don't mind... can you give me yours? What's your name?"

"...Thanks, Vincent.

My name is Fuyuko Shiki. Can you call me Fuyuko?"

"Of course, Fuyuko."

"...I'll finally be out of here in April. I'll then rush straight to the kingdom to see (and marry) you."

"Yeah. I'll be waiting, Fuyuko."

Open Episode "The Forms of Love"

Chapter One: The Three Horrors and the Extras

Reiji Mukudori

When people play too much of a particular game, they often end up simulating it in their heads while lying in bed with their eyes closed.

Recently, these simulations of mine were completely dominated by Dendro. Specifically, the fight against the Hell General.

Someone actually uploaded a video of the fight. It had been edited to make it look like I won easily, but that wasn't the case. I knew that better than anyone.

Without Gardranda, without Logan underestimating me and holding back his strongest devils, and without Veldorbell destroying his Brooch, I'd have surely lost.

I knew full well that I lacked the power to defeat a Superior who came at me with everything he had. Even though I won, that scene stayed with me, just like it did when I was first defeated by Marie. Seeing the video had only made the memory more vivid. I began picturing and examining it like a game of chess.

Though, if this was a chess match, then Logan had all his pieces, while I only had a king and a rook, so it's not like I was going to figure out some high-level play by just thinking about it.

"Heeyy, Mukudori, what's with that thinking face and why're ya sittin' there? The lecture's over."

"Ohh..." Kasugai called out to me, bringing me back to reality and reminding me that the morning lectures were over.

It was hard to overlook the fact that I was a college student who couldn't even focus on his lectures.

That made me wonder how B3 — or rather, Fujibayashi — managed. She was a clan leader, so I imagine that she'd have even more trouble dividing her time and attention between the game and reality. I'd have to consult her about it.

During lunch, I looked for her in the cafeteria and found her right away. She had this super diligent vibe, which was even stronger here in real life than in the game. It made her stand out, so she was really easy to find.

However, looking at the other student sitting with her, she didn't stand out so much that it drove people away. The presence of others would've made it fairly awkward to talk about Dendro, especially since she was someone who kept the two worlds neatly separated.

I wondered what to do next, but then her friend finished eating and left. Appreciating the timing, I tried to call out to her, but someone grabbed my shoulder.

"What's up, Ray? Tickletickle!"

"Hh?!" Miss Eldritch suddenly appeared, grabbed my shoulder with her right hand and tickled my armpit with her left.

Sexual harassment! Two seconds after her greeting...!

"Where's your handler... I mean, Tsukikage?! Did he collapse again?!" I asked.

"Kage's not heeeere. He went to visit his family back in Iga."

"Iga?! What, is he actually a ninja?!"

"'Actually'? What, you believe the stereotype that everyone from Iga is a ninja?"

...Well, he was the King of Assassins. He could sink into shadows, too. Him being a ninja would explain why he ended up with an Embryo like that...

"Heheheh," Miss Eldritch giggled. "Without Kage around, I can harass you all I want!"

"GHHAAH!" Oh, so she actually held back around him, I thought, before she continued.

She tried to slip her left hand under my clothes...

"Prez? What are you doing in a public space?"

...but then a heavy, domineering voice stopped her.

The one speaking was obviously Fujibayashi. Her eyes behind her glasses were steady... and she actually looked really scary.

"...Ah. So you were here, B," said Miss Eldritch.

"Sit down right there."

"...But this is the cafeteria."

"Sit."

"...Okay." Hearing how serious Fujibayashi sounded, Miss Eldritch immediately sank to the floor on her knees. The stares she drew from onlookers made her shake a bit, but she continued sitting regardless.

The way Fujibayashi was looking down at her, I felt like I was watching a priest exorcising a naughty demon. It seemed that even if you ignored the fact that Miss Eldritch needed her around to keep the club going, Fujibayashi still outranked her even in real life. Apparently they've been like this for a long time. Miss Eldritch had gone to Fujibayashi's place to learn etiquette and the Way of Tea, so she developed this awareness that made her crumble in her presence.

The woman looked quite disheartened, but I appreciated the fact that we had someone who could keep her in check.

Also, is it just me, or have I recently seen a certain someone sit on the floor just like that?

"Mukudori, foxes are always on the lookout for puppies to eat," said Fujibayashi. "She'll gobble you up if you're not careful."

"I understand. Thank you," I said in response.

"Boo... why are you always getting in my way?"

After the incident at the cafeteria, we went to the clubroom set aside for the club that Miss Eldritch is the president of: "Club Infinite Dendrogram," or "CID" for short.

Last time I was here, I was nearly subjected to Miss Eldritch's vile ways, but with Fujibayashi present, I didn't have to worry about that happening again.

"So, Mukudori, did you have some business with me?" Fujibayashi asked.

Oh, she noticed, I thought. I went ahead and told her about my difficulty dividing time between reality and Dendro.

"Oh, but you just have to focus on your lessons. The more you practice at it, the better you'll get," she said. "Besides that, the only thing you really have to pay attention to is your papers."

"Is that it?"

"Yes. Banish Infinite Dendrogram from your mind during lessons. It won't be easy, since you just started recently, but practice makes perfect. I'm speaking from experience."

...I guess she's right. "All right. I'll do just that."

"Do your best."

"It's scary that you can hold yourself in the big T just like that, B," grumbled Miss Eldritch. "...And it's scary how Ray thinks that's reasonable."

"Did you say something, Miss Eldritch?" I asked.

"Miss what?"

Ah, I went and said it out loud. There goes my streak of keeping it in my head, I thought.

"I want you to call me 'Tsukuyo,'" she asked.

"Will do, Fuso."

"...You're a piece of work, aren't you?" I did have her to thank for fixing my arm, but on the other hand she did kidnap me once and she sexually harassed me every now and then, so I didn't want to do what she said.

"Well, whatever," she said. "Anyway, you beat the Hell General, didn't you? I saw the video."

"Uhh..." She hadn't seen it the last time we met, but it seemed like she went on to watch it later.

"You also cleared the ruins and blew up the giant weapon there, huh? Isn't that nuts?"

"I was involved with the latter, but the former was all Tom's doing." We'd only explored the residential area after Tom had destroyed most of the prism soldiers. Hell, even the attack on the plant during the second day was mostly Tom and the other Masters. Honestly, I'd say he deserved nearly all the credit for clearing the ruins.

"Speaking of Tom Cat..." said Fujibayashi. "Mukudori, have you heard?"

"Heard what?" I asked.

"Tomorrow, real world time, Tom Cat and Kashimiya are going to have a ranked match." She informed me of a coming duel.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

I logged on to Dendro the moment I got home from classes. The place I appeared at was the capital's fountain. I'd returned here from Quartierlatin yesterday and set this as my login point. The weekend would start tomorrow, so I'd be able to stay online for a good while. I'd also be able to return to Gideon — my hometown here.

"Ray. You're back," Nemesis said as she popped out of my crest.

That was the same as usual, but there was something that wasn't.

"Ah. It's The Unbreakable..."

"...I'm scared," I heard someone say. People around me were reacting differently than they had before I'd gone to Quartierlatin. The reactions from children were especially strong.

It was like this before I logged out, but... "Scary?" That was a bit harsh...

"Is this because of the video floating around on 'the net'?" Nemesis asked. I was already relatively well-known due to an incident at Gideon, but the video with the Hell General had made me more famous... or infamous... than ever.

The most striking change was the amount of fear I seemed to cause.

That, too, was because of what was in the video.

First of all, the video came in two versions — the complete version and the scene-by-scene version. Among the latter, the most viewed scene was the one where Logan got the death penalty, followed by Gardranda and Gigaknight's battle. The reason why that one gathered so much attention was the rarity of special reward-based summons (if not that, Gardranda's appearance alone would have done it).

Honestly, it was understandable why those two got the most views.

The scene relevant to the current issue, however, was the one in third place — the one where I broke through the devil army and charged Logan.

It showed me releasing miasma everywhere, biting a devil, and running with blood dripping from my mouth.

...I saw it myself, and the angle was just so perfect. It made me feel like I was watching a horror movie. The voices were in French, too, for some reason, which only made it creepier.

Since then, I passed by some Masters in Quartierlatin who went "EEK!" and jumped away from me in shock, while child Masters occasionally cried stuff like "He's gonna eat meee!" and actually ran away ... The idea that I was that scary kinda got me down.

"I guess eating the devil was a bit too much," I said.

"...Your appearance doesn't help, either." Appearance, huh...? Did the video get tagged with “#DeathKnight” because I was dressed in black?

“Well, you know what they say: ‘everyone gets fifteen minutes of fame.’ They’ll get bored and forget about it eventually.” Though, I didn’t know who was getting the “fifteen minutes” here.

“...You think that isn’t enough time for you to get mixed up in something else? If those ‘fifteen minutes’ keep getting refreshed, they’ll never end, will they?”

I chose to ignore the reasonable and highly compelling, but very unsettling, prediction.

Anyway, it was time to head for Altea’s southern gate and prepare to go to Gideon. Riding Silver would make me stand out too much, so I would only get on him once I was out of the city.

Though, Quartierlatin’s mass-produced models could be a common sight soon. When that happens, I should be able to ride Silver around without standing out.

“...No, you would not. You will stand out no matter where and what you ride. Consider your apparel.”

I’ve been thinking this ever since you pointed it out back at Quartierlatin, but... aren’t you making a bit too much of a deal out of my appearance?

“You think I am...? After seeing your Storm Visage, the mere thought of your appearance changing again fills my heart with worry. Hm...?”

Nemesis looked ahead, seemingly noticing something.

I followed her gaze and saw a clockwork horse ridden by a familiar person.

“Ray, Nemesis... It’s been a while.”

“Liliana. It really has.” It was Liliana, riding a mass-produced white Prism Steed.

I’d arrived here alongside Azurite, so I did meet Liliana once before logging out; apparently, she’d gotten a new mount since then.

“You switched to a Prism Steed?”

“Yes. It was time for my trusty horse to retire, anyway, so I visited Quartierlatin and got myself this one.”

That was a sign that they were now being distributed to the kingdom’s knights.

The units that could be mass-produced in Quartierlatin — “Second Model Prism Steeds" or "SMPS" — were better overall than the replicas excavated earlier. They had barriers and could fly, which made them better suited to be a knight's mount than the average Demi-Dragon-tier monster.

Their only real drawback was that the barrier and flight were only unlocked if you had Prism Authorization level 1. As a Prism Rider myself, I found that part to be quite a mystery.

Well, perhaps it made sense at first glance, but I didn't understand why this condition was put in place at all. Originals such as Silver could fly and create barriers even if you didn't have the Prism Rider job, yet with replicas, the Prism Authorization skill was absolutely necessary for those functions.

While the other skill — Prism Beast Enhancement — seemed pretty standard, Prism Authorization seemed like exactly that — an authorization.

Hell, even though Prism Beast Enhancement was clearly related to the Prism Steed's skills, it was less like "this skill activates this ability" and more like "we removed the limits because you have this skill."

B3 had said that it was like a limitation to prevent those who didn't have the Prism Rider job from using them, but honestly...

"Ray? What is the matter?" Liliana asked.

"Ah... Sorry," I said.

"You have a tendency to lose yourself in thought," Nemesis commented.

...Perhaps, I thought. I did often focus on my thoughts too much after being distracted by something.

Rook had said that he had a similar habit. He actually had to say that; no one would've known about it otherwise, because his thinking speed was so great that it never seemed like he was lost in thought.

"Liliana, what about Elizabeth's... Her Highness' bodyguard duty?" When we were at Gideon, Liliana was either standing by Elizabeth's side or looking for her after she'd run away. What was that tomboy princess doing now that Liliana was away from Gideon?

"Oh, I received a new order from Her Highness Altimia, so I entrusted her to Sir Lindos for the time being."

Sir Lindos was quite the serious man. I could only hope that Elizabeth's shenanigans wouldn't completely break him.

Though, something she said had me curious.

"An order from Azurite?" Unlike with Elizabeth, I didn't have to use

"Her Highness" there. I had Azurite's permission to call her just that, and I'd got it again with Liliana listening.

"I know this will be temporary and all, but what could possibly be more important than protecting Azurite's sister?" I asked.

"...My apologies, but I can't say that on my own discretion."

Oh, so this was something classified.

"Her Highness gave me another order, though. It involves you," Liliana continued.

"Me?"

"Yes. She said she wanted me to find you and Barbaroy and bring you both to the castle."

"But... why?" I didn't quite understand why she required us both.

"Apparently she has a request for you." A moment after Liliana's words...

"...I feel some trouble brewing."

...Nemesis telepathically spoke words she'd said many times before.

Liliana led us to the castle, then straight to Azurite's office. I instantly noticed the mountains of documents around her, which told me everything about how busy she was.

...Well, she was the current political heart of the kingdom, and she'd been away in Quartierlatin recently, so I supposed that the work had piled up.

"...You sure look busy," I commented.

"I'm leaving Altea again tomorrow," Azurite said. "I need to get all this work out of the way while I still can."

...What was this masked swordswoman intending to meddle in this time? Though, she wasn't wearing her swordswoman clothing this time — she looked like a normal civil official, and...

"Not wearing your mask today, huh?"

"...Why would I wear it in the castle?"

Good point, I thought. Hell, in here, it would be worse if she actually did try to hide her royal status.

"Anyway, what's up?" I asked. "Liliana mentioned a request."

"Yes," Azurite nodded. "I need bodyguards for a trip to Gideon. You're returning there too, are you not?"

"That's the plan. I have nothing against taking this job, but... do you need a bodyguard?" Azurite was clearly stronger than me — hell, she was actually on the level of a pre-Superior, if not an actual Superior. At the very least, she would've stood a way better chance against Logan than I did.

"I won't be going alone," she continued. "The person in question has a Master bodyguard, so I thought I would get my own Master retinue to match, but..."

She became silent for a moment.

"The only Masters I've been in close contact with are you, Barbaroy, the parasite, and the Master bodyguard I just mentioned..." Well, that made sense. She did say that she had been avoiding Masters until recently.

Also, though her attitude towards Masters had changed, she still called Miss Eldritch "parasite." I could almost hear her voice, saying "That's sooo meaaan."

"Ohh, and you actually know the Master bodyguard, do you not?"

"I do?"

"Master Jiangshi, Xunyu."

Oh, Xunyu. I did know her. She was one of those people who beat the shit out of me to help me become stronger.

...Hm? Hold on, but Xunyu's the bodyguard of...

"...So, about this bodyguard request."

"As I mentioned, you would have to protect two people: me and Canglong, the third prince of the Huang He Empire."

...Failing this one would mean some serious diplomatic trouble, I thought.

"Like I said, I don't have any connections among Masters," Azurite continued. "As things are, you are the only one I can trust enough to request something like this."

"Well... thanks?"

"No need to thank me. This request is officially for you... and Barbaroy."

Aren't you two, well, you know...? I thought, but couldn't bring myself to say it out loud.

"You can contact her, yes? I told Liliana to search for either of you, because I thought I'd get in touch with both of you if I could reach you."

"I do have her address and can contact her, yes..."

"Please do, then. Give her this message from me: 'This is a bodyguard request for a trip from Altea to Gideon. You will protect me and the third prince of the Huang He Empire. Aside from you, Ray, Liliana, and Master Jiangshi, Xunyu will also be acting as bodyguards. We will ride your dragon carriage,'" she said before pausing for a moment. "'If you haven't forgotten your involvement in the capital blockade incident, you are in no position to say no.'"

Her tone of voice as she spoke that last sentence sent a chill down my spine.

I logged out, called B3, and passed it on. Her reaction? She instantly logged on and accepted the request.

Thus began our strange party's trip towards Gideon.

Let the quest... begin.

◇

At the moment, we were riding B3's dragon carriage along the Sauda Mountain Pass leading towards Gideon. Liliana was the coachman, and the carriage was being pulled by her SMPS.

Of course, the royal family had their own dragon carriages, so they didn't actually need to borrow B3's. However, due to recent circumstances, Azurite couldn't use any of them.

The kingdom had been infiltrated and terrorized by the imperium's Superiors multiple times now. It had occurred both deep in the south and the very north of Altar, meaning that nowhere was completely safe. If they caught wind that she was traveling between cities, it wasn't out of the question that they would take the opportunity to cause another incident like the Clash of the Superiors or the events at Quartierlatin's ruins.

Thus, she had to be covert. It was important to hide the fact that the carriage contained the first princess of Altar and the third prince of Huang He, so Azurite couldn't use the fancy dragon carriages of the royal family. They stood out too much, and there was the threat of someone sabotaging them.

Azurite could go to Gideon all by herself, of course, but this time she had a guest of honor: the young prince. She couldn't let a foreign royal ride a standard dragon carriage. Therefore, she needed a carriage that fulfilled all these conditions: didn't explicitly belong to the royal family, wasn't meant for extravagant ceremonies, looked good in spite of that, and was highly functional, comfortable, and tough. An interior with spatial expansion would've been a nice bonus.

Now, that seemed like a tall order, but what do you know — something like that actually existed.

We were riding it right now, in fact. B3's dragon carriage was an absurdly good quality product from Legendaria. Even the most luxurious carriages available on Altar's market were all outdated and lacked certain modern features, meaning this one surpassed them in every aspect.

Azurite had already ridden it from Quartierlatin to the capital, so she was already aware of its utility and value. Even though she had her mask on, I could tell by her eyes that she was thinking about how she could use this thing. And B3, being partially responsible for some severe damage to the kingdom, wasn't in a position to refuse to provide her carriage and services for this very serious escort quest.

At least she's getting a reward, I guess, I thought.

"Also, Azurite probably has many other things to be concerned about besides the dragon carriage," Nemesis added telepathically.

Yeah. Regardless of what they are, we do have a bit of a problem here...

"This really is an impressive dragon carriage," Azurite remarked.

"...That's true," said B3.

"Don't look so worried. I won't confiscate it."

"...Oh, I definitely wasn't worried about that."

"I see. By the way, how much do you think this carriage is worth?"

"...Somewhere over a hundred million."

"Really, now? Not that it's relevant, but that's nowhere near the losses caused by the capital blockade."

"..."

...The air between them was absurdly cold.

I really appreciated two things right now: the fact that Xunyu and the third prince were in the cabin at the back, and the fact that this carriage had spatial expansion, which let me sit a decent distance away from them.

"...Those two are the same as ever," Nemesis commented.

As Nemesis implied, Azurite and B3 didn't get along too well, to put it mildly. B3 was constantly reminded of the damage she'd dealt to the economy by partaking in the blockade. Her right to use save points was at risk. The victim in this situation had really grabbed her tormentor by the scruff of her neck.

"I gotta say... They're like rock-paper-scissors." Based on what Shu had told me, Miss Eldritch had made the royal family sign several contracts in exchange for services from The Lunar Society.

Because of this, the royal family had to humble themselves before Miss Eldritch, and Azurite's uncomfortable relationship with Miss Eldritch had made her deem the girl a "parasite."

With that in mind, the three girls had a dynamic that went like this:

Azurite was strong against B3, but weak against Miss Eldritch.

B3 was strong against Miss Eldritch, but weak against Azurite.

And Miss Eldritch was strong against Azurite, but weak against B3.

Again, it was like rock-paper-scissors with them.

Or maybe it's like that trilemma between a frog, snake, and slug.

"...You better not start comparing them to those vermin out loud," Nemesis spoke telepathically.

I know. I realized that myself right after thinking it.

"B-By the way, what did you order Liliana to do that was more important than her duty as Elizabeth's guard?" I asked Azurite, in a weak attempt to make the mood more bearable. I knew that Liliana had been given an important order, but she didn't know if she could tell me what it was.

"I had her transport a broken national treasure to Quartierlatin and act as my agent in a request to repair it. Liliana was easily the best person for the job," Azurite answered.

Transporting a national treasure definitely seemed like a serious job best left to people you trusted a lot.

But why bring it to Quartierlatin, of all places...? I wondered.

"National treasure... Ah!" I exclaimed as I remembered one particular broken treasure and what was currently being built in Quartierlatin. "The Prism Steed, right?"

"Yes. That precious heirloom that has been with our country for as long as it existed, only to break in the last war."

Gold Thunder. That was one of the original Prism Steeds, last used by Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria — the strongest knight in the kingdom, who'd sadly been slain in a battle against Logan's Mythical-rank devil.

I'd heard that Gold Thunder had been damaged so badly that even its auto-repair function no longer worked. “Can it really be fixed?” I asked.

“That is still unknown,” said Azurite. “All we found in the ruins was an SMPS manufactory. Nothing else. However, that’s where the kingdom’s few machine-focused Masters are located, so giving Gold Thunder over to them seems a lot better than just keeping its shattered remains locked away.”

By “machine-focused Masters,” she was mainly referring to Blue Screen.

“Though, I am somewhat concerned about leaving the task to the former core members of the rather infamous Sol Crisis,” Azurite added.

“They haven’t exactly had a change of heart since then, but they can be trusted to complete quests with attractive rewards,” B3 commented. “Unless their end goal is just PK itself, most PKs do have an eye for profit. I believe they’ll do the job as long as the pay is good.”

“I see. Very convincing, coming from you.”

“Ghh...” ...And so the mood in the carriage was back to square one.

I realized now that I couldn’t change her mind, so I just said “I’ll go check on them,” and went to the back cabin.

There, I found Canglong, the third prince of Huang He, and the abnormality that I was quite used to by now — Xunyu. Side note: she was keeping her Tenaga-Ashinaga shorter than normal, so it didn’t look like she was uncomfortable in this relatively tight space.

“HuhH? WhAt’s up?” she asked.

“The air over there is really suffocating...” I said.

“What, theY havin’ a cAtfight or sOmethin’? ShoUld ya reAlly bE comin’ hEre?”

“Not that kind of suffocating.”

And what would I have to do with any catfights? I thought.

“I suppose not even a person of Master Ray’s caliber can feel comfortable in the presence of quarreling ladies,” Canglong commented with a smile devoid of malice.

Despite being a prince, he was really modest, always adding “Master” before my and Xunyu’s names. He even insisted that we talk to him like we normally did. I wasn’t sure if it was okay for a prince to behave like that, but according to him, “I may have imperial blood, but I am not very involved in politics. You don’t have to be so considerate of me.”

Is that how most third princes are? I wondered.

"Yeah, I guess I can't feel comfortable," I said. "Girls are terrifying when they fight. They mainly use words..."

"...You knOw who yoU're talking abOut, right? You reAlly think thEy wOn't pull oUt their weapOns?"

...They might, I thought, as a clear picture of armor-clad B3 and Azurite brandishing Altar formed in my head.

And B3 would lose because of compatibility...

"I doubt it will come to that," Nemesis commented. "They have a common... friend in you."

"I hope that keeps them from escalating things..." I said. "Let's change the subject."

"YeAh."

"Canglong, what were you doing in the capital all this time? If I recall correctly, you were originally supposed to head to Gideon a month ago, during The Clash of the Superiors, right?"

"Yes!" Azurite and Canglong both were supposed to come to Gideon on that fateful day. However, they had to postpone their arrival due to the recent Epidemic. That, the effects of Franklin's Game, and the incident at the ruins had kept Azurite busy for a long time, rendering her unable to go to Gideon until just today. What had Canglong been doing during all this time?

"This journey served a diplomatic purpose, as well as broadening my own horizons," he answered. "I spent that time experiencing the capital and the port city to the west."

"I wAs with him whEn he was oUt, by thE way," Xunyu added. "As he is nOw, his stats arE low."

I see. It's probably not exactly like that, but it sort of reminds me of a long school trip.

"Thanks to you, we were able to go to the port city and back in one day!"

"It's in thE same coUntry, and it's nOt like wE had to cross an endlEss desert likE in CaldinA. Going thEre and back in a dAy is child's plAy."

...The world must seem really small to those who can travel at the speed of sound, I thought.

"BUt man, why evEn use a carriAge? I coUld carry yOu to GideOn in a flAsh," Xunyu added.

"Master Xunyu, that would be quite inappropriate..." said Canglong. "I am going to a formal marriage meeting. I cannot show up in the arms of another lady."

"That's trUe."

Yeah, that sounds like grounds for an instant cancellation of the marr... marriage?

"So, you're heading to Gideon for a marriage meeting?" asked Nemesis.

"Yes. The royal capital was unfit for the purpose for various reasons, so it will happen in Gideon instead."

"No, it isn't the location I'm wondering about. Who are you set to marry?"

"The second princess of Altar, Her Highness Elizabeth."

...Excuse me? Canglong's words seemed profoundly important to me. I was about to ask more questions, but suddenly the dragon carriage stopped.

Looking outside through the window, I saw a group of armed people surrounding the carriage.

◇

In Infinite Dendrogram, bandits and brigands were actually thought to be less common than you'd expect in a fantasy setting.

The reason for that was the presence of Masters — the immortal beings who gained immense powers from their Embryos.

The thing about Masters was that you couldn't tell how powerful one was just by looking at them. There were children walking around with Superior Jobs, and jokesters in costumes summoning battleships and burning down entire forests.

They weren't all equally powerful, of course, but there were thousands of them all over the world. Accidentally attacking a Master would mean having to fight an immortal superhuman, which didn't seem like a gamble most people would find worth taking.

Because of this, there were only four types of people who would become bandits.

First were the Master bandits. There were those like B3's Mad Castle, which focused exclusively on other Masters, as well as those like Goblin

Street, which would also attack tians, but they were unified in that they didn't fear Masters as much as tians did since they were Masters themselves.

Second were the groups like the Gouz-Maise Gang. They were organized and had many members, a handful of which could be notably powerful, giving them the potential to fend off most Masters.

The third were the groups that had a great deal to gain by engaging in banditry. These included the bandits lurking around the trade route going through the Cruella Mountain Belt to the east of Gideon. In other words, they were so blinded by greed that they simply ignored the risks.

And the fourth were the kind of bandits attacking us right now.

"Kheheheh! Leave yer valuables and carriage right 'ere!" They surrounded us, said exactly what you'd expect to hear, and tried to menace us with weapons held high. Their weapons were crude, though, and their levels were probably low.

It was pretty clear that they had become bandits and were now trying to rob us simply because they didn't even consider the dangers of attacking Masters, or that even tians could be powerful. They probably just looked at Liliana in the coachman's seat, saw a fair-looking lady, and assumed that this carriage was easy prey.

However, even Liliana was a relatively strong Paladin. She'd been training hard during her days of watching over Elizabeth. As far as I knew, her level was over 300 right now, but even then, she was on the lower end of the spectrum among everyone riding in this carriage.

They'd clearly chosen the wrong prey.

Alas, it was already too late. One of those inside opened the door and stepped out.

"HuhH? WhAt? Altar's got bAndits this dAmn stupid?"

"The hell're... you... Ehh...?" Upon seeing who had stepped out, the bandits were at a loss for words.

Of course they would be. They just saw an over four metel-tall anomaly step out of a carriage that seemed way too small for it.

"I swear, if I see a single scratch on my goddamn ride," said another... person who stepped outside, clad in ultra-heavy armor from head to toe.

She bashed her shields together in a show of force.

"I haven't heard of this happening too often after Ray crushed the Gouz-Maise Gang... so of course we'd run into bandits when I was transporting a foreign guest of honor... What a disgrace."

The last to come out was a weirdo in a mask.

Apparently, some of the bandits thought that she looked somewhat normal compared to the other two, but then she drew her sword — The Primeval Blade, Altar — and the bandits fell on their backsides. Some even wet themselves.

Even if they couldn't Identify it, they could instinctively feel how terrifying it was.

The bandits no longer had any will to fight. The three monst— Uhh, ladies had the kind of pressure that clearly showed how immense the gulf in power was between the two parties, even if they couldn't gauge it exactly.

"They're probably the three scariest women in the kingdom," Nemesis commented.

"If you ask me, Miss Eldritch would be in the top three instead of either B3 or Xunyu."

"...I recommend against saying that to Azurite."

"...Oh, I won't." That aside, the situation was actually worse now than it would've been if Miss Eldritch was around.

I didn't know about Xunyu, but the other two were clearly in a bad mood. B3 was seeing red from the stress, while Azurite was irritated about the very existence of bandits in her country. This could easily become a whole lot more tragic than it had to be.

Feeling that I had to stop it, I decided to leave the carriage as well.

"Oh, I should prepare in case a battle breaks out," I said, turning Nemesis into The Flag Halberd in case of debuffs. I then used Gardranda's miasma and flame-spewing mouths, activated Gouz-Maise in case I needed extra MP or SP, donned Monochrome's hood, and equipped my Storm Visage.

As ready as I could possibly be, I walked out and started speaking. "B3, Azurite, calm down. They clearly lost all will to—"

"I-IT'S THE LEADER OF THE MONSTEEERS!"

"MOMMYYYYY!" The bandits looked even more terrified than before — screaming, fainting, falling to the ground and grinding their faces against it, or even trying to run despite being unable to even stand.

"...Why?" I tilted my head in confusion. They acted as if they'd just seen something even scarier than the other three.

"Your appearance took it to the next level..." Nemesis sighed.

"...Is it that bad? Even compared to them?" I wanted to argue, but the terrorized bandits acted as compelling proof.

Thus, the bandits, terrified by our appearances, gave up without a fight.

...I'm so lost right now, I thought.

We bound the bandits and waited for knights from the capital to come retrieve them.

The tough ropes we used, by the way, were acquired by me rolling the gacha.

At the moment, Azurite was using her Truth Discernment to question them.

Apparently, they'd only made their banditry debut this very day. They were basically a bunch of village delinquents, and they hadn't even finished leveling a single low-rank job.

Well, considering that they gave up before anyone was hurt, they would probably be released with just some community service.

...Attacking the acting ruler of Altar and a foreign prince at the same time, though, was actually a very grave crime; since they were traveling covertly, though, the bandits couldn't be punished for that. We'd asked Canglong if he was okay with this, and he approved.

They'd also learned their lesson. According to Azurite, they were pledging to lead honest lives once their punishment was over.

However, we had a little problem.

"W-We... We captured a Master and took him to our base," one of them said. There was another victim... and a Master, at that.

Apparently, the Master had surrendered without any resistance, making them overconfident and leading them to believe they could take on a carriage driven by a knight. But...

"A Master surrendered?" I asked.

"Y-Yes! He was a Master! There was one of 'em Crests on his hand!" That was strange. Again, these bandits weren't too strong. Even an ordinary member of the Gouz-Maise Gang was stronger than them. Anyone who could cross the Sauda Mountain Pass by themselves and deal with the monsters here would be able to deal with them, as well.

Maybe the Master just wanted to avoid fighting people.

"What's the Master doing right now?"

"He said we could collect a ransom for him, so we locked him in our base... it's a shack nearby." Ah-hah... He was probably planning to log out. We Masters could do that as long as we weren't interacting with anyone or bound in some way. If captured, we could undo our shackles and move to safety after logging out. It was a way of both avoiding conflict and escaping safely. Though a bit roundabout, that was probably the Master's intention.

It was safe to assume that he had already logged out and returned to safety.

...Though, for all we know, he could've been a total newbie who'd only surrendered and spoke of a ransom because he was panicking. He might've not realized that he could log out. Maybe he was even still sitting, terrified, back in their shack.

"Azurite—"

"We have some time until the knights come. I don't mind if you go check on him," she said, understanding me before I could even say anything.

"Thanks. I'm off."

And so, leaving the bandits to Azurite and B3, I traveled to their base. Riding Silver, I arrived at the shack in question in about five minutes. It was completely unlike the mountain fortress occupied by the Gouz-Maise Gang.

"Well, they were the most troublesome bandits in the kingdom," said Nemesis. "It isn't a fair comparison."

"That's true. Anyway..."

According to the bandits, they didn't leave any guards — only locked the place up. Sure enough, there was no one around, and the door sported a chain with a padlock on it.

I casually pulled on it, and my STR, buffed by Gardranda, instantly broke it.

"...Is the Master still inside?" I asked as I gently pulled on the door.

However, something inside kept it from opening.

"Who is it?" a voice from inside asked. It was far more composed than I expected.

"Uh... I'm an Altarian Master who caught the bandits. I came to help."

"Ohh, thank you. I'm a bit busy right now, so feel free to come in and wait a moment."

...Just to make sure, I'm here to help someone in need, right? I wondered. I pulled on the door again, and it seemed like whatever was holding it shut was gone.

I was still careful, in case this was a trap. "...Pardon the intrusion," I said.

"...Is that truly the correct thing to say here?" Nemesis asked. Inside, I saw a person sitting on the bed ahead.

It was a black-haired man slightly older than me. Pen in hand, he was writing something down on his memo pad. Seemingly in high-spirits, he didn't even glance at us, as though focused entirely on what he was doing.

No. That wasn't right. We weren't the only thing he wasn't looking at — he wasn't looking at anything at all.

His eyes were closed even as he was writing.

This strange sight left me speechless.

He continued writing for a good few minutes before...

"This gave me some excellent ideas," he said. "I can't wait for the result."

Finally, he opened his eyes, showing his golden pupils.

Then, he took photos of what he'd written down.

I was aware that photos you took in Dendro could be uploaded to devices on the other side as images. It wasn't a function I'd ever used, but I could tell that he was really familiar with it.

"Oh, sorry to keep you waiting," he said. "I was on a bit of a writing spree." Once he was done taking photos, he finally faced me. "You have my thanks for saving me."

...That's kind of a strange thing to say in this situation, I thought.

Well, perhaps the gratitude was expected, but I'd just watched him lose himself in whatever he was doing to the extent that he hadn't even looked at us. He probably didn't need to be "saved" by anyone. The most likely situation here was that...

"Umm, I'll be blunt... You let yourself get kidnapped, didn't you?" I asked.

"Yes," he answered without hesitation.

It was more or less what I expected, considering how composed he was and how experienced he looked.

“...Why did you do that?”

“To acquire material,” he answered. “I happen to be an author in real life.”

“...An author?”

“Yes. I let myself be abducted to further my search for writing material.”

Hearing that made me think of a certain party member of mine — Marie. She was a mangaka, and I’d heard that she was logging in to Dendro and roleplaying as an assassin for work-related research. It wasn’t surprising that there were more people out there like her.

“You can’t experience being captured by bandits in real life, can you?” he asked.

“Well... I guess not?”

At least not in Japan, I thought. I got captured by Amazons in South America once, though.

“People have the power of imagination, but it’s more difficult to imagine something you haven’t experienced and digested with your own brain. Each and every word and sight you experience first hand feeds your imagination.”

I could understand his point well enough. People could only really imagine what they saw, heard, and felt for themselves. Words you’ve never heard could never surface in your mind.

“And this is why I am here,” he said. “There are just far too many experiences that can only be acquired in this world.”

“...That’s true.” I did agree with him. There were indeed many things, both good and bad, that existed here, but not back on Earth.

“And that’s why being captured by the bandits was a precious experience to me... Oh, speaking of the bandits, how will they be punished?”

“Putting your situation aside, they’ll only get some community service.”

“Oh. I approve of that, too. I’m not entirely sure how Altar’s legal system works, but I won’t press charges. In fact, I would like to thank them.”

“I see... Hm?” His words just now made me feel like something wasn’t right... But why?

“That aside, I will take my leave now. Sorry for bothering you today.”

“Oh, no worries.”

"Pardon the late introduction, but my name is F. My job is High Secretary."

"Oh, right. I'm—"

"I know you. You're Ray Starling the Unbreakable, and Nemesis."

...That video really did make me more famous... or infamous... than ever, huh?

"I should also thank the bandits for giving me a chance to meet you. I'm so glad I was kidnapped."

That's not the kind of sentence you hear very often, but he seemed to mean it.

"I'll be going now. Let us meet again, if fate decrees it so," he said as he left the shack.

That was proof that he indeed had the power to walk through this mountain pass on his own.

I watched as he disappeared in the woods.

"Why the serious look?" Nemesis asked.

"I feel like I know someone with a similar vibe to him," I said. He reminded me of someone, but I couldn't put my finger on who.

"Is it not Marie? Authors and mangaka are similar professions, no?"

They have a similar reason for playing and share a similar "indifference," but I feel like Marie's shadiness is different than his. And... something just doesn't feel right about him.

"There's no harm in wondering about him, but for now, we should go back. The capital's knights should arrive at the carriage soon."

"...Yeah." We were currently on an escort quest to Gideon. I'd save thinking about F for later.

Chapter Two: Battle for the Penultimate Throne

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

We were greeted by Gideon's immense outer wall, which I was actually kind of nostalgic for at this point.

There were fireworks bursting up above the city as if it was New Year's. Did they have something to do with the upcoming battle between Tom and Kashimiya?

Once I led Azurite and Canglong to the count's mansion, the quest was complete. If you ignored the freezing cold atmosphere created by Azurite and B3, the sudden bandit attack, and the encounter with F, I would say that it was fairly uneventful.

When Azurite rewarded me, she said that she might call for me again tomorrow. Also, after both she and Canglong had entered the guest house, B3 heaved a particularly long, deep sigh. The trip seemed to have taken a heavy toll on her.

"...You were really tense, huh?" I asked.

"Of course I was. My position in Altar depended on how well that quest went," she said. "Unlike Eldridge, I actually want to stay in the kingdom."

Apparently, she thought she was on the verge of being added to the wanted list. Honestly, I really doubted that Azurite would go that far. It seemed like she was just trying to get a feel for Masters like B3..

Following the incident at Quartierlatin, Azurite had decided to rely more on Masters, but whether that went well depended on both tians and Masters, not just one side or the other.

Altar had both worlders and ludos, and each and every one had their own outlook. I'd heard that most of the participants in the previous war were worlders, but it was clear that the kingdom also needed the ludos to stand a chance in the upcoming round two.

This quest was like a test. She entrusted B3 — a ludo and a PK terrorist — with an escort quest to see how she would behave. The dragon carriage thing might've been just a front. Even if B3's ride was insanely good, the kingdom surely had a fair amount of dragon carriages that would have been well-suited for this trip.

Then again, despite being a PK terrorist who turned into a bad guy when she donned her armor, B3 was a sensible person, so it was hard to say that Azurite had figured out what all ludos were like just by observing her. Even Logan had been acting on the will of the imperium, though, so perhaps you could say that as long as the reward was right, ludos might be even more eager to contribute than worlders. Regardless, this event might've been one of the factors that would ultimately decide Altar's guiding principles in the coming war.

We then went to meet up with Rook and the others.

The location was the same one we'd used when meeting up with Rook and Marie for the first time — the café with the open terrace.

"So I'll finally meet your party and brother," said B3 as we walked. "I'm a bit nervous."

I'd thought it would be great for her to join us on our ventures, and I'd already asked what she thought of that. She'd said that she hadn't had much to do lately after her clan disbanded, so she didn't mind joining us.

"Ah. We're here," I said, as we arrived.

"Ray! I haven't seen you in a while!" Rook called out with a smile. Marie sat next to him.

"It really has been a while, hasn't it, Rook. You too, Marie," I replied.

This reminded me that we hadn't met since the day our plans to go to the ocean were disrupted by Tsukikage kidnapping me. It was only a week in real life, or three weeks in-game, but I felt like it had been way longer than that.

"Ray... I'm glad you seem well," said Marie.

"You too... is what I'd like to say, but you actually don't look so great," I said, noting how tired she seemed to be.

"Well, I had this and that going on... Hm?"

Marie was usually like this when she either had too much Journalist work or was handling something Elizabeth-related, so with the match coming up and Elizabeth's arranged marriage, it could honestly be either.

Also, she was glaring behind me, for some reason. Why? It was just B3.

“By the way, where’s Shu?” I asked Rook.

“He left the city for some urgent business. I have the tickets.”

Urgent business? Here? As in, not in reality? What could it be?

“By the way, who is that armored person there?” he asked.

“Ohh, let me introduce her. This is B3, my senior in real life and... armored?”

It took Rook pointing it out for me to realize that B3 had used Instant Wear to switch from her normal clothing to Magnum Colossus.

She was giving off her usual violent aura, and it was clear that she was ready to fight. “So... I have to look at your ugly mug once again, you goddamn hitman RPer.”

“And you haven’t changed a bit, you villain RPer.” B3 and Marie glared at each other, clearly ready for murder. ...I could feel their bloodlust even past their armor and sunglasses.

They seemed to know each other... Well, they were both fellow PKs who took part in the blockade around the capital. It wasn’t that surprising that they would be acquainted.

“Do you know each other from the capital blockade?” I asked.

“As if,” they both said in unison.

Huh? I guessed wrong? I thought.

“She ambushed me after my clan disbanded... Sometime after whatever happened here in Gideon,” B3 explained

...Seriously? I was wondering why I saw Marie so rarely back then. Was that the reason?

“What an awful way to put it,” said Marie. “I put my PK job on hold after I joined your party, Ray, but I received a lot of requests from newbies who wanted me to get revenge on the PK at Sauda Mountain Pass.”

...That explained it. Though, I wasn’t sure what to think about someone hiring a PK who was just doing the exact same thing north of the city.

Then again, not everyone knew that the PK in the north was the Superior Killer...

“Umm, did she PK you?” I asked B3.

“Hell no. I held ’er off. It cost me a bunch of accessories and items, though.”

“The matchup isn’t in my favor,” Marie said. “My basic shots just fall to the ground, and even Daisy did almost nothing because of your elemental defense and Dragonscale Wards. And why were you wearing that armor like you were expecting an ambush?"

"I'm really damn used to PKs who attack outta nowhere."

"...Does she mean that wolf-eared musclebeast shotacon?" Nemesis wondered telepathically.

Each of those words totally fit Rosa, but stringing them all together is too much. Tone it down, I said.

"Ray was talkin' a lot about some 'Marie' person. Funny as shit that it turned out to be you. I'll settle the score before I join Ray's party," said B3.

"Fine by me," said Marie. "I still need to complete the hit. White, black, and blue should do the trick. Coincidentally, those are the colors you're going to be once I'm done."

B3 readied her shields, while Marie brandished her handgun and dagger.

I didn't think it was a good idea for the kingdom's top PKs to fight in town in broad daylight.

Oh, wait, I thought. We're in Gideon.

"Why not use an arena?" I asked.

"That wouldn't be PK, then, would it?!" they replied in unison again, totally rejecting my suggestion.

...Why are these two so in sync with each other?! Are they secretly close friends or something?!

"They are similar in personality, so perhaps this is less about their history with each other and more about simple hatred for one's own kind," Nemesis commented.

They're not that similar. I mean, aside from the fact that they're both bespectacled PKs who hide their identities and tend to reliably provide polite and thorough exposition.

"Umm, shouldn't you stop them?" Rook asked.

"I should. The PK seems unavoidable, but that's not something you do in the middle of a city."

Honestly, they should've been moving to some mountain far from civilization. But they were even more ready to fight than before, so there was no telling what might set them off now. It was clearly "kill or be killed" between them.

...Why was it that so many women around me seemed to have some kind of "battle switch" that made them hunger for conflict? My sister was the most obvious example.

"But how can I stop them?" I wondered only a moment before the presence of a third person startled me so much I let out a gasp.

I wasn't the only one who felt it. Nemesis, Rook, and even the two battle-crazed women were staring at the source of this presence.

Who could blame us? After all, it was more overpowering than even the women's bloodlust. As for who caused it... "I sense an overworld match. It's rare for them to happen outside of Tenchi."

It was a boy clad in woolly clothing, sporting blades that didn't suit his small frame and wearing an expression full of excitement for the upcoming bloodbath.

"I would like to take part in your overworld match," he said. "I haven't had one in a while now."

The boy was The Unsheath, Kashimiya "the Guillotine."

The bloodlust of some of the kingdom's greatest PKs attracted the greatest.

Needless to say, the battle was immediately called off. The two were aware how pointless it was to fight with Kashimiya present. I couldn't help but notice how they were rubbing the back of their necks sheepishly. Kashimiya, however, looked somewhat disappointed.

Anyway, though B3 and Marie's bloodbath had been called off, they still wanted to settle the score before joining the same party, so they'd decided to do it in the arena.

I considered watching their match, but Kashimiya stopped me, saying that he wanted to have a word with me. Apparently, he hadn't found us just by chance — he'd actually been looking for me or my acquaintances.

Whatever he wanted to talk about, it seemed pretty serious, so I entrusted Marie and B3 to Rook and talked to Kashimiya.

"So, what do you need?" I asked. My only real link to Kashimiya was the time Rosa attacked me on the way to Torne, but if that's what this was about, he would be better off talking to B3.

If it wasn't that, then what could it be?

"You recently defeated the Hell General, didn't you?" he asked.

"Yeah." Now I understood. Logan was a Dryfean Superior, as well as their top-ranking duelist... though, I'd heard that the King of Thieves had defeated him and taken his throne.

Did Kashimiya want to talk about him, as a fellow high-ranking duelist?

"I want to ask about the skill you used to defeat the Hell General," he said. "How fast can it get?"

Huh? That wasn't the kind of question I expected, I thought.

"I saw the video. I believe that the skill gains more speed and power the longer you charge it... do I have it right?"

He clearly meant Payback Beyond the Stars. Apparently, it wasn't Logan he cared about, but that particular skill of mine.

"Not exactly," I answered. "It does need to be charged, but it's for the process of converting the damage I received from the enemy into power, range, and speed. The speed is actually proportional to the damage taken."

I wondered if I should be revealing so much of my hand like this, but I figured that it was now public enough knowledge that people would have it figured out sooner or later; I decided to just come right out and say how it worked.

"I... actually don't know how fast it can become. When I used it against Logan, it had 60,000 AGI, but I'm pretty sure that's not the limit."

"Hmm..." Kashimiya pondered something for a moment before speaking, "Thank you, Mr. Ray, for explaining it to me, even if it meant revealing the nature of your ability. I'm indebted to you."

"Hey, don't be. People would've had it figured out in no time."

"Even so, I insist. Also, this might be impudent of me, but could I ask you a favor?"

"What, exactly?"

"When you have time, I would like you to use that skill on me in a mock battle." I'd sparred against rankers many times by now, so I had nothing against Kashimiya joining them. There were probably many things I could learn from the kingdom's third duel ranker and strongest PK.

But... why did he want me to use Payback Beyond the Stars?

"This might sound arrogant, but... I actually don't know anyone who's faster than me at the moment."

"...Which is why 'The Kingdom's Fastest' is another one of your nicknames, huh?"

"Exactly." B3 had told me that nobody could beat Kashimiya's speed. Even the Figaro was said to be far slower than him.

"However, cutting down those who are slower than me does not help me train to cut down those who are faster." That made sense. I'd more or less gotten the point.

Payback Beyond the Stars gained more speed the more damage I'd accumulated. Theoretically, if I took enough damage, I might be able to outpace even The Kingdom's Fastest. Kashimiya wanted to face that and maybe learn something new. The Unsheath was part of the "The One" series of jobs, so perhaps it had something to do with skill creation.

Personally, I didn't mind cooperating, but...

"Hmph. So you basically want him to act as your pitching machine," said Nemesis.

"Ah. Umm... I'm sorry!" Kashimiya apologized and bowed his head, feeling that he upset Nemesis somehow. Honestly, she did look slightly offended.

"Nemesis?"

"Just think about it, Ray. Just how badly would he have to cut you up to get the speed he needed?"

"...Ohh." That was a problem. The very fact that we were talking about this meant that he was at least faster than Figaro. It was possible that I would have to take 1,000,000 damage to reach his speed.

"By the way, what's your AGI?" I asked.

"Normally, it's 5,000." Huh? That's unexpectedly slow... "But it's 500,000 when I'm using the art of sword drawing."

...Scratch that. What the hell is with that speed?! And what's with the giant gap between the two numbers?!

"...To pass that with our skill, we'd have to take 5,000,000 damage," I said.

"Oh... that doesn't work," Kashimiya replied. Even at my current HP, that would mean basically dying hundreds of times. How long would it take and how many potions would I have to drink? It was best to not even think about it.

"Cutting you up that much would be inappropriate, so never mind about that..."

"Yeah, thanks." Not even I could handle all that. It'd turn me into mincemeat.

Anyway, though we wouldn't be doing everything he asked, we did agree to have a mock battle sometime. New sparring partners were always good in my book.

I decided to hang around and chat until the three who'd gone off to the arena returned. I did consider going to watch, but I didn't know which one they'd be using... and honestly, I was kinda scared of seeing what was going on there.

"Hm..." As we talked, I belatedly noticed something about Kashimiya. His weapons were enormous katana — odachi — linked to chains capped off by decorations shaped like rabbit and shark skulls. He had two of them, both of which had the rabbit skull biting into it. They were about ten centimeters longer than Kashimiya was tall.

Such large weapons were clearly unfitting for a boy his age, and he seemed on the smaller side, too.

I also didn't forget that Kashimiya's job was The Unsheath. That was a job focused around iai — the art of drawing the sword, cutting down the opponent, and quickly resheathing it. Not even a full-grown man could do that with odachi like these, and he was just a boy.

"Umm, is there something wrong with my swords?" Kashimiya asked, curious why I was staring.

"I'm just wondering how you can perform iais with those."

"Everyone does..." So I wasn't the only one with this question.

However, the answer that followed made me somewhat confused.

"When I demonstrate, people don't even see it..."

"What?"

"It seems to be caused by the difference in AGI." He'd said that his was 500,000. It'd gotten him the title of "The Kingdom's Fastest," so it wasn't that weird that no one else could perceive it when he employed his sword skill.

"Hey, what was that about your AGI being different when you're drawing your sword?" I asked.

"It's the effect of 'Godlike Unsheathing.' That's the ultimate passive skill of The Unsheath, and it multiplies my AGI by 100 only while I'm unsheathing a blade."

That made sense to me. Real life experts of iai were said to be able to do it so fast that it looked like the sword never even left the sheath, and this skill was basically that taken to the extreme. My guess was that he could instantly cut down anyone who entered his range. It was a potent skill indeed, but like I’d been told, it seemed to be a bad match for Tom.

If it ended after the first swing, he wouldn’t be able to get rid of all eight Toms at once.

“All right, I get that you’re too fast for anyone to see you draw them, but how do you draw them? I mean, your arms aren’t even long enough to pull them all the way out, right?”

Kashimiya nodded in response and stood up.

“Well, I can show you how I am before I draw them, so let me demonstrate.”

Saying that, he assumed a posture.

It seemed to be a sword-drawing stance, but it was odd. His left hand — which would normally be holding onto the sheath — was just hanging in the air. His right hand, however, was on the grip, where it was supposed to be.

Just as I was thinking that unsheathing the sword would be impossible like that, the chains connecting Kashimiya’s waist with the blade began moving on their own.

The rabbit skull-shaped holder bit into and held the sword’s sheath in the air. It was as though the chains were taking over the left hand’s role and holding the sheath for him. Was this his...?

“You haven’t seen anything like this before, have you? This ‘tachio’... sword strap is my Embryo, Inaba.”

Inaba... as in the Hare of Inaba, clearly.

The long chains fixed the sheathed odachi in the air — specifically, at a level that made it easy for Kashimiya to unsheath it.

“A chain... no... an auxiliary arm Embryo.”

“Yes.” That answered that question. These chains explained why Kashimiya, who was small even for a boy of his young age, was able to unsheath these large blades. With support from something like this, even children were able to perform iais. Aside from the strange quirk of replacing his left arm with a chain, his stance was quite masterful.

His aura was so intense that it was hard to believe it came from a young child. My survival instincts were raising the alarm, warning me that my head could be on the ground the very next moment. This was probably what B3 and Marie had sensed.

“Thanks,” I said. “Now I get how you draw your sword.”

“You’re welcome. I’m glad I was able to answer your question.”

He then relaxed his stance, instantly dispersing the tense atmosphere around him. Maybe he was releasing a surge of some sort of “grandmaster swordsman’s essence” or something.

...Why was an elementary schooler capable of anything “grandmaster?”

Then again, the world of Dendro was no stranger to outliers of any age.

“Also, if you don’t mind me satisfying my curiosity... are these odachi both MVP special rewards?” I asked. The two blades in different sheaths — one red and one blue — seemed to have an unusual presence. The red one in particular gave me a feeling similar to what I’d felt when looking at Figaro’s Gloria α and Xunyu’s Suling Yi. If the chain was his Embryo, were the weapons special rewards?

“This one is like a special reward, yes, but the other one was crafted for me by a smith I knew back in Tenchi.” The former was the red one, while the latter was the blue one. “It’s made out of Mythical metal. It’s very reliable and it helps me a lot in duels and the like,” the boy added, all smiles, while holding the odachi with the blue sheath.

There was a subtlety there that I definitely noticed.

“You can’t say the same about the one with the red sheath?” I asked. It was as though he’d said that it was unreliable and didn’t help him in duels.

“This one... It gets moody when I try to use it inside duel barriers.”

...So, it has a mind of its own? Is it cursed or something? I wondered.

“Perhaps it’s of the same kind as Gardranda?” Nemesis commented telepathically. “The bracers aren’t saying anything now, but they do possess intelligence, yes?”

Oh yeah, they were much like that.

“So, when you fight Tom tonight...”

“I won’t use it. Mostly because I won’t be able to. I just accept that, though. It’s a blade that doesn’t leave its sheath unless it will be used in a real battle to the death, or at least an overworld match against a Master.”

What a blood-crazed hunk of metal... “But then, how do you repair it?” I asked.

Or is it best maintained by cutting living creatures? That’d fit a cursed blade perfectly.

“No. It does come out for maintenance. Like so,” he said, taking out maintenance equipment such as Japanese paper, a pot of oil, and polishing powder before removing the odachi from the red sheath without any issue at all.

It was a fancier blade than I'd realized. It had an intimidating aura, and the "Horobimaru" kanji on the blade made it look pretty cool, but I couldn't help but feel like I was looking at an unruly pet that became obedient at the promise of treats.

We talked for quite a bit longer before Kashimiya stood up.

"I will be leaving now. Thank you for talking to me today," he said.

"No problem. I'm looking forward to your match against Tom, as well as our mock battles."

"Same here! I'm looking forward to them, as well!" he said, beaming. It made him look like an ordinary boy his age... and a really good kid in general.

...But that just made the bloodlust he'd given off seem all the more out of place.

"If I may ask before you leave," Nemesis spoke up. "Do you wish to fight those stronger than yourself for the purpose of skill-crafting?"

"Yes."

"I assume you would create a powerful speed-based skill you can use against Tom?" As far as I knew, Kashimiya had lost against Tom several times now, and the reason for this was Tom's Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin.

That was the fearsome ultimate skill that allowed Tom to split into eight different people, as long as one of the eight was still alive. Kashimiya had nothing that could counter it, so he'd suffered multiple defeats against Tom by now.

With that in mind, trying to develop a counter was indeed a very good way of preparing for the... fight... Hm?

Nemesis, that can't be right. While we were still considering it, Kashimiya said that he wanted me to help whenever I had free time. Therefore, the skill he would make wouldn't be for use against Tom.

"That isn't exactly the case," said Kashimiya. "That isn't why I want to craft a new skill."

"Really?"

"Also... I already have a counter."

"Eh?" question marks appeared above our heads.

"I already have a means to remove all eight heads of the Monster Cat Mansion." He said that as casually as he would speak about buying groceries for dinner, looking completely certain of his victory.

His attitude didn't match the carefree words at all, however.

"I'll show you the skill in today's match. I'm sorry if you don't see it," Kashimiya said before bowing and leaving.

From the back, he looked just like a small child. However, the intimidating aura he'd given off when he mentioned that he had a counter to Tom was much like the one I'd felt when I'd first met Xunyu before The Clash of the Superiors... only even more deadly.

"...The world is truly full of absurd children," said Nemesis.

"...Indeed it is," I nodded before sighing in relief as tension left my body.

◇

After Kashimiya left, Rook and the others returned. It... didn't look like the issues between Marie and B3 had totally vanished, but at least they had nothing against partying up now.

For the record, I didn't ask which one of them won. I felt like that would be like throwing fuel on some still-hot embers.

Anyway, with all four of us here, we headed to the central arena.

"So Shu's been training you since then, huh?" I asked.

"Yes!" Rook replied. "Ah, but... it was hellish." He remembered something that made the smile on his face vanish.

O, dear brother of mine, do not cast my friend into hell, I thought.

"After the battle training, I just did some powerleveling," he continued.

"What level are you now?" I asked. With my Paladin level at 100 and Prism Rider level at 40, my total level was now 140. As a low-rank job, Prism Rider was capped at 50, but I still hadn't decided what I would take after I maxed it out.

"My total level is 290. My current main job, High Tamer, is at level 40. I already maxed out Tamer and Harlot."

...He's more than double my level! I thought in shock. This gave me flashbacks to the time before we partied up at the capital. "I know I've got college and stuff, but he's so far ahead of me now," I muttered.

“...Rook always gets stronger so fast that we don’t even notice it,” Nemesis added, and I was inclined to agree. I could totally imagine coming back to find him with all his low and high-rank jobs maxed out... or perhaps even with a Superior Job.

His “Harlot” job made me raise an eyebrow, but apparently he’d taken it because it offered a passive skill which increased the success rate of Charm. That skill, along with his tamed monsters, was his lifeline, so I could understand his reasoning.

“During this round of powerleveling, I used XP-increasing items and traveled through high monster population areas with Babi and the others. I still had money from the incident a month ago.”

“XP-increasing items... Didn’t know they existed.”

“Oh no no,” said Marie. “Just so you know, even with an XP boost, you never get levels as fast as Rookie did. If XP boosts were that powerful, Journalists would be in higher demand.”

So they weren’t that extreme, huh?

“I just had lots of free time. After the incident with Gerbera, I spent about five real life days not sleeping or resting so I could just hunt constantly... I’m actually kinda sleepy... right... now...” Rook said, his head wobbling like it had earlier.

“Hey! Take care of your body, damn it! That can’t be good for the real you!” I cried out.

“I did some training to help me stay active for longer without sleeping. I’m totally finay and oke.”

“Now you’re not even speaking properly!” Nothing ever showed on his face, so you could never tell if something was wrong with him!

“I’m not getting much sleep, either,” said Marie. “I’ve been busy with preparations recently...”

“Preparations? You’re gonna cover today’s big duel?” I asked.

“No. This is for the DIN-sponsored... Oh dear, I can’t say that yet.”

“Well, that’s fine, I guess. I did notice that you looked tired, though. So that’s what it’s about, huh? I assumed it was related to either the duel or Elizabeth’s marriage interview.”

Marie and Elizabeth were close, so I wouldn’t have been surprised if she’d been asked to do something for the interview. “There’s some ordinary journalists covering today’s duel... Wait. Hold on a second. What did you just say?" Marie grabbed me by my scruff and glared at me.

I'm scared.

"On my way back here, I was acting as Azurite's... the first princess' and the third prince of Huang He's bodyguard," I explained. "During our chats, I learned that Elizabeth and the prince would be having a formal marriage interview."

At hearing this, Marie buried her face in her hand and threw her head back.

"Ellie's... going to a... marriage interview... engagement... marriage... birth... They're rushing things! Big sis doesn't approve!"

"You're the one rushing through this with all those predictions... And her big sis is Azurite, not you."

"GHAH!" Marie heard my response and collapsed where she stood.

"...I know you get along with Elizabeth, but does this really hit you that hard?" And so, carrying Marie — who was mumbling something to herself — we went to the arena.

We gathered into a box seat like the one we'd used last time and waited for the duel to begin.

Marie was still moaning and mumbling, and I occasionally heard some terrifying words, like "Third prince... assassination... engagement canceled..."

Please don't cause an international incident. Azurite will die inside, I thought.

"Also, you're already talking about engagement, but so far they're just at the marriage interview stage," I said.

"Ngh... I'll hope that Ellie has good taste in men."

...If she does, then you better prepare to congratulate them on their engagement.

Canglong was extremely mature and stable for someone his age, and they would no doubt make a fine couple. ...As long as Marie didn't assassinate him, anyway.

"Well, this is a negotiation between a prince and a princess. All we can do is watch how it pans out."

"Nngh... Ellie..." Marie groaned as she rolled on the ground, took out a sketchbook, and began drawing a portrait of a girl — most likely Elizabeth.

...Am I looking at a person with a strange kind of sister complex? I wondered.

“More like a lolita co—”

Nemesis, some things need to be left unsaid.

Anyway, we had about half an hour until the main event started, so I decided to buy some drinks and snacks. Marie was still sulking, while Rook and Babi were napping. I didn’t feel good about leaving B3 there all by herself, so I had Nemesis keep her company.

As I walked towards the store, I noticed the central arena’s reception area.

It was taking the final bets for the coming main event. The odds were 1.3x for Tom and 5.5x for Kashimiya. It reminded me of the odds I’d seen for The Clash of the Superiors, but those had been affected by Figaro being the local favorite.

The difference here was purely due to their battle history and abilities. Kashimiya had lost against Tom all four times he’d challenged him. Apparently, he was so unable to deal with Tom’s ability to multiply and split that almost nobody had any hopes for a Kashimiya victory.

Also, it was widely known that Kashimiya had been inactive for a time, so most were predicting that Tom would just win again.

...Since I was here already, I figured I might as well bet on one of them.

The odds and the info available made it seem like Tom was the likely winner... but I couldn’t help but consider what Kashimiya said to me.

That had been no bluff. I could tell that he was at least confident in his victory.

“Well, I guess I’ll bet on... him.” I eventually just let my intuition guide me and went through the betting process. Though, I did make sure to bet less than I had on Figaro.

“...Huh?” After betting, I checked today’s notice board and saw info about the semi-event, the betting for which was already over. I’d focused so much on the main event that I completely forgot the semi-event, which also happened to involve names I knew well.

Fallen Knight, Juliet VS Nobushi Princess, Rosa.

I returned to the box to see that the semi-event had already begun.

“TCH! It’s really damn annoyin’ how you’re scamperin’ about, Juliet!”

“Blackwing Requiem!” Rosa was clad in the exoskeleton created by the ultimate skill she’d employed against us, as well. Juliet, on the other hand, was attacking her with dark elemental magic attacks from the air, where Rosa couldn't reach her.

We had experienced first-hand just how tough Rosa's exoskeletons were, but the dark elemental black orbs released by Juliet's feathers were dealing steady damage to her.

The main quality of dark elemental magic was its anti-life properties. It dealt nearly no damage to objects, but in exchange for not being effective against as wide a range of targets, it could ignore most physical defenses when it did deal damage. Apparently, it would fare differently against magical barriers or its natural enemy — light — but in this case, where the opponent was merely clad in tough armor, it bypassed that almost as if it didn't exist. With Rosa being so focused on the physical defense from her exoskeletons, it was fair to say that this matchup was in Juliet's favor.

Rosa, on the other hand, couldn't even bring Juliet down to the close range that she specialized in. Her only means of fighting were jumping or throwing her spear, but that was far from enough to make up for the gap in mobility created by Hræsvelgr, which allowed Juliet to fly around freely.

It was clear who had the upper hand in both offense and defense.

"...I can see why the odds were 1.2x against 5.6x." Rosa had had a chance here. The Nobushi Princess ultimate job skill, A Kill Supreme, was the most damaging skill in Rosa's arsenal, and with duels disallowing Brooches, that skill could end it all right away.

However, the fact that the battle was still continuing was proof that she had missed. A Kill Supreme was a surprise attack skill, after all, so it was probably hard to land it from the front.

Juliet still hadn't used her ultimate skill. She was fully focused on evasion and long-range dark elemental magic attacks.

"She looks used to this," commented Nemesis. "They're fourth and fifth in the rankings. I suppose they fight quite often?"

"They do. Rosa's challenged the Black Crow many times now," said B3. "If she takes fourth, she'll be right next to Kashimiya in third, you know?"

"A wolf-eared musclebeast stalker shotacon to the core, eh?"

"...You added a new word to that!" I shouted.

"All of those words do apply to her, but I recommend against actually saying that in front of her." Anyway, the duel continued, but Juliet still seemed to have the advantage.

One of the reasons for this was Rosa's lack of composure.

Like B3 mentioned, if Kashimiya won his battle today, he would be second in the rankings. Was she acting like this because she feared Kashimiya might be even further away from her if that happened?

Regardless, Juliet, being the skilled ranker that she was, was taking advantage of every opening created by Rosa's panic, slowly but surely chipping away at her HP.

And once it reached a certain threshold...

"Corpse-Eating Bird — Hræsvelgr!"

...Juliet used her ultimate skill to finish her off.

It created a black tornado combining the power of dark and wind magic.

A direct hit from that quickly ended the fight... Or so I thought.

"That's... the skill from back then!" Rosa's body, which had been bleeding within the tornado, had been replaced by a decoy before anyone realized it.

That was the special reward she'd used when she'd attacked us, too.

"Aren't these kinds of items forbidden in duels?" I asked.

"You can't use Lifesaving Brooches, Dragonscale Wards, or consumable restoration items," B3 said. "But special rewards are exceptions."

That reminded me that Figaro's Closer had worked just like that.

"More importantly, Rosa is now... there, eh?" B3 was looking behind Juliet.

Now without her exoskeleton, she was brandishing her spear — Gashadokuro.

"Backslayer!" Rosa used an active skill which, according to B3, increased damage when attacking from behind, and thrust Gashadokuro forward. The damage was great enough to pierce even through the hardy armored gothic-style dress that Juliet was wearing.

Because she was still using her ultimate skill, Juliet couldn't dodge it. The tornado channeled through her arms vanished, and Juliet collapsed towards the stage. But just then, she grabbed hold of Gashadokuro with both arms.

"The Darkness of Valediction." Once she'd used that skill, a black, mud-like darkness began to creep up Gashadokuro's handle.

The Darkness of Valediction was an active skill from the Dark Knight grouping, and it was basically the opposite of the Purifying Silverlight we Paladins had. In exchange for some of the Dark Knight's HP, it briefly cursed the weapon they wielded. Since Dark Knights could overcome curses, it essentially allowed them to increase the power of their weapons...

"Shit! You got me with this one...!"

...as well as make an enemy's weapon completely unusable. Once cursed, Gashadokuro couldn't even be used by its Master. If Rosa tried, she would be subjected to curses that, among other things, limited her movements and continuously reduced her HP.

I had been in serious danger when Juliet had used it against me in one of our mock battles. If I hadn't used Purifying Silverlight, Nemesis would've been cursed, too.

Being a vanguard build, Nobushi Princess, Rosa, didn't have Purifying Silverlight or any uncurse skill, and consumables like Holy Water weren't allowed in duels. Thus, the only way for her to deal with the curse was to let go of her Embryo.

"Tch!" Rosa let go of Gashadokuro and used Instant Equip to take out a spare spear, but then...

"Reverse Crusade!"

...a black light — dark elemental energy that chipped life away — surged out from the surface.

This was the Dark Knight's equivalent of a Paladin's Grand Cross — their ultimate job skill. Caught in the torrent of darkness, Rosa lost HP and mobility all at once.

While that was happening, Juliet took out a small, bag-like inventory with her left hand, and cut it open with the sword in her right. Once broken, the bag released an enormous amount of cursed weapons, swathed in black or red auras.

Either gathered by Juliet or simply cursed by her afterwards, they were all cursed blades... and her bullets.

"Cursed Phalanx..." Juliet pointed the tip of the sword in her right hand towards Rosa, still bound and unable to move in the torrent of darkness. "...DISORDER!" She unleashed her skill, launching the many cursed weapons littered about the arena.

This was the ultimate job skill of the Fallen Knight: Cursed Phalanx Disorder. It was a truly devastating, expensive ability that, in exchange for the user's HP and MP, animated those bloodthirsty weapons, setting them all on the enemy. It basically turned them into homing missiles. The cursed weapons were akin to crazed beasts, moving in chaotic patterns as they went to bite into their target — in this case, Rosa.

"UOAAAGHH!" Rosa somehow jumped clear of the Reverse Crusade's torrent and used the spear she had equipped to try and fend off the cursed weapons coming her way.

I couldn't tell whether she was just that good of a fighter or if she was simply being stubborn. Even though she was wounded by many of the weapons, she managed to parry the ones that would have killed her. Which would give out first: Juliet's curses, or Rosa's HP?

Beyond the curtain of cursed weaponry, Juliet stood, joining her hands as though preparing to use Corpse-Eating Bird — Hræsvelgr again.

"Huh...?!" Rosa looked at her in shock, seemingly unable to believe that Juliet could cast her ultimate skill again after all that.

It was just a bluff, though. Neither the cooldown nor her mana reserves allowed Juliet to cast her ultimate skill again.

The bluff was enough to distract Rosa, however. Using this opening, a single cursed weapon pierced her abdomen.

It was none other than the newly-cursed Gashadokuro.

For all I knew, she might've been unable to sense it coming because it was her own weapon.

Regardless, the attack was fatal, and it paved the way for more weapons to strike home.

"Liberation!"

And then Juliet used the final skill, releasing all the curses within her arsenal and obliterating Rosa in a massive explosion.

Thus, Juliet emerged victorious.

Considering that she was above Rosa in rank and the matchup definitely favored her, this result was expected. Still, the ability, technique, and strategy involved in this battle was extremely high-level.

"She really made good use of her ultimate job skill, didn't she?" said B3.

"She did," I nodded. "Though, honestly, she might've lost without it."

This was my second time seeing the Fallen Knight's ultimate job skill. The first time was during a mock battle, when she'd used it to utterly defeat me.

Though, from what I could recall, that skill was what she called her "secret weapon." She'd told me that it was an ace up her sleeve she would eventually use against Kashimiya or Tom, and that she hadn't used it in any public matches.

That was probably why she'd tested it in a mock battle against me — a non-ranker.

Of course, she'd told me to be quiet about it. "In regards to my most esoteric of powers, I seek nothing less than supreme silence. Exchange with me a blood vow that it shall never reach the ears of worldlings," she'd said, which basically meant, "It's a secret! Pinky promise!"

The fact Juliet had used it against Rosa — a challenger — rather than someone who was higher in the rankings, meant that she'd been backed into quite a precarious situation.

Rosa's substituting special reward and Juliet's ultimate job skill. In a way, this was a battle where both sides bared their abilities to each other and fought as hard as they could. The performance was definitely worthy of praise and applause.

And with the semi-event over, it was time for the match between Tom and Kashimiya.

"TO THE EAST! WE HAVE THE CHALLENGEEERRR! THE THIRD IN THE DUEL RANKINGS... THE UNSHEATH, KASHIMIYAAAAAAAAA!" As the announcer finished, a plume of smoke appeared around the western entrance.

The stage of the central arena had two entrances — one to the west and one to the east — and the east one was usually used by the challenger. During The Clash of the Superiors, Xunyu had entered through the east, as well. Kashimiya now did the same.

At his sides, Kashimiya had an odachi in a blue sheath and another sword about the same size in a green sheath. Since he couldn't use the red one in duels with barriers, he must've taken the green one as a substitute.

"TO THE WEST! WE HAVE THE SECOND IN THE DUEL RANKINGS... THE LYNX, TOM! CAAAAAAAAAAT!" Tom entered from the west. He looked the same as he had in Quartierlatin, complete with the fat cat — Grimalkin — on his head. Naturally, there was still just one of him.

The two gathered on the stage, set the duel rules, and made some distance between them.

All that was left was to wait for the start of the match.

Kashimiya's chains were already floating, and he was ready to draw his sword.

"Logically speaking, Kashimiya will move the moment the match starts," B3 said as we all waited eagerly.

"I don't know much about Tom Cat... but I did hear the rumors, particularly the one that says that your only chance at beating him is right as the match begins."

"...I see." Tom's multiplication was a result of his ultimate skill, Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin, which he couldn't activate before the match actually started. It was reasonable to argue that if you were able to defeat him before he used it, you wouldn't have to deal with his clones. It seemed obvious, really, but so far, no one had actually been able to do it.

Tom surely had something that let him survive long enough to activate the skill. In fact, it had to be so potent that it couldn't even be overcome by Kashimiya's insane slashing speeds.

Or had Kashimiya developed something that had allowed him to shatter Tom's defense? As I was considering that... the moment finally arrived.

"LET THE MATCH... BEGIN!" The moment the start of the duel was announced, Tom threw Grimalkin into the air.

"Hm...?" Kashimiya, on the other hand, wasn't moving at all.

"...Why?" This moment was said to be his only chance, yet he did absolutely nothing.

He was only waiting for Tom to finish splitting.

"Now dance, Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin." Apparently, even Tom was bracing for Kashimiya to act right away, and was confused when he didn't.

Regardless, he'd instantly activated the skill, and the Grimalkin he'd thrown into the air to keep him safe became Tom. Both then split again, until finally there were eight of him. Now, Kashimiya had to defeat them all faster than they could multiply.

However, he hadn't moved at all, even though Tom's preparations were already complete.

Tom seemed to find it strange, as well. He sent one of himself to act as a scout. He moved so fast that he became a blur despite the slowdown from the barrier, but once he was close to Kashimiya, his head fell off and vanished.

The barrier had slowed it all down, but I couldn't even see what happened anyway.

"...What was that?" I couldn't see the moment the blade was unsheathed. It went from its sheath to fully drawn as if I was seeing it frame-by-frame... and Tom — who was moving at supersonic speeds, by the way — simply no longer had a head.

Tom quickly multiplied and recreated the eighth, but if Kashimiya's opponent had been anyone else, this battle would've already been over.

Tom was best known for his clones, but he was powerful even when he was alone. He was a Superior Job holder with a lot of battle experience, and even without his clones, he would still be a highly ranked duelist.

Despite that, Kashimiya the Guillotine instantly chopped his head off.

"Did Kashimiya remove all of Tom's HP with just a single hit?"

"That's not exactly right, Nemesis. I'm pretty sure that what killed him was an injury-based debuff."

Some of the first status effects I'd ever had were Broken Left Arm and Broken Right Leg, so honestly, it wouldn't be that strange if there was a Severed Neck debuff. Its effect as a debuff? Instant death, of course. ...It was basically the human equivalent of targeting a monster's core.

"So he lopped off the defenseless head with his speed alone, eh?" Nemesis continued. "But wouldn't that not work on people with high END, or those clad in armor?"

The one to answer that question was B3.

"In eastern swordfighting, there's a passive skill called 'Blade Speed-Through.' If the opponent wasn't able to defend against your attack, the opponent would lose END equal to 10% of your AGI multiplied by your skill level."

So, with 1,000 AGI and skill level 1, the opponent would lose 100 END, and with skill level 10, it would be 1,000 END.

"Kashimiya almost certainly has this skill maxed out at 10," she continued. "However, the speed of Kashimiya's blade is already so insane that END basically doesn't exist for him."

"...By the way, can the END go below 0?" I asked.

"That's the only saving grace of that skill." It was hard for me to imagine what having a negative END would be like, but apparently, Kashimiya's attacks couldn't do that to you.

"You said it reduces END, so I assume the defense from armor stays the same?" Rook asked.

"Yes. However, Kashimiya also has the attack power of his weapons. With all those unsheathing-based active skills on his attacks, it's difficult to withstand them with just defense from equipment... He could even cut through my Magnum Colossus, unless I used Astro Guard." B3 spoke, rubbing her neck.

The match continued even as she explained the situation.

Kashimiya returned the blade that had felled Tom's head back to its sheath, then became immobile again as though waiting for something.

What could it be?

"Sgh!" Since Kashimiya remained immobile, Tom moved first.

The eight Toms all equipped bows, throwing knives, and other mid-range weapons. At supersonic speeds, they split up and moved to encircle Kashimiya.

Kashimiya's silence and stillness was contrasted with the sound of Toms' feet hitting the stage as he ran. Tom continued to attack him from a distance, watching out for Kashimiya's techniques, but Kashimiya evaded them all with only slight movements of his body.

However, Tom anticipated his movements and released a focused attack from an angle he thought would make it impossible for Kashimiya to evade. For a moment, I pictured Kashimiya with tons of arrows and knives stuck in him...

"Hareshark Nullstep."

...but, for a brief moment, a magic circle with patterns reminiscent of sharks appeared beneath his feet. The next moment, Kashimiya appeared several dozen metels away... right next to a Tom.

This was followed by the Tom's head falling to the ground.

"Was that... teleportation?" When I'd first encountered Kashimiya, he'd appeared before me seemingly out of nowhere, just as he had just now. He probably used the same skill as he had that time, but as far as I knew, only ultimate skills were powerful enough to allow you to teleport. But that name clearly wasn't that of an ultimate skill.

"Hareshark Nullstep," B3 said. "That's Kashimiya's Embryo's — Inaba's — active skill."

I appreciated the explanation.

"With Brother Bear not present and Maria being useless, B3's explanations sure are welcome," said Nemesis telepathically.

Yeah, I thought. And man, I sure have a lot of explainers around me.

"The shark-like magic circle that appeared below him for a moment is basically a moving floor." She called it "shark-like," but honestly, I couldn't actually get a good look at it, myself.

"So it's not teleportation?"

"No. It's not nearly as useful. In fact, for an Embryo's unique skill, it's extremely lackluster."

"Lackluster?"

"All it does is let you move at speeds allowed by your AGI without actually using your legs. The benefit is that as long as you're inside the circle, you aren't subjected to air resistance or inertia and can move while maintaining your unsheathing stance. In the hands of anyone but Kashimiya, it would be a very unremarkable skill."

It let you move without using your legs, but your speed didn't change, huh? Well, that did sound like an unremarkable skill, but...

"So it would be unremarkable if Kashimiya wasn't The Unsheath, huh?"

"Yes." With Godlike Unsheathing, Kashimiya's AGI reached 500,000 whenever he was drawing his sword. So, if he timed his Hareshark Nullstep movements with the motion for unsheathing, the AGI used for the skill would be 500,000. That made it extremely easy to approach the enemy and slice their head off.

"...On the other hand, Tom's dealt with this skill many times now, huh?" At the same time, I now understood why Tom didn't just attack Kashimiya with all the clones at once. Tom made best use of his regeneration ability by leaving one of him in safety while letting the other seven fight, even if it costs them their lives, but with Kashimiya's movement ability, that was a bad idea.

It wasn't impossible for Kashimiya to cut down all the Toms ganging up on him, then use Hareshark Nullstep to cover the distance between him and the final clone to kill him, as well. Kashimiya had two odachis, as well as four arms, counting his own and his Embryo. It wouldn't be hard for him to slash twice in a row.

Tom was aware of this, and that was why he didn't fight him by ganging up on him, instead electing to keep his distance. Kashimiya was only fast while he was unsheathing, so his super speed on Hareshark Nullstep also couldn't last forever. Unless at least one Tom was in range, Kashimiya couldn't cut down all of them.

"This battle would've been long over if he was fighting anyone else but Tom." Kashimiya's ability was nearly a match even for those of the Superiors I knew. In fact, if he fought Logan, he could easily break through the devil army and decapitate him.

I now understood why Juliet and the other rankers said that Kashimiya was the true second strongest ranker. If compatibility hadn't gotten in the way, I honestly wouldn't be so sure if Figaro would still be the current duel champion. Kashimiya had just as much of a claim to the throne.

"...The Embryo and Kashimiya's abilities are just so well-matched," Nemesis said. She had a point. Auxiliary arm-chains, Hareshark Nullstep... Kashimiya's Inaba was all about the art of unsheathing.

To be more precise, it was focused on making the art usable to someone of his small stature. Inaba made up for both his short arms that were unsuited to drawing a sword as well as his short cutting range.

Embryo abilities weren't unrelated to Master personalities, though. With that in mind, did Kashimiya have a reason that drove him to pour so much of himself into the art of unsheathing?

"...This seems like it'll keep going forever," Rook said as he observed the match.

Well, it did look like a stalemate. Tom wasn't able to break through the combo of Kashimiya's unsheathing and Hareshark Nullstep, but Kashimiya also couldn't defeat all of the Toms. They both lacked moves they could play.

"In their previous duels, Tom always won because Kashimiya always ran through all his SP by using too many skills," said B3. "So it's a battle of attrition, huh?" Apparently, despite being so broken, Tom's Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin was unusually efficient. Of course, Tom also didn't use other skills along with it, but that was the reason why there was such a gap in their stamina.

It was looking like Kashimiya would once again be unable to topple this fortress and... Hm?! "Ray?" B3 looked at me.

"What's wrong, Ray? You look pale," said Nemesis. Both of them seemed worried.

Was my expression that surprising?

Even if it was... I wasn't actually sure why. As I watched Kashimiya, I suddenly felt an unexplained chill run down my spine.

B3 and Nemesis didn't seem to feel it, though.

Rook, too... Wait, no.

"..."

He was feeling the exact same way I was. Just like me, he was immensely shocked by something, but didn't know what it was.

"What was that...? Huh?" Just then, I noticed something strange.

The entire arena was oddly quiet.

Everyone was staring at the stage in confusion.

On the stage, there was Kashimiya, slowly returning an odachi to its yellow sheath.

You could no longer hear the footsteps of the Toms surrounding him.

Instead, there were eight headless corpses littering the stage, all with their heads lying next to them.

"Personalized Mystic Blade Technique: Octachrome Thunder." After Kashimiya whispered that, the eight bodies... the eight Toms became light.

A moment later, the barrier vanished. That could mean only one thing.

Kashimiya had defeated Tom.

"...I-IT'S OVERRRR! THE WINNER IS THE UNSHEATH, KASHIMIYA! WITH THIS, KASHIMIYA RISES TO SECOND IN THE RANKIIIINNGS!" The announcer belatedly realized what was happening on the stage and hurried to announce the conclusion, which was followed by a roar from the crowd. It wasn't praise of the winner or the duel itself. Everyone was merely... confused. Just like me, they wondered when it had even ended.

And so, without anyone seeing the conclusion or any sign of it... the duel was over.

All that we knew was that Kashimiya ascended to second place in the rankings, giving him the right to challenge Figaro.

...Wait, no. There's one more thing.

"Hm? Ray, why are you spacing out like that? What's that ticket in your hand?" Nemesis asked.

"...I bet on this duel."

"Again? So, just like on The Clash of the Superiors, you bet on the one who had higher odds, but this time ended up losing, eh? That's how gambling usually goes. How much did you bet, anyway?"

"Fifty."

"Fifty lir? That's absurdly little."

"Fifty... million."

"...Hold on. Wait, wait, wait, wait, YOU IDIOT!"

Nemesis gave me an indescribable look, grabbed my collar, and shook me back and forth.

"F-Fifty mi... A-Are you stupid?! That's so much money, so much... EEEEHHH?!" Unable to process reality, Nemesis couldn't even speak properly.

Marie and B3 looked at me with faces asking "What did you do wrong?"

Rook, however, was all smiles, clearly following the whole thing.

"Nemesis. You've got it all wrong. It's the other way around."

"Wh-What do you mean?!"

"I mean that... I bet on Kashimiya."

"...Huehh?"

Nemesis was now so dumbfounded that it looked like her mental circuits had shorted out.

"I went and bet on Kashimiya. He looked pretty confident when we met him today."

And he went on to win. With his odds being 5.5x, my 50,000,000 lir was now 250,000,000. Wow.

"...I have so much to say that my words are all stuck in my throat. I've just got one thing for you," Nemesis spoke with a completely exhausted expression as she stared into my eyes. "Stop gambling. It's scary."

Those words, coming from the bottom of her heart, left me unsure how to respond. All that came out of my mouth was...

"...Does gacha count as gambling?"

In response, I received a very familiar dropkick.

Interlude: The One Who Arrives and the One Who Finds

South of Gideon the City of Duels, natural area

Beyond the plains to the south of Gideon, there was a sprawling forest growing out of a vast expanse of hills. Further south than that, there was the Altar-Legendaria border, but it lay within an untamed land inhabited by powerful monsters, so there were no border checkpoints or anything of the kind.

In a way, the area itself was like the dividing line between fairyland and the kingdom.

On this day, inside — or, rather, above — the dense forest, something gigantic was traveling northwards.

It was a pair of objects that looked like upside-down towers. With each of them being about a kilometel in height, the twin objects waded through the forest and left footprints on the plains.

The word "footprints" was quite apt, seeing as the two towers were being used as boots by the lady standing above them.

She was none other than King of Berserk, Hannya — the Superior that had recently been released from the gaol.

The boot-towers were Sandalphon, her Superior Embryo, and she was heading north because that was where she would find her beloved.

However, Hannya stopped once she came across something else of considerable size.

It was a giant tank... no... a land-battleship with a particularly wide hull.

At first, Hannya thought it was just another obstacle and prepared to kick it out of her way, but then she noticed a man in a costume waving at her from the deck.

"Yooo! Haven't seen you in a beary long time," he said, making Hannya certain that it was someone she knew — Shu Starling.

"It really has been a while, hasn't it?" she said. "Figaro said that he had a health checkup and couldn't come to greet me, so you'd be coming instead. He said you'd be wearing a bear costume, so I knew it was you right away. Sorry for the trouble."

"It's fine, I was fur-ree anyway."

And it's better to stay close in case you do something you shouldn't, Shu added internally, not daring to say it out loud. I'm still worried about the other bomb I left in Gideon, but that one probably won't go off if I'm away for just a short amount of time.

"So, is Gideon far from here?" Hannya asked.

"Two hours away by Baldr. Hop on in, bear-ace yourself, and we'll be there in no time," Shu answered.

"I'll do just that, then. Sandalphon has been doing nothing but walking for who knows how long now."

...I can tell by the footprints spreading out towards the horizon, Shu thought, looking into the distance.

"Also, it's so chaotic back there that I'm feeling a bit tired. The moment I came out, I appeared in Legendaria's 'spirit capital' of Amneal, and I was instantly surrounded by tons of players."

"...Fur-om where did you start walking on Sandalphon?" Shu asked.

"Amneal, of course. Sandalphon is my only mode of transport."

So you appeared with that thing next to the capital... Of course they'd surround you, Shu thought.

"I didn't want to waste time with them, so I kicked them away before making my way north."

"...You said you were attacked by Masters. Did you see a muscled, half-naked, over-bear-ing macho pro-wrestler; an absolute freak in green clothes and a mask; or a fussy-looking, silent guy with a monocle?"

"I'm not sure. I don't remember... What about you, Sandalphon?"

"I did not see anyone fitting those descriptions, Lady Hannya," Hannya's Embryo replied.

So she didn't fight any of Legendaria's Superiors. That's a relief, Shu thought and breathed a sigh.

"All right, then," he said. "I'll take you to Gideon."

"Thank you. Figaro isn't around, though, so I'm logging out the moment I'm there."

"Oh, he'll fur sure come online the day after tomorrow, this world's time.”

“I see. I’ll also log on at about then. I’m dying to see him,” Hannya said as she hopped on Baldr and the twin towers transformed into a boy.

Thus, the two Superiors rode the land-battleship towards Gideon.

A certain man was watching them from between the trees.

His left eye was closed, but his right followed the land-battleship.

Going by that Embryo’s form... and the data from Libra, that’s one of the gaol’s Superiors: King of Berserk, Hannya. So you can leave that place, he thought as he wrote something down on his notepad.

There was something right next to him. It was so bizarre that it was hard to even tell if it was a living creature or something inorganic.

The easiest way to describe it was “a balance scale monster.” One dish of the scale held an eye, and the other held a status window with Hannya’s name. The balance was tipping in the latter’s favor.

Once the dish reached the surface, the scale monster vanished, leaving behind six black orbs. The man picked them up and put them in the Embryo crest on the back of his left hand.

I considered going to my little sister in Legendaria and staying there until the war resumed... but this intrigues me somewhat.

In Infinite Dendrogram, Superiors were big names. You could find info about Hannya and what she said at the gaol just by surfing the internet for a bit.

Two Superiors. Figaro and Hannya. Her prior conviction and nature. This is very intriguing, indeed, he processed all this information and cracked a smile. I smell a potential scoop. I might get material unlike any I’ve found so far.

With such thoughts on his mind, the man began walking.

However, right as he was about to leave the forest, something jumped him.

“GHOOAAARRGH!”

It was a Bloody Drag-Tiger — a fearsome, Pure-Dragon-tier part of local fauna that could claw and bite at speeds approaching that of sound, making it a fearsome opponent for many creatures.

The man didn’t even have time to react to the attack that came almost as soon as the roar reached his ears. The beast closed its maw on the man’s head, only to have its upper and lower jaws split continuously.

The upper part, along with the rest of the head and the brain within, fell right into the man's open left palm, while the lower part and the entire rest of the body passed him by and pathetically collapsed in front of him.

Where they split, both sides were scorched as though cut by something extremely hot.

The head in the man's hand looked at the miserable pile of flesh in confusion before dissolving into bits of light, leaving behind only loot — its fur.

A surprise attack by a wild beast is a rare occurrence in real life, but I'm already bored of it. Unlike with people, I can't even capture and examine them...

As he thought this, clearly unamused, a black, floating orb approached from an uncertain direction, and he put them in his crest just as he had with the ones left behind by the scale monster.

Well, let's go watch this unique event unfold. The tangles between Superiors struck by blinding passion must be something yet unobserved.

The man imagined what would happen next, cracked a smile, and walked towards the city of Gideon.

Chapter Three: The Start of the Festival

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Following Tom and Kashimiya's duel, we all went to dine at a place recommended by Chelsea, known for the huge amounts of good food it offered. The dinner doubled as B3's welcoming party, and I'd obviously picked the place because it had enough food to sate Nemesis.

Needless to say, as the lucky better, I was the one to pay.

I happened to be the party's leader, so I didn't mind doing that much.

...Yeah, despite consistently being the lowest level among us, I somehow ended up being the leader. B3 also said that this seemed best to her, so her joining didn't change that at all.

If you ignored the fact that Marie had yet to recover from the news regarding Elizabeth, the dinner-party was going quite well.

"Did you figure it out, Rook?" I asked.

"Well, I have a few theories, but I don't have enough evidence to say anything conclusive."

"Same as me, then. I think it has something to do with the change in the sheath's color."

"Yeah, that stood out for me, as well."

We were currently discussing how Kashimiya was able to behead all eight Toms.

With Gideon being the Mecca of duels, most of the other customers were talking about the exact same thing. Some said it was a new skill he'd woven, others said it was a new MVP special reward, and some even entertained the idea that he might have finally evolved into a Superior.

Aside from that, they were discussing when Kashimiya would challenge Figaro, with the general consensus being that the day was swiftly approaching.

Kashimiya — Altar's strongest PK — versus Figaro — Altar's strongest solo player.

It was a matchup that would make any duel enthusiast salivate, and many thought that it would be an event that would match — or even surpass — The Clash of the Superiors.

I noticed B3 staring at the still surface of her cold fruit drink, deep in thought.

"Is something wrong?" I asked.

"No, it just... made me think a bit," she said. "I have losses against both of them, after all."

Oh, right. B3 had lost against Figaro at the Sauda Mountain Pass... in quite a gruesome way, too.

And she'd already told me that she'd fought against Kashimiya and lost against him, as well.

"As someone who fought them both, which one do you think would win?" Marie asked her, after seemingly recovering a bit.

B3 thought for a moment before answering. "Do you mean in a duel, or a battle where anything goes?"

"The latter."

"Then it would be Figaro, I think. If it's not a duel, he can avoid instadeath using the Brooch and extend the battle's duration. Also, he has a clear advantage as a Superior who also has a Superior MVP special reward. Though, that might change if Kashimiya gets his hands on something that can close that divide."

"Ohh... then there's no way. He might evolve, but Superior special rewards are a different matter. Altar already had its SUBM with Gloria, and the only countries that haven't had theirs are Dryfe, Legendaria, and Caldina. The kingdom shares a border with all three of them, but the SUBMs will probably be handled by the countries themselves. I mean, Dryfe has the Physical Apex, while Caldina has the Magical Apex and the other Superiors in Sefirot... Though, maybe he would have a chance of stealing the Legendarian SUBM. The superiors there are absolute freaks whose combat potential is actually pretty low."

Granvaloa and Tenchi already had their SUBMs? I only knew about Altar's Gloria and Huang He's Suling.

"What kind of SUBMs appeared in Granvaloa and Tenchi?" I asked.

"The one in Granvaloa was 'Biframe White Whale, Moby Dick Twin.' It was a large, pale whale that functioned like a catamaran. Apparently, it was a real monster that could destroy large patches of area by transforming seawater into its ‘rigging’ and ‘outfit,’ and also use the same water to regenerate its body if damaged.”

...How the hell did Granvaloa, a maritime country, handle something like that? Talk about a bad matchup.

“Apparently, it was defeated by a combination of The Human Bomb blowing it up along with the entire ocean around it, all the firepower of the Granvaloan navy, and The Fatal Seal of the Four Seas.”

“‘Fatal Seal of the Four Seas’? I’ve heard of The Human Bomb, but that nickname is new to me.”

“‘Fatal Seal of the Four Seas,’ also known as King of Thieves, Zeta. She’s a long-time Superior from Granvaloa, but her Embryo’s powers aren’t clear yet. No one’s ever seen it, sort of like Figaro’s Embryo was at one point.”

A well-known Superior who was able to keep her hand hidden... that alone told me that she was no joke.

“Though, there are hints,” Marie continued.

“Like?”

“‘She walked on air,’ ‘she was completely unharmed by a rain of arrows in the desert,’ ‘she was suddenly standing right next to me. I could’ve sworn there was no one there,’ ‘she made blood burst out of her enemy,’ ‘she turned the wall into Swiss cheese,’ ‘she made a tank instantly evaporate.’ Information about her powers is plentiful and varied. Some of these were probably done with job skills and MVP special rewards, but because she does so many different things, it’s impossible to tell which are her Embryo abilities.”

Well, all those things certainly don’t seem like they can be covered by a single Embryo trai— Wait... I don’t know why, but I get the feeling I know something that actually can do just that...

“Speaking of The Fatal Seal of the Four Seas, she escaped Granvaloa after stealing a national treasure. That got her on their wanted list, and she’s more infamous than famous now.”

“On a wanted list for stealing a national treasure...” Rook muttered, looking as if he remembered something he didn’t want to. “She shares a crime with Gerbera.”

“Anyway, enough about her, let’s talk about SUBMs again,” said Marie. “You heard about Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria and Tetra-Beast of Creation, Suling from the people who faced them, yes?"

"Yeah," I nodded. I heard about Gloria from Shu, and about Suling from Xunyu, and both of them seemed like extremely powerful creatures with multiple abilities — or bodies, in Suling's case.

"After Suling, there was Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru in Tenchi."

"Tenchi? Aren't you from there? Did you encounter it?" I asked Marie.

"No. I left the country shortly before it appeared and was already wandering around Huang He when it did. Bad timing, eh? Though... from what I heard, I had no chance against it."

Marie? A pre-Superior who actually defeated a Superior? Had no chance against it?

"Apparently, it was quite a... bizarre SUBM."

"'Bizarre'? From what I've heard, all of them are."

"That's just how bizarre it was. Horobimaru appeared in..."

Thus, Marie began talking about the strange... "nature" of the SUBM known as Horobimaru.

It happened right after the war between Altar and Dryfe:

A giant suit of samurai armor had washed ashore in a certain fishing village on the western side of the island country of Tenchi. It was nearly three metels tall, but there was no head — or even a body, for that matter — inside it.

At first, the villagers thought that a ship had wrecked nearby and the armor it had been carrying had just washed ashore. They didn't know what to do with it, so they started by simply going to pick it up.

However, right before they did, the armor stood up.

And, despite lacking of a head, said the following:

"Who here craves my arms and armor?

Challenge me in combat.

I carry still a longbow, naginata, and this armor.

I am a Superior Unique Boss Monster.

Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru."

"...The thing introduced itself?" I raised an eyebrow.

"It did. It also just stood in place, waiting for a challenger, and didn't lay a finger on anyone who didn't challenge it."

Okay, yeah... that was definitely bizarre, even by SUBM standards.

"It didn't even hurt the villagers that awakened it," Marie added. "In fact, the village prospered, on account of all the demand for lodging and food from the challengers that gathered there."

It even helped bring life to the place...? For something with "Destroyer" in its name, it seemed unusually noble.

"And, well, Tenchi is full of hotblooded tians and Masters, so it was challenged many times. Most of them were defeated, obviously, but King of Brigands, Bigman actually did win against it once."

"First 'thieves,' now 'brigands'... and just 'once'?"

"Yes. He definitely destroyed it, but then the armor instantly reformed and gave Bigman the naginata it carried, saying 'Well done. Victory is yours, and so is this weapon.'"

"It gave him its weapon?"

"Yes. While you have MVPs with normal UBM fights, Horobimaru apparently handed away its equipment every time it was defeated." ...Again, it really was a bizarre UBM. How strange that it would just give away its equipment instead of having them become something adjusted for the individual.

"Also, anyone who received a weapon was unable to fight Horobimaru again. Apparently, they couldn't damage it at all."

Oh, so people weren't allowed to get several items, then? That made sense, actually. If they were, then the same person who beat it the first time could go at it again and again, becoming stronger each time thanks to their ever-increasing rewards.

"But didn't Horobimaru just become weaker as it handed its weapons away?" I asked.

"No," Marie answered. "In fact, it became stronger with each piece of equipment it lost. When there was just the armor left, even Superiors lost against it over and over."

"Now that's something..."

Also, growing stronger as it loses equipment? What is it supposed to be, a UBM version of Figaro?

"The armor ended up staying on the shore where it washed up for about five months."

"...That's a long time for something like that to be alive." It had countless Masters, Superiors included, challenging it day and night, yet it stayed there for months on end. That made it clear just how powerful it was.

And apparently, it was only defeated recently... about the time I first arrived here, actually.

“So, who ended up defeating it?” I asked Marie.

“Besides Bigman, I know that the one who got the longbow was The Gun, Sauer Urgaur ‘the Firestop.’ It’s still unknown who defeated the armor.”

Unknown? Was it defeated in secret? When nobody was watching?

“Because Horobimaru was so strange and gave its special rewards while it was still alive, neither Bigman nor Sauer received the message saying that it was defeated. It was clear that it was gone, though, so the Conquest General commemorated it with a hanami festival.”

“Ah. I think I read about that on the internet.”

So that was the occasion, huh? Well, there were no casualties, so the SUBM’s defeat was probably a good reason to hold a festival.

All in all, it was the polar opposite of what Gloria had done here in Altar.

Then again, from what I’d heard of Tenchi...

“A monster like Horobimaru, hanami events... Tenchi must be sooo peaceful,” said Babi, cutting my thought short. A heavy silence followed, and Marie and B3 had looks on them which clearly said “Hahaha — no.”

My Tenchi-dwelling college friends had told me enough about the country for me to share their sentiment.

“Anyway, those are the SUBMs that have been defeated so far,” Marie concluded.

“I see... Hm?” I muttered as a certain idea crossed my mind. She mentioned four SUBMs: Biframe White Whale, Tri-Zenith Dragon, Tetra-Beast of Creation, and Penta-Phased Destroyer.

All of the names had numeral prefixes.

“Hey, was there no ‘one’ monster?” I asked.

“Oh, you’re wondering about that, too, huh? People talk about it every now and then.”

So I wasn’t the only one who found it strange.

“But the thing is, we just don’t know. At the very least, there’s no info on anyone defeating such a monster. For all we know, an SUBM could’ve appeared in one of the countries that we think hasn't had theirs yet, only to have been done away with in secret."

Like Horobimaru's final form, huh?

"It's just as likely that number one is special and is being reserved for a later SUBM," Rook commented. "Regardless, a Superior special reward bearing the power of 'one' will eventually see the light of day."

"Why do you think that?" I asked him.

"For the number one being special? I just think that's obvious. As for us eventually seeing the special reward... I just thought that someone might be keeping it as an ace up their sleeves to catch an opponent off-guard. They're bound to use it eventually, though."

"...I see." If the "one" has already appeared and it had been in Dryfe, then the special reward could be deployed in the next war. It was a yet-unseen menace that I wasn't sure was actually dangerous, but I still had a bad feeling about it, however slight.

"By the way, Marie... what were you doing while I was away?" With the SUBM talk ending, I asked Marie something that I'd been wondering about. I hadn't gotten the chance to ask before today's big duel, and she was an incoherent mess for most of the day after it. Rook clearly had his share of troubles while I was gone. Was Marie the same in that regard? She'd looked pretty tired when we met up.

"Oh, I was preparing for a certain project related to the festival tomorrow and the day after," Marie answered.

"Festival?"

"Yes. The Love-Duel Festival. We're planning a newspaper project for it, called 'Ba-Thump! A Lovey-Dovey Couple Spawned! Kyahah!'"

...I have so much to say, but most importantly, you really don't need that "Ba-Thump" and "Kyahah!." Especially the latter.

"...First of all, what is the Love-Duel Festival?"

"It's a festival commemorating the founding king's duel with his wife here in Gideon. It happens here every year at about this time."

Ohh...? I happen to personally know one of the founding king's descendants... I'll have to ask her for the details, I thought, thinking of Azurite.

"And... Why a project?" I asked.

"DIN is often seen as an info-broker, but it's actually a newspaper press, you know?” Oh yeah — she’d mentioned that they also covered actual news and wrote lifehack articles.

“That’s why we sometimes do things like this, too. Alison from the planning department is very enthusiastic about this one. Even the twins at the top are into it.”

“Twins at the top?” I raised an eyebrow.

“The tians in charge of DIN. They’re twins of different genders and they look very young, but they’re from Legendaria, so it’s rumored that they’re actually very old.”

The leaders of the DIN and owners of all the info they have, eh? I wonder what they’re like...

“So, what kind of project is this ‘Ba-Thump Kyahah,’” asked Nemesis. Damn it, why would she shorten it to that?

“It’s basically a report in the style of a romantic comedy,” Marie answered. “During the Love-Duel Festival, we would have correspondents all over Gideon who would record lovey-dovey happenings in town. The editing department would choose their favorites, and our subscribers would then vote which one of those is the most lovey-dovey-est event of all.”

“...Isn’t that basically setting people up for public shaming?”

“Putting up the magic cameras and stuff was hard work.”

“Isn’t that a clear invasion of privacy?!”

Or is it okay here because we’re in a fantasy land? I wondered.

“...It is. That’s why the administration didn’t approve it. The cameras had to go, too...”

“Yeah, I figured it was no good...”

“Instead, we decided to just take reader-submitted photos... Though, The Kingdom People Times ended up copying our original project and they’re actually going through with it.”

“Why do so many people think that’s a good idea?!”

“Well, Gideon is all about the duels. You don’t get a wide variety of things to get excited about, so this is a breath of fresh air. And since it’s related to love, lots of people are actually planning to go on dates with their crushes and confess their feelings.”

“Oh, speaking of dates... I’m going on one with Kasumi tomorrow,” Rook said.

“Ohh...? Wait, you and Kasumi?! Since when were you two like that?!”

I exclaimed.

"I had her help me with Gerbera and wanted to thank her somehow. She seemed interested in this festival, so I invited her."

He invited a girl on a date... as a thank you? Goddamn, that's impressive.

"Anyway, the town is bound to be full of couples starting tomorrow," Marie concluded.

"I feel like I'll have to avert my gaze constantly," I muttered.

"It's a beary big problem," said Shu, who appeared out of nowhere and joined us. He spoke with bad puns, as usual, but I could tell that he was actually quite tense.

"Why are you here?" I asked.

"I knew that you were coming back today, so I was looking fur ya right after I got done with something. I'd love to catch up with ya, but we gotta talk about a huge problem on our paws."

"What problem, exactly?" asked Marie. "If it makes you worried, it must be something really big."

"Hannya, the Hannya is coming... That's more than enough to get the point across, right?"

Hannya the Hannya? What is that, some funky robot? I thought nonchalantly, but it was clearly no joke to Marie, who looked really tense.

B3 was also making a stern face.

If it was enough to shake both of these experienced players, then it had to be something really bad.

"...Wasn't she in the gaol?" Marie asked.

"She was released recently. Her sentence was pretty short."

"The timing couldn't be worse," Marie sighed as she placed her hands on her head in despair.

"Hey, what kind of person is this Hannya?" I asked.

"She's a Superior. One who got on wanted lists and was sent to the gaol, at that," Marie explained. "To be precise, she became a Superior after entering that place."

The gaol was a place I'd heard of many times now, but I didn't know much about what went on in there. All I really knew was that it was where King of Plagues and Gerbera went after the former was defeated by Marie and the latter by Shu and Rook.

Needless to say, this was my first time hearing that someone had actually gotten out of it.

"What got her on the wanted list?" I continued asking Marie.

"Destruction of personal property and inflicting bodily injury. That only got her a few years in the gaol... the real problem is her motivation."

"Which would be?"

"...She indiscriminately attacked any Master couples she saw."

"...Huh?"

Why would anyone ever do that? I wondered.

"The reasons behind that are profound... or shallow, depending on how you look at it," Shu said. "It all began on Christmas of the year 2043, and escalated on Valentine's day of 2044..."

And so, Shu told me about Miss Hannya's motivation, as well as his and Figaro's encounter with her.

Once he was done, I took a deep breath and said, "So, basically, Miss Hannya got NTR'd by someone from Dendro, so she started playing to get revenge by crushing her ex and his new girlfriend. She wandered around smashing every single Master couple that had the slightest chance of being them, and encountered you and Figaro while doing so. Thanks to the info you gave her, she did eventually get her revenge, but the crimes she committed landed her in the gaol. In addition to that, she fell in love with Figaro, who only cares about dueling her."

"Yeah. Beary good job summing it up," said Shu.

He was right — it really was hard to tell whether her reasons and history were shallow or profound. I could understand that it meant the world for Miss Hannya herself, but to a third party, this all wasn't much more than something to joke about.

"Is she really all that dangerous, though?" I asked. "I mean, she did get her revenge. Shouldn't she have stopped randomly attacking couples?"

"...No. She's still dangerous," B3 said with a serious expression. "I know bandit clan memb... Ahem, individuals in the gaol."

Why am I not surprised that you have connections there?

"They said that there are several unwritten laws inside, and two of them are 'don't walk out in public as a couple' and 'don't badmouth Figaro.'"

"...Hm?"

"Those who break those rules get crushed by giant legs."

“...”

Hoo, boy. Miss Hannya not only hadn’t improved — she actually had more targets now. It wouldn’t be that bad if badmouthing Figaro was the only thing that could set her off, but if merely seeing a couple did that, too, then... ah.

“...Hold on a second,” I said. “Marie... what did you say tomorrow was?”

“The Love-Duel Festival...” Right. The day that would see loads of couples getting together, during which there would be a person walking around who indiscriminately crushed all pairs who merely looked the part...

“...What kind of dangerous combo is that?!”

“I would’ve done something ahead of time if it occurred to me earlier,” said Shu. “But I had my paws full with Gerbera and the other one, so the Love-Duel Fest completely slipped my mind.”

“A Superior that attacks all couples and a festival that creates tons of couples... That alone is extremely dangerous, but we also have the potential of that meathead Figaro setting her off like a bomb. This could be a repeat of Franklin’s Game... Gideon could be attacked by a Superior yet again...”

“Wouldn’t she be open to negotiation? I mean, unlike Franklin, she has nothing against Altar or Gideon, does she?” asked Rook. He had a point, but...

“Rook... When it comes to relationships, love, and marriage, people completely lose all self-control.”

“Umm... Ray, why do you look like you’ve been through hell? Your eyes are so empty that even I can’t tell what you’re thinking.”

“...Let’s just say that I’ve been to South America once.”

“South America?”

The Amazons, thirsty for a man... my sister, recklessly destroying the jungle... it all terrified me even now.

“...I think she’ll be fine with couples if she’s with Figaro,” said Shu. “At first, she was out for revenge, but once in the gaol, her motivation turned into jealousy. ‘How dare you flirt when I can’t even be with him’ and all that. She... paw-robably won’t care if she’s on a date or something with Figaro.”

“And what if Figaro himself sets her off?” I asked.

I could totally imagine him ruining everything by looking into the eyes of this lady who expects a “Let’s get married,” and instead saying “Let’s duel.”

“...”

Brother, please say something. Or would it be that bad that you have no words?

“Well, I did give Figgy a roundabout, but beary detailed, explanation,” Shu said.

“Why not be direct?” Marie asked.

“The shock from that might kill the kid in real life.”

That was... not actually an exaggeration. I’d learned about Figaro’s condition while chatting between our mock battles. He had a chronic heart disease that endangered his life if his BPM climbed too high. That was enough reason for Shu not to talk to him about Hannya too much.

“Well, Figgy won’t be on tomorrow, and Hannya’s offline, so if something happens, it’s gonna be the day after tomorrow. I’ll use tomorrow to pre-bear and take measures against it.”

“...Sounds like hard work.”

“Beary hard work, especially with the bomb we’re already working on...”

“Bomb?”

“It’s nothin’... By the way, is Xunyu here?”

“Yeah. Canglong is in Gideon, so she’s with him.”

“I see. It just hit me that if Hannya paw-sitively loses it, Xunyu could stop her by tearing out her heart with Tenaga-Ashinaga. If Figgy and I had to fight her fair and square, it’d probably take too long.”

That was a hell of a violent solution. And did he just say that he and Figaro would take too long to beat her? Was Hannya that powerful?

“Xunyu, though... Xunyu would be able to do something,” Shu concluded.

And the reply to that came... “I don’t really gEt it... But I’d likE it if ya didn’t expEct too much of me.”

“Xunyu?!” I exclaimed.

...from Xunyu herself. I hadn’t even noticed her enter, but... speak of the devil and all that.

“Xunyu, why would you come here at this hour...? Huh...?”

Behind her large frame, there was another, far smaller girl.

“Ellie?” Marie asked.

“Nnh... waahh! Marie!” the girl — Second Princess Elizabeth — cried as she rushed into Marie’s arms.

Something had clearly happened, and the girl explained it herself.

“Altimia said that I have to marry Canglong and go to Huang He! That’s why I ran away from home!”

...When it rains, it pours, huh?

◇

The next morning arrived. After resting at an inn in Gideon for the first time in a while, I was woken up by fireworks going off outside. Not fully awake, I wondered what the occasion was, but I quickly remembered that it was the first day of the Love-Duel Festival.

I then recalled what I had to do today, so I hastily got out of bed, dressed, and left the inn.

After several dozen minutes of walking, I arrived at Count Gideon’s mansion — specifically, the guest house connected to it. This wasn’t my first time at the mansion. It was where I’d received the reward for my contributions during Franklin’s Game, and I’d gone through certain procedures at the nearby knight’s offices several times now.

However, this would be my first time entering the guest house. I wondered if it was okay for me to enter, and sure enough, I was greeted by a guard who stuck out his spear to me the moment I came close. “S-Such a terrifying appearance... A villain?!”

“No, wait!” the ninja next to him said. “Villainous as he may look, this is Master Ray the Unbreakable! My Reveal is max level, so that can’t be a mistake!”

“Ohh, that’s certainly his face. My apologies, Master Ray. Her Highness has given you permission to enter. Feel free to do so.”

And so, I was let into the guest house, where I was greeted by a royal knight who said he would show me the way to Her Highness’ room.

But man, what’s with that attitude? I don’t even have my mask or my hood on, I thought.

“I assume I’m allowed in because Azu—... I mean, Her Highness knew that I was coming?”

"Yes," the knight said. "She said she was certain you would come the moment Lady Grandria and Gideon's ninjas reported that Her Highness Elizabeth had run away to your group."

So they already knew that much, huh? I thought.

After about three minutes of walking, we arrived at a door deep inside the guest house.

"Your Highness! Master Ray has arrived."

"Show him in," Azurite said from behind the door. The knight opened it and urged me inside.

Upon walking in, I saw Azurite sitting at a writing desk, just like she had been doing at the capital.

"Morning, Azurite."

"You too, Ray... So it's already morning, huh?"

That was when I noticed the slight bags under her eyes.

"You pulled an all-nighter?" I asked.

"I do have lots to do, after all. I might be away from Altea, but I still have to take care of the more urgent matters."

Honestly, I wouldn't have been surprised if she just couldn't sleep last night, so she decided to just lose herself in work.

"You came to discuss my sister, yes?"

"Yeah."

"She started crying and ran away because I delivered the order very harshly." When Elizabeth ran to us, she'd been crying her eyes out because Azurite had ordered her to marry into Huang He's ruling bloodline, while keeping up her usual frosty attitude.

That was the reason she'd run away from home and was now staying at DIN along with Marie. Xunyu was watching over her, too, and we called Liliana over as well. She'd tried to bring Elizabeth back, but the girl was adamant about staying where she was, so Liliana had decided to just stay by her side.

We had then discussed what to do next, and it was decided that, come morning, I would talk about it with Azurite herself, like I was doing right now. I thought that Liliana, whom Azurite had known for a long time, would've been the better person for this, but she herself claimed that she was bound by her role as a knight serving the royal family. Eventually they concluded that I, as Azurite's friend and equal, was the better pick.

Oh yeah, Marie tried to "talk" to Azurite right away, but it seemed like she was seeing red, so we all had to hold her back. It even got to the point that she used The Art of Vanishing. Man, was that dangerous.

"So, did you come to denounce me as an awful woman who sells out her sister to foreigners?" Azurite said.

"...That depends on how you answer my questions."

"About what?"

"The marriage between Altar and Huang He's ruling bloodlines, the alliance that comes with it... Why do it, and all that."

Elizabeth's situation upset Marie, Nemesis, and even Babi, for some reason. They were all really mad. The rest of us, however, merely wondered why Azurite... I mean, the two countries involved would come to such an arrangement.

Oh, and Nemesis had stayed up really late last night, so she was still inside the crest.

"While talking with Shu and the others, we were only able to figure out what Huang He wants out of this," I said.

"I see," Azurite nodded. "And what would that be? I need to ask to see if you have it right."

"Yeah... We're guessing that Huang He wants the Altarian royal bloodline itself... as in, the right to use The Primeval Blade, Altar."

That was Shu and Rook's assumption, and Xunyu had given the conclusion her approval, saying, "YeAh, that's prObably it." She didn't actually know the terms agreed on between the two countries, but according to her, "Since its foUnding, Huang He's always seEn Special SupErior Jobs as divinE. Getting anOther one is probAbly more than enoUgh for them."

"Two thousand years have passed since the downfall of the pre-ancient civilization," I continued. "During this entire time, the only ones who could become Sacred Kings or Sacred Princesses and wield Altar were the descendants of the first Azurite, and only a few of those, too. However, that also means that anyone from this bloodline may have children with the aptitude. If Elizabeth marries into the Huang He bloodline and such a child is born, Huang He would end up having both the Draconic Emperor and the Sacred King — two powerful Special Superior Jobs."

With Masters and especially Superiors, there were now a great many individuals who broke the balance. However, before the influx of Masters...

i.e. before Infinite Dendrogram released... the balance-breakers were the tians with Special Superior Jobs. It was no exaggeration to say that people like the King of Kings, the previous Draconic Emperor, and the Sacred King — who unified the entire center-west area — had changed the course of history.

Shu, Rook, and Xunyu said that it was only natural for Huang He to want those.

"...Yes, that is more or less what Huang He wants to gain from this," Azurite nodded. "They also added that they want the right to test if Huang He's bloodline has the aptitude for the Sacred King whenever there's no living Sacred King in Altar. They certainly like to plan far ahead."

That also meant that, at the very least, Huang He didn't seem to want Altar's demise at this point. Though, for all I knew, they were planning to come in and take The Primeval Blade in the event that the country did collapse.

"...Is there any chance they would do anything about you... the living Sacred Princess?" I asked.

"No. We are using a Contract for rulers, and it would forbid it."

So the signing would be done on a Contract made for rulers — the kind that punished entire countries if broken.

I'd heard that among the many warring states that would eventually become Altar, one had a king who had broken such a Contract. As a result, his lands were ravaged by famine and disease for several years until an insurrection dethroned him and sent his whole family into exile. The risks were too great for anyone to breach such Contracts.

"...Didn't you have such a Contract with Dryfe?" I asked.

From what I recall, the countries were once allies.

"They have to be renewed whenever new rulers take over, so there was no alliance between us when the war began," Azurite explained. "Also, the alliance between the three western countries was mostly about cooperation in case of invasion by other powers and prevention of the assassination of important figures. There was next to nothing about land or trade, so invasions don't violate it."

"...Isn't that, like, the most important thing?"

"It was the only way, apparently. I hear they had a clause in there against that at first, but the processes involved in avoiding the punishments were very complex, so, over a century ago, my teacher... the late Arch Sage... said that it was better to repeal many of the restrictions to make cross-country interaction more simple. Also... a mere year ago, the countries got along so well that the idea of a war between us was absurd."

The conflict itself was unexpected, huh?

"So, I assume the alliance with Huang He will be done properly?" I asked.

"Yes."

"I see. Anyway, we had Huang He's reasons down, but we haven't figured out what Altar will gain out of this union."

Even Xunyu had no idea, and neither Shu nor Rook had enough information to come up with anything conclusive.

"I mean, it's not like they can send reinforcements, right?"

"Yes. They cannot cross Caldina's deserts, and Granvaloa does not allow foreign armies in their waters."

Going from Huang He to Altar required crossing The Great Desert or Harshwinter Mountains, both of which were extremely unwelcoming places.

Traveling through the former meant dealing not just with attrition due to the harsh conditions, but also constituted an act of war against Caldina, who wouldn't tolerate foreign armies on their lands. The latter was a hostile place inhabited by powerful landdragons and avians, including the Landdragon King, Mother Drag-Land, and Divine Comet Bird, Tunguska, all of which were UBMs above Mythical in power.

Needless to say, neither route was an option.

Therefore, the question remained — what would Huang He bring to this alliance?

"They would give equipment," said Azurite.

"Equipment?"

"MVP special rewards. Ten of them."

"Huhh?! Hold on, you can't even trade those!" Special rewards were made to suit the MVP, and they couldn't be traded or transferred in any way. If they could, it would totally defeat the purpose.

"Yes. That is why they will be given to us in the form of actual UBMs. Sealed away, of course."

According to her, Huang He's Draconic Emperor before the last one had developed a means of sealing UBMs away alive.

“They will give us ten sealed UBMs. They were brought here alongside Prince Canglong.”

“...That takes ‘Handle with care’ to a whole new level.”

“Indeed. Though, the long years of sealing have apparently weakened them a lot. I was told that it’s easy to defeat them if you are well-prepared.”

“And what do you intend to do with the special rewards?”

“At first, I intended to distribute them to trustworthy tians, but now, I am considering using them to entice Superiors into cooperating with Altar.”

Chances to acquire MVP special rewards were few and far between. Even Logan was unable to use the ace up his sleeve on me because he was too hesitant to sacrifice his. Many Masters were absolutely desperate to get their hands on one, and they were a prize not even the imperium could offer. They could be used to get the kingdom’s Superiors to actually fight this time, or perhaps even hire Xunyu or Superiors with no allegiance to any country.

...Yes, I know that the kingdom’s Superiors are the kind who can’t be bought with special rewards. Shu and Figaro have so many of them even by Superior standards.

“Would you like one?” Azurite asked.

“Hey, I’ll participate even if I don’t get one. Use it for your negotiations.”

“...No hesitation at all, eh?” Well, I’d already promised that I would help her, so these special rewards were better used elsewhere.

“But man, ten MVP special rewards without a set owner... It’d be scary if someone stole them,” I commented.

“It would. Like Altar, they cannot be stored in inventories, so securing them is a very important matter, as well. Though we will only receive them once Elizabeth is safe on the road to Huang He.”

“I see... Hm?”

What did she just say...?

“Ray?”

“...Nothing. Anyway, is that all that Huang He’s offering?”

“No. If Altar is defeated, they would also allow any asylum seekers, noble or otherwise, into Huang He.”

“That’s...”

“Preparation in case we lose. A hard life awaits many people if Altar falls.”

“But they can’t cross the desert, can they?”

“I already spoke to Granvaloa about it. As long as they’re not military and they pay the fare, they will take the people to Huang He. Though, only under the condition that those over a certain level reset their jobs.”

The significance of the military came up yet again. I now understood why Canglong and Xunyu went through the desert. They couldn’t use Granvaloa’s ships because Xunyu’s level was too high and because they were transporting the UBMs. They probably couldn’t reveal that they had UBMs on them and wanted to keep it hidden.

Anyway, I now knew what Huang He gave Altar in exchange for the royal bloodline.

“And that is why I’m sending off Elizabeth and forging an alliance with Huang He,” Azurite concluded, putting on a faint smile. “You can hold me in contempt if you want. I’m basically selling my sister in exchange for military potential and the safety of our people.”

At first glance, this seemed very heartless, but...

“That’s not it, is it?”

...I just couldn’t believe it.

“No. I just said it as it is...”

“I mean, the kingdom... you’re getting something more out of this.”

“...What?”

“You’re marrying off Elizabeth because you want her to live in Huang He, aren’t you?”

That was obvious when she’d said, “...once Elizabeth is safe on the road to Huang He.” That was her letting slip her true desires — to allow her little sister to escape the war-torn country of Altar.

Azurite said nothing in return, but I could tell by her expression that I was right.

Considering the situation, I could also more or less guess why, exactly, she wanted Elizabeth away from here.

“During the coming war, more cities could be attacked, like Gideon or Quartierlatin, and Elizabeth might be caught up in all of that again...”

It was easy to imagine what might happen, and how bad of a taste it would leave in my mouth.

“...If I die on the battlefield like my father, my two little sisters would be the only members of our bloodline left. The younger one, Theresia, is extremely sickly and relies on a special field within the castle to live. I’m told that her life will be short...”

I knew Azurite and Elizabeth, but I’d never met or heard much about the third princess. I had no idea she was in such circumstances...

“That is why Elizabeth is in the most danger. If she was captured by Dryfe, as the last of the royalty and the Sacred King’s bloodline, she might be treated horribly. Rather than letting that happen—”

“You think that she would be happier living in Huang He as the prince’s wife... right?”

“...Yes.” What followed was a long silence.

I understood her line of thinking and honestly... kinda agreed with it.

Azurite wished for her sister’s happiness. She would marry off Elizabeth and forge an alliance with Huang He so the girl could live a happy, healthy life regardless of what happened to Altar. This actually explained some other things, such as why Azurite had Elizabeth stay here in Gideon all the time.

The girl was originally here on “official business,” but now I felt that Azurite merely wanted her to be in the Altarian city that was furthest away from Dryfe and possessed the most military might. From the safety of this city, the girl would go through her marriage meeting with Canglong and be evacuated to Huang He.

However, Franklin then embarked on his game and almost kidnapped Elizabeth.

Back then, Azurite had probably considered bringing her back to Altea, only to realize that Gideon was probably safer now that it was on high alert after having already been the target of a terrorist scheme. For all we knew, the enemy could still have had something sinister in store for the capital. Also, following Franklin’s Game, Azurite was busy handling a lot of work and dealing with various incidents, delaying her and Canglong’s arrival to Gideon.

In fact, they’d basically come here the exact moment all that work was done and dusted, just so she could ensure her sister’s safety as quickly as possible.

Also, there was the trip itself. It wasn’t just meant to gauge ludo Masters like B3, but also to see whether Canglong was worthy of her sister. Azurite had told Elizabeth about the marriage last night because she'd seen the good in the boy.

She might have even skipped the formal marriage interview because she'd already wasted so much time on other things and wanted to let Elizabeth escape as quickly as possible.

Oh man. Looking back at it all... you could really see how much she cherished her sister. It was a bit awkward, but it was definitely a form of love.

"...I have decided to fight alongside you... and the other Masters," Azurite broke the silence. "However, that resolve does not affect my intention to have her escape in case something goes wrong."

Azurite's will was firm, and it was all because she truly cared for and loved her sister.

"I see. I have nothing to say, then," I said.

"...How unexpected. I thought you would have more objections."

"You're doing all this because you really love your sister, right? In that case, it's nothing I can judge. This is purely a family matter."

"..." Ultimately, they would have to settle this by themselves... maybe even with the youngest, Theresia. I couldn't get involved in it. All I could do is help Azurite, for her sake.

"Though, can I say one thing?"

"...Go ahead," she said, looking as if she actually wanted to hear my thoughts.

"I assume that your attitude as Elizabeth described it was probably meant to make her think that you no longer care about her, to make leaving easier for her, but..." The girl had said that Azurite was very cold to her, and for all I knew, that might've hurt her more than the very fact she was being married off.

Though, putting such a mask on her heart and acting that way might have been painful for Azurite herself as well. But anyway...

"You should drop it and apologize to her," I said. "She might be moving to a foreign land. Just imagining her last memories of her family being so unpleasant... leaves a bad taste in my mouth."

"...I suppose you're right," she looked down with regret in her eyes.

Yeah, it really must've hurt her, too.

“Bare your soul, be honest, talk to her and find a solution together. And believe it or not...”

This was just a personal rule of thumb, but...

“...Younger siblings understand the honest words of their older siblings way better than you’d expect.” Just as I had carried around the possibility Shu had given me ever since I was a boy...

◇◇◇

DIN Gideon Branch

That day, Elizabeth awoke not in the now-familiar guest house, but somewhere she didn’t recognize.

It was a sleeping room in Gideon’s DIN branch. She’d been brought there after she fell asleep while the girls (B3 excluded) were comforting her last night. While the others had left her to her rest, Marie was still by her side, leaning against a wall to watch over her.

If Ray was here, he’d wonder if sleeping while standing was an Onmitsu skill or something.

Elizabeth, however, didn’t think too much about it and snuck out of the room, careful not to wake Marie. Though the woman was ready to snap to attention if anything happened, Elizabeth’s innate sneaking ability actually surpassed Marie’s high perception.

First things first, Elizabeth went to the bathroom to wash her face.

She followed the signs on the walls and doors, and when she finally found it, there was already someone there.

“Yo. Already awake, huh?”

It was a girl about as tall as Elizabeth. She needed a moment to realize who it was, but it was easy once she noticed the girl’s pale bluish skin and serrated teeth.

“Xunyu? You’ve shrunk a lot.” The nearly four-metel-tall aberration was now only about a third of her usual height.

“A high reach and height would just get in the way here, so I put my limbs away.”

Xunyu’s Superior Embryo, Tenaga-Ashinaga, was a set of prosthetic arms and legs. However, unlike Figaro’s Cor Leonis or Sechs’ Nu, it didn’t actually replace any parts of her. She was basically just wielding pairs of long, versatile grabbers and platform shoes, and she could remove them whenever she had to.

"Your face and voice are different, too," said Elizabeth.

"Well, I can't wash my face with that Fu on, ya know?" Indeed, the Fu hiding Xunyu's face and distorting her voice was gone, too, so her visage was fully exposed and her speech was natural.

"Here to wash your face, aren't ya?" she said. "The sink right there is open."

"Mhm... And it's really strange for you to be shorter than me," Elizabeth giggled at seeing this new side of Xunyu, who'd been her friend since Franklin's Game.

The two then washed their faces, did whatever else they had to, and went to the lounge. Xunyu went and bought a random drink from the vending machine there and went to sit at Elizabeth's side.

"Feelin' calmer after your sleep?"

"...Mhm." Last night, Altimia had told Elizabeth to marry Canglong and go to Huang He. Her tone was harsh, and the little girl had not been allowed to say no. The suddenness of the situation had been quite a shock, but a night was enough for her to calm down.

In retrospect, though Altimia had tried to act composed, her eyes were full of tears, which might have implied that she was hesitant to give the order. The fact that she did it anyway might indicate that it was for Elizabeth's own good.

"Maybe sending me to Huang He really hurts her, too." She didn't know why, and wouldn't know until she asked Altimia herself, but if it really was so heart-rending for her to send Elizabeth off like that...

"I'll go back tonight... and talk to Altimia again," Elizabeth spoke her resolve.

"Good idea," said Xunyu.

"Your Highness, are you in here?!" Liliana entered the bathroom, looking somewhat panicked.

"What's wrong?" Elizabeth asked.

"He... Third Prince Canglong is waiting below." Those words made Elizabeth and Xunyu look at each other and tilt their heads.

Upon hearing that, Elizabeth first went to get properly dressed. After all, a prince wasn't the kind of person she could greet in her sleepwear. As someone who was adept at running away from home, she'd brought an inventory with extra clothes and other necessities with her.

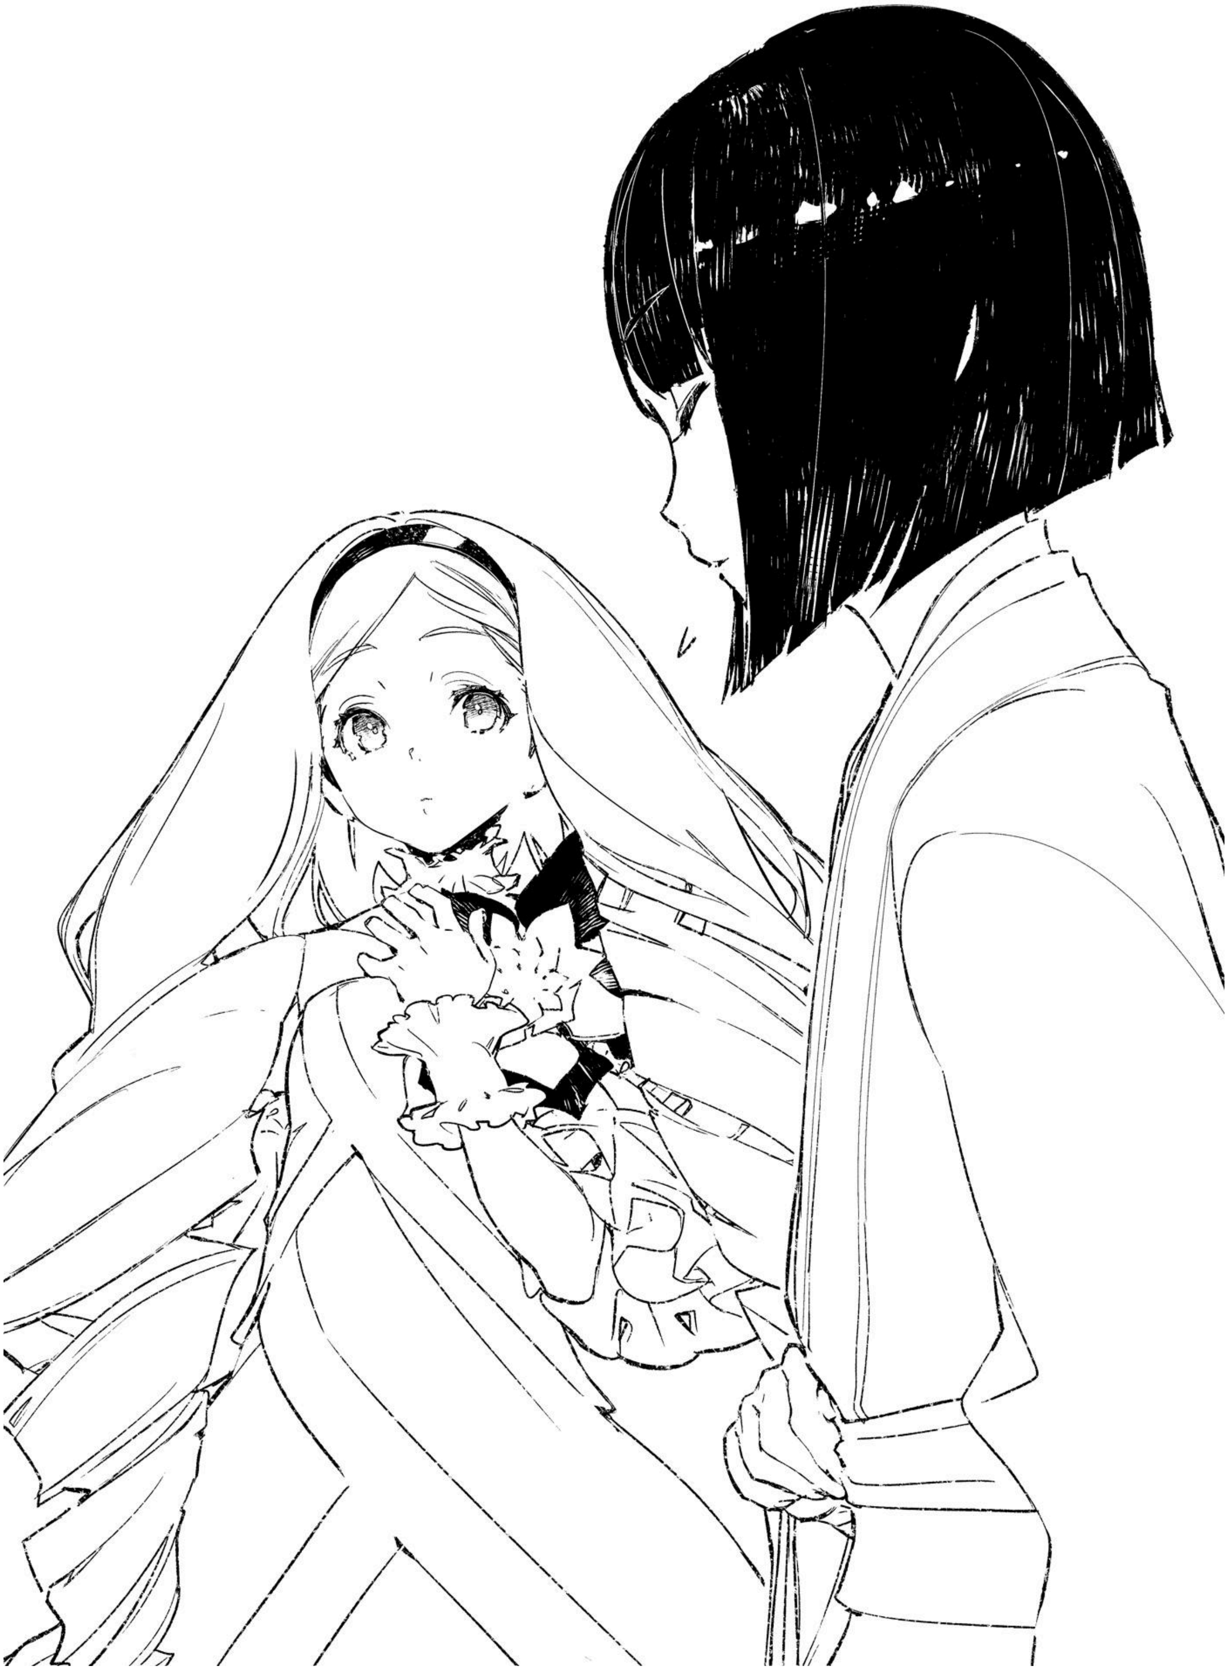
"Good morning, Your Highness."

Once the two girls were fully dressed — and in Xunyu's case, armed — they, Liliana, and Marie, whom they'd woken up, went to the first floor. There they saw the Third Prince of Huang He, Canglong.

Elizabeth had already met the boy. They'd had dinner together, and the unfortunate conversation with Altimia had happened afterwards.

"Good morning... What brings you here so early?" Elizabeth asked, hiding behind Marie.

She knew he wasn't a bad person, but he was still the reason she was being forced to go to Huang He, so she couldn't help but be wary of him. Canglong began by bowing his head before her.



"I deeply apologize for disturbing you so. Brazen as it may seem, I came here hoping to make up for it somehow."

The boy had actually come here to say he was sorry.

However, Elizabeth didn't know how to react. Though she saw him as the reason behind it, she didn't think it was his fault. The marriage and the move to Huang He had been arranged by Altimia and the emperor; Canglong wouldn't even be here if they hadn't. In a way, they were both in the exact same position.

So, Elizabeth didn't know what to do in response to his apology.

The most she could do was look away from him and say "...It's okay. It isn't your fault."

"But if I didn't come to Gideon, you—"

"I'm saying that it's not your fault, so accept that!" Canglong felt uneasy because he thought he'd made the sisters quarrel, while Elizabeth just didn't know how to feel about the whole situation.

Watching the two made Liliana extremely anxious.

That was when Xunyu beckoned both her and Marie over to her and, in a low tone that Canglong and Elizabeth couldn't hear, said "Let's make them go on a date."

"...Ehh?" Liliana raised her eyebrow.

"...Hold on there, Xunyu — how did you come to that idea?" Marie asked, shocked by this out-of-the-blue suggestion.

"I've beEn thinking it since yestErday, but the problEm here's that Elizabeth needs to mArry someone and mOve out in a way she doesn't rEally like, right? Why not just make it agreeable to hEr? It's nOrmal to move oUtta the country for love and mArriage. It's whY my mom moved to SingapOre."

"Umm... i-is that how it works...?"

"I meAn, it was supposed to bE a formal marriage intErview at first, right? But thEy went strAight to marriage befOre anyOne even realizEd it. That ain't hOw it's supposEd to go, right? For now, lEt's just see if they're goOd for one another by making thEm go on a dAte. If they likE each other, they cAn get married no prOb and Elizabeth's sis won't hAve to feel like she's forcing hEr to do something she doEsn't want."

That seemed reasonable.

The initial plan was definitely that the two would have a formal marriage meeting to see if it would even work out. Changing up the order made a mess of Elizabeth's relationship with her sister, but thinking on it, they would have had far fewer problems if they'd just kept with the original plan.

The most questionable thing about this was the fact that this voice of reason belonged to a girl in elementary school.

"...And what if they don't like each other?" asked Marie.

"We'll crOss that bridge whEn we come tO it. They probably dOn't have a say in whEther they'll get married or not, bUt whether they gEt along is completely up to thEm. I'm jUst sayin' that it'd be greAt if they actUally like each othEr and it ends up workin' oUt."

"That's true," Liliana agreed. "Even if they don't, the situation won't be any worse than it is now."

As a royal knight and a close friend of Altimia, she also hoped that Elizabeth's marriage would be a happy one.

And, albeit reluctantly and with the most bitter look on her face, Marie also said "Well... it's what's best... for Ellie's happiness... Grnnh..."

Thus, the three stopped the back-and-forth between Elizabeth and Canglong to suggest that they should go on a date to get to know each other.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

"Hey, this is about Elizabeth's marriage again... why Huang He?" I asked. "Geographically speaking, Legendaria, Caldina, and Granvaloa are the better options, aren't they?" They were all closer to Altar than Huang He. With no countries in between, you could even expect some reinforcements out of the deal. And from what I knew, Altar was already allied with Legendaria and had a trade treaty with Caldina.

"Legendaria and Caldina actually gave similar propositions, but I just went with the least worst option," said Azurite.

"Least worst? And... what about Granvaloa?"

"Forming an alliance with them through marriage is impossible. It just wouldn't be enough to give you backing from all the four great fleets."

According to Azurite, the grand captain (as the king of Granvaloa was called) was selected out of the candidates presented by the great houses of each of its four fleets — the merchant fleet, the military fleet, the pirate fleet, and adventurer fleet.

Because of this system, the addition of Altarian royal blood into any of the four houses would destroy the balance and maybe even spark a civil war. No marriage-based alliance offer came from Granvaloa because none of the houses wanted that to happen.

There was also another detail that made it difficult to forge an alliance, even without marriage involved.

The current grand captain was elderly and it was thought that he would be replaced soon, so it was hard for the country to make any major policy decisions. Apparently, the houses weren't unified on whether they should side with Altar or Dryfe.

This was only slightly related, but the house in charge of the pirate fleet was "Grandria," and it was where Sir Langley — Liliana's and Milianne's father — was from. So, if things went differently, Liliana herself might've been a candidate for grand captain.

Though, it wasn't like such "what ifs" meant anything now.

"And what about Legendaria?" I asked.

"That country is going through political unrest."

"It is?"

"Yes. It is a limited monarchy with two people at the top — Fairy Queen Titania, who is basically a figurehead, and the prime minister who's the real political leader."

Oh, I'd heard of Titania before. And... a limited monarchy? So Legendaria was basically like Japan or the UK, huh?

"For many years, their prime minister was the patriarch of the high elves, but he died some time before the war here in Altar." A high elf. So this world also had the classic fantasy races...

"And apparently... it was an assassination." ...Now that definitely seemed like something that'd cause a disturbance.

"I hear his death was really odd, too. He transformed into a monkey... from the neck down."

"Now that's just freaky... Hm..." I felt like I'd heard of something like that before...

Oh, right... Marie had told me once that Legendaria had a Superior with an Embryo that did something similar.

“So, uhh...”

“Yes,” Azurite said, understanding what I was getting at. “Legendaria has a Master that can do exactly that. However, he is not being investigated for the crime, and the culprit still hasn’t been found.”

That was weird. It would all work out fine if he was innocent, and with Truth Discernment you’d know if he was guilty right away, so why not investigate him?

“I looked into this a bit myself,” Azurite continued. “Apparently, the prime minister’s close relatives tried to look into it, but some other influential people interfered.”

“So, basically...”

“Yes. They have an internal conflict. The country’s tians are split into factions, and as a whole it’s now a crucible of assassination and betrayal. There is no all-out bloody conflict, but many people aren’t even sure who their enemies are. Everything is muddied and unclear. We are always told that that is the reason why they cannot send us reinforcements.”

Now that’s a hell of a mess, I thought. Even Tenchi seems like a better option, and war over there is like a daily routine.

Anyway, now I knew why Azurite didn’t feel like sending her sister there.

“The only places in Legendaria that are as peaceful as they seem are the place where Titania lives and their arenas. Many of the Masters there seem to be completely nonchalant about what is happening,” Azurite said.

“For a place called ‘Fairyland,’ it really doesn’t seem all that pleasant. So, last one... why not Caldina?” I asked, expecting her to quickly say something negative about it.

However, her response was... silence.

“Azurite?”

“...There are no obvious problems with that country,” she said while making a face that seemed to imply the opposite. “Ray, what do you think about Caldina?”

Her question was spoken in a voice dense with unease. She basically sounded as though she saw Caldina as an enemy.

“...I know next to nothing about it. ‘I don’t know’ is about all I can say.”

If I had to name something, it would be their indirect involvement in the actions of the Gouz-Maise Gang, which definitely didn’t give me a good impression.

“Is there something about Caldina?” I asked.

“...Nothing I can say with certainty. And unlike Granvaloa, there aren’t any problems that immediately come to mind.”

That alone made it seem like a good potential ally, but there had to be something more to this.

“After we lost the war, they offered to send Masters to us, including four Superiors.”

“Four?!” Caldina had a total of nine, and that was nearly half of them. That would literally double the amount of Superiors Altar had available, and the non-Superiors would do a good job filling whatever gaps they still had.

“And it was an alliance offer that did not even involve marriage. We would simply unite to get back at Dryfe. The only condition was that Caldina would have Dryfe’s land and technology, while Altar would get back the territory Dryfe had taken from the kingdom.”

Altar could use all the manpower from Caldina to win back what it had lost. It sounded like a really good deal, but... “...What about the pay for the Superiors and other Masters?”

“Not only would they cover all of that — they would also give us money to hire our kingdom’s Masters.”

So Altar would get everything back with little effort on their part. It was actually such a good deal that it made a light chill go down my spine...

“...You didn’t agree to it, though? Why?”

“Because if everything went according to their plan, Caldina would simply gain far too much...” First of all, they would receive Dryfe’s advanced technology and Dryfe’s land. The former was obviously the more important thing, but to a desert country like Caldina, even Dryfe’s land would be quite useful. The imperium was also full of ruins like the ones at Quartierlatin, with a great deal of treasure potentially waiting to be unearthed.

Second, they would have Dryfe’s Masters. Even if the imperium vanished, its Masters would still be around. Many of them would switch allegiances, and many of those would pick Caldina simply because it would now be controlling Dryfe’s territory. Caldina was also rich enough to match the insane monetary rewards Dryfe paid to its Masters, as evidenced by the four Superiors and many normal Masters they offered to dispatch to Altar's aid.

If there was one thing in this deal that might be a hardship for Caldina, it was the money they would have to pay to their Masters, but even that was a drop in the bucket compared to the country's immense wealth. Hugo had once told me that Dryfe's rewards to Masters had made a huge dent in the imperium's coffers, but to Caldina, that kind of money was pocket change.

Third, Caldina would break free of their geopolitical encirclement. Currently, Caldina was surrounded by the three western countries, Huang He to the east, and Granvaloa to the south. If they defeated Dryfe and forged an alliance with Altar, they would lose two out of their five enemies. Once that happened, they could use their nine Superiors, and all the other Superiors and Masters they would gain thanks to merging with Dryfe, to invade Huang He or Legendaria.

Basically, if the alliance happened, Caldina would have it all without risking anything.

They might even be able to use the momentum from their victories to bring the entire continent under their banner. Honestly, it was only natural for Azurite to be wary of their offer.

"Though, we did almost accept their offer," Azurite said. A drowning man will clutch at a straw, as they said. Desperation could've easily led Altar to accept the deal.

"But... the kingdom still has other options. We are not broken yet," she continued before looking into my eyes, for some reason. It felt like she was using me to remember something she'd seen in the past.

"Azurite?" I broke the silence.

"...I should get back to work."

Then I guess I should leave, I thought.

"...Thanks for coming today," Azurite said. "I will talk to Elizabeth again and really open up to her, just as you told me."

"That's good to hear."

"Thanks to you, I will avoid making at least one mistake."

"Don't mention it. I just did what I thought wouldn't leave a bad taste in my mouth."

With that, I left Azurite's room.

◇◇◇

The Guest House

Altimia watched as Ray left and closed the door, then heaved a sigh and said, “You are the reason why the kingdom didn’t break, Ray.”

It’s only because you gave hope to Altar’s tians that the country wasn’t shattered, she thought.

His battle had been broadcast to both Gideon and Altea, and it had been witnessed by many Altarians, noble and peasant alike.

It had prevented the nobles from finally losing all trust in Masters along with their hope for the kingdom’s future.

It was why the kingdom hadn’t gone with the easiest but most suspicious option.

If Altimia’s guess was correct, accepting Caldina’s offer would lead to a future where Caldina ruled the entire continent, and Altar would either end up as their vassal state or be destroyed entirely. It would be the same as losing to Dryfe, if not worse. The only difference would be that it would happen later.

Even so, despite the fact that that case held no hope for the future, she might’ve picked that option in order to save the present. There were many in the Altarian nobility who viewed Caldina favorably. Many of them thought that accepting Caldina’s offer was the most certain path to victory against Dryfe, but Altimia believed that a decent number among them were actually colluding with Caldina. There were even some documents in the recently-sentenced Marquis Borozel’s mansion referring to shady dealings with Caldinan merchants.

The country was trying to spread their tentacles throughout the Altarian nobility, using merchants as points of contact.

“Dryfe is the enemy that will fight us directly, while Caldina is the one that will backstab us... that might be the best way to look at it,” Altimia spoke to herself.

This was supported by the fact that Caldina had begun acting strange once Altimia rejected their alliance offer. For one, they requested a change in the commerce treaty and slightly changed their exports and imports. That didn’t seem like much to worry about, but Altimia thought that it wasn’t out of the question that they would assassinate her to instill a sense of danger and then support the Caldina-friendly nobles in order to put Elizabeth or Theresia on the throne and forge their alliance then.

"That witch... President La Place Phantasma is definitely capable of going that far." Also, Altimia hadn't told this to Ray because she wasn't certain of it, but it was possible that Caldina was also behind the imperium's invasion of Altar.

Before the change in Dryfe's leadership, Caldina had begun holding back its exports of food. Officially, it was "part of a restructuring related to the recent increase in Masters," but that didn't ring true to Altimia.

She'd also recently learned that Dryfe was going through a severe famine.

Strange as it was, the tian agents she'd dispatched there earlier hadn't reported anything like that happening, and the situation had only become clear once Altimia began giving similar requests to Masters.

Regardless of the reasons for it, Caldina's food export policy and the famine had added up, putting Dryfe in a dire situation. Altimia believed that it was possible that Caldina had stopped their exports because there was a famine in Dryfe, all so they could drive them into invading the fertile lands of Altar.

The imperium's food production simply couldn't keep up with demand.

Out of their neighbors, Granvaloa was in a similar position. They could only produce marine products and had to rely on foreign exports to fill the gaps. The other neighbor, Altar, had ended the alliance between the countries shortly after the new imperator took the throne. Legendaria was beyond Altar, while Huang He and Tenchi were beyond the vast deserts of Caldina.

With all that in mind, Altimia could see that Dryfe had no choice but to invade Altar to fix their food shortage.

However, the whole thing just didn't sit right with her. She questioned the actions of the invaders as well as the invaded — her own country.

Altimia found it strange that Altar had ended the alliance in the first place.

She couldn't understand why her father — the late king — and the Arch Sage — a major political advisor — would have done something like that.

Of course, Altimia was aware of the rumors that the current imperator had risen to the throne after killing the whole imperial family besides his younger sister, and it was understandable to be wary of him.

However, she couldn't help but feel as though there were some deeper reasons behind ending the alliance.

"...How troublesome." Caldina's actions, Altimia's dubious agents, and Altar ending the alliance... It seemed as though multiple motives had intertwined to bring about the war between Dryfe and Altar.

Currently, she suspected that one of the people involved was the president of Caldina, who was known to be a witch and a truly anomalous person.

"...Even the parasite is better than that witch." Even though the "parasite," Tsukuyo Fuso, often pushed Altar into making difficult choices in order to further her cult's agenda, she could no doubt be useful on occasion. In a way, she was like a parasite that sometimes became mutualistic.

The same couldn't be said for Caldina's witch.

Altimia had actually met her once during a certain diplomatic event. In her eyes, the witch was a monster that would bait you with a sweet deal and tempt you into doing what she wanted before wringing everything you had out of you.

"If I don't pay enough attention to Caldina's actions, the situation could become worse than I'd ever expect... How deeply troubling."

I already have my hands full with Dryfe, Altimia thought with a sigh.

The imperium hadn't acted once since Quartierlatin. They'd even dispatched a Superior for that, but had been completely inactive in the kingdom since.

Was there a problem in Dryfe, or was this a sign that they were planning something major?

Altimia lost herself in thought. Even if they had something up their sleeve, the kingdom and the imperium had already fought head-on, causing much bloodshed and damaging their relationship beyond repair. Painful as it was for her, Altimia had no choice but to admit that this would not end peacefully.

"Claudiah... What is your brother planning this time?" Altimia sighed, as she remembered her good friend from her days as a transfer student in Dryfe.

Chapter Four: To Each Their Own Duels of Love

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

My talk with Azurite was over, so I decided to look around town.

Festivals didn't happen every single day, so it'd be a waste not to enjoy this one... especially with the mess we could be in come tomorrow.

"So, do you have someone you want to walk around town with?" Nemesis asked. Apparently, she'd been awake during my conversation with Azurite, but she stayed within my crest to make the exchange less awkward. Once you looked past her gluttony, Nemesis was actually pretty considerate.

"Hmm... As far as I know, everyone's busy today," I said.

"And we're the only ones left with nothing to do, eh?"

"Well, even if that wasn't the case, I wanted to walk around with you today."

"I see. I also had something I wanted to do with y—... huh?"

She looked dumbfounded. No idea why, but apparently, she had something planned. "What is it?" I asked.

"Oh, uh... I was thinking of doing a bit of shopping..."

"Shopping? For what, Love-Duel-exclusive sweets?"

"...For some normal clothes for you."

...Well, I guess walking around town in armor can be a problem, so... I guess that's an okay idea.

"It's far worse than 'just a problem.' Masters don't seem to mind but don't you think walking around town in full armor is... unsettling?"

You have a point. All right, then — let's enjoy the festival while we keep an eye out for some clothes for me.

I suddenly began to wonder how the others were spending their first day of the festival.

◇◇◇

Gideon, Fourth District

That day, the ninjas Count Gideon had put in charge of intelligence, counterespionage, and spec ops were busy with a particular mission.

"This is squad B. We are observing the fourth district's market. No suspicious people in sight."

"This is squad C. We are following the targets. The only dubious people nearby... are those three."

They had split into several squads, all focused on following a certain group. Why? To protect it, of course. They were, after all, Elizabeth and Canglong — young royalty going out on a date.

Because the Love-Duel Festival had its roots in an historical event that had led to the marriage of the founding king and queen, there were many families that used this day for matchmaking. Most of them were wealthy merchants or craftsmen, but occasionally nobles as well. Even the parents of the current Count Gideon had met in this way.

However, it was nearly unheard of for two members of royalty to take part in such endeavors.

The Second Princess of Altar, Elizabeth, and Third Prince of Huang He, Canglong... Once it was known that they would be going on a date, Count Gideon directed nearly all of his ninjas to focus on securing their surroundings, which was notable even when considering the fact that some of them had already been designated as Elizabeth's protectors or watchdogs.

It was worth noting that the knights weren't accompanying them. They stood out far too much compared to the ninjas who could melt into the shadows, and having them around would have been like broadcasting the presence of important people. Thus, they had been deployed to guard other areas.

"It's so lively here! It really is a festival!" said Elizabeth. "What are Huang He's festivals like?"

"I'm sorry. I couldn't walk out in town like this before coming to Altar, so I could only watch over such events from far away," Canglong replied.

"That seems boring."

"I can see why you would think that. Perhaps it is."

The two young people talked while walking through the lively streets.

According to the ninjas all around, there were no suspicious people around them... At least, not ones they didn't recognize.

There were some shady-looking individuals the ninjas knew well, though.

About ten metels behind Elizabeth and Canglong, there was a totem pole of three people peeking out and watching over the two from around the corner of a building.

It was Liliana, Xunyu, and Marie.

One was there as a knight, one as a friend, and one as a self-proclaimed big sister.

"Do they truly believe they don't stand out?" one of the ninjas asked.

"...Well, they are in disguise." Liliana had swapped her royal knight armor for casual clothing, but she was quite a beauty, so that only made her stand out more.

Xunyu had taken off her prosthetic limbs as well as the Fu covering her face and was now wearing clothing more typical of someone her age, but her pale-blue undead skin remained the same.

Marie had removed her sunglasses... but that was it.

"I can understand the other two, but Marie..."

"Best not to say it. She's panicking... is what I'd like to say, but she always seemed to think that taking off her glasses was a working disguise."

Even in her manga, she often had scenes that seemingly introduced a new, beautiful lady character, only to reveal that it was just the protagonist — Marie — without her sunglasses.

Many readers commented that you could tell it was her just by her clothes or just assumed it was a running gag, but she truly and honestly intended it to be a real disguise.

Anyway, there was this young couple and three weirdos, and the former seemed to be enjoying the festival. Elizabeth looked over the festival stalls — and not just the ones with food, unlike a certain someone — with gleaming eyes, while Canglong watched her with a smile on his face.

"...He's lookin' like a brother watching over his little sister as she enjoys the festival," Xunyu commented.

"I-I don't think that is bad," said Liliana.

"But it doesn't seem like a date, does it?" Marie asked. "I think we should join them and enjoy the festival togeth—"

“Stop,” the other two shot down her idea.

“What kind of date involves the company of a friend, a bodyguard, and a pervert all at once?” Xunyu said.

“...If I may ask, which of those is which of us?” Marie asked coldly.

Is that even a question? thought everyone who heard it, even the surrounding ninjas.

As this continued, the couple arrived at a mask stall.

Because the first queen was said to have worn a mask, and also due to the desire of many ladies and gentlemen to mingle anonymously, many people spent this festival wearing a mask. Elizabeth excitedly examined one mask after another, seemingly pondering which one she should buy.

“She also wore a mask the first time I met her. I guess she likes them,” Marie said. “Ah... Ellie, no. Not the bear mask.”

“...I suppose it’s in the blood,” Liliana commented.

“The founding king’s queen and ex-princess of Gideon was a masked swordswoman, right? Does she get it from her?”

“...I had someone closer in mind,” Liliana said with a clouded expression. Marie didn’t understand what she meant and just tilted her head, while Xunyu, having actually seen the “someone closer” wear a mask while on the way to Gideon, knew exactly what Liliana was referring to.

“Hrmm... Should I pick the bear or the cat?” Elizabeth wondered. At her side, Canglong was looking at another mask. It depicted a dragon... specifically, the eastern “Ryu.” Masks like this were often seen in festivals on the eastern side of the continent — not so much here.

Canglong looked at it as if to compare it with something. “Did you pick one, Canglong? Hm... That one’s a bit scary,” said Elizabeth.

The man behind the stall smiled and said, “Little lady, that is a very precious mask. It’s based on the one The Draconic Emperor — the duel champion of Huang He to the east — wears whenever dueling. I got them from an eastern merchant, and they’re selling great. Would you two like one, as well?”

“I want a bear or a cat mask.”

“Oh? Then how about this? It’s another one I got from the east, and it’s like a fusion of a bear and cat... a panda mask!”

“What is this wondrous animal?!” Elizabeth exclaimed, her eyes gleaming at the sight of the panda mask that the man took out of his inventory.

Canglong smiled as he watched her before slowly putting the dragon mask back. He whispered “Zifu Longmian” as he did, but no one heard him.

Elizabeth donned the mask, and they went on to walk around the market in the fourth district. It seemed less like a date and more like two friends enjoying a festival.

This continued for several hours before the two sat down to take a break in the shade of a tree.

“Mrgh... You have so little energy, Cang.”

“I’m sorry... I’m not used to walking around like this,” Canglong replied. His face was flushed and sweaty, possibly due to fatigue. This would happen to any normal child who walked around for hours on end on a sunny day — Elizabeth was actually the anomaly here. The girl was still full of energy despite not being old enough to even have a job.

The heat had caused Canglong to undo the upper buttons of his shirt and fan himself with a fan he was carrying.

Elizabeth looked at him, and at that moment she noticed something in the gap he’d opened.

“Hm...?” She stared at it, blinked a few times, and realized that it was black bandages, wrapped around him so thoroughly that you couldn’t see his skin.

“Canglong, what’s that?” she asked.

“Eh? Ah...” Canglong realized his mistake and hastily buttoned up his clothes again.

“Are you hurt or sick?”

“...I suppose you might call it an illness. These bandages are a measure to hold back a certain handicap I was born with.”

Hearing these words, Elizabeth realized that Canglong had been born with a disease, just like her little sister Theresia.

“...I’m sorry,” Canglong apologized. “I didn’t intend for you to see something so unsightly.”

“Don’t apologize! What’s so unsightly about being sick?!” Elizabeth snapped at his apology, as though actually angry. “So what if you were born with an illness?! If you think that bothers me, you’re sorely mistaken!” It was possible that she wasn’t talking to him, exactly; She might’ve just been seeing some part of her sickly sister in Canglong.

Even so, Canglong could tell that she was being completely honest.

"...You really are a gentle person, Your Highness," he said.

"Altimia and Liliana would say the same thing I did."

"I see..."

So you must be gentle because you were raised by gentle people, Canglong thought, as his heart ached at the fact that he was responsible for splitting such a family apart. That pain also made him realize that he couldn't treat this pure and gentle girl the same way he treated everyone else.

Silence then came over them and continued for a good while.

It was broken by Elizabeth, who said, "I don't want to go to Huang He."

"...I'm aware."

"I don't want to leave Altimia and Theresia... or this country. I want to support and protect them."

Though Elizabeth had some particular talents, she was just a child without any special job, so there were few things she could do to help Altar in the war.

Even so, she wanted to support her older sister and protect the younger one.

"I love Altimia. She gives her all and works harder than anyone else to protect this country and us. And..."

Elizabeth paused and looked to the north... in the direction of the mountains, beyond which lay the capital.

"...I love Theresia, too. She's my dear little sister who's always stuck in the castle, and I want to protect her so that she can smile at least a little."

Of course, she didn't actually know how she could do that.

"I'm still just a weak little girl, so I can't do either of those things." A child like Elizabeth could do little to save her family or Altar in its time of need.

"But..."

However, now she'd been given a certain way to do exactly that.

"But if I go to Huang He with you, I might be able to support Altimia and protect Theresia." The support Huang He would give to Altar in exchange for Elizabeth traveling there could help ensure the safety of the country and her family. Young as she was, she had a vague understanding of her situation and the negotiations between the two countries.

After the shocking news from Altimia had caused her to run away from home last evening, Elizabeth had spent a lot of time thinking about it all, until she finally made her decision.

Through both her calmness and tears, she finally realized that there was no other way, so she resolved to marry Canglong for the sake of Altar.

The girl was too young to understand romance, yet she'd already chosen her significant other. In terms of matchmaking, this date was over.

Canglong couldn't find what to say in response. He couldn't refuse, for that would go against the will of his father, the emperor.

But he also couldn't accept, for that... would go against his own heart.

His soul and heartache told him that he could not "acquire" this pure, gentle, sun-like girl as his wife in such a cold manner, like a trade agreement.

"That's why I will—"

"There is still time until I return to Huang He," Canglong said, cutting Elizabeth off. "I will give you my response before then."

It was neither refusal or acceptance — he merely delayed it.

"I will know how I feel by then."

"...Very well," said Elizabeth. Thus ended their date that doubled as a formal marriage meeting. Basically, it ended on a note of "Could you give me more time?" which was quite common for such events.

◇

"Yo. You feElin' good?"

"Master Xunyu. Thank you for protecting us all this time."

"Well, that's pArt of my jOb. Are yoU sure about that, thOugh?"

"With what?"

"You fell for hEr at first sight, didn't yA?"

"..."

"And yet yoU didn't accept her chOice. I know how yA feel, though. Forcin' sOmeone into a mArriage doesn't automAtically make them lovE ya."

"Master Xunyu..."

"That's exActly why I recommendEd the date. If she starts likin' ya, too, thEn that'd be prOper love. Doesn't seEm like it happened, thOugh."

"..."

"Ya constAntly closed yOurself off, didn't yA? She actEd like herself, but yOu weren't you. Ya were nEither The Third Prince Canglong nOr the other you. Ya werE just a coward hidin' yoUrself. Ya can't show off tO the girl you like likE that, can ya?"

"...It hurts how right you are."

"If you undErstand that, then show hEr what you're reAlly like... and think of hOw to charm hEr. You cAn do that, right?"

"...I can!"

◇◇◇

Gideon, urban area, KoD's Popcorn Factory

"...Man, how should I handle this?" While Ray and Azurite were having their conversation, Shu heaved a sigh, standing in a facility he'd rented for his popcorn production.

He currently had three major problems to deal with: keeping an eye on the "bomb" that had been lurking since Franklin's Game, the potentially-bloody romance between Hannya and Figaro, and the marriage between Elizabeth and Canglong. He intended to entrust the last one to Ray and the rest. Considering his relationship with Altimia and general suitability, Ray was the best man for the job.

However, the first two problems had to be handled by Shu alone. This festival was actually a golden opportunity to earn big money selling popcorn, but he ended up having zero spare time to dedicate to it.

"The situation with Figgy and Hannya is especially bad. It won't end with just a talk... Do I have no choice but to lead them on a 'date' outside of Gideon and have them settle it there? But how do I lead them out of Gideon when the Love-Duel Festival's goin' on? There's no tourist attractions or anything outside."

As Shu worried about the approaching calamity...

"Excuse me. Is Shu Starling here?"

...someone outside asked, with a knock on the door.

Before Shu could even respond, the person opened the door, (twisting off the knob in the process) and entered Shu's office.

It was a woman with a porcupine in her arms and a crest on her left hand, marking her as a Master.

“I heard your voice, so I figured you were in,” she continued. “Aren’t you glad, Behemot?”

“...You better pay for the door,” Shu said with a glare.

“soz,” the porcupine — Behemot — said, as the woman threw a gold coin towards Shu.

This was the “bomb” Shu was watching over. The strongest pawn of the imperium, which had been here since Franklin’s Game — King of Beasts the Physical Apex, and her partner.

“So, what’s your business? I’m not sellin’ pawpcorn today.” The porcupine’s face was hard to read, but anyone could tell that those words shocked her.

“Behemot, we didn’t come here for popcorn.”

“...kk”

“Whaddya want, then?” King of Beasts was a major threat to the kingdom, but she was also a regular customer at Shu’s popcorn stall, and they had talked many times as they ate.

Shu wondered what they wanted this time... “I’ll get right to the point. Come on a date with us.”

“...”

...And the answer was one he could have never expected.

He quickly considered how he ought to handle this sudden situation.

For better or worse, the issue of Hannya will come to a head tomorrow. I’m free today. And I have no idea what they’d do if I refuse. I guess it’s best to accept the invitation and watch over them, just in case, Shu thought in two seconds and accepted.

At the same time, he sincerely hoped that a certain egg-woman who often messed with him wouldn’t add anything to the pile of troubles he already had.

Though he’d agreed to go on a date, he had no idea why they’d invited him in the first place.

He went and asked, and the response went as follows:

“Well... the biggest reason is that you can only fully enjoy this festival as a pair.”

According to her, The Love-Duel Festival was full of things you could only do as a couple.

For most such things, the gender of either party didn’t matter — but obviously, it was hard to make a cool-headed beauty and a porcupine pass for a couple. It would've just made her seem like a profoundly sad and lonely woman.

Considering Shu's costume, it didn't look all that different with him; he was relatively famous, however, so it was at least understandable.

The three still ended up looking like they were orbiting a lonely lady who'd gone to an amusement park by herself, but they all actually ended up quite enjoying the Love-Duel Festival. They looked over the many and varied stalls opened by tians and Masters alike, and they participated in a duel-ranker charity event at the third arena.

Once that was done, they'd bought honey castellas at a stall marked "couples only" and went to the second arena for an event Behemot wanted to see.

Naturally, the strangeness of the pair drew some weird looks. Shu's costume stood out, and the pretty lady with the porcupine also attracted a lot of attention. The lady looked around, as though irritated.

"Sorry for makin' ya stand out," Shu said. "But this was your decision, so bear with it."

"Believe it or not, you were the most reasonable option," the woman replied. "Though, I must say that I don't understand it."

"Don't understand what?"

Not even looking at him, the woman said, "A newspaper article said that you refused to participate in the previous war because you didn't want to reveal your face, yet you participated in the game set up by that weakling while dressed in an outfit that was one step away from doing just that. Now everyone knows you're the King of Destruction, yet now you don't seem to care if you stand out at all. Your words and actions contradict one another."

"...True." It was said that Shu had refused to participate in the previous war because he didn't want to needlessly reveal his face.

That wasn't entirely wrong. Shu had indeed said that, and he had indeed avoided participation in the war. It would've also been a lie to say that he hadn't been afraid of revealing his face if his gear had been destroyed. That was exactly why he'd also said the same thing to Ray.

However, there had been another reason why he absolutely couldn't participate in the war.

"Well, it doesn't matter to us," the woman said. "But do participate in the war next time. If you don’t, we won’t have anyone to fight.”

“...I’m sure you won’t.” Shu fully agreed with her words. The pair next to him were no doubt the strongest people around. They were on par with the other two monsters he’d fought — the Magical Apex and the Technical Apex.

There existed a theory of the ultimate synergy between Embryo and job — the Guardian-Jaguarman theory. These two were the strongest beasts to arise from this theory, and Shu knew full well that he would have to give his all to fight them.

They eventually arrived at the second arena. It had been converted into a theater stage for an event where various groups displayed various acts. There was a schedule off to the side.

“What did we come here fur, anyway?” Shu asked.

“A hero show. Behemot liked them quite a lot.”

The fact that she used the past tense stood out to Shu, but he didn’t ask about it.

“?” Behemot suddenly noticed something and dashed off.

“Behemot?” Shu and the lady went after her and arrived at the arena’s staff entrance.

There was a gathering of Masters there, and they were all wearing costumes fit for the stage. It was clear that they were on next.

However, their expressions were gloomy.

“Gh... This is a nightmare. We can’t do this if Gin doesn’t come online. Why did he have to get food poisoning now, of all times?!”

“I should’ve stepped in when he posted ‘I’ll best this vile pufferfish!’ on his account.” Apparently, one of the acting Masters was in no state to come online. And even in the current year of 2045, you had people itching to flaunt their recklessness on social media.

“What do we do? Should we get help from some other acting troupe?”

“But we’ve only got an hour left. It’s too late to get a replacement for a main player, isn’t it?”

“Why not bring the hero count down to five?”

“We already advertised it as a squad of six...”

“We either have to call it off or change the whole thing...” The people in the colorful outfits seemed quite troubled.

“They are...”

"As far as I know, that's the Hero Club clan." Shu recognized them from their sentai-hero-like apparel.

The Hero Club was a clan of hobbyists built around hero show performances. They were popular among tian children and Master enthusiasts alike, and their performances gathered a good amount of views on video sites.

Apparently, they had a show planned for the Love-Duel Festival, but it seemed like they'd run into some trouble that might force them to call it off.

"wtf," Behemot said and collapsed where she stood, shocked by the fact that she wouldn't get to see the hero show.

It made her seem more like a small child than a porcupine.

"Behemot is sad. Do something about it," demanded the lady.

"You just assume that I would, huh...?" Shu spent a good moment thinking about it

"Beary well, then," he said as he walked up to the Hero Club members and asked, "How about I be the stand-in?"

The Hero Club were surprised by his offer... and the very fact that he was here, for that matter. He was one of Altar's Superiors, famous for constantly wearing a costume. They all knew him, obviously.

While they were surprised by his offer, he asked for the script, and they just went and gave it to him without thinking too hard about it.

Shu went on to flip through the pages. As they watched him do that, the Hero Club members whispered among themselves.

"That came outta nowhere... It's a nice offer, but what do you guys think?"

"Can... Can he even act?"

"Having the walking playground as a guest star would make the kids really happy, though."

"It'd be a real news hook, too. Why not just let him act? If he's bad at it, we'll just pass it off as a character quirk... That's about the only option we've got, right?"

"Hold on, that's a bit—" As they talked, Shu closed the script.

"Was there a problem with it?" one of them asked.

"I memorized it," Shu said.

"...Huh? But you only read it for five minutes..."

"It ain't beary hard to memorize a hero show less than thirty minutes long. Name a page and a line."

"...All right. Page fifteen, sixth lin— Ah," one of the Hero Club members said, only to realize that he gave Shu a line of the leader, not of the sixth they had to replace. He tried to switch to another one, but...

"As long as there are children to protect... WE WILL NEVER LOSE!" Shu exclaimed, making the Hero Club gasp.

That was indeed the correct line, making it evident that Shu had memorized not just the sixth hero's lines, but the entire script.

More importantly, Shu's acting was simply spectacular. The fact that he was in an animal costume did nothing to detract from the heroic aura he emitted as he delivered the line.

The Hero Club had actual aspiring actors among them, so they could easily tell just how good Shu was.

"All right," he said. "We have a little over fifty minutes until the show. I wanna pre-bear fur it with a complete rehearsal. Let's get to it."

"Y-Yes!"

And so, Shu and the Hero Club began their practice.

Behemot silently watched them with excited-looking eyes. "Did you hear that? It seems you'll have your hero show after all."

The lady holding the porcupine was quite happy herself.

"So, what should I wear? If I need to change, I—"

"Oh, just equip this accessory with Clothing Switch on it," one of the Hero Club members gave Shu a mechanical bracelet. "You will switch from your costume into a hero suit when you say 'Transform.'"

"That's beary convenient." The hero suit produced by the accessory seemed very high-quality even to Shu, which showed just how passionate they were about their hero shows.

"Do I get a transformation pose?" Shu asked.

"In our performances, we use transformation poses from old sentai hero shows. It's so we can show off the cool poses to tian children and get some grins out of tokusatsu fans. Oh, if you have a pose you like, just feel free to use that one. If you don't, I can show you some to choose from."

"I have one I'm used to, so I'll just go fur that one."

"I see... Wait, 'used to'?" the red-clad actor tilted his head, but Shu ignored him and hit the pose. It involved a swing of the hand, a raised leg, and a spin, and it was done with great liveliness and fluidity.

"Ohh, the transformation pose of Cruise Gold, the extra Cruise Five member. You did it great! None of the other members are using it, so please go with that."

"Gotcha." The pre-transformation Cruise Gold was played by a child actor. Because of that, it was surprising to see the pose done by an adult man in a large bear costume, but it was done so flawlessly that the red-clad member instantly gave it his seal of approval. In fact, he found it a bit amusing.

However, if Shu's old friend, Lei-Lei, was here, she would be amused for a totally different reason.

After all, the child actor who'd played Cruise Gold was none other than Shu himself.

It was a particularly noteworthy role Shuichi Mukudori had played as a young acting prodigy.

Shu using this transformation pose was basically just the actual actor revisiting his old role, but no one in the Hero Club could even entertain the idea that they were in the presence of the actual Cruise Gold, now grown up.

Shu, on the other hand, only thought, I haven't done this in years. I guess the body remembers.

The two girls watching him, however, now seemed to feel something other than joy.

Once done with the rehearsal, they went up to the stage. The audience were surprised by the presence of Shu and his animal costume, but thanks to the acting prowess of the Hero Club and especially Shu, they thoroughly enjoyed the show.

Thus, Shu had successfully saved the hero performance.

◇

It was already evening when the show ended. The city was still brimming with life, but Shu was in an empty place, far away from all that vitality.

He had been invited for a post-performance party, but he'd refused.

"Phew... I'm so beary tired," he said, making a sweat-wiping gesture despite the fact that his costume never exactly produced any sweat.

He had Behemot in his hands. The lady that was holding her before had given the porcupine to him, saying that she would go buy him a drink.

"Did you enjoy the hero show?" Shu asked Behemot.

"...yea." There was no lie in that. Behemot had fully enjoyed the show. However, there were signs of a different emotion in those eyes.

Shu could sense it, so he asked, "What's wrong?"

The scene of a big bear talking to a porcupine might've seemed like something out of a children's tale. However, Behemot said nothing, as if she was nothing more than an ordinary porcupine.

"Sorry for the wait." That was when the lady returned with juice cups in hand. Once she drew near, Behemot jumped from Shu's hands to the top of her head. As though used to it, the lady didn't miss a beat. Behemot was still completely silent, making it clear that she didn't intend to answer Shu's question.

"Here, this one's yours," the lady said as she handed him the cup in her left hand.

While still watching Behemot, Shu grabbed the juice with his right hand. He skillfully took it with his bulky paws, but the next moment, she dropped her own cup in her right and thrust a spear-hand towards Shu's heart.

A second later, you could smell a mix of fruit juice and the metallic scent of blood everywhere.

The blood belonged not to Shu, but herself.

"...Well done," she said. The spear-hand had been shattered. The fingers were pointing in unnatural directions and the skin had been torn open, letting blood drip freely to the ground.

Her right hand had directly clashed with Shu's fist. Shu had expected this surprise attack and placed his fist in the path of her spear-hand.

That was what had broken her hand. Some would say that this was an expected outcome, considering she'd hit the fist of the King of Destruction — the player with the greatest STR.

However, some would claim it was amazing that she had the offensive power and endurance to make it out of this clash with just broken fingers. As long as they weren't END-focused, even ordinary Superior Jobs would have simply lost their entire hand. "What's this about?" Shu asked without a hint of his usual humor.

"Well, I suppose you can call it a reconfirmation. I simply did a final check to see if you truly are the kind of person who wouldn't die to a surprise attack from someone like me, as I am now. The result speaks for itself. What a relief."

"..."

"It appears that you always thought that we might come for your life. Your usual outward attitude always made me somewhat worried and very irritated, but I'm so, so glad to see that I have no eyes for this kind of thing."

For some reason, she smiled as though actually happy. There was now a grin on her face and no trace of the composure from before. It felt as though she was a monster whose human skin had begun to peel away.

Shu had prepared himself to summon Baldr out of his crest. If worse came to worst, he thought that Gideon might once again have a Clash of the Superiors, except greater than any battle before it. It would certainly come to that if he were to retaliate — so for now, he refrained from attacking.

However, if she wanted to start it here and now, Shu would have no choice but to oblige.

"What do you mean, 'final check'?" he asked, looking to find out her motive while keeping an eye on her actions.

"We received an order yesterday. We will now return to the imperium," she said.

"...What?" Shu couldn't have possibly expected that reply.

"Don't worry. We won't do anything here anymore. Consider today's date and the attack just now to be a little something to remember us by."

The very fact that they would receive an order telling them to retreat wasn't strange. It had always been obvious that they were in Gideon on Dryfe's orders.

However, Shu didn't understand why it would happen now, of all times.

Why had they stayed here until now?

"Anyway, Behemot and I are now leaving Gideon. It might be a clichéd thing to say, but I can't wait until we meet again and fight to the death... Oh? Ah, yes..."

As she tried to take Behemot off her head into her hands, she remembered that her right hand's fingers were broken.

She reached into the inventory on her hip, took out an ampoule filled with healing liquid, broke off the top with her thumb and downed it. It instantly healed her right hand, right down to the bone.

Shu had watched it with Identification on and noticed that it was not a special medicine, but a standard potion that healed a certain percentage of health. It was a low-tier healing item that you could acquire on the market quite easily, and one that only healed about five percent of the user's maximum health.

That weak potion was enough to completely heal the damage her clash with Shu had inflicted.

He knew exactly what that meant — the lady before him was so strong that an attack which could instantly kill Legendaries dealt only minor damage to her.

To win against her head-on, Shu would have no choice but to use his ultimate skill. That would be a repeat of the ultimate battle against Gloria, and it would be a calamity matched by few before it.

He'd been troubled by the problem of Hannya the whole day, but whatever she might cause was small compared to what could happen with this woman.

Even if a fight with her was unavoidable, he couldn't have it here in the city. Thus, he had no choice but to agree to do it the next time they met, just like she'd said.

However... before she walked away, Shu called out to her.

"Answer me one thing."

"Only if it's something I can answer."

"Why have you been in Gideon all this time?" That was something he'd started to wonder just recently... if not the entire time they'd been here.

"At first, I thought you were waiting for some golden opportunity, like the arrival of the First Princess or something," Shu said. "But you didn't do anything when she showed up, and now you're saying that you're leaving. You basically spent the past month and more just hanging around Gideon. What did you hope to achieve with this stay?"

"Phew..." she sighed, as though remembering something boring, before continuing. "We're the same as you."

"...I see." Those words didn't seem to mean much, but Shu instantly understood. As though to reinforce his understanding, he continued, "You couldn't leave, could you?"

The mad smile on her face had vanished and was replaced by a cold expression.

“That weakling’s... Franklin’s act of terror on Altar was a failure. It’s only natural for us to be wary of counterattacks from the kingdom, isn’t it? And the ones who would perform them would be Superiors... most likely the wide-scale extermination type — yourself — or the wide-scale suppression-extermination type like the High Priestess and her Lunar Society.”

“...True.”

“However, the kingdom’s relationship with The Lunar Society isn’t favorable, so you are the one we have to be most wary of.”

Lei-Lei came to Shu’s mind, but it was hard for her to be relevant to this conversation when she was hardly ever online.

“If I don’t intend to commit any terrorist acts, this is basically a waste of good fighting power, isn’t it?” Shu asked.

“It isn’t. We were an anchor.”

“...An anchor?”

“You were so wary of us that you almost never left Gideon. You mostly did it when you trained that rookie.”

It was indeed true that Shu had almost never left Gideon during this time. He hadn’t even moved from here when Tsukuyo Fuso had kidnapped his brother. It was all because the King of Beasts was here, and the result of that was...

“You couldn’t leave Gideon and couldn’t gather the materials for your ammo. Am I wrong?”

Shu’s reply was silence, but she was on the mark.

“We can fight at full capacity at any time, but that isn’t true for you. Your wide-scale extermination firepower is the same as that weakling’s monster creation in that it relies on outside Resources to be effective. However, since we’ve been here, you haven’t been able to go to any high-level monster areas to gather rare materials. Your only option was to buy what you could find on the market. However, Altar now has few veteran Masters, so the supply is limited. Well? Are your ammo stocks high enough that you’d be able to fight for the entirety of the coming war?”

It would be quite difficult. Baldr really didn’t have much ammo left. He only had enough for three armies of the same scale that Franklin had unleashed upon Gideon. Considering that the war would mean a rematch with Franklin and possibly a fight against the Hell General, who could create monsters even more easily than the mad scientist, three seemed like a very small number.

"...I always took you for a meathead," Shu said.

"I can't deny that. Instead of wasting time on craftiness, I believe it's easier to simply crush things with our power. This wasn't just our idea, but part of the imperator's strategy. After Franklin's Game, we were simply ordered to live here. We didn't know the reason ourselves until we were contacted yesterday."

"...I see." It might've seemed like Shu had been taken for a fool, but his actions actually wouldn't have changed even if he'd known about it. If he'd ignored the King of Beasts and went to gather materials, the imperator could've easily issued them a new order, possibly causing another incident in Gideon. He also noted the craftiness behind the fact that not even these two knew why they were here, for the lack of information made it impossible for Shu to actually outsmart the imperator.

Also, this move had probably been made right after Shu had revealed his identity at the battle against Franklin, which made him understand how cunning the ruler of Dryfe really was.

"It is quite troubling that you won't be at your peak in our coming battle," said the lady. "However, the ultimate skill that you used to defeat Gloria can be used without any ammo, right?"

"...Yeah." Indeed, Baldr's ultimate skill, The Unmatched God of War — Baldr, wasn't as dependent on Resources as ammo. As a solo fighter, he was still almost at his best.

"Then I don't mind. All I want is to face you in a contest of pure power."

"Is that something you say after trying to kill me with a surprise attack?"

"Like I said, that was just a final check to see that you were truly a worthy opponent. If that had worked, you would've been unworthy of a proper fight... A pebble just like the rest."

She smiled again, but not in a cruel, monstrous, or crazy way.

It was a smile of actual joy.

"You are indeed worthy," she said before turning away and walking off, holding Behemot in her hands. If her back could speak, it would surely say, "This ends our conversation. Next time, we will merely fight to the death on the battlefield."

Behemot said nothing and simply looked at Shu from within the lady's hands.

Shu watched them leave, but then remembered something.

"Sorry, there's one last thing I forgot to ask."

"...What is it?" she turned around and asked, looking somewhat irritated that he would continue this exchange after she'd said everything she wanted.

Shu went and asked her something that had somehow never come to mind before now.

"You still haven't told me your name, have you?" And that was despite them being in close contact for over a month. Shu still had never figured out the name of the lady holding Behemot.

"We aren't foolish enough to show our hand." She tried to avoid answering that, but...

"np."

"...I suppose you're right. I guess you may have my nickname, at least."

Behemot's urging made her quickly change her tune.

"Behemot calls me 'Levia.' You can use that, as well."

"Levia, eh? Behemot and Levia... I see. What a pair," Shu muttered as though that was enough for him to understand everything.

The lady calling herself "Levia" turned around and left without saying anything more.

Behemot, however, stuck her head out from her arms, looked at Shu...

"See ya, Mr. Bear."

...and gave a farewell actually understandable to humankind.

"Yeah. See ya, Behemot," said Shu.

King of Beasts, he added in thought.

After parting ways with Shu, Levia went north through the Nex Plains. Her speed exceeded that of sound, and it was growing so dark that no one could see her. She held the porcupine in her hands, but moved at supersonic speeds, occasionally turning any obstacles — meaning, monsters — to dust as she moved towards the imperium's capital.

"Behemot, I can't go at half of my maximum speed in this form, but it should be enough to get us to Vandelheim by tomorrow morning."

The porcupine in her arms had been silent the whole way so far, but she finally spoke up. "...Cruise Gold."

There was no one around, so rather than the usual Earth internet slang she’d ordinarily employ, she instead used human words.

“The transformation pose reminded me of Dad.”

“...Yes, it does seem similar to what you see in your memories.” Levia looked through the memories she shared with Behemot and concluded that what she’d seen at some point definitely bore a resemblance to what Shu had done at the hero show.

The movements were the same, but the actor was different.

“It was so nostalgic and made me so happy.”

“If it made you happy, then I’m happy, too.”

“But it also reminded me of something dark... and sad.”

“I understand. We will kill that bear the next time we meet, no matter what,” Levia nodded with a gentle smile on her face.

And, after canceling the Crest Disguise skill and making the mark on her left hand vanish, she declared, “Queen of Beasts, Leviathan was born to protect all that you are.”

Thus, they left the city of Gideon without having caused a single incident.

However, both they and Shu were certain that the day of their clash was drawing near.

Chapter Five: The Lion and the Bomb

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

“I say we should opt for clothing instead.”

“Isn’t armor the better choice? I mean, who knows what could happen.” Following Nemesis’ suggestion that I get some casual clothes, we’d headed to the bustling fourth district, which was filled with all kinds of stores.

However, we’d run into a problem — should I buy armor or regular clothing?

Unlike in reality, what you wore in Dendro wasn’t just fashion, but defense too, potentially making it a crucial part of your survival. Most armor pieces with actually good bonuses were crafted using drops from monsters and such, and that often came at the cost of making them look awkward. On the other end of the spectrum, you had fashionable clothing that was both stylish and varied, but completely useless as armor.

For battle, you needed to focus on armor, but to look fabulous in the safety of a town, you needed regular clothing.

“...You sure I can’t just walk around like this?” I asked.

“That is completely out of the question,” Nemesis shot back. “Even you noticed how people react to you, did you not?”

She had me there. I’d even been stopped by some guards this morning. Man, what should I do? I wondered.

“Ah, Ray. Good morning!”

“Huh? Rook?” I’d run into a familiar, unexpected face.

Wasn’t he on a date with Kasumi? Or are they going to meet up later?

“Didn’t you say you had plans with Kasumi?”

“It... has been postponed.” He went on to say that Kasumi was sick in real life and couldn’t get out of bed. She’d caught something a few days ago and tried to recover before the date, but it hadn’t worked out. She was getting better, though, and it was likely that she would be well enough to go on the date tomorrow in Dendro time, which was about half a day in real life. If that wasn’t enough, then they would postpone it again.

Well, it happens, I guess, I thought. Unlike Dendro, real life doesn't have items or spells that instantly cure disea— Huh? Wait. But my sister and someone else once... no, it must've been my imagination.

"With my schedule freed up, I thought I'd walk around the stores in the fourth district or pay a visit to the pimp guild. I haven't been there in a while," said Rook. "What about you two?"

"Oh, I already talked to Azurite about you-know-what, so we're just shopping now," I said.

"We're looking for clothes for Ray," Nemesis added.

"Clothes? I see, I see!" Rook said.

...See what? I wondered.

"I mean that I understand. Don't worry about it, please," Rook elaborated.

"All right... Anyway, we ran into a bit of a problem," I said before explaining to him that we couldn't decide whether to focus on the stats, the design, or just keep things as they were.

Rook tilted his head and said, "Why not just buy normal clothes and use an accessory with the Clothing Switch skill?"

"The what skill?" I'd never heard of that one before.

According to Rook, Clothing Switch allowed you to swap between your current equipment and inventory items of the same type that were linked to them using the skill. It sounded like Instant Equip and Instant Wear, but those allowed you to instantly choose and equip any item from the inventory, while Clothing Switch only allowed switching between two items that have been paired. You could use it to change all of your equipment at once, but it didn't give you the freedom to pick and choose the right item for the situation.

Unlike Instant Wear, it also had a cooldown of a few seconds. Because of this, Instant Wear was better for swapping between specific equipment depending on the situation, while Clothing Switch was preferred for just switching from standard clothing to battle equipment.

This didn't mean much to me, but apparently, when you used Clothing Switch on equipment that took all armor slots — like Shu's costume or B3's Gunhammer Plate — it was functionally the same as Instant Wear.

"I hear it's often used for costume changes in plays," Rook added.

"Really? Well, I can imagine it being useful for hero shows."

Regardless, Rook's idea solved our problem. Since I could use Clothing Switch to get into my armor instantly, I would just buy some normal clothes. I did wonder if the switch would be fast enough, but I had Counter Absorption and the Brooch to keep me alive long enough.

We parted ways with Rook again after that. Nemesis and I went to a clothing store, while Rook went to pay a visit to the pimp guild.

The store we went to wasn't all that different from the kind you'd find in reality. It was lit by magical lamps, and you had a wide selection of clothes hanging on hangers all over.

There's tons of variety, too, I thought. With so much to choose from, I can see why people enjoy shopping.

"If I may ask..." Nemesis spoke up. "If you think that there's so much to choose from, why do you exclusively go for black and red clothes?"

"...I'm not doing it on purpose." I was definitely picking clothes in that color scheme, which made me think that I might have a fondness for it.

Though, it probably wasn't a good idea to buy clothes of those colors — I'd probably end up looking basically like I did with my armor on.

"What about your bracers, by the way?" Nemesis asked. "You need a piece of equipment to pair them with."

"I guess I can link them with some basic gloves. Like these ones here."

"...You realize that those are fingerless, don't you?"

"...I'm not doing this on purpose."

In the end, we postponed the matter of the gloves, and I let Nemesis choose my clothing. The end result had flair, but wasn't too eccentric, and it seemed like something I wouldn't have any problems wearing in casual situations. The store also had Clothing Switch accessories, so we bought one along with the clothes. I paired my new outfit up with my armor, so I was still ready for battle at any time.

And with that, my appearance change was complete.

"You look proper," said Nemesis. "Yes. Proper indeed. So proper..."

"Nemesis, why are you repeating the word 'proper' over and over while looking like you're about to cry?"

"You will never understand how I feel... Nor understand what it's like for me to stand next to you when you're clad in the armor you ended up with!"

Hey, my current set is just a bit dark, a little scary, and pretty cool.

There's nothing weird about it, I thought.

"...Ray, imagine yourself crossdressing, wearing animal ears, and glasses at the same time."

"Why would you combine my three most hated clothing styles? The very thought makes me shudder."

"Albeit in a different way, that is how I feel about your armor."

"Is it really that bad?!"

Why would it be so mentally taxing for y— Hm?

"That's..." While we talked, I noticed something familiar.

Someone was leaving a nearby accessory shop, wearing a lion costume that I'd once seen in the central arena's waiting room.

It was undoubtedly Figaro, who was apparently doing some shopping.

"Online already?" I wondered. "But... an accessory shop?"

There was a sign in front of the store saying "Lifesaving Brooches for 800,000 lir each! Limit of 10!"

Oh, so he's stocking up on items, I thought.

"Oh? Ray," Figaro said as he noticed me staring. "Hello. It's been a while. So you're back in Gideon. I see you're going incognito. Well, I guess you are famous now."

"Ahahah. Well... I suppose you could say that." I did notice fewer people staring at me after I changed clothes, but I didn't know how to feel about a guy who was incognito in a lion costume asking me if I was incognito just because I was wearing normal clothes. "Umm... What are you doing here?" I asked him.

"I'm just preparing for something."

"Shu told me that you weren't able to get online until tomorrow." Speaking of Shu, he was probably preparing for Miss Hannya's arrival and thinking of how to reduce the potential damage.

"Yes. My check-up ended earlier than expected, so I thought I should prepare for tomorrow. I could've done this in the morning, but it's better to prepare ahead of time rather than waiting until the last minute. Oh, wait... did Shu tell you about Hannya?"

"Yes. Umm... that's a woman who's coming here, and you're meeting her tomorrow, right?"

"Right. That's what I'm preparing for."

He was preparing for their meeting by buying Brooches? An item that negated fatal damage? It took a moment, but it soon came to me.

According to Shu, Figaro was looking forward to dueling Miss Hannya. However, he'd also said that her Superior Embryo was enormous, reaching as high as one kilometel. It was basically impossible to duel something like that within the confines of the arena.

How would they go about it, then? Well, what came to mind was that they could have a Tenchi-like overworld match outside of the city and fight until one person's Brooch broke.

...Figaro was clearly preparing for a duel with a lady who was expecting a marriage... and that definitely couldn't end well.

Oh boy... we have no choice but to hope that Shu will have a solution to this by tomorr—

"...Hm?" Figaro suddenly looked up at the sky.

"Figaro? What's wrong?" Silence. Without saying a word, he fixed his eyes above. Even though he was still wearing his lion costume, I could still tell.

I followed his gaze and tried to see what he was looking at.

"...Figaro?" At that moment, I heard a voice behind me.

As it reached my ears, it somehow made a chill run down my spine.

I turned around to see... an ordinary woman.

She had dark brown hair that was slightly curly, Japanese facial features, and was dressed in simple, ready-made clothing.

Nothing about her stood out all that much. In fact, by Master standards, she was really plain. The blond, angelic boy next to her stood out quite a bit more.

However, I could feel it... This woman's presence exerted the kind of pressure that Xunyu had emitted at the arena, and made me shiver like Kashimiya had yesterday. She hadn't even introduced herself, but I was already more or less certain that this woman here was none other than Miss Hannya — the one Shu had been so wary of.

Thinking about it, it wasn't that strange for her to be here. Figaro had come on early, so it wasn't impossible that she'd done the same.

Yeah, okay, fine... but why did they have to actually run into each other, damn it?!

"Isn't this... quite the predicament?" Nemesis asked telepathically. Indeed it was. I couldn't do anything, though. My body was completely frozen in place.

“Hey, Hannya. Welcome to Gideon. We’ve finally met,” Figaro said, switching into his usual equipment.

He took off his incognito gear so easily...

Speaking of which, how had Miss Hannya figured out that it was Figaro while he was wearing the costume?

Wait... Was it actually his voice? From what Shu had told me, they’d only communicated through text and had only actually spoken with each other on the one time they’d met, a whole year ago... which was actually three years ago here in Dendro. She remembered his voice even after all that time?

“Figaro! I was dying to see you!” Miss Hannya said as she clung to Figaro.

It was a very direct expression of affection, yet he hugged her back as if it was nothing.

Oh, right... He’s a westerner. Hugs are probably normal to him.

“Has it really been three years since we last saw each other?” said Figaro, looking pretty happy.

“It’s hard to believe that so much time passed on this side,” Miss Hannya replied with a smile. “Heheheh. Our faces haven’t changed at all, have they?”

Their expressions made it a heartwarming sight, but the core of my being was ringing all the alarm bells.

Damn it, Shu! Get over here right now! Xunyu would be fine, too... Hell, I’ll even take Miss Eldritch!

“It’s that bad, eh?” Nemesis asked telepathically.

IT IS! I’m basically stuck right next to a ticking time bomb!

“Ray, let me introduce you. This is my girlfriend, Hannya and her Embryo, Sandalphon,” he said, saying the word girlfriend and making me wonder if he even knew what it meant. “Hannya, this is Ray, Shu’s little brother and my occasional duel opponent. The girl next to him is his Embryo, Nemesis.”

“Oh my, the costume fellow’s family. Your brother helped me out a lot. I’m Hannya, and this is...”

“A pleasure to meet you. I am Sandalphon.”

“Hello... I’m Ray Starling,” I said, realizing that I missed my chance to run away.

...Although I couldn’t really run even if I wanted to. If a battle broke out here, I would have to take action to prevent casualties. Azurite and Count Gideon would die inside if there was another incident.

“I am Nemesis. I must say, the male version of Maiden is quite a curious sight.”

“Yes,” Sandalphon replied. “I also believe the female version of Apostle isn’t exactly common.”

The two then glared at each other in silence.

Nemesis, dearest, why are you being antagonistic towards him? I asked in thought.

“Figaro, do you have some time today?” Miss Hannya asked.

With the introductions done, she invited Figaro to some quality time.

In response to that, he... shook his head.

“Sorry... not today,” he said. “There’s somewhere I have to be.”

I prepared for Miss Hannya to snap...

“I see. I was hoping we could have dinner together, but okay.”

...but she backed down without issue. She didn’t seem the slightest bit angry, which made me think that she might be more calm than I’d been led to believe.

“But if you have time tomorrow, I’d really like to enjoy the festival with you. We need to take a look at some venues for the ceremony.”

...At some venues for what?

“Yeah,” Figaro said, as if he didn’t hear or just didn’t care about that last part. “Let’s meet up before noon tomorrow and take a walk around Gideon. I wanted to show you around, anyway.”

“Thank you! I can’t wait.” There actually didn’t seem to be much tension in the air after all. Figaro was avoiding her advances, but Miss Hannya didn’t seem hurt by it.

I really hope this ends without anything bad happening, I thought.

“I’m glad that makes you happy,” said Figaro. “Oh, by the way... Hannya?”

Yep, I sure do hope this doesn’t escalate...

“Yes?”

“Would you duel me tomorrow?” He finally dropped the bombshell in that cheerful voice of his.

"...HUH?!" I exclaimed, shaken by his devastating words.

He'd refused to have dinner with her, ignored her mentioning ceremony venues, and just asked her to duel him. Even a normal girl would be mad at that, and from what I'd been told, Miss Hannya was no normal girl — this was bound to make her snap.

I expected to suddenly be standing in the center of extreme destruction and mayhem...

"Yes. I'd love to."

...but Miss Hannya accepted his request with a smile on her face.

"Thanks! I can't wait for tomorrow!" said Figaro, full of joy.

"Heheheh. You're like a giddy child," Miss Hannya said, looking at him like he was something precious.

...This isn't at all like what I was told.

"Umm, are you sure you want to duel him?" I couldn't help but ask. The situation was just so unexpected.

"I am," she replied, looking not the least bit offended. "I know from his writings that he loves duels. If it makes him happy, then I'm happy, too."

Miss Hann... I mean, Hannya then looked at Figaro with affectionate eyes.

...My impression of her was totally different from what I expected based on what Shu and the others had told me. She seemed more like a good wife who appreciated her hubby's hobbies.

"You two duel as well, right?" Hannya asked. "Thank you so much for playing with him."

"Oh, those duels are more like lessons for me, really... He's always a huge help," I replied.

"Heheheh. That made it sound like I'm his guardian!"

"...She has such a gentle demeanor," Nemesis commented telepathically.

Seriously. Did Shu and the others just overthink things in the worst possible way, or did she mellow out while in the gaol? I wondered. Whatever the case, I was glad that the worst case scenario didn't happen. If an offer to duel didn't make her blow a fuse, then it was safe to assume that nothing would.

"...Oh dear. I just got a message on my phone in real life," Hannya said before opening up a window. "I hate to have to do this, but I'm logging out.

I can't wait for tomorrow, Figaro. It'll be an important day for us and our future."

"Yeah. I can't wait, either," Figaro replied.

They went on to say their goodbyes peacefully and hugged again before Hannya logged out.

"...She seemed nice," I said.

"She's very nice. Hannya's supported me over texts for quite a while now," Figaro replied with a very bright smile on his face.

Apparently, Figaro didn't see her as just a duel partner, but also as a good friend. Wouldn't it be best for them if they just got together? I wondered.

"That would actually be quite difficult," Nemesis replied telepathically.

"...That's true," I whispered. Over here, Figaro was the Over Gladiator and the strongest fighter in the kingdom, but in reality, he lived with the risk of deadly heart spasms. He was only a picture of health in Dendro. Hannya, on the other hand, seemed to want a relationship with him in reality as well as in this world.

I didn't know what effects this barrier between them would have, but I sincerely hoped that things would work out for them.

◇◆◇

Gideon the City of Duels, Fourth District

There was a man sitting at a table deep in a two-storied café.

He wore a coat that looked like the night sky, but by Master standards, his appearance wasn't too unusual.

What was curious was what he was doing — both his eyes were closed, but his right hand was writing something on the notepad on the table. His vision and the work of his hands were completely disconnected, just like they would be when touch typing.

He'd been doing this for about two hours now. A waitress looking at him wondered if he was deep in thought — as strange as he was acting, he must've been very focused on something extremely important to him.

However, the man wasn't lost in thought or doing any sort of soul-searching. He wasn't seeing the darkness of his closed eyelids, but the surrounding townscape.

Though his eyes were shut, he was looking down at the city of Gideon. It was like a bird's eye view or the stream of a flying drone's camera.

Not saying a word, he was using this vision of his to observe.

A festival was an exhilarating environment, and it made the people attending it truly worthy of observation.

The city was full of people doing all kinds of things. Considering the festival's theme, there were many couples, tian and Master alike, but there were also a lot of tian families enjoying it, as well.

Such wholesome sights particularly stood out, but if you observed carefully, you could see many pickpockets taking advantage of the joyful populace, as well as guards and ninjas capturing the criminals.

The man observed all these events, occasionally giving things a push in a certain direction.

Here, he led a guard patrol into a back-alley where a burglar was hiding.

There, he saw a man who seemed to be secretly dating several women at once, so he led his other girlfriends to the site of his current rendezvous, resulting in a major catfight.

He looked down at the scenery below, watching the events unfolding, or even outright causing them.

Eventually, his vision focused on someone familiar.

It was the famous Master he'd ran into the previous day — Ray Starling the Unbreakable. He was accompanied by someone in a lion costume... and the man knew who it was just by the way he moved.

The two were soon joined by a third person, who was none other than the Superior that had just left the gaol and arrived at Gideon... King of Berserk, Hannya.

"...Already?" he muttered as he stopped writing. He was entirely focused on watching the two Superiors' every movement, hoping to observe something that had never been seen before.

However, he was quite disappointed.

The two had a peaceful exchange, made some plans, and simply parted ways for the day.

That unexpected sequence of events didn't make him click his tongue, but it did make him sigh in disappointment.

That wasn't it, he thought. What he wanted out of them wasn't just the exact same things that most of the city was doing, nor a mere mock battle.

He wanted to see some bloodshed filled with the kind of powerful emotions that only these two Superiors could feel.

I didn't intend to get involved here, but if holding back means that I won't get to see what I want...

It was as if there was a fuse before him, leading to the most exquisite of fireworks. He had intended to wait until it was lit, but if no one came with a match, he would simply do it himself.

The man stopped merely observing and chose to act.

"Apologies for staying so long," the man said, standing up and handing over a silver coin to the waitress.

"No worries! Please enjoy the festival!"

"Yes. I'm sure I will."

With a smile on his face, the man left the café... and stepped onto the stage he just observed.

Chapter Six: The Fuse

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

After that, Nemesis and I parted ways with Figaro and went around the festival.

I'd expected her to redefine gluttony today, but she'd actually only bought one cotton candy-lookalike and that was it.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"I'm not hungry. Not sure why."

"Wh... WHAT...?!"

This can't be real...! This isn't happening! I thought.

"That is a reaction I've seen before," she said. "I didn't like it then and I do not like it now. Stop it."

"But, I mean, you— 'Before'?"

That reminded me that we'd already had an exchange like this.

Back when we were in Torne, she... ah.

"...Are you evolving?" That was it — the evening before she evolved, Nemesis had told me that she actually wasn't hungry for once.

"I'm not sure yet. Also, don't link my appetite and my evolution like that. It makes it sound like the only time I'm not hungry is when I'm about to evolve."

"Well, but... you know... you're Nemesis."

"You said that last time, too!" Nemesis was somewhat difficult today.

Anyway, we went on to enjoy the festival with little food involved — a rarity for us — but eventually, I started to feel thirsty.

"Wanna get a drink?" I asked Nemesis.

"I do. I have no appetite, but my throat is a bit dry. How about some tea?"

"Sure. Now, where can we get som— Oh?"

As I looked around for stalls that sold drinks, I noticed a certain stall (or more like a small café) that really stood out from the rest.

It was a building with a Japanese aesthetic. Perhaps "Tenchi" aesthetic was more apt here, but unlike the strange Japanese-style design philosophy I'd seen at the inn at Quartierlatin, this building here looked properly Japanese. This was the kind of place where you'd drink tea while sitting on cushions placed atop low wooden benches. It looked much like a dumpling shop you'd see in a historical Japanese drama.

"This is a rare sight here in Altar. We should check it out," I said.

"Agreed." We went in, bought some green tea, and sat at the benches.

"I suppose I can handle this much," Nemesis said as she also ordered a plate of dango despite her lack of appetite.

I took a sip of the tea, and it was actually as good as the stuff my mom made, if not better.

"These are some good leaves," Nemesis said. "But I feel like I've had this tea before."

"Really?" I asked.

"These are leaves from Tenchi. An adherent donated a small amount and we took a liking to them, so we asked Tsukuyo to import more through Granvaloa."

"I see," nodded Nemesis. "This is indeed the same tea I tasted at The Lunar Society's headquarters."

"I ate breakfast there too, but I don't remember getting tea like this," I said.

"Nemesis had it with us while you were still unconscious."

"Ohh, that is true." Nemesis agreed, thinking back.

"I see. This tea really is goo— AH?!"

I was so focused on the delicious tea that I didn't even notice that I was talking to someone else besides Nemesis. I turned to see a third person sitting next to us. It was an unfamiliar woman with a tennyo raiment straight out of Japanese myth and hair akin to moonlight.

"Kaguya?!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Indeed. It's been a long time, Nemesis."

Kaguya?! That's Miss Eldritch's Superior Embryo!

"Wh-What are you doing here?!" I asked in a panic.

Kaguya smiled and pointed at a certain detail inside this establishment — a symbol of a crescent moon and a closed eye.

"This place is owned by The Lunar Society," she said.

"I didn't notice...!" Thinking on it now, Altar was the most western country in Dendro, and the only groups who used a Japanese aesthetic here were The Lunar Society and K&R.

Damn it, Ray, why didn't you notice?! I thought to myself.

"Wait... If her Embryo is here, then..."

"Indeed. Tsukuyo is in Gideon, as well," Kaguya said.

You can't be serious, I thought. Of course this had to happen right when I thought that Hannya's matter would be settled peacefully...

...Then again, though Miss Eldritch was quite a troublemaker, she wasn't the type to do anything bad here in a city, so maybe I didn't have to worry all that much.

"This is a festival, after all. There is nothing odd about Tsukuyo coming to enjoy it," Kaguya said. "What was the name of that village, again? The one with all the pinwheels? She was there, as well."

Oh, right, she'd been to Torne's Windstar Festival because of her ties to Mr. Shijima. Even if that wasn't the reason, she seemed like the kind of person who'd enjoy festivals. Otherworldly creatures generally had a fondness for such events.

"...You are quite harsh with her," Nemesis said telepathically.

You know that she's the woman who kidnapped me and locked me up without as much as an introduction, right?

"Fair point..." As we had our silent exchange, Kaguya watched us with a smile on her face, as though amused. While Miss Eldritch seemed to have a grin much like that of a malicious fox, Kaguya's smile was as gentle as moonlight.

"What is it?" Nemesis asked her.

"Heheheh. Have you two made some progress since then?"

"WHAPH...?!"

...Whaph?

"Wh-Wh-Wh-Wh-Whatever are you talking about...?!"

"You are spending the Love-Duel Festival together, after all. We suppose our advice was helpful?"

"Th-That's not what this is about!"

Why is Nemesis so perplexed? I wondered.

"It is quite cute that a gluttonous girl like yourself loses her appetite on a date."

"I-I just happened to lose my appetite at this particular moment! There's nothing more to it than that!"

"My my. Heheheh..."

Interesting, I thought. Kaguya was only the second Maiden Nemesis had met, but I couldn't help but notice how the vibe between them was completely unlike the one between her and Cyco. While Cyco was like a friend her age, Kaguya was more like an older sister. Well, she was definitely the more experienced Maiden, at any rate.

Ohh... so Nemesis and I were both juniors to Miss Eldritch's duo. "Well, it's good to make new friends, I guess," I said.

Kaguya seems like a better person(?) than her Master, at least, I thought as I watched her gently tease Nemesis and sipped my tea.

"...It's really nice." Because of The Love-Duel Festival, we were surrounded by a very cheerful atmosphere.

It really felt peaceful here.

I knew that there was a war coming, but this moment was so calm that it seemed far away. I wasn't even caught up in some kind of trouble like usual.

"If only we could just keep having days like this," I muttered as I took another sip.

"An omen of a coming disturbance."

Hm? Am I jinxing it?

"Hey, not every hopeful statement ends up being a jinx," I said. "Things may very well stay peaceful."

"What awaits the Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson is a tempest of trials?"

"Yeah, I know I often end up at the center of all kinds of problems, but you were also involved in the recent dragon king thing, weren't you? And stop using that nickname."

"Strife is the fate to which the living are perpetually bound."

"Well, that's true. Dendro is an eventful place for everyone. Not just us."

"...Hey," Nemesis stopped talking to Kaguya and called out. "What should I be surprised by first: the sudden appearance of Juliet at the bench on the other side, or the fact that you can converse with her so easily?"

She looked at us as if something was wrong.

Like Nemesis said, Juliet had joined us without us realizing and spoke to me while enjoying some black sweet bean jelly. I didn't know what was so weird about it, though. After all...

“We’re just chatting,” I said as I shrugged.

“...The shackles on my tongue are light tonight,” Juliet added.

“What do you mean, you ‘aren’t using difficult words this time’? You always speak normally.”

“First your fashion sense... then your grasp of Juliet’s edgy nonsense lexicon... I suppose you really are a...”

A what? I don’t really see what you’re getting at.

“By the way, it’s rare for you to eat sweets by yourself. Where’s Chelsea?” I asked.

Chelsea was a good candidate for the duel ranker with the greatest sweet tooth, and she often invited Juliet or other rankers to eat with her.

However, this time, Juliet was all alone... and actually seemed to be in low spirits.

“My soul-sister is facing a trial, and I cannot interfere. It is a matter of depravity within the horde bearing the golden flag.”

Mhm...

So there was some relationship trouble within Golden Pirates — Chelsea’s own clan. It was a matter just between the guys and girls there, so Juliet couldn’t get involved. She was probably bothered by the fact that she couldn’t help her friend while she was dealing with some problems.

“That seems like something you should just wait out,” I said. “And... you’ll help her if she asks, right?

“Yeah! I mean... Indeed I shall,” Juliet replied.

“Then everything’s fine. I’m sure she’ll count on you if she really needs someone.”

“...Yeah.” Juliet’s expression lightened up a bit.

But man, there’s relationship troubles in Chelsea’s clan, too? I thought. First Hannya, then Elizabeth... I know it’s a love festival and all, but does it really have to come with so much romantic drama?

“Aren’t you in similar trouble, as well?” Nemesis asked telepathically. “Does nothing come to mind?”

...Boy, I sure do hope I don’t get snatched up to be some amazon’s groom.

“...Huh? That’s where your mind went first?”

...Boy, I sure do hope I don’t run into an amazon queen that fights as well as my sister.

"Your brain is replaying scenes that do not seem to belong in that world. Are you sure this wasn't a dream?"

Oh, how many times have I hoped that it was.

"I now feel that most of my hardship that isn't related to combat has its roots in your childhood trauma..."

"Do you really have it that hard?"

Oh. She looked away. Did I upset her somehow?

Anyway, the day ended without anything happening, and after enjoying the festival with Nemesis, I went to sleep at the inn.

◇◆◇

A Certain Location at Gideon the City of Duels

It was late in the evening as Figaro left a particular plant shop.

As you'd expect, there were various sorts of flowers in there, but being a plant shop, it sold far more than just flowers. There were flora and herbs used in potion brewing, as well as plants and seeds that had an effect when ingested raw, so the shop had quite a wide customer base.

Whatever he'd bought there, it had put a smile on his face. However, that smile vanished the moment someone called out to him.

"I finally found you, you sickly prince." That someone was a person he didn't actually want to know, but unfortunately did, quite well.

"...Fuso Tsukuyo," he said.

"You just scowled, didn't you?" she said. "I can tell even through your costume."

Figaro had always found Tsukuyo Fuso to be a fundamentally unpleasant character. As a person, he didn't like how she brought her cult and so many other things from real life into Infinite Dendrogram. In addition to that, her Embryo — particularly her ultimate skill — was such a hard counter to Figaro that he wanted to avoid it at all costs. It had even given him the death penalty once.

Anyway, despite being the one to point out Figaro's "scowl," Tsukuyo herself seemed quite upset.

"I walked around town lookin' for you, and I sure didn't expect to find you here, of all places," Tsukuyo said. "What did you want in that shop?

Are you poisoning someone?"

"...It has nothing to do with you," Figaro replied as he realized his mistake.

If he had felt her presence as he left the shop, he might've avoided meeting her. He'd been so happy thinking about tomorrow that it had dulled his senses.

Then again, she'd apparently been searching for him, so he figured that this encounter would've happened eventually.

"Well, not like it matters to me. I have some business with you. Look here!"

Tsukuyo reached to take something from her side, making Figaro jump back and switch his equipment with Instant Wear. His costume was now gone and he was naked to the waist. It was the AGI-focused set he'd used at The Clash of the Superiors, showing just how wary he was of whatever Tsukuyo was doing.

"Hm...?" He was ready for battle, but Tsukuyo wasn't actually doing anything that looked like an attack. She just held something out to him — something that seemed to be a piece of paper.

Figaro took a look at what was written on it and tilted his head in confusion.

"...What is this?" he asked.

"Exactly what it says," Tsukuyo replied, pouting.

However, it was the very contents of the paper that were confusing to Figaro.

After all...

"I want you to pay."

...It was a bill.

"...For what?"

What is she even saying? Figaro wondered. After all, he had never bought anything from her.

In fact, he wouldn't even think of buying anything from her, no matter how good a deal she offered.

"You don't know?" Tsukuyo asked with a blatantly displeased expression.

"I seriously haven't the slightest clue. I can't think of a single reason why I would have to pay you anything."

"You're saying that after making such a huge mess for me?!" Even Figaro couldn't hide his surprise at that sentence. Seriously, what is she even saying?

"Just what are you talking about...?"

"What do you mean, 'what'?! You destroyed my base, didn't you?!" Upon hearing that, Figaro finally understood.

Some days ago, he'd destroyed The Lunar Society base to save Ray after he'd been kidnapped. He'd broken the main gate, leveled the buildings, and shattered many of the installations to drag Tsukuyo out.

"It took us this long to estimate the damages! It's over 10,000,000,000 in total! That's more than ten times what I expected! It's all because you destroyed not just buildings, but expensive furniture, too!" The Lunar Society's HQ was a Japanese-style mansion constructed of high-quality wood, which made it quite a luxurious location. With Noz Forest — the capital's primary source of lumber — having been burnt to ash, wood had become a lot more expensive.

Figaro had also destroyed most of the placeable magic items they had imported from Caldina, and with the country's recent revisions of their trade regulations, the price of those items had gone up even more than wood had. The art that had been destroyed was quite expensive, as well, and the overall sum was far above what Tsukuyo had expected. The Lunar Society was making a lot of money through donations, but paying for repairs would put a serious dent even in their coffers.

"Yeah, I know it all happened because I kidnapped Ray, but you didn't have to destroy so much! You went crazy! I want you to pay at least half of the costs!" Tsukuyo had become emotional to the point of actually crying, then grabbed Figaro — still shirtless, by the way — by the shoulders and began shaking him.

Is that really my fault? he wondered. He dug through his memory, thinking of how to deal with it.

"Talk to my lawyer about i—"

"The law doesn't exist between Masters! You know that!"

"...Right." Unlike in reality, he couldn't rely on legal advisors here.

However, he was still unsure of how to handle this.

Do I really have to pay her in this situation? Isn't this her own fault? he wondered, remembering his rampage through The Lunar Society's headquarters.

In this situation, Shu would likely say “Huh? The law says I didn’t commit any crimes, so I don’t have to pay, right? It ain’t my pawroblem,” but Figaro was too pure for that.

The fact that Tsukuyo demanded payment despite being aware of that showed that she was a cunning fox, even while she was weeping.

Figaro went on to tell her that he couldn’t make a decision right away and didn’t have the money anyway for one reason or another, and Tsukuyo reluctantly backed off.

However, neither of them realized that someone had witnessed... and recorded them.

◆◆◆

DIN Gideon Branch

On the night of the first day of the Love-Duel Festival, Tom Cat... control AI no. 13, Cheshire... paid a visit to DIN’s Gideon branch.

While Elizabeth had been staying here, this place was protected by Marie, Liliana, and Gideon’s ninjas, but now that she had returned to the guest house, it was back to business as usual.

Cheshire walked up the stairs and opened the door leading to the rooftop.

However, what he saw wasn’t the roof or the scenery of the city around the building, but a bizarre space where you couldn’t tell which way was up, full of countless information windows.

It was a control AI workspace — just like the one Cheshire himself used.

“Pardon the intrusiooon.” When he called out, the two people who had been standing in the middle of the space and doing something with the windows turned to him.

They were twins of different genders, and their faces were nearly identical.

They both had small frames and wore suits like the one worn by Marie, making them look like children pretending to be working adults — which was, in a way, adorable. The boy wore silver-rimmed glasses, while the girl sported large headphones.

“I have not seen you in 2689 hours, 58 minutes, and 14 seconds in this world’s time, No. 13.”

“It’s been too long, Cheshiiire! Congrats on falling to third plaaace! Yaay! Clap clap!”

The boy greeted Cheshire with extreme formality, while the girl was nothing if not casual.

“Is that something to congratulate me for?” Cheshire asked.

“It is quite a welcome event,” the boy said as he adjusted his glasses.

“Your Tom Kitty’s there to be beaten! It’s fine, it’s fiiine! Don’t worry! It’s okay to looose!” the girl said as she rolled around in midair.

An overly formal older brother and a sister who was far too casual. They haven’t changed at all, Cheshire thought.

These two were the founders of DIN, as well as the current heads of the company. They were also the ones organizing all the information DIN had access to. It was an impossible task for just two people, but that only made sense.

These two weren’t human, after all.

The boy was Tweedledum, and the girl was Tweedledee.

Having borrowed those names from the twins in Alice in Wonderland, they were the avatars of control AI No. 11.

“Allow us to inquire something of you, as well,” the boy said.

“Why’d ya come here?” the girl asked.

Cheshire stated his reason for being here outright. “King of Beasts just up and left Gideon, didn’t she? I was wondering why. Was there some sort of incident that happened without me knowing?”

“Certainly not.”

“No no nooo! There’s nothin’ like what you dealt with in Quartierlatin!”

“Really?”

“Affirmative. The first day of the Love-Duel Festival...”

“...Went by without anythin’ happenin’!”

“King of Destruction and King of Beasts nearly clashed...”

“...But they’re puttin’ it off for later! It’s gotta be the main event of the war! Kyaa! That’s so lewd!”

They’d begun talking strangely, with one starting and the other finishing every sentence.

They really are the same as ever, Cheshire thought.

“I seee.” he said. “So there they passed each other by, huh? What a relieeef.”

“A relief, eh?”

“But that ain’t good for us, is iiit?” While Cheshire was glad that nothing happened, the twins didn’t share his sentiment.

“...Ain’t good?”

“War is something we desire.”

“The chance of an Embryo evolving into a Superior during a war is 86.95669%!”

“That is slightly above...”

“...Even SUBM releases!” A war was a major clash between Masters, tians, and countries. Just like the release of SUBMs, it could be a trigger for evolution.

In a way, conflict was something that control AIs would naturally want more of. It was particularly likely that Embryos in sixth form and below would evolve while facing a raging Superior Embryo, especially if it was happening in a city the Masters would want to protect. The twins were actually somewhat disappointed that King of Beasts hadn’t picked this place for the battle.

“Fortunately, we have more gunpowder,” said Tweedledum.

“We’ll light it up and boom, boom, BOOM!” his sister added.

“If all values in our calculations are accounted for...”

“...We might get some more things before the waaar!” Albeit with completely different expressions on their faces, the twins were predicting the exact same thing. Cheshire had a bad feeling about this.

“...What are you planning?”

“An event,” they said in unison.

The two were control AI No. 11 — the ones in charge of quests and events. When it came to plotting, they had no equal.

“It is not an official event, however. We will merely assist in spurring on a certain player.”

“We’re just pushing down the first dominooo!”

“Do not worry. We are not acting as control AI. This is all within the rights of this avatar.”

“We’re the big cheese and all thaat!”

“And to be clear, we are designing a romantic tragedy...”

“...That perfectly fits a festival of looove! So Shakespearean! Let’s goo!"

The twins were clearly planning... no, had already finished planning something.

Suddenly, tons of visual data appeared in the workspace.

"We received the material, but DIN is not the optimal channel for it. Using it would negatively affect our activities further down the line."

"Wanna leak it to The Kingdom People Times? They'll eat this scoop right up! And they're already stealin' the ideaa!"

"That is a newspaper with little support but good exposure. It will suffice."

"Heh heh heh! It'll be heaven and hell tomorrow!" Cheshire didn't know what the two were doing, and he couldn't stop them.

After all, they were working towards the common goal of the control AIs, and they weren't doing anything that required the use of their original body. In fact, they were putting in a lot of diligent effort into what the control AIs all truly wanted.

Because of this, Cheshire couldn't say anything, just as he couldn't argue against Jabberwock's releases of SUBMs.

Seeing the twins work made him feel uneasy... and he would soon know that it wasn't unwarranted.

◇◇◇

Gideon the City of Duels

The second day of the Love-Duel Festival had arrived. Rook, Babi, and Kasumi were walking through Gideon. It was still before nine in the morning, but the streets were already full of people.

With Kasumi on his right and Babi on his left, Rook looked like an absolute winner and attracted stares everywhere he went. Babi's nonchalant suggestions had put them in this position. All the people looking at them started to make Kasumi blush, and she began to tear up behind her long bangs.

"What great weather! Perfect for a festivaal!" said Babi casually.

"Yes. It sure is," Rook replied, looking the same as ever. Kasumi alone was extremely tense.

Th-This isn't a dream, is it...? she thought. I keep checking, but it's not just a fever dream, right? Some days ago, Kasumi had helped Rook find a certain criminal, and he went on to invite her on a Love-Duel Festival date as thanks.

While we were going through the Tomb Labyrinth recently, I told the girls that I liked the idea of a "Love-Duel Festival date" that I saw a walkthrough blogger talk about... but I never would've thought that Rook would remember it... Indeed, she was attracted to this idea. Being the high school girl that she was, Kasumi thought that walking around a love-themed festival with your lover was the height of romance. However, since Kasumi never actually had a lover — or had even attempted to obtain one — it was only something she could imagine.

But then came Rook with his date invitation. Kasumi literally felt like a Typical Village Girl who'd been invited to the ball by the prince. The tension and helplessness were shaking her to the core.

This was only compounded by the fact that Io and Fujinon had caught Kasumi's illness and couldn't log in to watch over her date like they'd originally planned.

Ohhh... I was perfectly fine with just my daydreams of princes making out with other princes... AHHH! What am I thinking at a time like this?! Embarrassed and perplexed by all the thoughts racing through her head, Kasumi flushed bright red.

Rook noticed all of this and talked to her with consideration in his voice, "Kasumi, are you sure you aren't still sick? Even your avatar looks flushed."

"Y-Yeah, I'm fine! Perfectly fine!"

"Let me know if something's wrong. I'll do anything I can to help."

"A-Anything?!" His choice of words made various images swirl inside Kasumi's head, bringing her close to the boiling point.

Wh-Wh-Wh-What?! R-Rook is so forward! Way too forward! What do I do?! Io! Fujino! Help! As a person with observation abilities that more or less let him read minds, Rook had a good idea of what was going on in Kasumi's head.

However, he didn't hold the girl's tendency to use him in her shipping fantasies against her.

As someone who'd been studying human psychology and examining criminal cases from a very young age, he knew Kasumi just shipped men with other men as a kind of intrusive thought, and it didn't bother him at all..

In fact, the way Kasumi's own thoughts made her red and flustered was rather cute to him.

Kasumi is also quite heartwarming to watch, though in a different way than Ray, Rook thought.

"You mean that she has that hamster-like cuteness?" Babi asked telepathically.

...Babi, please don't use rodents for your comparisons. "Small animal" works perfectly fine.

Rook remembered a particular animal closely related to the hamster and trembled a little.

"U-Umm, are you okay?" Kasumi asked.

"...Yes. I just had some... recollection shivers."

Recollection shivers?! Is that even a thing?! Kasumi wondered in her mind, but didn't say it.

"By the way, is there anywhere you want to go today?" Rook asked her.

"U-Umm, there's a large clothing store in the fourth district that has couples-exclusive photoshoots." This was a special event where couples could try on new clothes made by clothing-related jobs and take commemorative photos wearing them. Photo data could be extracted, and Kasumi wanted those polished pictures to use as reference.

Nhh... I'm nervous, but this is a chance to get photos of a wonderful model in wonderful fashion... If I don't go through with this, I won't be able to face Io and Fujino... They even got sick because they visited me...

It was quite a challenge for her, but Kasumi gathered her resolve and decided to go to the aforementioned store for the event.

"All right. Where is it supposed to be?" Rook asked.

"Ah. G-Give me a moment! I'll check right now..." Instead of using the map window like most players, Kasumi used her Embryo — Taijitu.

Like always, she took a look at what was displayed... and saw something incredibly strange.

"...Eh? What is this...?" The map displayed by Taijitu was in pieces.

Gideon on the map was split into many even squares that were scattered about randomly, like a sliding block puzzle. It was as though a mischievous god had shattered the whole city with little rhyme or reason.

“The city is...?! Huh?” Kasumi exclaimed, looking up in shock — only to see Gideon the same as it ever was. It wasn’t scattered or broken, and only one thing had changed.

“...Eh?”

And what a major change it was.

At the center of Gideon, close to the central arena, there was something enormous.

It was something you could see from any place in the whole city.

Two inverted towers were standing tall as if to pierce the heavens... or stab straight through the earth.

It was the Superior Embryo known as Sandalphon.

Chapter Seven: The End of the Festival and the Explosion

Thirty Minutes Ago

After the first day of the Love-Duel Festival, Hannya — Fuyuko Shiki — went on to take a nap.

She could've gotten more sleep within Infinite Dendrogram, but she chose to sleep in reality because she wanted the second day — and her date with Figaro — to come as soon as possible.

She slept, anxious for that long-awaited moment... and woke up feeling absolutely awful.

"...Why would I have a dream like that now?" During her nap, she'd relived that time when she was betrayed by the man she once loved. She'd seen herself giving her all to him and helping him with everything she had, only for him to cut her off with a single message. She'd seen his face as she found him in Legendaria, grinning like an idiot as he messed around with another woman.

The memories came back to her as a dream, attacking right before her long-awaited moment. It was almost like a red flag, or an alarm bell ringing out.

"Figaro... Vincent isn't like him."

I can trust Vincent. ...Can't I? I mean, he's so pure. ...We only talked through messages. How can I be sure? We love each other. ...Even though I never confirmed it? Vincent isn't like him. ...But what do I actually know about Vincent?

Her reason clashed with her emotions, repeating her greatest fear: that she would be betrayed by her beloved again.

"What am I so worried about...? I just need to confirm that he loves me..."

Fuyuko shook off the intrusive voice in the back of her mind and logged in to Infinite Dendrogram.

She appeared at the plaza — the local save point — and immediately noticed that her surroundings were astir. At first, she thought it was just the cheerful festival atmosphere, but it didn't seem quite right.

"Do you think those two are... you know...?"

"It's unexpected, but they make for a balanced pair. Maybe they're a good match."

"They don't really seem happy, though..." Many people were chatting with newspapers in hand. Nearby, someone was talking while selling copies of that same paper, and Hannya was curious enough to buy one.

What she saw first was the name of the newspaper — "Kingdom People Times."

What she saw next was a photo of a bare-chested man, and a woman right next to him.

To the side, there was a large text saying "THE HEAT OF PASSION?! THE DUEL CHAMPION AND THE LEADER OF THE TOP CLAN!" followed by letters in a smaller font, starting with "A teary exchange! Whatever happened between these two..."

The people in the photo were named, too, but Hannya didn't need that to know who the man was — she couldn't forget him if she tried.

"...Figaro." It was none other than her beloved.

The paper said that the photo had been taken last night — which would mean that this happened right after Figaro had told her that he couldn't dine with her.

He said he didn't have time for me, Hannya's mind wrung out one single thought as it gradually went blank.

Who is she? What were they talking about? she wondered.

What am I to him? What did we have between us? she questioned herself.

Then, all the mail they'd exchanged flashed through her mind.

"Oh... I just realized... that he never said... that he loved me."

King of Berserk, Hannya finally noticed that crushing detail. She realized that her love was an illusion, and the last shreds of her rationality finally fell away.

"As you command, Lady Hannya." In response to the voice in his Master's heart, Warden Angel, Sandalphon instantly began to act.

"Form Shift — Prison Tower." As he appeared out of the crest, he instantly and drastically changed his appearance.

From a living being to an inorganic structure... from a small child to twin towers that reached as high as the sky.

Thus, Sandalphon now stood in the middle of Gideon's central plaza.

Though the structures were gigantic, reaching an entire kilometel in height, they actually tapered down in volume towards the bottom. A building like that would never stand using conventional means and materials, but such logic didn't apply to a Superior Embryo.

The towers hadn't even touched the ground yet. If they weighed as much as they looked, they would smash craters into the ground the moment they landed.

"...AAAAAAAAHHHHH! R-RU... RUN AWAAY!"

"Tch! Dryfe's at it again?!"

"...Wait, that's the thing from Valentine's..." Sandalphon's sudden appearance left the people dumbfounded for a good moment, then made them scatter in fear. A few Masters tried attacking the towers, but Sandalphon didn't care. Numerous as they were, the spells and blows could only scratch it at best.

Sandalphon ignored the minor resistance...

"Angeldeath Dominion — Sandalphon."

...and activated his ultimate skill.

Like a ripple, its effect began to spread with barely anyone noticing until it enveloped all of Gideon.

A few seconds later, screams of fear and confusion drowned the city, spurred by something more than just the two towers in the plaza.

◇◇◇

Gideon the City of Duels

"R-Rook! Th-That's...!" Kasumi cried, unable to hide her fear of the large object in the middle of the city.

Rook stood in front of her and considered the situation.

That fits the description I was given of Miss Hannya's Sandalphon. Ray said that things were going smoothly on that front, but it looks like something's changed.

He took out his Telepathy Cuffs to contact Ray and Shu, but then he heard the screams. However, they didn't come from somewhere off in the city, but from right next to him.

The screams were let out by people that had appeared from seemingly nowhere just ten metels in front of him.

"Huh? What?!" Rook swept Kasumi into his arms and moved away from the panicked crowd. They seemed quite perplexed by the situation, but they were desperate to get as far away from Sandalphon as possible.

As Rook watched them, he considered the situation once more.

Mass teleportation? Is this a skill? Did Sandalphon do this? Rook had been informed about Hannya herself, but he didn't know anything about her skills because Shu and Figaro didn't know anything, either. Figaro could've asked her, but he'd chosen not to do it because he believed that it would've been unfair to know all the cards in the deck of someone he'd eventually duel.

But... How much would a teleportation skill of this scale actually cost? As far as Rook knew, teleportation skills were costly even here in Infinite Dendrogram. For example, Kasumi's Taijitu's teleportation was limited to her own monsters, and its cost grew exponentially the farther she tried to teleport them. Then there was Franklin, who had to create monsters solely dedicated to Castling — the short-distance teleportation skill that swapped his and the monster's places — just to make good use of it. The only skill Rook knew that could go over long distances without much effort was Xunyu's ultimate skill, but even that was limited to just her limbs.

It was quite obvious this anomaly had been caused by Sandalphon, but if he could teleport that many people at once and also manifest such a gigantic body, he was clearly abnormally powerful.

Since he can do that, he must either have some complex limitations on it, or it isn't even pure teleportation to begin with... or it could be a mix of both... Reminds me of her Embryo.

Rook remembered one of his past opponents — Hugo and Cyco. Cyco's La Porte de l'Enfer could instantly kill Masters far more powerful than herself as long as the right conditions were met.

Assuming that that power stems from the "giant-killing" theme Maidens have, this phenomenon most likely has to do with some characteristic common to all Apostles, but... Rook didn't have enough information to make any assumptions about what it could be, so for now, he focused on analyzing the effect of the skill.

It can't be literal teleportation because of the high cost, so maybe it's something else? Like... an illusion?

He first considered that it could be like the stealth-focused Superior Embryo that he'd faced recently, and that what he had seen here might've been just a vision of people running around in a panic in some other location.

Rook ordered his coat — Liz — to create thin threads and let them flow in the wind. The threads could physically touch the panicked crowd, making him realize that they were real to Liz, at least.

It's not sense manipulation. Even a Superior Embryo couldn't do that on this scale. These people are definitely real. Rook had faced Gerbera and her Alhazred, so he knew that the range of such abilities was limited.

There's people popping up here and there all over the street... Hm?

He looked at the street ahead, which continued for hundreds of metels, and noticed something.

People were only popping up in certain places. Based on his estimations, it was ten metels ahead, then 110 metels, then 210 — every 100 metels, basically.

Could it be...? Rook made Liz extend her threads in all directions, and she, too, was affected by this phenomenon. However, it was only to the threads that reached past a certain distance.

Rook looked in the direction, calculated the distance, and had an epiphany.

Squares of exactly 100 metels. Leaving one moves you someplace else.

An area split into 100 metel-large squares. That reminded him of what he'd seen right before he saw Sandalphon.

"Kasumi, could you show me your Taijitu agai— Huh?"

"Hhnn..." When Rook spoke to Kasumi, he noticed that she was blushing bright red from head to toe and seemed barely conscious.

His accelerated analysis took him just a little under a minute, but he had been holding Kasumi this entire time, and she was about to explode from embarrassment.

He gave up on asking. She was holding the Taijitu in her hands, so he took a look at it and saw the map of Gideon displayed in the same "sliding block puzzle" state as before. Rook checked it against his memories and realized that the area ten metels to the north had become Gideon’s north gate.

Wanting to test his theory, he walked towards the place people were appearing. He first kicked a pebble before passing, but it rolled by with no problem.

“The utilities haven’t been affected, either, so I suppose it only works on living creatures... and whatever they’re carrying,” he whispered, as he watched the still-clothed people passing by.

“It affects the Taijitu, too... so we can add Embryos to that.” And so, he went against the wave of people and passed through the place where they appeared.

A few steps later, he was no longer in the street from before, but the north gate.

“...So this is how it works.” With the truth finally revealed, Rook contacted Ray and Shu to pass on this information.

◆

A few minutes earlier...

“Labyrinth created — prison complete,” Sandalphon whispered as he opened his eyes — the jewels on the tip of each tower.

Each of them saw different things.

The right jewel saw Gideon as it was before the skill’s activation. The people seen through this one were teleported elsewhere as they moved.

The left jewel saw Gideon scattered in a square tile pattern. The people seen through this one were moving around without any teleportation.

To them, Gideon was currently the same as it appeared to the left jewel.

Just as Rook had assumed, this phenomenon was caused by the special characteristic of Apostles.

Maidens were known to excel at giant-killing. Apostles also had a unique theme to their powers. This theme could only be described as “domination” — the opposite of the Maiden-type Embryo tendency to focus their power to defeat overwhelming odds. Apostles, by contrast, spread their power out, claimed a part of the world as their own, and rewrote its rules for their own benefit.

Some might think of Kaguya, but her night was merely an overlay she painted onto the world. Apostles, on the other hand, marked an area as their own, controlled it, and changed it at will.

Sandalphon affected the laws of movement within the ten kilometels he dominated. This ultimate skill rewrote the spatial connection for every 100 metels, but only for living beings and their possessions. It shuffled the world around Sandalphon into what his left jewel saw.

This power was based on Judaic writings — specifically, the archangel that imprisoned other angels.

Besides Sandalphon himself, only very few people could perceive this scrambled world. To most, this city would become a prison that merely happened to look like a very familiar place.

This was the power Hannya had desired — the power to never let RockPanther get away from her. She'd already used it to corner him. He'd frantically ran around, crying and pissing himself, but she'd eventually crushed him.

This time, she was using it on someone else.

"Optical Search — Over Gladiator, Figaro." Sandalphon slowly walked and looked in every possible direction to find the target.

He was merely walking through his scattered world, but to others, it appeared as though the two massive towers were teleporting.

This was also how it had suddenly appeared behind Figaro when they'd first met.

At the top of Sandalphon stood Hannya, not saying a word as she glared at the city below. There were many emotions in her eyes, but all of them were overwhelmed by grief, rage, and insanity.

"Lady Hannya. I have finished transforming and setting up the Angeldeath Dominion. I am now searching for the target."

Sandalphon received no response, but he knew his Master well enough to expect this.

There were two stages to Hannya's rampages.

The first was indiscriminate rage. She would be angry from the bottom of her heart, but she would lack a clear target, so she would simply lash out at those who closely resembled the source of her ire, screaming out her emotions while doing so.

That was how she had been most of the time while searching for RockPanther — the man who'd dumped her in real life.

The second stage was a pure destructive urge. She wouldn't say a word, and nothing — neither power nor words — would be able to stop her until she found her target and the fire in her heart was finally extinguished.

This was how she had been when she'd found RockPanther in Legendaria.

Sandalphon knew full well that the second stage was far more terrifying than the first.

After all — in this state, she didn't care about anything. She would be focused solely on letting her anger out on her target and completely lose all consideration for her surroundings — which she still had in the first stage, however meager. Being Hannya's weapon, Sandalphon knew better than anyone that the lack of tian casualties back when she'd crushed RockPanther in Legendaria had been pure luck.

Needless to say, she'd been in the second stage of anger back then.

This city will probably be wiped off the map, Sandalphon thought. Figaro wasn't like RockPanther — not as an individual, but as a fighter. He was powerful even by Superior standards, and Sandalphon believed that Gideon would fall before he would be defeated.

...I have no say in this. I must do as Lady Hannya desires.

Once, Kaguya had told Nemesis that Apostles were "products of a sense of duty."

That was simply the truth. Apostles always strived to be merely tools meant to fulfill whatever their Masters desired, and never argued against them or raised any objection.

The title of "Apostle" was most apt indeed, and this one knew that everything would end the moment Figaro appeared.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

"Can Miss Eldritch go one day without being a nuisance?!" I roared as I rode Silver around Gideon's skies.

In my hand, I held a newspaper — the likely cause of this happening.

I'd picked it up at the inn where I was staying, thought "This can't be good," and this whole thing started happening the very next moment.

"...I can understand why she blew up, though," said Nemesis. "The man who refused to dine with her went on to meet another woman with his shirt off. Fuel on the fire. Truly."

"And I'm pretty damn sure this wasn't Figaro's intention at all!" Then again, this was certainly not what Miss Eldritch or the newspaper company wanted either, but that didn't change what was going on right now.

[Reiji, how's it going up there? You gettin' close to the legs?] Shu asked using his Telepathy Cuffs.

[No! The scenery just changes as I fly around! I can't get to her even from here!]

[Well, Rook said that the local space's split into a bunch of 100 metel squares and scattered into a huge mess. Hannya's movin' around, too. Meeting her is a matter of pure luck. Rook and the Superior Killer aren't doing too well, either.]

The spatial scramble seemed to work no matter how high up you were. I saw some people flying around on tamed monsters, and they all seemed as lost as I was.

[...Have you found Miss Eldritch yet?] I asked.

[Nope. She might not even be online,] Shu replied.

Miss Eldritch and her Lunar Society's swarm tactics and debuffs might've been able to help, but it didn't seem like we could rely on that.

...You caused this, damn it! Where are you?!

[What about Xunyu?]

[She can't use her ult. Said something about visual info not lining up with her aim. The scrambling only affects creatures and Embryos, so there's a discrepancy between us and our optics and observation from a spellcasting standpoint.]

Some would probably think of just casting spells on the target as it appeared, but that was no good, either.

It teleported with every step taken, so every projectile would just miss; since that could result in collateral damage on the city, it wasn't wise to risk it. The same could be said for Shu's Baldr.

"Those legs are over a kilometel tall," said Nemesis. "A single step is more than enough to cover the 100 metels."

Rook had figured out the nature of the skill, but we had no means of dealing with it.

...Perhaps Azurite's Altar could cut through this skill itself? No. In this absurd situation where the laws of movement were completely re-written, bringing in an even more absurd all-severing power didn't seem like a good idea.

There was no telling what could happen. For all we knew, that could make the laws of space irreparable.

Azurite already knew about the situation and they were acting to mend it, but they'd had no results so far.

[...Bro, where's Figaro?]

[I can't contact him. He ain't online yet... but maybe it's best if he doesn't show up today.]

I thought that maybe Figaro could persuade Hannya to calm down, but Shu rejected that idea.

[Right now, Hannya's just walking around the city using her skill,] he continued. [She's probably lookin' for Figgy. Once she finds him, the situation will drastically change.]

[...In what way?]

[I can think of two. They'll either talk, or she'll attack him on sight.]

...One or the other, huh?

[The latter would be real bad. Hannya would use her berserker grouping skills and Sandalphon would start raging around with a huge boost to STR and AGI.]

[...Is it just me, or does that seem worse than Franklin's Game?]

[It ain't just you. That's what I meant by "real bad."]

The fact that Shu stopped using his bear puns told me everything about how serious this situation was.

"I just realized something," Nemesis said telepathically. "Bringing those towers down would be a disaster all on its own, no?"

"Yeah. That's why we don't have many good ways of stopping her."

Our only options were to convince her to stop or instantly give Hannya the death penalty and make Sandalphon vanish before he collapsed.

Shu had been counting on Xunyu because she had Tenaga-Ashinaga's ult, which could quickly get rid of Hannya without making Sandalphon fall, but his own ult made that impossible.

That was why we were now trying to reach Sandalphon and stop Hannya directly, but if she was in no state to be swayed by words...

"...We'll have no choice but to defeat her, huh?" I recalled her as she was yesterday... and her excitement for today's date with Figaro.

If things hadn't unfolded like this, they would've had a great time together.

This is leaving a bad taste in my mouth... Why did this happen?!

[...Reiji, I got good news and bad news. In a single package,] Shu said with a tense voice.

[...What is it?] I asked, with a worried note to my voice.

[Figgy's online.] That was enough for me to know that the situation would shift in one way or another.

◇◆◇

Gideon the City of Duels, DIN Gideon Branch

Standing atop the (actual) roof of the Gideon branch of DIN were three entities. They were control AIs — Cheshire as Tom Cat, Tweedledum, and Tweedledee.

"...How long have you been planning this?" Cheshire asked, realizing that this had been an intentional gambit from the twins. It wasn't a spontaneous idea they'd had just yesterday — they had been planning this since the moment they found out that Hannya would be coming to Gideon. As the one in charge of the gaol, Red King had already informed them of the time Hannya would be released, as well as her goals.

"Since Alice brought us the idea," said Tweedledum.

"We've been thinkin' of takin' a good photo since then. You can get some spicy ones if you try, y'know?" added Tweedledee.

"We were not allowed to set up cameras to increase our chances of success, but this led to us acquiring one of the best player contributions possible."

"Manpoweeerr! Wait, is that the right way to look at it? His goal is pretty much the same as ours, right?"

Alice was the control AI in charge of player protection, and she worked at DIN as Alison. It was a disguise she kept up for certain purposes, just like Cheshire had Tom Cat.

She wasn't important right now, though. The twins' plot was the real threat.

"Anyway, we already had the info about King of Berserk and knew what she was like."

"We guessed this would happen if we just gave her a li'l nuudge."

Basically, to the twins, this "Ba-Thump Kyahah" plan was nothing but a method of triggering Hannya's rampage.

"Originally, we'd planned to use a photo he would take with a fan. This is a love festival, after all, so it was likely that some of them would try flirting with him."

"He didn't stop wearing the costume while out in town, though, so we were panicking preeetty badly."

"We devised some alternatives, but in the end we managed to acquire perhaps the ideal photography."

"Kingdom People Times did great after we leaked it, too. Though, I guess it's normal for newspapers to write articles with looots of assumptions."

From their perspective, Tsukuyo Fuso, the newspaper company, and the contributor had all done a perfect job. Hannya was, after all, going on a rampage.

"...This is bound to affect their real lives," said Cheshire. "That's not something we should—"

"That observation could not be more late," Tweedledum replied.

"It's waay too late!" Tweedledee added. "There's already lots of people who were so affected by what happened in here that it changed their real lives. It's especially common with Maiden Masters like King of Tartarus or King of Swords. They're sooo sensitive!"

"Tweedle...!" Cheshire choked out, glaring at them. They had just said something he couldn't tolerate.

However, when he looked into their eyes, he was shocked to see absolutely no malice in them. There were simply no emotions there at all. Tweedledee seemed to act like she was enjoying this, but a closer look into her eyes would make you see that they were as cold as camera lenses.

They were like machines — even their speech and actions were pre-programmed.

It made Cheshire realize yet again just how different he was from them, even though he'd known them for a long time and seen this play out many times before.

"...You're more loyal to the cause than most of us," he said. Cheshire wasn’t like them. He had been a living creature-based Legion-type even before he evolved, while the twins were Type Infinite Calculator, evolved from the “Calculator” branch of Arms, which were focused almost solely on calculation processing. Since the twins had started out as basically machines, they were fundamentally different from Cheshire even after they received avatars which allowed them to act human.

And like machines, they always prioritized their goals over emotions.

“That’s what makes you so hard for me to bear. You’re just like that thing.”

They reminded Cheshire of his most hated Infinite Embryo... control AI No. 10.

“I am unable to agree with that assessment,” said Tweedledum.

“Yeahh! Bandersnatch goes waaay too far. Don’t lump us with hiim.”

The twins had just caused some major problems for Masters to make them evolve, but that didn’t seem like “too far” to them.

“Make the differentiation, No. 13.”

“It’s fine, it’s fiiine. Even if it hurts them, they’re still alive... Unlike our Masters.”

“...Tweedle.”

For just a moment, Cheshire saw a hint of emotion in their eyes, but it vanished as quickly as it appeared.

He then looked away from them and walked towards the fence around the roof.

“What are you doiing?”

“We shouldn’t throw them into traps like this. I’ll intervene to stop this disturbance.”

He couldn’t use his original body, but he could be useful even as Tom Cat.

Cheshire prepared to jump off the roof into the chaotic city of Gideon...

“Ah...!”

...but his legs didn’t listen to him.

In fact, his entire body was completely immobilized.

“This is... Alice!” He called out the name of the colleague responsible for this phenomenon.

Control AI No. 1, Alice, was in charge of player protection, as well as all avatars. She’d used her abilities to render Cheshire incapable of moving

Tom.

Under other circumstances things might have been different, but as an avatar, Tom Cat had no power against her. After all, control AI avatars, Master avatars... all the avatars active on Infinite Dendrogram had been created by her.

“...So she’s with you on this one?” Cheshire asked.

“You could see it that way. Be content to spectate. It is not your place to get involved.”

“Observe the resuults! Won’t it be great if someone evolves?!”

Cheshire couldn’t use his original body and was rendered immobile, while the two twins were eagerly awaiting the results of the rampage they’d set up.

Thus, the control AIs observed the third Clash of the Superiors to happen in this city, none of them knowing how it would unfold.

◇◇◇

Nex Plains

Figaro wasn’t in Gideon.

Last night, he had been running around the city’s outskirts, looking for a good place to duel Hannya; he’d logged out after deciding that the edge of Nex Plains would do just fine. This let him avoid the effects of the Angeldeath Dominion.

Many could count themselves lucky that he was outside the city, for the casualties would’ve been far worse if he’d been inside it.

Right after logging in, he instantly saw Sandalphon stomping around Gideon, as well as its panicked people.

“Hannya...” He understood the situation before he even came online. The MMO journal he’d read right before had mentioned something about the article in Kingdom People Times.

Before logging in, he didn’t think much of it besides “Well, this isn’t true at all,” but upon coming here, he realized that article was the driving force behind the situation before him. He wasn’t the type to overthink things, but he wasn’t a fool, either, so he was instantly able to connect Hannya’s rampage to the article.

For a moment, he looked as if he was holding something back... and then he wordlessly removed a particular item from his inventory.

It was a magic item that functioned as a signal flare. He'd acquired it while raiding a dungeon, but since he could only fight solo, it had been gathering dust in his inventory for a long time.

Figaro fired it into the sky, letting Hannya know his location.

"Target sighted." Sandalphon saw the signal, instantly noticed Figaro standing in Nex Plains, and moved the giant tower-legs according to Hannya's will. They seemed absolutely out of control. Fixated solely on Figaro and ignoring everyone else, the tower-legs rushed towards him.

It was quite fortunate that Hannya's current location was at the edge of the Angeldeath Dominion.

Sandalphon quickly left the area of effect, instantly canceling the skill. One of Angeldeath Dominion's conditions was that Sandalphon had to stay within the area he'd shuffled for it to remain active.

Of course, Sandalphon could use the ult again to apply its effects to his current location, but he didn't do it. There was something far more important now.

Destroying the Nex Plains beneath, Hannya arrived mere moments before Figaro. The two faced each other, with Hannya staring straight down at him.

"Han—"

"Last Berserk." Before Figaro could even call out her name, she used the King of Berserk ultimate job skill.

Last Berserk was both a skill and a declaration of incoming obliteration.

It could only be used once locked on to a target, and it put the KoB in a berserk state until either the target or the user died. In exchange for this extreme loss of control, the user's STR and AGI were quintupled, they took only twenty percent damage and their other skills didn't cost any MP or SP.

The moment the skill was used, it turned the user into a biological weapon focused solely on killing the target. It was a forbidden skill that had led many past Kings of Berserk to their death in a state of pure insanity.

Hannya knew its effects well, but she still didn't hesitate to use it on Figaro. A moment later, one of the kilometel-tall towers fell right on him.

Figaro reacted fast, quickly switching to his AGI-focused set and evading the tower by jumping backwards.

However, the other tower fell right where he landed.

It seemed like simple stomping, but because of Sandalphon's weight and the supersonic speed gained from Last Berserk, each step was like a meteor impact, creating craters that made Nex Plains look like the surface of the Moon.

Back at the gaol, Hannya had fought Gerbera — a stealth-focused Superior — who was quickly pulverized by this exact same barrage.

It was like a bombardment that could neither be avoided nor defended against.

Among the outlaws, it was a well known fact that if Hannya was above you, you would be crushed, but the Over Gladiator was far beyond this mere fact.

"Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis!" With no hesitation at all, Figaro went and used his own ult — the skill that whittled his life away.

"Acceleration!" He followed it up with the active skill from his equipped ring, which greatly increased his AGI.

Cor Leonis empowered the effect of his items' skills immensely in exchange for destroying them permanently, and Acceleration from his ring now briefly gave him speed that surpassed the stomping towers.

Figaro evaded the legs themselves, as well as the powerful shockwaves they caused.

He survived the fatal blows he couldn't dodge using Dragonscale Wards that were empowered by Cor Leonis and absorbed even more damage than normal. He replaced the ones that broke, continuing to evade the blows as he did.

Normal people... no... even rankers would be pulverized by this bombardment, but Figaro was actually surviving it.

However, he wouldn't be able to keep this up forever.

He had a limited number of items like the Dragonscale Wards, and his ult was chipping away at his HP every second.

On the other hand, it cost Hannya absolutely nothing to continue doing this.

Because of Last Berserk, she could continue barraging Figaro for as long as he was alive.

This battle already had a set goal — his death.

Despite the absolutely desperate situation, Figaro continued evading the deadly stomps while keeping his eyes on Hannya above him.

He then switched his footwear from Unbound Sabatons, Unchain — which negated movement limitations — to a pair of boots that had the Climbing skill. That was a passive skill used while scaling cliffs, and if empowered by Cor Leonis, it would become so powerful that he would be able to run up even smooth walls.

Albeit situational, the boots that had this skill could be used against a large variety of enemies, so he always had them handy.

And there was only one reason why he would equip them now.

“...I’m coming over there.” Figaro jumped on the surface of one of the tower-legs and began running upwards. It moved at the speed of sound, but that wasn’t enough to throw him off.

Through the earth-shaking impacts, he ran up Sandalphon, heading straight towards Hannya.

Chapter Eight: A Story Written in the Sky

Gideon the City of Duels

“Figgy loggin’ in outside is a real silver lining here.” Thanks to Figaro appearing in the Nex Plains and Hannya going after him, the situation had shifted drastically. As Shu considered how to handle things now, someone contacted him through the Telepathy Cuffs.

[Hello? Can you hear me?]

[Rook! What is it?]

[I just met up with Xunyu. The shuffling effect was canceled, so she can target Hannya now.]

Angeldeath Dominion had been undone, allowing Xunyu to use Tenaga Ashinaga’s ultimate skill.

[Can we count on her tearin’ out her heart?] Shu asked.

[She says there’s only like a fifty percent chance that she’ll succeed, because Hannya has high AGI and she’s moving around like crazy.] Tenaga Ashinaga’s ultimate skill didn’t come with a lock-on function and it could easily miss if the set coordinates were incorrect. That was why Xunyu had first immobilized Figaro before using it on him in The Clash of the Superiors.

With Hannya and Sandalphon being so large and mobile, it was difficult for Xunyu to land the skill.

[...Hannya’s probably wearin’ a Brooch, too,] said Shu. [Even if it lands, it won’t be enough... And then she might go on to make a mess out of more than just the plains.]

[That’s true.]

[...Let’s leave it to Figgy for now. We’ll go with Xunyu’s plan if he doesn’t make it.]

[Understood.] After cutting the comms with Shu, Rook gazed at Sandalphon and Figaro in the distance with an inquisitive look in his eyes.

“Why is Figaro climbing up Sandalphon?” he asked. “He could easily win by just standing on the surface and using Gloria α... or any other ranged skills.”

“It’s sooo weird,” said Babi. “He could just go SHWING like he did in the duuuel!”

“...Is there some kind of issue with using long-ranged attack skills against Hannya?” Rook theorized. “Would she block them somehow...?”

“NopE,” Xunyu cut his musings short. “For someone with sUch a good head on your shoulders, you’re prEtty ignorant.”

“...Ignorant?” Rook rarely heard anyone call him that, so he was a bit taken aback.

“The reAson he’s climbin’ is prObably really simplE.”

“It is?” Whatever Xunyu was thinking, Rook couldn’t see it yet.

“YeAh. He ain’t wiEldin’ a weapon, and he’s using thE ult he didn’t use even in oUr duel. Ya know whAt that means, right?”

Rook didn’t, actually. Based on what he’d been told, Figaro had been looking forward to dueling Hannya, and according to what Ray had said that had been exactly their plans for today. Because of this, Rook assumed that Figaro saw this as a duel or some sort of fight to stop Gideon from being destroyed.

“Well, you’ll find oUt if ya just think abOut it. Just thinking cAn make for a good lessOn, Rook.”

“For a little girl, you’re so much like a big sisteeer,” said Babi. “I won’t let you be Rook’s big sister, though. That’s my role!”

“I don’t even wAnt it,” Xunyu chuckled as she watched Figaro’s fight, preparing her ult just in case.

◇◆◇

Nex Plains

Two different sounds now resounded over the plains: the roar of the pulverized ground and a young man’s voice.

“Fall! Please just fall down already!” Sandalphon shouted this while continuing his devastating stomping.

However, Figaro was weathering every movement and shockwave, never stopping his dash to the top of the tower.

The scene seemed to defy the laws of physics, but Figaro's stats and his boots' Climbing skill, buffed by Cor Leonis, made this feat possible. The ult had already expired, but because he was limiting his equipment, the enhancement was still sufficient.

It also bears remembering that Figaro had tons of experience fighting on unsteady terrain.

"He's absurd...!" This was the first time Sandalphon had ever encountered someone who had tried to climb on him while he was attacking.

So far, he'd only lost against two enemies: the incarnation of nature that specialized in area-wide extermination and a slime that negated all physical damage. Compatibility had been against him in both of those fights — Sandalphon couldn't make use of his strong points and afterwards could fully understand why he lost.

However, Figaro was just a human — a creature that should have died with a single stomp.

The fact that he was still alive began to make Sandalphon panic.

The Over Gladiator was already halfway up his tower-leg.

"...■■"

"Lady Hannya...!" While Last Berserk was active, Hannya was basically a machine devoted to attacking Figaro. It made the movement of her body completely automatic, and if Sandalphon wasn't there to provide stability, even the massive tower-legs would be moving at a maddening rate.

However, her thoughts remained her own thanks to the player protection function, so even though she was rampaging, her feelings for Figaro remained the same.

Bloodlust, rage, grief, love... too many emotions swirled within her to pinpoint just one, but the effect of them all had already convinced her to use Last Berserk and attack him.

This was the only way of handling lost love that she knew.

She'd only fallen in love twice in her entire life. The first love ended in betrayal, and the second was an illusion. The only way she could feel any kind of relief was by releasing her grief, anger, and hate onto the object of her affection.

Sandalphon knew how she felt better than anyone, and he knew that this was the only way. After all — he was born from her mind and heart. And as her loyal Embryo, he once again fulfilled her will.

“Screamer, set,” Sandalphon said, as he slightly changed his appearance.

The towers remained top-heavy, but spiral grooves now appeared on their surface. Figaro couldn’t see them in their entirety from his current vantage point, but everyone else watching the battle could.

As someone described what it looked like now, Sandalphon suddenly began to shine...

“Downfall Screamer!”

...and used his only offensive active skill.

Sandalphon was now a kilometel-tall pair of drills.

He’d acquired this skill when Hannya was still trying to escape the gaol to meet Figaro and evolved into his seventh form by using ■■■.

Though it hadn’t been enough to let Hannya escape, it was a space-warping, all-pulverizing, penetrating, perforating attack that ignored material toughness.

Of course, there was little point to some of those attributes now. The skill’s effects were concentrated at the very tip of the tower-legs, and Figaro was running up the side.

Why did Sandalphon decide to use it, then? Simple — to make the towers spin and throw Figaro off.

With an obscene 600 revolutions per second, the drills were like giant centrifuges, and the angel was confident that they could easily throw off anyone and anything clinging to them.

That was exactly what happened a moment later. Figaro was flung into the sky...

“Liferend Shield Formation.”

...and landed on thin air.

“Huh?!” Sandalphon couldn’t hide his shock at this feat. Figaro had used a skill from his blue coat-like MVP special reward, Rendshield Cloak, Closer, which created barriers that doubled as platforms. He had used it for air mobility when fighting Gloria, and now he used it to approach the top of Sandalphon.

He was already past the halfway point, which placed him close enough for the Liferend Shield Formation to take him up the rest of the way. Hannya was trying to stomp him out of the sky with the spinning towers, but his movements were too unpredictable.

Figaro was soon high enough to make Sandalphon panic even worse.

He was aware that he was a powerful Superior Embryo with a gigantic size and an ability that warped space, but he had his share of weaknesses, too.

One of them was common to all Apostles — the absolute lack of stat growth bonuses to their Masters.

Another was a flaw specific to him — because of his size, he had absolutely no way of dealing with enemies that reached his weak point: the very top of the towers.

His battle abilities were useless against someone who made it all the way up, and even if Hannya unequipped Sandalphon and fought Figaro by herself, she wouldn't stand a chance even with her buffs from Last Berserk. Without her Embryo, the gap between them was just too vast.

As Sandalphon panicked about the danger that would soon befall his Master, Figaro made the final jump to the top... only for something to shoot him down.

The sudden snipe shocked many people present, but it wasn't enough to end Figaro's life. He'd switched Closer's barriers from platforms to the absolute defense bubble shield he'd used in his duel against Xunyu. However, the disappearance of the platforms forced Figaro to fall back all the way down to the ground.

Sandalphon watched the sight in confusion, while Hannya looked down at Figaro with a face still full of rage.

◆◆◆

Cruella Mountain Belt

A hit, thought the man with closed eyes.

In his hands there was a pen and a notepad, and next to him there was a strange creature composed of four mechanical legs and an upper body armed with a bow.

Behind his closed eyes, he watched Figaro fall with a view from right above Sandalphon.

It was about to end too early. This is an extremely rare event, so I want to watch it a bit longer. It's quite unusual for me to interfere like this a second time...

The man wanted a true struggle between Figaro and Hannya — an emotional clash between two Superiors. That was why he'd sent DIN the photo that would set this in motion. He hadn't expected that story to get scooped by another newspaper, but the result was the same, so those details didn't matter to him.

And now, because it seemed like it would end too soon, the man waited until Figaro had no control over his aerial movement and sniped him using his own Embryo. It would have been terribly disappointing to end the battle with that one shot, but just as he'd expected, Figaro sensed the attack coming and defended against it.

Thanks to that, the emotional clash had been reset.

Sagittarius did a good job, he thought. The strange creature's arrow was special because it was made of light rather than physical matter, but perhaps the most extraordinary thing about it was the fact that it had hit a target in Nex Plains from all the way here in the Cruella Mountain Belt.

Though, unlike my first interference, this one was much too direct. Everyone who watched the battle could see that Figaro had been sniped from the side, and thus they now knew some outsider was interfering.

Still watching Sandalphon with his closed left eye, he opened his right and looked up at the sky.

What he saw was a silver Prism Steed galloping across the heavens towards him.

I knew it... I was fully aware this might happen when I decided to interfere. Still, I hope this doesn't make it too difficult to observe.

The man heaved a sigh, and Sagittarius vanished, leaving behind twelve black orbs.

He put them back in his crest and gave the incoming Prism Rider a welcoming smile.

"Good morning, Ray Starling," he said, making the Master... that is, Ray Starling, adopt a shocked expression.

He clearly hadn't expected this reunion.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Someone had shot Figaro down right as he was about to make it to Hannya.

I’d been high up in the air, so I noticed where the attack originated and rushed to the Cruella Mountain Belt, only to find a familiar face — the man who’d let himself be captured by bandits, F.

“...Did you do that?” I asked him as I put Silver away.

“Yes. With my Embryo,” he replied, showing no intention of hiding it.

“Why?”

“Because I felt that it would be regrettable if things ended too early.”

“R... Regrettable?!” I shouted, not bothering to hide my shock and anger.

However, he showed no reaction to my emotion and continued to speak plainly.

“A romantic tragedy between Superiors isn’t something you see every day. Isn’t it natural to want it to last longer?”

“Like hell it is!”

“Also, I took the picture that caused all of this. I didn’t want those efforts to go to waste,” he said, showing me a photo — the very one responsible for this ordeal.

He’s behind this whole thing?!

“Just what are these people to you?!” I roared.

“Sources of material. Very good ones, to be more precise.”

The quickness of his reply made it clear that these were his honest thoughts.

“Gideon might be destroyed! Doesn’t that mean anything to you?!”

“Of course it does. My heart would ache,” he said, as if he couldn’t believe what I was implying. “However, my own emotions would make for excellent material, too, so I would take note of them, as well. And Gideon’s destruction itself would also be quite a good source of inspiration. That would at least make up for missing Franklin’s Game.”

His words shocked me speechless and reminded me of a character from a particular short story: “Hell Screen,” the 1918 story about Yoshihide — an artist who’d painted his own daughter burning to death. He placed his art above good, evil, and even morality itself... just like F.

“...I see.” Now that I understood what kind of person he was, I remembered the uncomfortable feeling I’d gotten back when I first met him. He hadn’t seemed to care one bit about what the bandits were doing — he was satisfied with just being “kidnapped,” and didn’t spare a single thought for the evil the bandits might’ve committed. That was why F had said he’d even thank the bandits for what they’d done, and that wouldn’t have changed even if the bandits had gone on to kill someone before finally being apprehended. He was only interested in their punishment insofar as their villainy might be useful for improving his work.

And now, he was staring right at me with his one open eye.

He readily admitted everything he'd done because he wanted to see my reaction and use it as "material."

"...All right," I muttered. He found joy in his accomplishments, and even the casualties caused by his actions were a positive to him. I knew someone who was much like him, and in spite of their shared search for inspiration, it wasn't Marie... F was more like Franklin.

That mad scientist was the greatest enemy I'd faced so far, and the threat he'd posed to Gideon was unmatched. He was the kind of person who didn't hesitate to put others through hell for the sake of his goal.

And F here... he destroyed Figaro and Hannya's relationship for nothing, created a disaster that could destroy the city, and observed it all with satisfaction. He was clearly cut from the same cloth as Franklin.

"Ohh, he's trying to climb up again," he said, still looking at me with his right open eye.

Figaro had probably recovered from the fall and was trying to reach Hannya again. His condition was deteriorating and the situation was growing worse by the minute, but he was still fighting.

However, as things were, F would get in his way again.

He claimed that he just wanted to observe the battle for longer, but based on the rest of what he said, he also wanted to support Hannya and see her destroy Gideon.

"I won't let you get involved in this any further," I declared. "I'll stop you."

"Yes. Please, do try. You are The Unbreakable — one who defeated many powerful foes in highly dramatic ways. Fighting you directly is bound to make for good material, as well."

He wasn't lying about wanting this. Anything that happened was just further material and more accomplishments to him... and what a troublesome mentality that was.

"Oh, wait. Allow me to introduce myself again," he said as he took out a small object — a Job Crystal. "I'm King of Light, F... the thirtieth in Altar's kill rankings."

He surprised me one more time by switching from High Secretary into his true job...

"Let's see what material I can get from The Unbreakable."

...and attacked me with lasers fired from his fingertips and countless orbs of light that had appeared around him.

"...!" I quickly shielded myself with Monochrome. The Black Warcoat absorbed all light-based attacks, instantly protecting me from all the damage except the slight heat created by the lasers burning through the air.

Without this special reward, I would've definitely died.

...I was running into way too many laser-wielding enemies recently. First there was Monochrome, and if I hadn't acquired the Black Warcoat from it, I would've had a really bad time against the whale in Quartierlatin.

"I see," said the King of Light. The light-based spellcaster Superior Job had observed me protect myself against his attack.

"The fact that you assumed a defensive position tells me that this isn't the type of item that grants you protection by simply being equipped." The battle had just begun, but F had already figured out my weakness.

If the lasers hadn't hit Monochrome, they would've easily pierced my body.

"Glint Pile." He switched from pointing his fingers at me to opening his palm in my direction.

Knowing that an even stronger attack was coming, I took evasive action while simultaneously preparing to shield myself with Monochrome.

A moment later, I felt an impact on my coat far stronger than the ones before.

"Gh...!"

"Ray!" Nemesis shouted telepathically. Based on the power level, this had to be the ultimate job skill of Flashmancer... a high-rank job.

It's powerful, but Monochrome absorbed most of the dama—

"Above?!" My thought was cut short by a shadow falling over my body, which made me notice two orbs of light right above me.

They were growing in radiance. That couldn't be a good sign, so I quickly jumped away.

Right as I did, the orbs released the same high-rank ultimate job skill I'd already blocked once, launching a deadly laser that melted the ground I'd just been standing on.

"Spell extensions... Drones! Ray! Don't stop moving! They'll surround you!"

"I know!" I used Instant Wield to equip Silver and began running around the mountains.

Going into the sky wasn't an option because he would just shoot me down with his lasers. Instead, I zigzagged between the obstacles, aiming for a chance to strike F.

His left eye was closed. He was probably using his orbs and some optical skill to watch Figaro and Hannya's battle — and if that wasn't an opening, nothing was.

I approached him from his blind spot and launched my attack.

"How decisive. Is that one of your strong points?" I was sure I was in his blind spot, but King of Light was still smiling.

A moment later, the lasers from the orbs of light attacked us so precisely that it was like they were threading the needle between the trees.

"Gh...!"

"How?! We're in his blind spot!"

"I suppose you guessed that I'm using my left eye to watch the fight, and you would be correct," F said as he faced me. "But if that's the case, it only makes sense that I would be able to do the same here, no?"

He then closed his right eye.

Shocked, I looked over his head — at the orbs floating above him.

He's using one of them to watch the battle! I thought.

"It can be quite tiring to see different things with each eye, but if you're used to it, it won't even make you dizzy."

"Is that so?!" F had a grasp of the entire battlefield and would attack me with lasers if I came close.

That only left one option — to use a ranged attack that couldn't be blocked.

Thanks to his own attacks, I had just the thing.

"MONOCHROOOME!" In response to my call, the Black Warcoat wrapped itself around my left arm and transformed into a cannon. "I'm leaving defense to you!"

"Understood! Counter Absorption!" The orbs of light released yet another ult laser at me, but Nemesis' shield blocked it off.

Seizing on this chance, I fixed my aim on the King of Light...

"Shining... DESPAIR!"

...and fired back at him using the greatest firepower I had — my concentrated laser cannon.

In the blinding, burning white, F stood still...

"I see."

...and made something black appear out of his crest.

It was a dense wall of dark orbs.

In less than a moment, it clashed with the laser... and fully protected F against it.

Not a single spark of the laser made it to him before Shining Despair stopped, and once it was over, the black orbs were shining as if they'd completely devoured all of that light, sealing it away inside them.

I instantly understood what it meant.

"...Light Absorption?!"

That Embryo has the exact same skill as Monochrome...!

"It appears that we have a similar repertoire," he said.

"Guess we do...!" Similar, but not exactly the same.

I also had Gardranda, as well as Nemesis.

I could still win if I hit him with Vengeance — it would deal double the damage sustained by Monochrome.

"Allow me to show you another similarity," F said as he swung his finger like a baton. Seven of the orbs that had absorbed Shining Despair followed his movements and formed into a very particular shape.

I instantly recognized it.

"...Cancer?" It was one of the twelve constellations of the zodiac.

"A Story Written in the Sky — Zodiac: Cancer." As though to tell me I was right, the King of Light activated his ultimate skill.

At that moment, the seven orbs of light became a giant crab.

Both its claws and the shell on its back were made of thick, gleaming armor, and anyone with any gaming knowledge would know that it had been summoned to act as a tank. It moved to cover and protect the King of Light, much like the great crab Karkinos from Greek myth that had appeared to protect its friend the Hydra.

"A monster summon...! This is like Arc-en-Ciel... Wait, no!" If F really was an author, it wouldn't be unusual for him to have an Embryo that functioned similarly to Marie's Arc-en-Ciel, but that wasn't what he was referring to.

“I’m aware that you also have a summon skill.” Indeed... He was talking about Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda.

However, I’d completely emptied Gouz-Maise during the battle against Logan, and I still didn’t have nearly enough power to summon Gardranda for a reasonable amount of time.

“Or have you expended all the battle Resources needed for it? I can’t blame you. The battle at Quartierlatin was quite intense.”

“...Who knows?”

I was finally beginning to understand something.

King of Light most likely had a fighting style very similar to mine, and it wasn’t just because of the skills we shared.

Nemesis’ Counter Absorption, the MP and SP storage in Gouz-Maise, Monochrome’s Shining Despair charge... I increased my battle potential by charging up abilities ahead of time, then unleashing them later in battle.

F was the same in that regard. The black orbs that had absorbed Shining Despair probably had to be charged with light to be used. The ult that had summoned the crab had most likely come at the cost of a certain number of orbs.

As a fighter, he was indeed very much like me.

“...A pre-Superior with my exact fighting style, huh?” He’d claimed to be the thirtieth in the Kingdom’s kill rankings, but under optimal conditions, he had to be far more powerful than that statistic suggested. I’d readily place him next to top rankers like Juliet... if not higher.

“...Can I ask why you’re only the thirtieth?”

“I want to gather material in the war, but rising too high would make it difficult.”

“I see.” Like I’d suspected, he was only thirtieth by choice. Considering how he operated, it would’ve been hard for him to find a clan, and from what I could remember of the kill rankings list, the thirtieth place only showed a job and no name, just like Shu’s.

“So, what are your intentions?” F asked. A pre-Superior that could match high-ranking duelists like Rosa, Juliet, and maybe even Kashimiya.

He’s clearly too much for me as I am now...

“...It’s too early to give up!” I roared before finishing my thought.

...But I’ve fought worse!

“I’m glad to hear that.” He spoke with nothing but honesty, before attacking with both his crab and lasers.

◆◆◆

About F

To F, this world was a wonderful source of material and inspiration.

The extreme realism of Infinite Dendrogram formed the ultimate environment to stimulate his mind. The information he could gain from a single description was far less than he could get out of properly experiencing something, and that greatly influenced the writing he could weave.

This world had the foreign townscapes, untrodden lands, and strange, fantastical sights that made it the best tool for inspiration he could have possibly asked for.

There were actually many people who were logging in to see the sights, but he stood out from them because he wanted more than that.

F also had a fondness for risk.

Situations where a single mistake could mean death, acts that could make him a pariah and end his life as he knew it... such things were too risky even for him in reality, but as a Master, he could dabble in all of those things without any real danger to his life or livelihood.

He spent most of his time spectating and observing himself, this world, and its lives, not letting a single moment go to waste.

F had entered areas dominated by dangerous monsters, died fighting Masters, led a tian party into a deadly mountain pass, unleashed monsters upon a small fishing village, let himself be captured by bandits... and made Superiors fight to the death.

As he did all these things, all he saw was more reference material for his own work.

Fellow creators such as Marie and Veldorbell could perhaps relate to him, but he was different from them because he had no limits and never hesitated to go as far as he wanted.

No matter how terrible the tragedy, it was just a source of material for him as an author.

That was why there were always people ready to try and stop him.

In the mountains, it had been a power-suited Superior who hadn’t known when to back down.

In the fishing village, it had been a newbie party calling themselves "The Fairytale Squad."

And now, it was The Unbreakable himself.

◇◆

...His gear counters me, but it's his persistence that stands out the most, F thought. He doesn't hold that title for nothing.

He watched in wonder as Ray fought against him, Cancer, and the many stars of his Zodiac.

F was generally known as the greatest wielder of light magic. This element actually boasted some of the game's strongest offensive spells.

Only fire surpassed them in sheer power, and they moved at the speed of light, making them by far the fastest spells of all.

However, casters who used light magic were actually fairly uncommon.

This was due to its three major flaws.

First — the spells were MP sinks, with offensive spells using about five times more MP than similarly-powered spells of other elements. Second — though the spells themselves were the fastest, their activation times were the slowest of any element.

And third — their spell trajectories were extremely simple. Most of them were just straight lines, making it easy for any skilled fighter to counter them before they were even launched. AGI builds could use the slow activation time to make their own moves or dodge after predicting the trajectory, while END builds would have the time to use appropriate defensive or resistance skills.

Because of all this, despite its power, light magic wasn't well-suited for one-on-one battles.

However, as the Master of Zodiac, F was an exception.

The King of Light made up for the excessive MP usage by stocking up his stars with light ahead of time.

The slow activation wasn't a problem, because he made sure his stars were always ready to fire.

And the simple trajectory didn't matter when he could attack from every direction and make his attacks impossible to dodge.

Even without his ultimate skill, F had already conquered every flaw inherent to light magic.

Though he needed time to prepare, at his best, he was one of the greatest light magic casters.

He was exceptional even among pre-Superiors... if not a match to some actual Superiors.

And Ray, despite facing such a powerful enemy, was still persevering.

F was well aware that Ray possessed gear that countered him, but that didn’t stop him from recognizing his abilities and deeply appreciating him as a wonderful reference for his work as an author.

I wouldn’t have it any other way, he thought. But I doubt he’ll survive this intense barrage.

Splendid Starsky, Zodiac was a Type Legion-Arms Embryo that absorbed light and used it to power his spells and vision skills. It not only allowed him to fire lasers — he could also use it for remote viewing and optical camouflage.

Just now, Ray felt his side pierced by a star he hadn’t even seen.

F achieved this by placing an optical camouflage star right next to one that fired lasers. That was also how he managed to hide the star he was using to look down on the battle.

He used powerful abilities like summoning and giant beams while simultaneously chipping away at his enemies using little tricks like this. As someone who willingly jumped into risky situations, F was an extremely experienced fighter, and it showed.

This is what’s happening over here... but what about over there? F was still using his left eye to watch Figaro and Hannya.

Not much had changed — Figaro was still climbing Sandalphon to reach Hannya. However, due to the damage he’d sustained and Hannya’s resistance, he was far slower than before.

F was also puzzled about something.

Why does he insist on climbing in that state? Figaro had yet to attack — all he was doing was climbing up.

What he was doing went against F’s... and Tweedle’s... expectations, and it wasn’t what he’d hoped to see.

F thought that it might end up being necessary to help Figaro next, but he also thought that the Over Gladiator could turn things all around.

He didn’t want to miss something like that, but Ray was still continuing his struggle.

F was already satisfied with what he’d received from Ray and now wanted to focus on the main event.

“You really are quite persistent,” he said. “But why not focus on those two now? To tell you the truth, I feel that the highlight of the battle may come at any moment, and it’s making me anxious. Would you like to see it with me?”

“...” F was nothing but sincere, but Ray responded with only silence.

It was impossible to tell if he was too focused on surviving F’s attacks or if he was already beyond the stage where he was capable of conversation.

I suppose the battle continues, F thought. F himself hadn’t thought it was likely that Ray would agree to the offer, but in a state like this, there was probably much more material to extract from him.

Since this isn’t enough to seal the deal, I’ll add another constellation. I just used Sagittarius, and I want to leave Pisces in case I need to escape at supersonic speeds.

The battle here had become far too intense. Even if F defeated Ray, other Masters would come here to fight in his stead, so he wanted to keep an escape route in reserve.

His ultimate skill, A Story Written in the Sky — Zodiac, had two limitations.

First, it required fully charged stars, just as Ray had guessed.

Second, the monsters he summoned returned after fulfilling the single order carved into them, and then he couldn’t summon them for a whole twenty-four hours afterwards.

Cancer’s order was simply “protect F,” so it lasted for quite a while, but there were also those that disappeared after a single activation — such as Libra, which had been commanded to “investigate the target,” and Sagittarius, which had “sniped the target.”

Because of this, if F wanted to intervene in Figaro and Hannya’s battle again, he would have to fire lasers from the star he was using to observe them. He hadn’t done so earlier because it would increase the chances of that star being destroyed, and that would leave him without any means of watching the battle.

Of course, using Sagittarius had ultimately let Ray know where F was and brought about this new battle, but he was the kind of person who welcomed that.

"A Story Written in the Sky — Gemini." This time, he summoned a pale shape with an outline that looked much like F's.

This monster was Gemini, which "acted as his clone until it ran out of energy." It had his exact stats and could even use the same spells. F himself remained under the protection of Cancer and sent Gemini to fight Ray in his stead.

It attacked him with light magic, just as F would have.

Charged stars, a clone, waves and waves of attacks from every direction... It was the kind of onslaught that could easily kill high-ranks and even overpower Superior Jobs.

The reason Ray was still alive was his evasion ability, which he'd honed over his many life-or-death battles, and Monochrome cutting down most of the damage from the lasers. Without the Black Warcoat, he would've died dozens of times over by now.

That was just how powerful F's attacks were — it was an overwhelming onslaught employing his sheer volume of Resources.

Even so, Ray was still alive.

Hm...? F raised an eyebrow. A whole minute had passed since F had gone on the full offensive.

Because there were more projectiles now and Monochrome couldn't fully cover Silver, Ray had stored the Prism Steed away. He hid his weak points beneath the Black Warcoat while doing everything he could to dodge. Despite all of this, he ended up beaten and battered, and his ability to evade all these attacks slowly dwindled.

And even so, Ray was still alive.

That just didn't make sense to F.

...Why isn't he dying? That same thought might've gone through the minds of many of Ray's opponents in the past. With his abilities and stats, it just didn't make sense for him to still be alive.

Even so, Ray lived, unbroken and still going for his enemy's throat.

"Hh...!" F gasped as cold sweat went down his back.

It was caused by panic... a fragment of fear.

F sought out risks he couldn't experience in reality, so real fear was actually a welcome thing. He could use this as reference... but something was off this time.

After facing Ray alone and seeing how he was for himself, F began wanting to run away.

Suddenly, Ray looked up to where F was hiding his observation star.

Thus, his right eye met Ray's... Though, "met" might've been the wrong word for it.

For all F knew, Ray might've not realized the star was even there.

However, that gave F a glimpse.

Like those who gazed at the abyss found it gazing back, F saw what lived in Ray's eyes.

It was pure rage, directed solely at F.

He'd first caused the conflict between Figaro and Hannya, then asked Ray to watch it with him, increasing his anger beyond all reasonable limits.

It was something many of his enemies had seen, and F now joined their ranks.

To F, fear felt while gathering material was a good thing. It was just another accomplishment, after all. He would simply analyze it, and it would become reference material for his own writing.

But now, he'd seen the weight of the emotion in Ray's eyes.

He was no longer simply a source of material or a fellow player.

Ray was a human being... who couldn't tolerate F's actions.

The sheer strength of this emotion filled F with a fear that left no room for analysis... and wouldn't let him do it even if he'd wanted to.

"Gh...!" Gathering material was no longer an option. There was nothing for him to gain from this battle. He felt... no... was certain that if he didn't end this as quickly as possible, something within him would be damaged beyond repair.

F began gathering magic in his hands, looking to end this battle as quickly as possible.

However, Ray acted first.

"Hellish Miasma... full power!" He equipped his Storm Visage and fired Hellish Miasma from the right Gardranda, covering the area in a dark-purple fog.

It affected Cancer, but Gemini counted as an elemental, so it remained unafflicted. F himself drank an Elixir he'd prepared.

The real problem it caused for F was visibility. The star that had been watching the battle from above had its vision completely clouded by the poisonous gas, and Ray was keeping low, so F had now effectively lost sight of his enemy.

"Kh...?!" The stars and Gemini fired lasers in every direction, but it wasn't clear if any of them hit.

The sea of miasma was like the depths of hell, leaving F completely in the dark. At any moment, that black blade could strike out from the darkness and take his life.

His fear grew, but F also hadn't given up on victory.

He used the ace up his sleeve he'd been charging all this time — an attack that didn't care where the enemy was.

"Corona!" It was the ultimate job skill of the light magic Superior Job, King of Light. It released lasers that surpassed high-rank ults in every possible direction, drowning the battlefield in all-consuming light and leaving no room for evasion.

Despite the devastation it caused, Cancer and Gemini were completely unharmed, while the stars actually absorbed the power. Of course, F himself was also untouched.

Only Ray, still hiding within the miasma, would suffer its effects.

Not yet...! F thought. He sensed that not even that was going to be enough to finish Ray off. F knew that he would assume a defensive position and shield himself using Monochrome.

The fight was as good as over.

With Ray fully focused on protection against the light, Cancer could attack him now. Its pure physical power would break through his defense, and the combined attacks from Gemini and the stars would wipe him out.

Check... mate! The whiteness drowning their vision soon abated, and the miasma blinding F's star dispersed.

He quickly spotted a figure rolled up in Monochrome... as well as Ray, swinging his left fist straight at F.

"HUH?!" F opened his eyes wide in shock, right before receiving a punch to the face. At the moment of impact, Gardranda opened up and doused him in Purgatorial Flames from point-blank range.

"GHAAAAHHHHHH!" F had his pain set to on for the experience, so the feeling of his entire body burning was very real to him.

How?! I saw his Black Warcoat! If he's right here, then who is that?! he thought, a mere moment before the person wearing Monochrome began moving.

Cancer was about to crush the person with its giant pincer...

"Counter Absorption!"

...but then she — Nemesis — blocked it with a barrier of light.

"Wh-What...?!" F couldn't hide his shock. The one wearing Monochrome wasn't Ray, but Nemesis.

Normally, only the MVPs could wear special rewards, but there was an exception — Embryos. They were an inseparable part of their Masters and could equip MVP rewards just as well as they did.

This allowed Nemesis to wear Monochrome, while Ray had approached F without any armor at all.

He was only wearing ordinary clothes — the defenseless casual clothing he'd changed into using Clothing Switch. Behind him lay the remains of a broken Brooch.

He took off his armor to lower his defense and make sure he received lethal damage...?!

With that, F fully understood what had happened.

Ray had given his lifeline — Monochrome — over to Nemesis, then approached F through the miasma while negating the lethal damage from Corona with the Brooch.

Monochrome then acted as bait, attracting F's attention while Ray used the opening to punch him.

He guessed that I was charging my ultimate job skill... and knew that it was an all-directional attack?! F's assumption was actually wrong — Ray actually had no idea what kind of skill it was. However, he was already familiar with one caster-type Superior Job ultimate skill — Xunyu's Zhenhuo Zhendeng: Baolongba. Based on that, Ray had gambled on the King of Light's ult also being a high-power AoE attack... and that gamble paid off.

"Khh...!" Still burning, F tried to recover. He moved both Cancer and Gemini, trying to target Ray with his remaining stars.

"Miasmaflame Princess: Gardranda, 10 seconds."

However, Ray was faster.

Miasmaflame Princess was a summoning skill that cost 1,000 MP for every second of the summon's life. Not even Gouz-Maise had enough MP to make full use of it right now, but a brief summoning was still possible.

“That’s short, but enough... for me.” Gardranda began fighting the moment she appeared.

She took a step forward and struck F’s head with Shu’s signature roundhouse kick — the Kodachi.

F survived thanks to the Brooch, but it shattered from the damage.

Not wasting any time, Gardranda continued to make the best use of the ten seconds given to her. She pointed her right bracer at Cancer and the left one at Gemini.

“Eat this... okay?” The goblin princess simultaneously unleashed the power of Hellish Miasma: Zero and Purgatorial Flames: Zero. These were skills so potent that they rendered all of the bracers’ abilities temporarily unusable.

Cancer was a slow tank, while Gemini only had the same stats as F — a caster. They couldn’t evade, and both of the “Zero” skills landed without difficulty. The dense poison melted Cancer’s body into a bubbling mess, while Gemini evaporated in flames hotter than even its own lasers.

“...?!” The two Zodiac monsters vanished, and though F had negated Gardranda’s kick, it had still rendered him momentarily immobile. During this moment, Nemesis returned to Ray.

The moment their hands joined, she transformed into pinpoints of light that converged into a greatsword, while Monochrome covered Ray once again.

F quickly had all the stars fire their lasers at Ray, but the Black Warcoat and his own body weathered the barrage as he rushed towards F again.

The distance between them was soon covered. “Glint Pile!” The King of Light fired the high-rank ultimate job skill from both his hands...

“Vengeance is Mine!”

...but Ray just barely dodged them both and lunged at F.

All the damage he’d done to Ray was returned twofold.

There was no chance that he could survive all of that, and the King of Light vanished without a trace.

Many things went through his head as he did, but he was in no state to analyze any of them. F only understood one thing. He had joined the ranks of those Ray had defeated once they’d roused his wrath.

Chapter Nine: The ■■■■■■■■ of Figaro

Nex Plains

How long had it been since F had shot Figaro back down to the surface?

His injuries were starting to slow Figaro down, and Sandalphon continued to attack him, not letting the opportunity go to waste.

Even so, Figaro kept on climbing.

His coat and many other pieces of his gear were torn, he was the only one on the battlefield who had been wounded, and Cor Leonis had taken a toll on his HP... yet he continued to climb upwards.

In fact, he hadn't attacked even once so far.

Hannya looked down at him, silently but intently.

Influenced by Last Berserk, her body was moving to kill Figaro, but her mind was still her own and her eyes were fixed upon him and only him.

Figaro was doing nothing but climbing. He hadn't equipped a weapon or argued with her — he was simply trying to reach Hannya, ignoring all the painful wounds inflicted upon his avatar.

Though her body was overcome by bloodlust, Hannya's mind couldn't help but wonder why he was so persistent in trying to get close to her. If he wanted to fight and defeat Hannya, he had many options available to him. As these thoughts went through her mind, her heart was slowly starting to be at odds with her body.

Figaro was thrown off, only to cling and keep crawling to try and make it to the top. He was the duel champion and the pride and joy of Gideon, yet he made no effort to hide his beaten and bloodied frame from the masses as he struggled to reach her.

Hannya's body wouldn't stop until Figaro was dead.

Sandalphon wouldn't stop as long as his Master needed protection.

And Figaro wouldn't stop as long as his soul kept telling him that he couldn't.

No one would stop... and the climax was drawing ever closer.

"Kh! You're still...!" Sandalphon sensed the threat approaching his Master and tried to throw Figaro off again.

The moment the cooldown on Downfall Screamer ended, he used it one more time. Figaro couldn't hold on to the spinning tower, and since he couldn't use his barrier-platforms yet, he was about to start falling back down to the surface again.

However, the Over Gladiator denied that fate.

He clung to the tower with not just his legs, but arms as well, which allowed him to continue reaching for the top despite the whole thing spinning like a tornado.

That had slowed him down, of course, but it wasn't enough to stop him.

"Gh...! You're too persistent!" Sandalphon then clashed the towers together.

They were spinning in opposite directions, and their meeting threw out an absurd amount of sparks. Figaro was caught up in the devastation between... and the sound of something soft and hard shattering resounded throughout the plains.

Blood thrown off by the centrifugal force dissipated into a lingering mist, while the shattered fragments falling to the ground had to be the remains of Figaro's boots.

"I did it! Lady Hannya, I did it!" Sandalphon was overjoyed that he'd fulfilled his Master's will and turned to face her. He was completely confident that he had ground Figaro into dust and given him the death penalty.

"...Eh?"

But when he looked at Hannya's face, he realized that she was still under the influence of Last Berserk.

"H-He's still alive...?!" He then realized that there was a chain wrapped around one of the jewels that acted as his eyes.

A moment later, its owner pulled himself up.

He was barefoot and covered in wounds, his left arm was completely gone and the power of his ult was boiling the blood straight off his skin, turning it into steam. The only gear he still had equipped was his AGI-focused lower body armor and a single chain.

But despite it all, he... Figaro was still alive.

"What...?! Did he actually...?!" Just seeing Figaro's current state was enough for Sandalphon to understand what Figaro had done.

When the towers were about to clash, Figaro realized that climbing any higher was impossible.

First, he'd quickly removed his Climbing boots and used them to jump into the air.

At the same time, he severed his left arm and threw it between the drills, creating a spray of blood that briefly distracted Sandalphon.

He then focused his equipment enhancement into his chain, giving it enough range to quickly reach Sandalphon's top and pull himself up. If it hadn't reached, Figaro would've died when he hit the ground, but his gamble proved successful. Finally, he managed to reach the top.

"Are you even human...?! Lady Hannya!" As Sandalphon shouted, Figaro — or what was left of him — approached Hannya.

Silence. Even now that her defeat was certain, Hannya was still looking right at Figaro. She looked as terrifying as her namesake — the Noh mask of Hannya. It was impossible to tell if the expression was the result of Last Berserk or an honest representation of her feelings, but looking deep into her eyes, you could see that Figaro coming all the way up to her in spite of the extreme difficulty was making her feel something other than rage.

Their eyes met, and the silence continued until...

"Hannya... I have something for you."

...Figaro removed something from his inventory.

For a brief moment, Sandalphon thought that it was a weapon. That exact thought ran through the heads of everyone watching the fight from a distance, too.

However, they were far off the mark.

What Figaro offered to Hannya wasn't a weapon...

...but a bouquet of blossoms that looked much like real-life sunflowers. Figaro had bought them from the plant shop he visited before he ran into Tsukuyo.

"...Huh?" Hannya was so astonished that the rage vanished from her expression. Her heart had been shaken so badly that one might think the effects of Last Berserk had disappeared for a second.

After all, she knew what sunflowers signified in the language of flowers.

They meant "I only have eyes for you," and were often used for marriage proposals.

The offering was so sudden and unexpected that she, still dumbfounded and absentminded, just took it without saying anything, as if Last Berserk had stopped working completely.

"...There's also this," Figaro said as he took out a small box and opened it.

There was a gemmed ring inside.

That was what he'd bought at the accessory shop.

The day he'd found out when Hannya would be released, he immediately went to order the best engagement ring his money could buy.

"Fi...garo?" she called his name despite still being under the influence of Last Berserk.

"Fuyuko," he called her by her real name as he presented the ring to her. "Will you marry me... here in Infinite Dendrogram... as well as reality?"

This was his first and final marriage proposal.

◇◇◇

Vincent Myers

What was she to me?

That was a question that even I had trouble answering.

At first, all I felt about her was curiosity.

She was above me, Shu, and Foltesla, which caught my interest enough to make me want to duel her. I was just hoping that we could become good dueling partners.

That was why I was only thinking of dueling in our early exchanges.

After that, she made me feel at peace.

Though we couldn't meet in Infinite Dendrogram, we talked over email basically every single day. She was actually the one person I could talk to naturally. She wasn't like my parents, my brother Keith, my first friend Shu, fellow duelists like Foltesla, or old enemies like Sechs Würfel and Tsukuyo Fuso.

My time with her was pleasant. We spent our time talking about our lives, day in and day out. My bland daily life that rarely ever changed took on a different hue when I shared it with her.

We occasionally shared our joy, comforted each other when one of us was down... The volume of the feelings we exchanged was vast.

This pleasant relationship we had eventually became a source of peace in my life.

The third thing I felt regarding her... was worry.

As we communicated day in and day out, I developed a desire to meet her. And not just as an avatar, but as myself in real life.

However, that meant facing a major worry of mine.

She only knew me as I was in Infinite Dendrogram. Figaro was my avatar and the perfect picture of health, while the real me was a sickly young man living on the verge of death.

I wasn't able to bring myself to tell her of my circumstances or how I was in real life. I had little trouble telling it to Shu, Foltesla, and a number of others, but the idea of telling her was so scary that I always ended up deleting the emails before sending them.

The fear that I would disappoint her made me unable to tell her the truth. I couldn't even begin to understand why I was so worried about letting her down, but the answer came to me seemingly out of nowhere.

While the question lingered in my mind and the worry took up residence in my heart, one day my parents invited me to drink tea with them, and my mother, looking at me with a smile on her face, asked, "Vincent... Are you in love?"

At first, I didn't understand what she just said and just tilted my head in confusion, parroting back at her, "Love?"

I then went on to digest the word, truly remembered what it meant... and the pieces all fell into place.

That was the final thing she made me feel — a strong love for her.

At first, I only wanted to duel her; then I found peace in our exchanges until eventually I became attracted to her.

I, Vincent Myers, was now painfully aware that I loved her... and wanted to be with her forever.

I then told my parents about the woman I loved and wanted to marry. I told them how she supported me, how gentle she was... I told them all I could to the best of my ability.

At first they were surprised that I was thinking as far ahead as marriage, but they were understanding of my feelings and said that they would like to meet her, as well. They also said that I should keep quiet about this with Keith. He was really busy at that time, so I could understand that.

After the talk with my parents, I logged in to Infinite Dendrogram and used its tripled time to think about how to confess my feelings to her.

First and foremost, I couldn't do it by email. It was how we usually communicated, but even I knew that it wasn't something you used for a confession of love.

Next, I considered meeting her in person. It was totally possible. We'd exchanged postcards before, so I knew her address and I could send her plane tickets that suited her schedule.

Normally, I should've been the one to go visit her, but the disease I was born with made that impossible, so having her come to me was the only option.

But then... I felt like it would've been weird to bring her to me so I could confess.

The only way left... or more accurately, the only way I'd ever had open to me... was to confess to her in Infinite Dendrogram.

Thankfully, her prison term was about to expire. I could use our promised meeting to express how I felt.

"But... Can I really do that?"

It would be the first time I proposed to someone. Well, that much was obvious, seeing as this was the first time I had ever fallen in love.

I was so worried about whether or not I was going to do it right that the tension and unease put a lot of stress on my heart.

It got so bad that it could've caused a heart attack if I thought about it too much in reality.

If only there was a way I could defuse the tension...

"Wait... I've got it." When we'd first met, I wanted to duel her — to fight someone who was ahead of me.

I decided to start with exactly that.

Duels were great. Through them, I met Foltesla and gained so many other friends. Dueling linked the two combatants through their intense feelings.

That was why I decided to duel her first, then propose to her afterwards... even though I had no idea if she would accept.

◇

The day we reunited, I didn’t tell her how I felt. ...I was simply unable to do it.

Meeting her made me more nervous than I’d expected. It was partially because I ran into her by chance while getting ready, but I was so overwhelmed that the most I could do was invite her to duel me.

Neither she nor Ray seemed to realize it, but I was really, really tense.

The fact that she accepted my duel made me very happy and relieved.

Even so, I was still tense. As it stood, I wasn’t sure if I could confess even after the duel.

Oh, if only this was as easy and enticing as a battle. I can start fights and keep on fighting even if I bleed or lose a limb, but the very thought of rejection paralyzed me from head to toe.

I was shocked that love could make me so weak.

“I hope I have the strength to take the next step tomorrow.” With that thought, I logged out.

◇

The fated day had arrived.

I saw Hannya rampaging around Gideon after reading the article. I had an idea why she was doing it — I’d refused to dine with her and went on to be caught in a photo with Tsukuyo Fuso, destroying her trust in me.

Maybe she felt betrayed again, just like she had when her previous man had left her.

For all I knew, she might’ve been so disappointed in me that she would never accept my confession.

Even so, I had to tell her how I felt... so I stepped forward.

◇◇◇

Nex Plains

Everyone who heard Figaro’s confession felt as if time had stopped.

The closest listener — Sandalphon — was absolutely dumbfounded. Rook, who was lip-reading from a distance using a long sight item, felt the same as the angel.

Ray had ridden the skies and returned from his battle against F, and the shock of this sight combined with the wounds all over his body, almost made him fall off of Silver.

Those who were watching through various means felt about the same.

The only exceptions were Xunyu, who saw this coming, and a certain control AI.

However, this was to be expected from the moment Figaro had used Burn, My Soul — Cor Leonis.

He never used his ultimate skill in duels.

After all, he kept that skill in reserve for the duel against the friend he’d promised to face with all his power. He hadn’t even used it against Xunyu, and the reason why he so readily used it now was simple — this wasn’t a duel to him, but his way of proposing to Hannya. Nothing more, nothing less.

Hannya was at a complete loss for words.

Figaro’s words resounded within her as the feelings welling up in her heart were rushing through her mind. Last Berserk was still very much active, but just looking at Hannya it seemed to have ended.

“I... I don’t think I’m normal.” Figaro continued speaking.

“I was born with a heart condition that makes it difficult for me to lead even an ordinary life.” He opened up to her, saying what he’d been hiding all this time.

“I don’t have much of a life or social experience, so I often say and do weird things.” He revealed to her what he’d been silent about because he didn’t want to disappoint her.

“All I have to be proud of is my family and what I’ve built here in Infinite Dendrogram.” Tense to the limit and with a heart beating so fast it hurt...

“I’m honestly pretty pathetic... Would you choose me despite that, Fuyuko?" ...He confessed his love to her to the best of his ability.

"Ahh..." Figaro's sincerity instantly drove away Hannya's doubts.

Her love was no illusion.

He truly cherished her.

She was finally able to believe.

Ohh... I knew it. He really is a wonderful... and adorable person, she thought as tears welled up in her eyes, a charming smile appeared on her face, and...

"Yes. Gladly."

...she accepted his proposal.

"...Thank you," Figaro replied, sounding like he was about to start crying — something not even his closest friends ever heard.

Shaking from his own powerful emotions, he put the engagement ring on her left ring finger.

Then, he brought his face close to hers... "I love you, Fuyuko." ...and declared his love before kissing her on the lips.

Thus, their love was finally realized... and a moment later, the side effect of Cor Leonis and damage from debuffs like Bleeding took their toll. Figaro took the death penalty.

◇

Following the kiss, Hannya was left alone with a bouquet in her hands, a ring on her finger, and rosy cheeks. She wasn't saying a word.

"L-Lady Hannya?" Sandalphon called out to her in worry.

Last Berserk had ended, meaning that Figaro had definitely received the death penalty this time. Sandalphon wanted to congratulate his Master, but her now-fiancé disappeared right before he could.

The angel was also the one responsible for the damage that had killed Figaro; his stomping and drilling had quickly whittled away Figaro's HP, after all. Why did he have to disappear now, of all times...?! he thought, but thinking logically, it actually was a miracle that he'd even survived long enough to put the ring on Hannya's finger.

However, there was no telling what his Master felt about all this.

He and all the other Masters watching them gulped...

"Heheheh..."

...only for Hannya to beam with her cheeks still rosy.

"Sandalphon," she said.

"Y-Yes?!"

"I'm logging out to send him an e... No... I'll go meet him in real life."

"L-Lady Hannya?!"

"I know where he lives." Vincent knew where Fuyuko lived, so there was no reason why the reverse wouldn't be true. She hadn't visited him yet because she was afraid of finding out that her love was an illusion, but now that she knew it was real, she had nothing to fear.

"Oh. Before I go..."

She wrote something on a piece of paper, put it in an envelope and tossed it to the ground.

"All right, Sandalphon, I'm logging out. And I might not be back here for a little while."

"Understood. I wish you good health and great happiness!"

"Thank you. I'll be going now."

Sandalphon saw her off as Hannya logged out of Infinite Dendrogram.

Thus concluded the Sandalphon incident, and in spite of all the panic caused and buildings destroyed... miraculously, there were no tian casualties.

◇◇◇

Earth, Myers Mansion

"...Oh no. I forgot to check my HP," Vincent said once he'd logged out.

It was a mistake he would never make under normal circumstances, which spoke volumes about how focused he'd been on his proposal.

However, he had lived long enough for her to accept his love, and that filled him with relief.

"Vince. You're offline," Keith — Vincent's little brother — said as he entered the room.

"Hey, Keith. What is it?"

"Mother's birthday is coming up, so I wanted to talk to you about it... What's wrong?"

"What do you mean?"

"I don't see you make that face very often. Your cheeks are red and you just look so... happy. Did something good happen?”

Vincent touched his face and noticed that it was warm. He was smiling without realizing it, too. “Yeah. I just proposed and she said yes.”

“Ohh, I see. That’s great... Hold on, what?”

“Heheh. I was so nervous. The confession, putting the ring on her, the kiss... Just remembering it is making my heart... beat... fa...”

With a blissful smile on his face, Vincent collapsed back on his bed.

It was an attack caused by his chronic heart disease.

“Huh?! Vince?! Heal him, Sapphine...! Wait, she doesn’t exist here! Hey! Someone call Dr. Winston!” Keith started to panic, and called the resident maids and the attending physician. Vincent was unconscious throughout all of this, but his face was still full of happiness.

And so, just by remembering their proposal, Vincent Myers suffered a heart attack that landed him in the hospital.

Epilogue

DIN's Gideon Branch, rooftop

The twins watched as the towers in Nex Plains vanished.

This hadn't gone according to their calculations. They expected Hannya to rampage throughout Gideon, rousing its Masters to fight her and potentially causing evolutions.

The actual result couldn't have been more different than that.

The damage caused by Hannya was minimal. Figaro took care of the situation all by himself... and by means they never expected — a marriage proposal.

In fact, they didn't expect Figaro to participate in the battle at all, because they knew that he couldn't do so in an environment with allies. They hadn't expected him to appear in the Nex Plains, either — far away from anyone else.

And most of all, they didn't account for his own affection.

With such critical flaws in the calculations, it was only natural that the result would be wrong.

However, one of those miscalculations was no fault of their own. They were told that Figaro would log in inside Gideon.

"I see," said Tweedledum.

"So that's how it iiis..." said Tweedledee. The calculating control AI twins quickly reassessed the situation...

"You gave us false variables, didn't you, Alice?"

...and simultaneously addressed the reason why they were wrong.

Turning back to the rooftop's door, they saw a particular person.

She looked like a teenager, but there was a motherly air about her, making it impossible to tell how old she really was.

Her name was Alison. She was a worker in DIN's planning department, as well as the avatar of control AI No. 1 — Alice.

"All right, that's enough plotting for today," she said with a smile on her face. "Get back to work, please. You have lots to do, don't you?"

“Very well,” said Tweedledum. “I must say, I did not expect this.”

“We tried to use your plan, but you used us instead, huuh?”

“I suppose the wisdom of age is hard to beat.”

“Well, other than that, she’s the oldest of us all. We’ve been haaad.”

“Ugh, don’t treat me like an old lady,” Alice said with a hand on her cheek and a mildly angry expression.

The twins turned away from her and entered the building.

They’d already switched their focus. Their plans had shown a lower than expected success rate, so instead of sticking to them, they prioritized their sub-jobs as the CEOs of DIN.

That left only two people on the rooftop — Alice and Cheshire, whose avatar was still immobilized.

“...Could you set me free already?” he asked.

“Sure thing.” And just like that, the Tom Cat avatar was free.

Cheshire opened and closed his hand, regaining the feel for his body before asking Alice, “You... You knew that Figaro would confess to Hannya, didn’t you?”

“Yep,” she answered as if it was nothing.

Cheshire had actually suspected that something wasn’t right the moment he’d learned that Alice was helping the twins with this plot. Alice always prioritized her values over her role... In fact, she held her role because of her values.

She was what you could call a “Master Supremacist.”

Alice valued Masters above all else and made it her overriding goal to protect them.

That was why it was strange that she would be complicit in this plot. While she would take part in large-scale events like SUBM releases, this situation was just an idea the twins had dreamed up spontaneously, so it didn’t seem right for her to be involved.

“Tweedle said something about trying to use you, but you used them instead...”

“I had them set the stage for Figaro to properly open up.”

The twins had the greatest calculation power among the control AIs, but as the supervisor of all avatars, Alice wasn’t far behind them.

Though not as well as the twins, she could predict outcomes, and when it came to her field — Masters — her predictions could actually be more accurate than theirs.

When the twins asked her for Figaro's logout info and feelings, she lied to them so they would use their position as the CEOs of DIN to set the stage for this event. After all — she knew what calculations they would make and what kind of scheme they would weave.

"...Why would you do something so roundabout?" Cheshire asked. He didn't know whether Alice wanted Figaro to confess to Hannya because it aligned with her values or because of something else, but he couldn't help but feel that things would've gone just as well between them if no one had gotten involved. Alice, however, rejected that idea.

"I'm always monitoring the state of the avatars and the thoughts of the people using them, and it looked to me that Figaro might've not taken the step forward. So I gave him a little push. If he didn't make his move, both of them might have ended up unhappy."

So she really was just meddling, huh? Cheshire thought to himself as he realized exactly what she was saying. He knew Figaro well, and the idea of him confessing his love seemed unnatural even now after he actually saw it happen.

Perhaps Figaro himself had felt the same way, and it wasn't unlikely that things might've gone badly if he didn't get a push from someone.

That answered one of Cheshire's questions, but he still had more.

"When Figaro confessed, Hannya's Last Berserk basically went inactive. Did you do that?" Cheshire knew what Last Berserk did — in fact, it was actually used against him in the past. He thought Last Berserk would never let you stand still while the target was in front of you, but Hannya had done nothing long enough for Figaro to finish his proposal. Cheshire guessed that Alice had limited her movements, just as she had made Tom completely immobile.

As likely as that seemed, however, Alice denied it.

"That was simply her own willpower," she said. "The avatars I made resist skill-based effects on the mind, but the reverse, well... that's completely up to them."

Alice was basically saying that Hannya had held back her mad rampage out of love, like the protagonist of a story.

A skill that influenced the mind could in turn be influenced by the mind.

A part of Cheshire found it reasonable, but another part of him just couldn’t believe that Hannya had a will strong enough to overpower an ultimate job skill.

Only Alice knew the real truth, but Cheshire realized that she wouldn’t say anything more about it.

“This outcome itself was made possible by the strength of their wills,” Alice added. “We can set the stage, but we’re not powerful enough to decide how they feel.”

“...That’s true.” She’d stopped Cheshire from interfering because she didn’t want him to get in the way of the confession. Alice was afraid that he could use his numbers to break out of Angeldeath Dominion and meet up with Figaro. The presence of an ally would hinder his fighting and maybe even lead to him being stomped by Sandalphon.

Basically, she’d bound Cheshire for the sake of the happy ending.

“...But didn’t this plot have a chance of seriously damaging Gideon?” If this outcome was truly the result of their willpower, then there was a chance that things could’ve gone differently. The casualties could’ve been as high as the twins had predicted.

“What of it?” Alice asked as she tilted her head.

“...Well, I guess that’s the kind of Embryo you are.” She only cared about Masters. Tians were outside the range of her affection, which was exactly why she had no trouble fighting the war against the pre-ancient civilization as the fearsome Incarnation of Blasphemy.

Cheshire felt that he had to be wary of this particular colleague in a different way than Bandersnatch or the twins.

“Well, they got together, so all’s fine and dandy, isn’t it?” said Alice.

“Yeah. Though... This is more of a comedy than a love story. Everyone besides those two and you were just aimlessly running around in circles.”

Ray’s group had been worried about Figaro and Hannya for nothing, the twins and F had woven a plot that in the end only led to a proposal, the citizens of Gideon had been thrown into a labyrinth before they even knew what was happening, and the unfortunate newspaper company released the leaked photo as a scoop, only to endanger the entire city.

It all seemed so serious, and the fact that it ended with a kiss scene right out of a fairytale or romance manga made it seem like the height of absurdity.

It really was a comedy.

"...Oh. I just realized." As the control AI in charge of spreading culture, Cheshire remembered a certain well-known comic opera titled The Marriage of Figaro.

◇◇◇

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The day after the Love-Duel Festival, Nemesis, Rook, Babi, and I gathered at the usual café with the open terrace and talked about what happened yesterday.

After the battle against King of Light, I'd burned for thirty seconds because of the side effect from Miasmaflame Princess, but it wasn't enough to give me the death penalty. So here I was, alive and well.

Shu was busy with something today, Marie had DIN work to take care of, and B3 had business of her own.

"I must say," Rook spoke up. "I'm really glad that no tians died in the incident."

"You and me both." Despite the scale of the incident, Sandalphon hadn't actually killed anyone, directly or otherwise.

The shuffled space had caused some falls, crashes, and broken bones, but nothing had been fatal. This was probably because Hannya and Sandalphon had been considerate of the surrounding people until Figaro showed up. It also helped that Figaro had been outside the city, all by himself.

"Oh, right," Rook said as he remembered something. "Bishmal was trying hard to stop her before she went out of control, but when Figaro appeared, she instantly crushed him and gave him the death penalty."

Bishmal... RIP.

"But that's actually the only death penalty."

"The injured were healed by Miss El... Tsukuyo Fuso and the priests of her Lunar Society." She'd logged in after things had calmed down and was very surprised by the state of the city.

I recalled her saying, "Ugh, who did this? The second day of the Love-Duel Festival is a golden day for business. I dunno who's responsible, but they sure are a nuisance."

Shu instantly shot her with his gatling gun. I couldn't blame him.

Anyone would be annoyed hearing one of the main culprits saying something like that.

In fact, you could say that Shu was still being very rational, seeing as he used the weakest attack he had.

After finding out what had happened, Miss Eldritch immediately tried to run away, but B3 was there, and she stopped her with a gravity field.

Then Azurite arrived, told her to take responsibility, and had her go around healing the injured.

In fact, she was still doing that, and B3 was making sure of that. Miss Eldritch had also healed my wounds, so I was in top shape despite the intense battle yesterday.

“It’s also looking like they’ll have no trouble fixing the city,” I said.

“It’s just roads that suffered the most, and all key facilities are still standing,” Rook commented. The damage could be undone relatively easily using earth magic and Embryo skills. Even standard crafting jobs could do it.

“And the damages will all be paid by Fuso, Figaro, Hannya, and the newspaper company.”

“Though, the kingdom covered for the first three.” As the main culprit, Hannya was supposed to pay half of the total damages, while the others split the rest evenly. Miss Eldritch couldn’t pay because of various circumstances, while Hannya didn’t have any money to begin with, so the kingdom... that is, Azurite, paid in their stead.

This event was actually the end of the newspaper company. They’d tried to claim that they couldn’t be held responsible over a mere article, but their involvement was undeniable.

Perhaps it might’ve gone differently in modern Japan, but this was The Kingdom of Altar.

Their guilt became even more obvious when the officials used Truth Discernment on them to find out that the article was just sensationalist nonsense they’d written to stir reader curiosity and passion.

“And F will just get away with it, huh...?” He was the one who’d taken the photo that caused the incident, but that was just him answering the newspaper’s call, and for some reason the credit on the photograph sent to the newspaper wasn’t even his.

Also, getting in Figaro’s way didn’t exactly count as a crime.

Master-on-Master violence was just PK, which was outside the boundaries of Dendro law. It might've been different if his interference led to Hannya causing more destruction, but even with his involvement there were no casualties, so he was considered innocent. Knowing how he operated, he probably had committed crimes, but they were unknown.

"What a disagreeable wretch he was," said Nemesis.

"I hope we don't run into him again..."

In all honesty, the King of Light was way more powerful than me. If I didn't have Monochrome — his hard counter — I would've barely stood a chance against him.

Even so, I didn't even think of giving up, and I felt like I would be compelled to stop him once more if he attempted something like this again.

The central person in all of this — Hannya — had left behind an envelope before logging out.

The paper inside read, "I am sorry for the trouble caused. I will pay for the damage done through public service."

Azurite chose to believe it and didn't put her on the wanted list, so now Hannya owed the country money.

Figaro's share of the payment would be discussed once he returned, so for now, Count Gideon covered for him. According to Azurite, he'd said, "Figaro is always a great help, and he's the one who actually stopped this incident, so I can do this much for him."

...Though, all the damage to his city seemed to be killing him inside. Do your best, Count, I thought.

Apparently, Miss Eldritch had tried to worm her way out of her share by saying, "Th-The meathead is gonna pay me 5,000,000,000..." but Shu shot her down with: "Like hell he is! Forget it or I'll trash your place again with my bear hands!"

And that was just about it for the results and responsibility splitting.

Figaro's death penalty hadn't expired yet, and Hannya hadn't come online again since that moment.

"...I wonder how they're doing now," I said.

"Well, they just got engaged..." Nemesis commented. Shu said that he couldn't contact Figaro in reality, so for all we knew, they might've been discussing their future in real life. (I later went on to learn that Figaro was hospitalized and that Hannya had gone to the UK to visit him.)

"Man, this kind of thing just had to happen on a festival day, huh?" And for all the trouble we'd gone through, it seemed like we were just running around in circles... That we had absolutely nothing to do with all that happened. Knowing how long Shu had been worried about it, he might've suffered the most mental trauma from the way everything had worked out.

"Though, once it all ended, the festival just continued like nothing had happened," I said.

"Gideoners are a sturdy bunch." The Love-Duel Festival resumed soon after Hannya logged out. Not even that level of emergency was enough to stop the festivities.

Looking back at it, it had been the same with Franklin's Game.

Even Rook went on to continue his date with Kasumi, and when I saw them in the evening, Kasumi was all flushed and happy-looking, so I could only assume it went well.

"Seeing how it worked out, the incident might've actually been a net positive for the kingdom," said Rook, and I couldn't help but nod.

The most obvious good outcome was Figaro and Hannya getting together, but there was so much more when you looked at the fallout.

"Because of Figaro, Miss Hannya will definitely join the kingdom," Rook continued. As long as Figaro continued playing Dendro, she would keep on logging in with him, and she would obviously stay in the country where her dear husband was.

Basically, Altar would have its fifth Superior.

In terms of numbers alone, the kingdom would finally be a match for Dryfe.

"And because of what happened, both Miss Fuso and Miss Hannya are now indebted to the country." They couldn't pay their share of the damages, so they were literally in debt now.

Miss Eldritch had put Altar under a contract that forbade them from limiting The Lunar Society, but since this was a personal debt, it didn't help her at all.

Azurite was pretty happy that she, in her words, "finally got back at that parasite."

She was obviously thinking of using this to make The Lunar Society participate in the war without having to "change the national religion" or fulfilling whatever other extreme demands Miss Eldritch had.

"These debts will be used against Miss Fuso and Miss Hannya to force them to participate in the war, won't they?" said Rook.

"Most likely," I nodded.

"That means that both countries have an equal number of Superiors, which are also more or less equal in power. That alone changes the outlook."

Of course, there were Masters besides Superiors, as well as tians such as Mario, who surpassed even some of the most skilled Masters, but even so, it didn't seem hopeless anymore.

"As things are, even if Dryfe attacks, their victory wouldn't be guaranteed. Even if they won, it would likely be a Pyrrhic victory. And if we consider what Her Highness the First Princess told you about third parties like Caldina..." Rook said before pausing for a good moment. "The war might not happen at all."

That was a guess that could very well become reality.

◇◇◇

Sacred Princess, Altimia Azurite Altar

I finally dealt with the paperwork related to the incident caused by King of Berserk, Hannya.

It had drained quite a lot from the kingdom's coffers, but it was settled relatively peacefully.

I talked to Ray after the event, and he said that, for a Superior, Hannya was actually a very mild person as long as there were no problems with the Over Gladiator, Figaro.

He and the parasite were the main driving forces behind this incident, but looking at how it all ended, it was unlikely that anything similar would happen again.

I was quite satisfied with the fact that I finally got to put a leash on that parasite, at least.

"I suppose it's all settled for now..." I'd also taken care of the other problem... Elizabeth's marriage.

The night before Hannya started her rampage, I had reconciled with Elizabeth.

As Ray had told me, I'd apologized in my own words and talked to her as honestly as possible.

Apparently, she herself had also thought a lot about her marriage to Third Prince Canglong.

For now, we decided to put everything on hold until the day before Third Prince Canglong returned to Huang He.

Elizabeth, Canglong, and I still needed time to process how we felt.

“CooO, CoOo!” I was pulled from my thoughts by the cry of a creature in the corner of my makeshift office.

It was a grotesque little thing that was basically a large eye with wings... and its name was “Broadcast Eye.”

Count Gideon had acquired a number of them after Franklin’s Game, and some of them had ended up here with me. Since they were made by the detestable Franklin and had a disagreeable appearance, I honestly wasn’t fond of them. However, I could not deny their usefulness in long-distance communications, so I used them regardless.

They normally made no sound. If they did, it could be only because someone was trying to contact my Broadcast Eye.

“Connect.” Upon saying that, I saw a room in the royal castle as well as a man — Marquis Findle.

I’d put him in charge of intelligence, so I had a bad feeling about this.

“I apologize for contacting you like this, Your Highness,” he said.

“I do not mind,” I said. “More importantly, did something happen?”

He wiped his face with a handkerchief, looking like he was hesitant to say what he had to. If he was acting like this after contacting me first, it could only be something major.

“Is anything the matter?” I asked.

“...We received a message from the imperium.” That was surprising, but not unexpected. Seeing as the war would resume, I knew Dryfe would contact us with a final warning. I had been preparing for that, as well.

However, his reaction was a bit extreme for one who received something that was “expected,” which could only mean that the content of the message was nothing like what we imagined.

“Marquis Findle, did you already open the message?”

“No. The seal is still intact. However... the messenger who brought it gave us a summary.”

“What did he say about it?” In response...

“That it’s a peace offer, Your Highness.”

...he gave me a truly unexpected answer.

“...Very well. I will return to Altea as soon as possible. Make sure no one hears of this, especially not information brokers like DIN.”

“Understood.” With that, the Broadcast Eye connection ended.

I closed my eyes and looked up at the ceiling of my makeshift office.

It was thoroughly unexpected. A recommendation to surrender would’ve been significantly easier to understand.

“Claudiah... Your brother just can’t stop doing unexpected things.”

Was it an honest peace offer? Or a start of some new plot?

To know even that much, I would have to return to Altea and see the message for myself.

“But... I suppose the time has finally come.” I didn’t know if the message would mark the end or a new beginning, but I could feel that the machine of war, which had ground to a halt when my father died, had begun to move once more.

To be continued

Afterword

Cat: “It’s time for the afterwoord! I’m the ‘Cat,’ Cheshire, back from the breaak!”
Bear: “I’m the ‘Bear,’ Shu Starling!”
Xun: “Xunyu here. Haven’t been here in a while, either.”
Cat: “It’s hard to tell here in the afterword, but Xunyu isn’t wearing Tenaga Ashinaga or the Fu.”
Xun: “I was like this in the story this time, so I’m carrying it here... And yeah, I know I didn’t get an illustration.”
Bear: “That just means the audience has something to look furward to.”
Xun: (Now that I think about it, this bear hasn’t fully shown his face, either... His bangs are too long.)
Bear: “Fur those curious, the fox ain’t here ’cause she’s busy fixing Gideon.”
Xun: “There we go, linking the story and the afterword again...”
Cat: “Anyway, we can’t go through this afterword without mentioning the currently-airing anime!”
Bear: “Yaay! You all watchin’ it?”
Xun: “You can see it on d-Anime Store and a bunch of other video sites.”
Cat: “I’m pretty sure I won’t show up after this point (February 2020), but you can still see me on ‘The Why and What of Dendrogram,’ (Nazenani Dendrogram) so check that out, too!”
Bear: “Now it’s time for the regular, beary serious comment from the author!”

Dear readers, thank you for your purchase. I am Sakon Kaidou, the author.

The anime is finally airing. By the time this volume comes out in Japan, it should be on about the fourth episode. I’m actually writing this afterword on the day before the official airing of the first episode, but I and La-na — the artist for the Crow Record spin-off — saw the advance screenings for both episode 1 and 2. Until then, I hadn’t seen or heard a single second of the anime besides the postrecordings.

However, once I actually got to see it, I was very moved by the fact that Infinite Dendrogram was now animated, and suddenly struck by the welcome realization that it was now an actual anime. I also heard Aoi Yuki’s opening song, Aya Uchida’s ending song, as well as the OST by Kenji Hiramatsu. All of them are so great I listen to them while writing.

Speaking of pleasant sounds, I can’t express how passionate the voice actors were in their work. I participated in all the postrecordings and was left amazed every time. The voicework really starts to stand out at the latter half of the season, so please look forward to it... especially to Yoshitsugu Matsuoka’s crazy-yet-fascinating performance as Franklin. The work of all those involved has created an anime beyond my expectations, and I can’t help but thank all those who accomplished this task impossible for any sole person.

I also want thank all of you dear readers who supported us throughout all this. I would be quite happy if you enjoyed the anime with me. Please look forward to more Infinite Dendrogram in the future.

Sakon Kaido

Bear: “Anyway, with that done, let’s all gather together and announce the next volu—”
Fox: “VOLUME 13 IS SET TO COME OUT IN OR AFTER JUNE 2020!”
Cat: “Meow?!”
Xun: “She just appeared outta nowhere...”
Fox: “You’re all here going ‘anime this, anime that’...! I’M SO JEALOUS!”
Xun: “...What’s with you? Mad ’bout what happened in this book?”
Fox: “I’m obviously mad ’cause I’m the only one without a voice actor!”
All three: “Ah.”

Fox: “You’re all uppity ’cause you got voices and lots of scenes! No fair!”
Cat (VA: Shiori Izawa): “Umm, I don’t know what to say...”
Bear (VA: Satoshi Hino): “You deserve it fur what you always do.”
Xun (VA: Nao Toyama): “...Cheer up.”
Fox: “Why’re you getting your voice actors next to your names now?! You pickin’ a fight?!”
Cat: “Well, you have even less of a role in the anime than His Excellency the General, and he just appeared for a moment in the second episode...”
Fox: “Ngh... J-Just you wait! I’ll have my voice somedaaay!”
Xun: “She just ran away while crying...”
Cat: “All right, I guess that’s it for this afterwoord.”
Bear: “See you all beary soon!”
Xun: “See yaa!”

Six: “...I haven’t appeared at all, so I would say she has it fairly good.”
Bear: “Sechs... Were you here the whole time?”

Bonus Short Stories

A Mascot and His Puns

Gideon, City of Duels

It was the first day of the Love-Duel Festival.

King of Destruction, Shu Starling, King of Beasts, Behemot, and Behemot's Superior Embryo, Leviathan, were walking to the second arena to view a particular event. Behemot was comfortably seated in Leviathan's hands, while Shu was right next to them.

Naturally, this trio attracted a lot of attention. After all, it was a group consisting of a single fine lady and two mascot-like creatures.

Far too often they found themselves being approached by families and couples wanting to take a picture with them.

"Sure thingy. Stay in line, though. Don't be overbearing."

Shu didn't even seem to mind all of this and gladly agreed, making him scarcely different from some mascot in an amusement park.

"...Tch."

Leviathan maintained a cool expression, but the throbbing vessel on her forehead made it clear that appearance was a lie.

This was mostly due to all the couples asking her if she could take the photos.

They actually thought that she was just some woman who spent this festival doing nothing but taking group shots of the couples and the bear.

This group had convened because her Master, Behemot, wished it to, but her patience slipped a little more every time she was asked to take a photo.

Once the last of the many couples left with their shots, Leviathan spoke to Shu, not even bothering to hide a single bit of her hostility and murderous intent.

"Why do you just let them take photos?"

"Hmm... I'm a guy in a costume, so it would be beary bad if I was cold to people."

"You haven't changed since we first met. Why do you insist on being so approachable?"

Indeed, he had been the same back when Leviathan had come to take Behemot from him shortly before The Clash of the Superiors began.

"'Tis the burden of all those in animal costumes."

"About that... I understand that you use the costume to hide your face, but there's no reason for you to use puns, is there?"

Shu Starling was a Superior. Leviathan knew that he was wearing a costume to hide himself. However, there was no good reason for him to act like a friendly and quirky bear character that children would love.

Leviathan had wondered about this for a while, just like she had wondered why he stood out so much despite wanting to hide his face.

"..."

Shu said nothing in response, but it didn't seem like that was because he didn't want to answer. In fact, it seemed as if she'd pointed out something he hadn't realized himself.

"...You're joking, aren't you?" Leviathan asked as she understood what his silence implied.

"...Nope. I'm just not doing this on purpose. I just got my paws on a costume, put it on, and before I knew it, I was speaking with puns."

He did have control over his puns and even dropped them whenever they weren't needed, but the very first pun he used in a costume had just come naturally to him.

It might've been something he'd picked up in his child actor years — "People in animal costumes have to talk funny" or something along those lines.

"Why not stop using them altogether?" Leviathan asked.

"Absolutely not. It's just how I am. You'll have to bear with it!"

"...I see."

"Why not follow suit, Behemot? Add some flavor to your speech."

"'porcupine?' tl;dr," Behemot responded, meaning that it was hard to craft puns around the type of animal she was.

"..."

During that exchange, Leviathan swore to herself that she would most definitely launch a surprise attack on Shu for saying something stupid to her Master.

The End

The Culinary Troubles of the Royalty and Nobility (Hell's Kitchen)

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

The path between Altea and Gideon wasn't exactly short.

Figaro, Xunyu, and others who could travel at supersonic speeds could go to another city and back within a day like it was nothing, but most people weren't capable of that. It took awhile for me even if I rode Silver at maximum speed; back when Rook, Marie, and I rode to Gideon as a party, it took us a whole day in spite of the fact that our dragon carriage was pulled by Marilyn — a demi-dragon.

The carriage we were riding now was being pulled by Liliana's Second Model Prism Steed — SMPS. It was faster than Marilyn and never got tired, but this trip would take some time in spite of that.

Of course, we had to eat on the road a couple times.

Whenever the time came, we set the table and reached into a preserving-type inventory to retrieve some food that was as fresh as if it was just made.

"I suppose this is in-flight food, except on land," Nemesis said, somewhat excited.

Before I dug in, I was a bit worried if Canglong, being the third prince of Huang He, would be fine with meals like this, but it didn't seem like he had a problem.

Thinking about it a little more, he had come here by dragon carriage all the way from his empire in the far east. He was probably used to such meals by now.

We also had a princess with us, but I never had to worry about that kind of thing with Azurite. Knowing that she was the type who didn't mind putting on a mask and investigating ancient ruins by herself, I knew that meals on the road bother her.

"Do you need medicine?" B3 asked.

"No," Azurite replied.

This exchange sparked my curiosity.

“Medicine?”

“I heard that Altarian nobility dine with Elixirs and High Holy Water at the ready.”

“There are those that do. I, however, do not.”

“...Why would you have anti-debuff potions at dinner?” I asked.

“In case their food is poisoned.”

Now that she mentioned it, that did seem like a common occupational hazard for royalty and nobility alike.

“Poisoning explains the Elixirs, but why the High Holy water?”

“Because in some situations, the food might have curse catalysts instead of poison.”

“Now that’s just scary... But why aren’t they using tasters instead?”

“Because there was a time when it was popular among poisoners to use skills that made it so that the food only became poisonous after being tasted once.”

...Well, Dendro has no shortage of status effect magic, I thought.

“Apparently, poisons and curses that kill people instantly don’t even give them time to drink a potion, so they always equip Brooches, too,” B3 added. “High Hexers can also use instakill magic, so they might even need some appropriate accessories.”

“I’m guessing that these anti-assassination countermeasures are a result of people learning from history...” Trying to imagine what kind of incidents had sparked the need for these elaborate countermeasures made me shudder.

“For something more exotic...” Azurite said. “There were cases of people mixing inventories smaller than even rings into their target’s food, so their stomach acid would melt them open. The items would be released inside the body, instantly making the target burst and die.”

“...Man, these assassins scare me.”

“And that is why there are many nobles who always have medicine and accessories on them.”

“I see... But why aren’t you doing the same?” I asked.

“I have accessories on, but there’s no need for me to prepare any medicine.”

“No need?”

“My stats are high, so I would make it in time even if I don’t have any medicine prepared. My resistances are good, too, so the kind of poison that would kill the average person instantly would take about an hour to kill me.”

“...”

Azurite’s casual words had reminded me and B3 that the most powerful beings in Dendro had physical prowess that put them far above your average means of assassination.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 13 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 12
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2020 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2020 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2020 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2020 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.1: July 2020

Premium E-Book

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
13. Vorpal Rabbit, Vorpal Hare

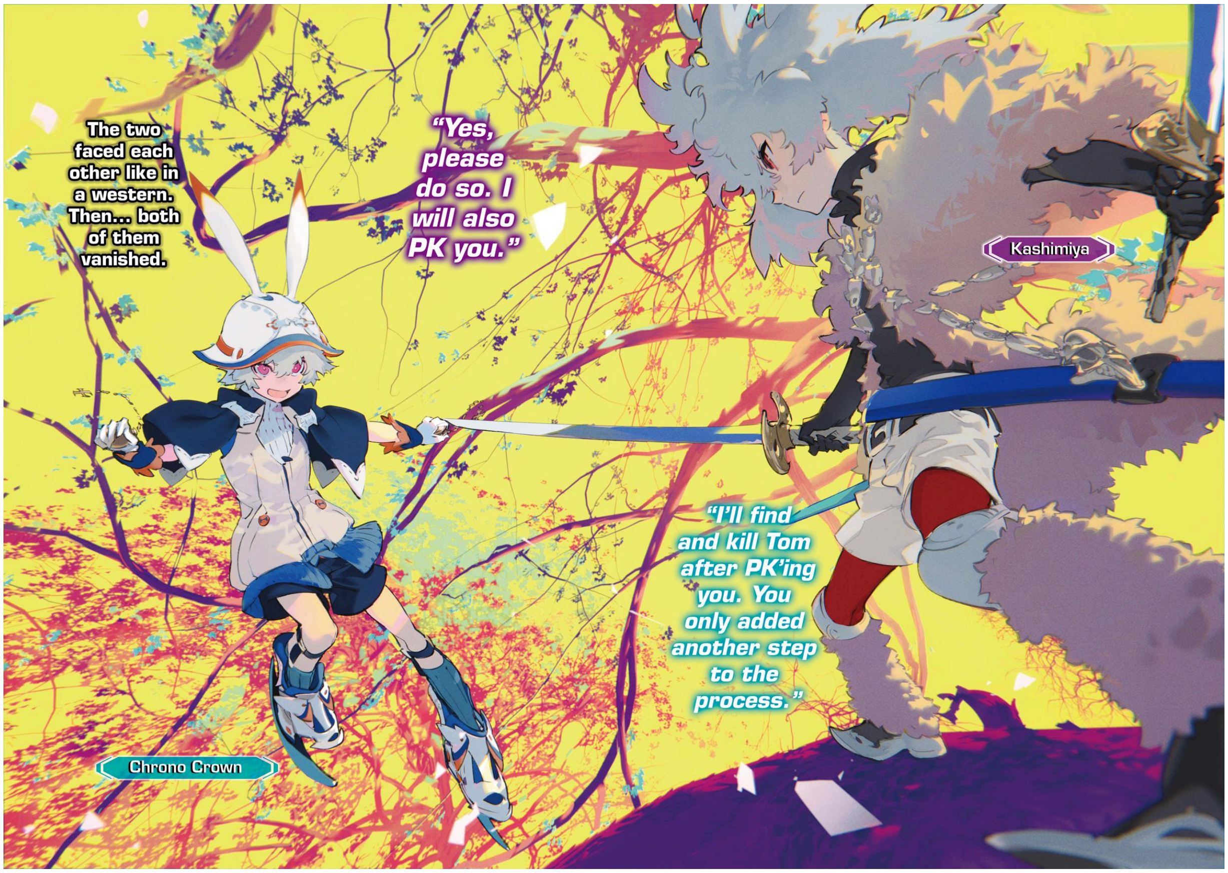
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
13. Vorpal Rabbit, Vorpal Hare

Infinite Dendrogram

13. Vorpal Rabbit, Vorpal Hare

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



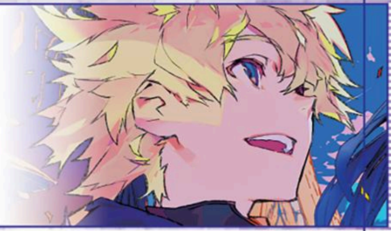
The two faced each other like in a western. Then… both of them vanished.
“Yes, please do so. I will also PK you.”
Kashimiya
“I’ll find and kill Tom after PK’ing you. You only added another step to the process.”
Chrono Crown

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

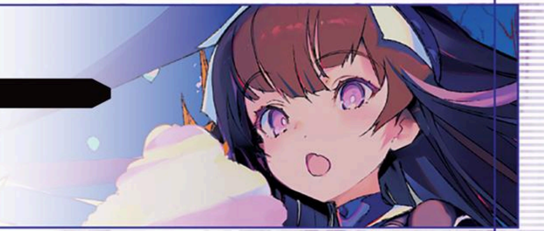
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of what is right that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

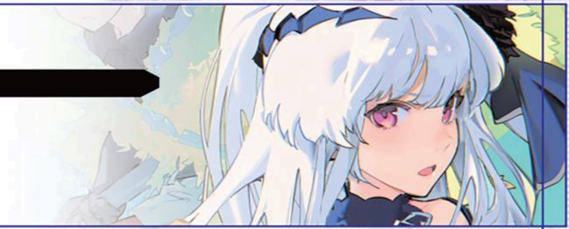
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword, a halberd, a shield, and a pinwheel. She's a bit of a glutton, too.



Juliet

Juliet

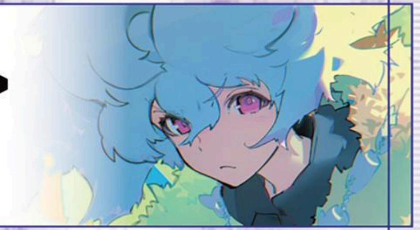
Ranked #4 in Altar's duel rankings.
Her main job is Fallen Knight, and she often acts edgy or mysterious for the sake of seeming cool.
Likes to hang out with Chelsea, a girl who holds the 8th position in the duel rankings.



Kashimiya

Kashimiya

A major duelist, and the strongest player killer in the Kingdom of Altar.
After a long period of rising up and beating the odds, he's risen to the #2 spot in the duel rankings.
He's a PK with a moral compass, and makes a point not to attack people indiscriminately.



Azurite

Altimia Azurite Altar

First princess of the Kingdom of Altar, and holder of the Sacred Princess job.
After she encountered Ray, she started to change her feelings towards masters like him.

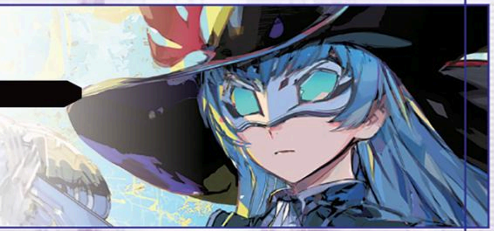


Table of Contents

Cover
Color Illustrations

Prologue: Friends
Chapter One: The Third Job
Chapter Two: Clan
Chapter Three: The Fearsome Clan
Interlude: The Imperium’s Preparations
Chapter Four: The Rabbit Skips Through the Darkness
Chapter Five: The Night Before the Peace Conference
Chapter Six: Peace Conference
Interlude: The Assault on Altea
Chapter Seven: Opened Hostilities
Chapter Eight: The Battle of the Masterless
Chapter Nine: Vorpal Rabbit, Vorpal Hare
Interlude: The Spectator

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue: Friends

Sacred Princess, Altimia A. Altar

I immediately realized that I was dreaming.

I'd had this dream many times before — a dream of the past. However, unlike the previous times I dreamed of this, I didn't relive the last time I saw my father.

Instead, I saw a scene that dated back a lot further than the day my father died. The dream was more of a vision from half a decade ago, when Altar and Dryfe were on such good terms that the very idea of a war between them seemed absurd.

It was a peaceful time, before the attack of The Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, and even before the increase in the number of Masters.

Back then, I was a transfer student at a school in Dryfe. On that day, I was in the dorm's lounge, reading a book I'd checked out from the library.

I was the only one there, most likely because I was the first princess of a kingdom. I'd been here for almost a year now, so I was used to being avoided — not out of hate, but out of fear.

"Altimia, can I have a moment?"

Despite all that, there was still one person who would always talk to me.

"Claudiah. What is it?" Claudiah was her name, and she was one of my few friends here. You could definitely say that we were close.

...Though, it's not like I had many friends in Altar, either. There was only Liliana — the daughter of my father's friend — and Integra — the youngest of the Arch Sage's disciples.

"Would you like to come shopping with me this afternoon?" Claudiah asked. "We can get some tea at a café, too. They should start selling fall treats today."

"...You really like going out, don't you?" Claudiah was the daughter of the third prince of Dryfe and one of the candidates for the throne. She had also been in charge of helping me live in this foreign land. We were about the same age and had some things in common, so we got along rather well.

"What do you need to buy, if I may ask?" I wondered out loud.

"Clothes! Mostly for you!"

"Me?"

"You've gotten a little bigger in the chest, haven't you? By next season, all your clothes will be too tight for you."

"Well, I am in the middle of a growth spurt. I'm impressed you noticed."

"...Heheheh. Well, people really pay attention to things they desperately want, but can't easily get." Claudiah then indicated her own bust — it was on the smaller side, and it didn't look like it would be growing anytime soon... If ever.

Claudiah was staring at my chest with envy in her eyes, too. I got the impression she'd reach for it if I took too long to respond, so I rushed to give my answer.

"Very well... Let's go. I wanted to look around the bookstores, anyway."

"Splendid! Let's meet up outside the gate at one o'clock! I can't wait!"

I found the meeting time she specified a bit odd. My watch said that it was still ten in the morning. That meant that we wouldn't be meeting up until over three hours from now.

"Why the afternoon?" I asked. "I'm free. We could go right now. Do you have some prior commitment?"

"My brother asked me to help him in his workshop! Ugh... I know my stats are high, but he shouldn't make a lady carry things around for him."

"Oh, I see..." Like she'd just said, her stats were extremely high.

After all, her job was The Ram.

Claudiah had been born with incredible talent that had allowed her to claim the open Superior Job at the tender age of thirteen. That was one of the reasons why we got along so well. Though I used the Swordmaster job title as a cover, I was actually the Sacred Princess. We were both daughters of ruling families, and we both spent a great deal of time honing our martial skills, so it made sense that we would see eye to eye. We even sparred together at least once every few days.

"Could you not simply have someone else assist your brother?" Claudiah was a lady — someone you could truly call a "princess." I found it unfitting for such an individual to perform manual labor, and it seemed strange that her brother would ask something like that of her.

"Sadly, no," Claudiah answered. "My brother is extremely anxious around strangers and cannot focus on his work if he's with someone besides me or a member of our mother's family... the Barbaros, I mean."

"I see..." That seemed reasonable enough to me.

Claudiah had lost both of her parents, and it was rumored that they were assassinated by someone from the imperial family. While Claudiah had somehow gotten through everything while remaining innocent and cheerful, I could only guess that her elder brother, on the other hand, refused to trust anyone but those he considered his own.

"Well, I don't mind waiting," I said. "You go help your brother."

"Thank you! I will not take long, so please be patient!" Claudiah rushed out of the lounge and through the hallway at supersonic speeds.

That was a level beyond the usual rule-breaking in the dorms, but her carelessness just made me chuckle. I resumed reading my book, killing time until she came back.

About two hours later, I closed my book.

There was less than an hour left until one o'clock, our proposed meeting time, but Claudiah hadn't returned.

A bit curious, I went to the workshop she'd mentioned earlier. Dryfe was a country of machines, so all places of education had facilities for machine-related crafting jobs.

And so, in a pleasant hallway outside the workshop, I found a familiar face — Claudiah herself.

"Oh. Claudiah — Hm...?" However, once I came close, I realized that it wasn't her.

This person had a very similar face, but the expression and the eyes were nothing alike.

Princess Claudiah was cheerful, energetic, and had the vigor of a true battle-focused Superior Job. This person, by contrast, was far too gloomy to even serve as her shadow.

The lovely face that so resembled Claudiah's was spoiled by the dark expression and the oil staining their hair and cheeks. They also weren't wearing a school uniform — instead, they were clad in a set of dirtied work clothes.

However, what made it plainly obvious that this couldn't possibly be Claudiah was the gaze. It was icy cold, as though this person had never once felt any warmth or passion.

Still, the face resembled Claudiah's so much that it must have been someone related to her.

"Are you... Claudiah's brother?" I asked.

"...Yes, Your Highness Altimia." Though his voice was lower, it was similar to Claudiah's in tone, just as you would expect from a sibling.

I could only assume that they were twins.

I also realized that he knew who I was. Perhaps Claudiah had told him about me?

"Claudiah... I mean, Her Highness is always a great help to me."

"...No need to act like that around me. She does what she does because she wants to. Also, you don't need to use 'Highness' for me, or her."

Though it seemed like he wasn't fully tuned into the conversation, I felt like his attitude had shifted slightly.

"Do you know where Claudiah is?" I asked. "I was looking for her. We agreed to meet up, and it's almost time."

"...I suppose she's taking a bath right now," he replied. "I had her help with my work, so she's probably as dirty as me... She can't go with you in such a state. I'd appreciate it if you wait for her a bit longer."

"Oh, so that's what's happening." Gloomy as he was, his words still held a hint of gentleness towards his sister, as well as some consideration for me — her friend. I also started to notice that his eyes held more warmth than I'd realized at first.

I quickly revised my impression of him. Maybe he wasn't such a cold person after all.

I looked down and saw a metal container clutched in his hands.

"A toolbox..."

"...Despite appearances, I am the King of Machines. I'm often entrusted with repairing all kinds of devices, like the machines here in this school or the Imperstand."

King of Machines was the Superior Job in the mechanic grouping. Dryfe Imperium was a country that boasted far more technicians than warriors. You couldn't say the same about Claudiah's job, The Ram, but there had to be a great many people here in Dryfe competing for the King of Machines title. If he was truly Claudiah's twin, he was far too young for such a job. The fact that he actually had it meant that he must be nothing short of a genius.

...Though, I did find it odd that a candidate for the throne was entrusted with something as mundane as repairs.

"I will be going, then," he said. "Please keep being a good friend to my sister."

"I will. Thank you."

And with that, we parted ways.

However, it was only after I'd returned my book to the library that I realized something important.

"Oh... I forgot to ask his name."

What was it, again? I didn't know at this point.

After several dozen more minutes, Claudiah finally appeared in the lounge.

"My apologies! I'm late!" she exclaimed.

"It's okay. You had a hard time, didn't you? It doesn't bother me at all."

"Ohh! You're so nice! I love you!" Claudiah ran up to me and hugged my arm like a little girl. Her hair smelled faintly of the machine oil she'd failed to entirely wash off.

Oh, I could only imagine how hard she worked to get rid of this smell.

She soon realized that I'd noticed the smell and jumped back about twenty metels, like any normal battle-focused job would.

"I-I'm sorry! Ugh! Why did my brother have to make me help him today, of all days?! My usual deodorant did nothing! I can't walk with you like this!"

"There's no point in shopping separately. The smell doesn't bother me, really, so you can come closer."

"Altimia... Th-Thank you!"

And so, we stood side-by-side and went shopping just like we'd planned. Shoulder-to-shoulder, we talked about many things on the way.

One of the things we discussed was her brother.

"Oh? You met him?"

"Yes. And as rude as it may be, I forgot to ask for his name."

"Well, he almost never introduces himself," she said, before heaving a heavy sigh and shaking her head. "I'll make introductions in his stead! His name is... Reinhard!"

The moment I heard that name, the dream ended.

◇

Then, I awoke from my dream of the past and sat up. Wiping the sweat from my brow, I let out a sigh.

“To think I would dream of her now, of all times...” Once the dream was over, that was the only thing I said.

However, I knew full well why I saw that vision in particular.

It was no doubt the peace offer from the imperium.

Now, there was a small part of me that hoped the war would soon end and our relationship would go back to the way it was. That small part of me had dreamed of my time in Dryfe — the fun memories I made with my friend.

If all went well during the upcoming peace talks, the war would be over.

But if it didn’t, the fighting would inevitably resume. It would be a war that would decide the fate of both the kingdom I led and the imperium that Claudiah’s brother Reinhard ruled.

In silence, I pondered the situation. We were no doubt good friends.

However, the war with Dryfe had taken my father from me.

The gulf between not just the two of us, but our whole countries had grown too vast and too deep.

If there was no peace to be had, then we would have no choice but to fight.

She and I might be friends, but both of us had something more important to protect.

I was the Sacred Princess — the sword of the kingdom — while she was The Ram — the spear of the imperium. Just as I wanted to protect my sisters, she wanted to aid her brother. I was certain that we would be forced to fight each other to protect what we held dear.

It might even lead to one of us taking the other’s life.

“But...”

No matter what happened next.

No matter what lay in store for us.

No matter what terrible fate might befall me.

“I... I want us to always be friends.” That was the conclusion I drew from my nostalgic dream, before I steeled my resolve once more.

◆◆◆

The Imperator's Office, Dryfe Imperium

On the day that Gideon, the City of Duels, was shaken by the two Superiors — King of Berserk, Hannya and Over Gladiator, Figaro — Field Marshal Gifted Barbaros was having an audience with his imperator.

"And that concludes our report on the events in Quartierlatin."

Barbaros had been summoned here for two reasons.

One of them was to deliver the final report about the Quartierlatin incident. His mission there was to investigate the ruins and prevent the kingdom from acquiring any powerful weapons there — and by his own estimation, he'd failed.

However, that wasn't because the superweapon, Acra-Vasta, had been destroyed by the kingdom's Masters and the Sacred Princess, Altimia A. Altar. The real problem was in the reports that followed the events, saying that the kingdom was only growing stronger thanks to the discovery of certain facilities in the ruins — a plant that produced not the uncontrollable Prism Soldiers, but Prism Steeds instead.

Thanks to events such as the clash with The Lynx, Tom Cat, and the large-scale battle against Acra-Vasta, Gifted had found the whole incident to be an extremely hectic experience. However, he saw the ultimate outcome as a failure on his part and didn't even try to hide that assessment in his report.

"I see how it is, Uncle Gifted," a matter-of-fact, emotionless voice replied. "Also, there is no need to be so formal with me."

The person calling Gifted "Uncle" was none other than the current imperator of Dryfe — Reinhard.

"You claim that this is a failure on your part, but I do not see it that way. The primary objective was to destroy the superweapon. That was accomplished. Certainly the ideal outcome would have been for us to secure the weapon and destroy the production facilities on top of that, but the outcome we have is far better than one where the kingdom wields the weapon as their own."

Gifted took a moment to think about how to respond, but his train of thought was cut off by a different voice resounding in the room. "But Brother Dearest, this 'Acra-Vasta' was an uncontrollable superweapon, was it not? If Dryfe could not master it, the very notion that Altar could do so is absurd. They never could've wielded it in the first place." This new voice was much like Reinhard's; the differences were quite subtle.

"It's entirely possible to control supposedly 'uncontrollable' weapons with Embryos. We even know of one example, do we not?"

"Oh, The Weapon. I'd somehow forgotten how he ruined an entire underground city." With a voice that carried slightly more emotion than before, Reinhard was now talking to his sister, Claudiah.

Gifted said nothing. He merely listened, thinking back on the past and noting how the machine-like Reinhard always had a soft spot for his sister.

They were both his relatives. Gifted had been adopted by the Barbaros family, meaning that their mother was his elder step-sister, and his wife was their cousin. It was a complicated family tree, but this relationship was a major factor in his rise to the rank of imperial field marshal. He was their uncle, Claudiah's mentor, and the only person in the military that the two of them could trust. No one else was worthy of it.

"By the way, Uncle Gifted... you met Altimia, did you not?" Reinhard asked. "How was she?"

For a moment, Gifted wondered why he would ask such a thing, but then recalled that the First Princess of Altar and Claudiah had been good friends in school.

"She seemed to be in good health, but..."

"But... what?"

"She was wearing a mask and calling herself 'Azurite.'"

"Pfft!" Claudiah covered her mouth and burst into laughter at the mental image. "A mask...! And 'Azurite'? That's just her middle name...! AHAHAHAHAHAHAH!" Claudiah was so amused by this that she actually fell to the floor clutching her sides, rumpling her fancy business clothing.

"I-I know she really loved books about aristocratic girls concealing their identity and bringing change to the world... but I didn't think she'd actually do it...! PFFT! AHAHAHAHAH! HOOH! HAAH!"

"...Claudiah," Reinhard spoke up, having had enough of the sight and the sound. "I have nothing against laughter, but snorting like that is unbecoming. Also, you are not much better than her in that regard, are you?"

“...Oh. Th-That is true.” That was enough to calm Claudiah down.

“I wish to continue talking to Uncle Gifted. Could you please keep yourself under control?”

“Then I’ll have to wage a mental mock battle against Altimia herself!” And with those words, Claudiah vanished from the room.

“Now... Let us change the subject, Uncle Gifted.”

“...Very well.”

“I’ve heard enough about Quartierlatin; we should discuss the other issue at hand. I believe the information already reached you, but the kingdom now has a fifth Superior.”

Gifted said nothing. This very day, yet another battle between Superiors had occurred in the Altarian city of Gideon. The clash had been arranged by King of Light, F and the control AIs themselves. As unlikely as it seemed, it actually ended without a single casualty. The two Superiors had settled their differences and King of Berserk, Hannya had officially joined Altar.

Now, Dryfe and Altar had an even number of Superiors, and though the former still boasted a higher number of pre-Superiors and Masters in total, the shift in the balance was not to be underestimated.

We already have to watch out for interference from Caldina, Gifted thought. If the war resumed as things were now, Caldina would strike the moment both Altar and Dryfe were exhausted, subjugating both countries.

That was the worst outcome he could possibly imagine.

“Altar and Dryfe are now equally matched in military might,” said Reinhard. “And Caldina is biding its time like a watchful hawk. What do you think the best course of action would be?”

The field marshal faction’s original plan had been to demonstrate the imperium’s power to Caldina and quickly annex the kingdom using overwhelming force, but that was no longer an option. The plan was already in doubt once King of Destruction showed his power, but with King of Berserk thrown into the mix, the power gap had grown far too small.

King of Beasts can keep King of Destruction occupied and ultimately defeat him. That would’ve given our other Superiors the chance to quickly subjugate the kingdom, but that’s impossible now that the numbers are even, Gifted thought.

And thanks to the failure of the chancellor faction — namely, Franklin — it was now impossible to force the kingdom to surrender.

Both factions' ideal plans had been rendered entirely unachievable.

"All we can do now... is end the war," Gifted said. It was impossible to fight Caldina while also facing Altar, and with the kingdom's newfound power, outright war was a futile effort that was best abandoned.

"Exactly," Reinhard nodded in response. "And if we were to be honest with ourselves, we've already won in any case."

"...That is true." The imperium's primary motive for war was the famine caused by Dryfean land gradually becoming woefully unfit for agriculture, as well as Caldina and Altar ending their food exports to the country. However, that had all ended when the imperium occupied the old Lunnings Duchy in the previous war.

The area had a dark history, having been utterly decimated by the mighty and wicked Gloria, but it boasted extremely fertile soil. Dryfe had begun agriculture operations there shortly after the occupation, and some of the faster-growing crops from the territory were already flowing into the imperium, helping to alleviate the famine. The food from the former Lunnings Duchy was enough to prevent mass starvation, meaning that the imperium already lost their primary motivation for fighting.

"The problem is whether the kingdom would allow us to rest on this victory," said Reinhard. It was indeed questionable whether Altar would be open to peace after losing so much of its land and its people, including the king himself. If this was what it took to finally end the war, would they truly accept it?

"In all honesty, I am only half certain," the imperator continued. "I believe that she... the acting queen, I mean, would choose to stop, but I am not so sure about the nobles and commoners who suffered in the war, either directly or indirectly."

"But..."

"Oh? Am I wrong somehow, Uncle Gifted? Do you have anything to say?"

"No... I don't." Gifted refrained from telling Reinhard that he couldn't be so sure that the first princess would choose peace. After all — she had lost her father. She wasn't the only one who felt that way, either. Many citizens of Altar had lost loved ones to the war. Could those people truly just... stop? It was an extremely complicated problem that made any predictions difficult, but Reinhard didn't even seem to consider that. It was as though it had completely slipped his mind... or as if he found it not even worth thinking about in the first place.

"Also, even if we end the war, we still lack certain things," Reinhard added.

"What things would those be?" Gifted asked.

"What was necessary for the country was the old Lunnings Duchy. However, we still do not have what is necessary for the war, for us... and for the world."

Gifted fell silent and pondered.

He knew what Reinhard meant by "What is necessary for the war" — that was the kingdom's Superiors. Part of the reason he wanted to annex the kingdom was to acquire its Masters, because it was the only way Dryfe stood a chance against Caldina.

Gifted guessed that "What is necessary for us" likely referred to the first princess of Altar. He already knew that the imperator had strong personal feelings for her, and it was clear that she was needed for the annexation of the kingdom to occur.

But what does he mean by "What is necessary for the world?" Gifted wondered. Not even Gifted could fathom what he meant by that, and he was a high ranking imperial official as well as the imperator's uncle.

He couldn't even begin to guess at what Reinhard was thinking.

The young imperator had always had a different viewpoint than most for as long as Gifted could remember; the only one who truly understood him was his twin sister, Claudiah.

"...What is it that's necessary for the world?" Gifted asked. Reinhard fell silent for a moment to think, then opened his mouth. "It's..." he began, only to fall silent before saying anything further. "I'm sorry, Uncle Gifted. It seems I have an unexpected guest. Could you please leave us?"

Without answering Gifted's question, Reinhard suddenly dismissed him instead.

"What...?" Gifted activated the miniature marionettes he'd placed in the surrounding area, but he didn't see anyone anywhere.

He also wondered what kind of guest would require Reinhard to make everyone else leave.

"I will handle the second matter by trying to make peace with the kingdom," Reinhard added. "I will draft up our terms and discuss it with you and Mr. Vigoma... so please, leave us for now."

"...As you will." And so, Gifted did as he was told.

He considered leaving a marionette in the room in order to find out who his nephew would be talking to — and about what — but decided against it. He realized, based on Reinhard's attitude alone, that it would be someone Gifted would not be allowed to know about at any cost.

The imperator was the child of Gifted's step-sister and someone who had been family for nearly twenty years, so there were some things he could understand without Reinhard having to utter a single word.

And so, shortly after Gifted's leave, the space in the office warped... and a single person appeared.

Imperator Machina, ■■■■■■■■ ■ ■■■■■

As you may be aware, the imperium and the kingdom are now more or less even in their number of Superiors. However, if you consider each individual Superior and their potential for cooperation, then Altar might actually have the upper hand. I understand that I am in no position to say this, but Dryfe's Superiors have some glaring personality flaws.

One is too confident in his own status as a prodigy.

One has been rejecting any sort of companionship since the very beginning.

Murdoch is relatively decent, but he puts too much of his adventurous spirit into all of his actions.

Zeta? She is not a Dryfean Superior, per se. There are far worse snakes you could clutch to your bosom, but I believe she would be willing to complete a particular task I have in mind, at least. That would be satisfactory. I already took it into account.

Huh? Ohh, Franklin... She is a timid coward. In addition, she is a mental deviant who cannot put the brakes on her desires and convictions... particularly her drive to create and her desire never to lose.

That is why her plots always have far more layers than necessary. She could not stop herself, and she was afraid of coming into conflict with someone and suffering defeat. It is a possibility she cannot tolerate. That's why she puts so much unnecessary effort into eliminating any obstacles in her path, and the longer things go badly for her, the less discerning she becomes about her methods.

That's why the one they call Ray Starling is her ultimate obstacle, the being she hates most in the world. His brother — King of Destruction, Shu Starling — is far more powerful than him, but that is irrelevant to her. She found Ray Starling's very existence unpleasant, and no matter how weak or strong he was, she simply could not tolerate him.

However, like I said before, she is also a timid coward, so she is afraid of their next encounter. She lacks the nerve to hurt him even indirectly.

That is why she will not touch him until she is prepared enough to be completely confident in her victory.

Though, if you asked her about it directly, she would dance around it in her usual jester-like manner.

How am I able to analyze everything in such detail, you ask? It's the same as working on machines. To me, seeing the movements of human hearts and minds is about the same as tinkering with circuits of machines from the pre-ancient civilization.

...I do feel uncomfortable saying that to an expert like yourself, though.

You look like you want to say something, and I know what it is.

You are wondering why, despite being so understanding, I do not seem to comprehend anything that relates to her. Well, there is no helping that. What I feel for her makes my circuits go into overdrive and creates a major glitch in the program inside me we call "personality." Indeed, this is a glitch in the brain... or perhaps my very soul.

And it is a glitch I myself have grown fond of.

Regarding anything about my love for her, the computational device we know as the brain stops outputting the correct values.

I myself know full well that letting her father die in the war was suboptimal. But despite that knowledge, I do not reject the result.

Indeed, I know perfectly well that I am not of sound mind. It is as if the calculating side of me and the side of me that is driven mad with love for her are attempting to control this machine we call the body in tandem.

I suppose that most onlookers would find me less agreeable than your garden-variety madman. However, I myself think that this state of affairs is tolerable. The fact that I have been driven mad by my love for her simply cannot be helped anymore.

Now, I have a question for you, as well.

What was the goal behind this war you incited?

...Heheh. No answer? I expected as much.

You have your reasons for what you do, after all. You came here to plant the seeds of a new war, in case I intended to stop it completely. Worry not. A war will happen, one way or another. It might not be against the kingdom, but that is of no consequence to you, is it?

What you need is merely the phenomenon of war itself. It does not matter who is involved.

Wars are major events to the Masters... and important matters to the observers.

They always act whenever there is a war. The Lynx's appearance 600 years ago is a perfect example. He wielded his Embryo's immense power to intervene in the battle between that era's strongest champions.

You wanted war because you wanted something like that to happen again, did you not? No need to be so surprised.

You and the president of Caldina are not the only ones who can see right through people.

Whatever the case, Dryfe will go to war again, so there is no need for you to worry. Feel free to scheme in other countries instead.

Oh, but one more thing. Claudiah has a warning for you.

"If you conspire to assassinate Altimia, I will hunt you to the ends of this world and slaughter you." There. That is that.

Yes. Make sure you do not forget it.

Goodbye, then. If fate so dictates, let us meet again.

Oh, I forgot to say one thing.

That appearance suits you well... Arch Sage.

Re-Open Episode: "The Forms of The Self"

Chapter One: The Third Job

Prism Rider, Ray Starling

Only about a week in Dendro time had passed since Hannya's outburst, but that was long enough for the situation here in Altar to change drastically.

The biggest reason for the sudden change was that Azurite had announced there would be peace talks between the kingdom and the imperium, scheduled to occur in about two weeks in Dendro time. Thankfully, that was a Saturday in real life, so I would have no trouble participating.

It would be held in a building built on the border between Altar and the old Lunnings Duchy, which was now effectively under Dryfe's control. In preparation for it, the kingdom was recruiting a lot of Masters to act as Azurite's retinue. This was necessary because there was a chance that the talks could go badly and lead to immediate war, as well as the possibility that all of this was just a trap disguised as peace talks. If either of those worst-case scenarios became reality, it would be the Masters' job to protect Azurite and the other diplomats.

Our party had received a personal request to join her retinue, and we'd already accepted it.

Of course, it would be best if none of that happened, but if it did, I'd really regret it if I wasn't there by Azurite's side. No one in our party had any objections to going, so we agreed.

There was one problem, though. If a fight broke out during the peace talks, I'd obviously be up against some of the best Masters in Dryfe... but I really wasn't strong enough to fight them. In fact, it was possible that I'd be the lowest level person there. I already had the lowest level in my party, after all. Marie was a Superior Job, B3 was a veteran player, and even Rook was fast approaching level 400, while I was only level 150.

...I'd actually reached 150 that very morning, meaning that I'd maxed out Prism Rider — my second job — and it was time to choose my third.

"The Catalog gave me several options... but I just don't know what to pick," I muttered.

The Suitable Job Diagnostics Catalog that Shu gave me presented the best jobs for me based on my current build. The ones it recommended now were Knight, which would buff my base build; Priest, which would increase my healing ability; and Scout, which improved a few very useful utility skills.

"I can see why," Nemesis commented. "All of these jobs are so common that they don't feel right for you."

"Hey, I don't mind that they're common... It's just that I don't see that X factor in any of them." I half-heartedly nodded, still paralyzed by indecision. It didn't seem like any of them would change my set-up quite as much as Paladin or Prism Rider had. If possible, I wanted a job that would quickly breathe new life into my build.

I'd hoped to see the high-rank direct upgrade to Prism Rider listed, but I couldn't find it anywhere in the Catalog — meaning that either no one had taken it yet, or it was a lost job and its conditions were secret.

It seemed like I had no option but to pick one of the jobs presented to me, but...

"Why not just pick Knight?" asked B3. "If we ignore your Payback Beyond the Stars and Shining Despair skills, you're primarily a melee fighter. I don't think that will change anytime soon, so I think you'd benefit from the active skills Knight would give you."

"No no no," Marie objected. "Scout is the way to go here. Ray always charges head-first into trouble, so he'd get a lot of benefit from utility skills like Reveal and Killing Intent Perception."

"Ray's build is based around taking damage," said Rook. "I think Priest is the best choice here." Not even my party could help me decide. Each person present was in favor of a different job.

We were in a café, by the way. Nemesis and I were here first, but we'd been glaring at the Catalog for so long that before we knew it, we were joined by B3, Marie, and Rook.

I did have the option of picking all three jobs, but I could only max out one or two of them before I had to accompany Azurite to the peace talks. Taking that into consideration, the next low-rank jobs I took were actually extremely important, but that just made this choice all that more difficult.

As this discussion continued...

"Ohh? Well, now ain't this a shady group, inside and out. What's up, B3 and company?"

...I heard a familiar voice from outside the terrace.

The speaker was that muscle-bound, wolf-eared woman whom I'd seen several times now — the sub-leader of the K&R, the PK clan, and the Nobushi Princess, Rosa.

"...That's quite a greeting, Rosa," said B3, looking extremely displeased.

"Hahahah. Good to see you know what I'm talking about."

B3 didn't look shady on the outside, so she must've felt that Rosa was making a comment about her character. Well, her tone did seem pretty provocative.

"So? Why're you lookin' at a Catalog?" Rosa asked. "Messin' with ya build again? You're so indecisive. Just get a Superior Job already."

"...That's easier said than done."

B3 was searching for info on Full Armor Giant or Shield Giant Superior Jobs, but neither DIN nor The Lunar Society had anything to offer. Apparently, such jobs often had strange conditions — for instance, to get King of Destruction, Shu had to do a certain amount of damage to objects.

"Also, this isn't about me. It's about Ray." B3 continued. "We're discussing what job he should pick next."

"Hm? Ohh, Unbreakable's still level 150," Rosa said. "You have Paladin and Prism Rider... so this'll be your third one, huh?" For a moment, I wondered how she knew that, but then I remembered that I was actually still a Paladin back when I'd fought her, and she must've used Reveal to see that I was a Prism Rider currently.

"The Catalog's tellin' ya... Knight, Priest, and... what the hell? What a boring build."

"No peeking — it's bad manners," said B3. "And if you think that's boring, what would you say is an actually interesting build?"

"A good ol' first-strike Nobushi build with a focus on spear skills and concealment."

"...That's just your build. I might as well just say, I like this END-based giant set-up," B3 huffed.

"Ugh, you damn turtler. Try comin' outta your shell once in a damn while!"

“Bitch, don’t act like ya didn’t use your ult to pump up your defense last time we fought!”

B3, your Barbaroy mode is showing, I thought.

“One’s all about offense, the other’s all about defense... but they have a lot in common. Like their boorish nature and preference for younger men, for example.”

“...Marie, please don’t throw fuel on the fire,” I said.

Also... B3’s into younger men? Since when?

“Well, let’s leave it at that, then,” said Rosa. “Any ‘best’ builds that don’t follow the Guardian-Jaguarman theory are more or less parallel to each other.”

“...That’s true.” The Guardian-Jaguarman theory, huh? I’d heard of that before.

“More importantly, why aren’t ya reccing him that job?” Rosa asked B3.

“‘That,’ as in...?”

“Death Soldier.”

“...Is your stupidity terminal?” For my part, I’d never heard of the job Rosa mentioned. B3 opened her mouth wide and made a face like she’d slipped back into Barbaroy mode, while Marie looked like she was trying to remember something.

I was curious, so I used the Catalog to search for the job, and found it almost instantly.

“It has low stat growth, only one skill, and to top it off... it requires you to die,” B3 explained.

...Requires you to what*?* I wondered.

“Despite being a low-rank job with a utility skill, it’s so unpopular that it might as well be a lost job.”

“But don’t you think it suits him perfectly?”

“The problem is he’d have to get into a situation where Death Soldier’s skill would actually be useful...”

“And he gets into those situations all the time, right? He just does some insane shit and basically goes ‘Chances of survival? Caution? What’re those? Can ya eat ’em?’”

“...I can’t deny that, but...” That actually seemed like a pretty insulting evaluation to me, But B3 actually glanced in my direction, as though thinking that Rosa might actually have a point.

“Umm, what kind of job is Death Soldier, anyway?” I asked.

“...Basically, it’s a job that only saw use centuries ago, and even then, only as a punishment for tians.”

“A punishment?”

“The unfortunate tians were made to take it before being forced to charge into enemy lines as suicide bombers.”

Now that’s just terrifying, I thought.

“According to the lore, it was most popular as a kind of capital punishment 600 years ago.”

“...How come was it used like that?”

“Because of Death Soldier’s only skill — Last Command. To summarize its effect, it lets you keep moving after you die.”

“...You mean, it turns you into an undead?”

“No. It just lets you move around after your HP drops to 0 for a time based on your level in the skill. Of course, you die once the effect ends, and even at level 5 — the Death Soldier’s max — you still get less than a minute.”

I said nothing in response. This skill literally cost the user their life.

“Since it lets you move even after your HP drops to 0, Last Command allowed the Death Soldiers sent out as shock troops to keep running even after they were killed by a rain of arrows. Though, apparently, you can only move parts of the body still connected to the brain — so the Death Soldiers who were blown up by their own bombs couldn’t do anything but wait for death to come for half a minute or so, after their body parts were scattered everywhere.”

...That is downright horrifying, I thought. Also, the fact that you could only move parts still connected to the brain made it seem more like a zombie thing than a higher tier undead.

“Because it has such a terrible history and reputation, not a single tian would willingly take this job. The same goes for our fellow Masters.”

“It does?”

“Nobody really wants the death penalty, and if they have to choose between a job with poor stat growth that lets them move around after death, and a proper job with good stat growth and normal skills that help them survive, they’ll obviously choose the latter. That makes Death Soldier extremely unpopular.”

“...Oh, I remember it now,” Marie finally spoke up. “Tenchi actually had some tians that took the job, but they’re all part of the Nanshumon clan... which is like the Shimazu clan from real life history. They’re all extremely reckless.”

...My college friend had also compared some Tenchi clan to the Shimazus, and now I couldn’t help but wonder if he meant their outlook rather than just the location of the territory.

“...All right, I think I get what Death Soldier is about,” I said.

“See what I meant?” asked Rosa. “Fits ya like a glove, doesn’t it? It’ll make that one technique of yours easier to use, too.”

“Technique...? Oh.” I thought for a moment and quickly figured out what she was talking about.

It was the Impact Counter I’d used on her. She’d actually been the one who named it. And yes, Death Soldier’s skill would certainly be useful for that. In fact, it might even make it more powerful.

I had to think on this a bit. I could definitely make good use of Death Soldier’s Last Command, and since it was a utility skill, I could use it while maining other jobs. This would come at the cost of the stat growth and amount of skills provided by the other jobs... but it would bring me the major change that I wanted.

“...All right. I’ll level Death Soldier,” I declared, gathering my resolve.

“You should really reconsider,” B3 suggested anxiously.

I shook my head and said, “The peace talks are really close. If Dryfe is plotting something, I need to be as strong as I possibly can. However, I don’t have the time to raise my base abilities high enough to match experienced Masters. I’d rather bet on something that, if I use it well, might let me go toe-to-toe with those more powerful than me.”

B3 gave up and sighed before saying, “...It’s your build. The choice is yours to make.” Rook and Marie nodded in agreement.

“If that’s what you think is best, then I think it’s good too,” said Rook.

“Oh, by the way,” Marie said, remembering something. “Last Command’s skill level... as in, the time you get to move around once it’s active... is linked to job level, so you should focus on leveling Death Soldier immediately.”

...Well, it would be pretty bad if it improved based on the amount of uses. Tians couldn’t die over and over, after all.

“Though, don’t forget — despite everything, you’ve only actually died once so far,” she added. “The skill might turn out to be useless to you.”

“...How strange to hear that from the person responsible for that sole death,” said Nemesis with an exasperated look in her eyes.

“I would appreciate it if you stopped pointing that out,” Marie replied with a tense face.

Anyway, I’d chosen my third job. I was going to be a Death Soldier. The name was a stark contrast to the bright and positive names of my first two jobs.

“It suits your manner of dress perfectly,” said Nemesis, who was harsh on my fashion sense, as always.

“By the way, those peace talks everybody’s talkin’ ’bout,” Rosa spoke up again. “Are you all goin’?”

“Yes,” B3 replied. “Your tone makes it sound like you’re going, too. Are you?”

“Yeah. I’m a ranker, so I got a request to come.”

Naturally, we wouldn’t be the only Masters joining the retinue. Out of the ones I knew, Juliet, Chelsea, Riser, and Bishmal were also coming, and Azurite told me that she got Miss Eldritch and Tsukikage to join, as well. Apparently, she was already making her pay for her involvement in the Hannya incident.

Even Shu would be joining us. I found that odd at first, seeing as he’d been apprehensive about leaving Gideon recently, but I would certainly appreciate having him around.

Even with just these few, Altar’s side was already very powerful — enough, according to B3, to surpass the kingdom’s entire forces in the previous war.

However, there were some that couldn’t make it. After his proposal, Figaro suffered an attack that left him hospitalized in real life, and Hannya seemingly hadn’t logged in since the incident, presumably because she was staying by Figaro’s side. Lei-Lei always had an erratic Dendro schedule, so she wouldn’t make it to the peace talks, either.

As a result, only two of the five Superiors would be present.

“What about Kashimiya?” I asked.

“Darling has family business that day. Said he doesn’t know if he’ll be able to log in for it.”

Kashimiya was among the strongest 1v1 fighters in the kingdom, right next to Figaro. Not having him around really hurt, but if it was real life business, then we had no choice but to accept it.

Tom had also said that he wouldn't be able to participate. Apparently, he was still rumored to be connected to the developers. Maybe his refusal had something to do with that?

"If Rosa is participating, it means that I'll be on the same side as her and the Superior Killer," said B3. "This kinda reminds me of what we did at the capital back in March."

Oh yeah — they were the ones behind the blockade at Altea. It was strange and almost moving to think that the same people who'd conspired against the kingdom would now be fighting for it.

"Speaking of which, I wonder where Eldridge and his GobStreet went," said Rosa.

"Ah, DIN has info on him," said Marie. "After the blockade, he traveled all over and fought Superiors like Master Jiangshi, Xunyu; The Earth, Fatoum; Great Admiral, Antimicrobic Soy Sauce; and The Saber, Saki Muryo-Taisu."

"I haven't heard of the last one before, but that's a... big name." Muryo-Taisu referred to "10 to the power of 68" — one hundred unvigintillion. It was a Buddhist concept of the immeasurable.

"I had that exact thought when I first heard it," said Marie. "Ignoring that last name, though, she said that 'Saki' is her first name in real life, too."

"You know her?"

"Yeah. From my time training over there. She's a Tenchi Superior, after all."

Tenchi, huh...? That place was on the other side of this world, so I rarely heard anything about it. It didn't seem like my Tenchi-dwelling friends from real life got involved in any major incidents, either.

...Though, I did recall Natsume looking like he wanted to say something.

"Yinglong... Magical Apex, Human Bomb, and now Realm-Divider, huh?" said Rosa. "Why's Eldridge pickin' fights with beasts like that? Wasn't he the cautious type?"

"Mad Castle split up after the blockade incident, so I can only assume that Goblin Street had a bad time, as well," B3 answered. "They must've tried to make up for it, only to be defeated again and again... The fact that he fought a lot of bad matchups is proof of that.”

“His presence opens up many tactical avenues, though,” Marie added. “He’s really strong against people he is compatible with.”

Plus, even if he was defeated every time, he still managed to challenge all those Superiors. In addition to what I’d heard about his tactical skill, it became pretty obvious that Eldridge was a really fearsome Master.

“Well, enough about him,” said Rosa. “What matters is that we’ll be on the same side for our next job. We were really at each other’s throats recently, but let’s get along, shall we?”

“Yeah. Let’s,” I said, and we exchanged a handshake.

She was a decent person... for a PK junkie, anyway.

◇

Death Soldier, Ray Starling

I switched jobs to Death Soldier right after we left the café. It had no conditions and you could pick it at just about any crystal, so it was no trouble at all.

Now, we were leveling as a party some distance away from Gideon. The party consisted of me, Rook, Marie (who’d switched to Journalist), B3 (who’d switched to Shield Giant), and finally two of Rook’s monsters, Marilyn and Audrey. This was more or less what we always used when leveling.

“By the way — is it just me, or are Marilyn and Audrey bigger than they were when I first saw them?” I asked.

“Have they gained weight?” Nemesis echoed me. Marilyn roared and Audrey screeched as if arguing with her. They were both girls, I guess, so I could only assume that they didn’t like the assumption that they’d gotten fatter.

“Well, both Marilyn and Audrey are higher level now. They might even change species at some point,” Rook said.

I had actually heard that certain kinds of monsters could change species as they leveled up. This seemed like something straight out of Pokémon, allegedly, a good number of UBMs were actually normal monsters that had become uniquely strong among their kind. They were both Demi-Dragons right now, but apparently there was a chance that they’d actually go up a rank.

"I'd have new tactical options if that happens before the peace talks in two weeks, but I don't know if it will," said Rook. "But you're working so hard, so I'll do my best to become stronger, too."

"Thanks, Rook."

Though, you know you're already over twice my level, right? I added internally. I'll have to work even harder...

"By the way, Ray," Marie spoke to me from the dragon carriage. "You seem to be laser-focused on the peace talks right now, but you do know that it won't end there, right?"

"Yeah," I nodded. "If something happens during the talks, it's likely that we'd just end up with another war, right?"

"Exactly. Oh, and do you know about the special effects of war? I mean the War Boundary, of course."

"I do. I looked it up after Franklin's Game."

It started when the leaders of the countries involved agreed to activate it. It was just called the "War Boundary," and once active, it granted three special effects to the involved countries, as well as the rest of Dendro.

The first of these effects was a restriction on Masters logging into the countries who were at war.

The moment the war began, the War Boundary would be established in the parts of the countries that were designated as battlefields. Masters who were outside the country rankings would be unable to enter those zones, and the non-rankers who were inside the boundary when it became active would be forcefully logged out. The amount of people who would be allowed in would be really limited if it was just kill and duel rankings, but because it counted clan rankings as well, you could easily get in by just belonging to a ranking clan, even if you only joined it for the duration of the war.

There were two reasons for this.

First, it limited the damage done. If anyone could participate in the war, the amount of Masters on both sides would just keep growing, which would severely increase the damage suffered by both countries. This was a preventative measure against that.

The War Boundary also allowed rankers from countries that weren't participating in the war, though. That was how Caldina was able to send rankers to Dryfe to interfere in the previous war.

The other reason was crime prevention — to keep Masters from taking advantage of the situation to perform illegal acts. Masters on all wanted lists — like the members of the infamous IF — didn’t belong to any country and weren’t part of any rankings, meaning that they were always rejected by the War Boundary. Supposedly, this prevented wartime criminal activity all over the land.

It seemed like something that might be nice to have around all the time, but apparently there was a limit to how long War Boundary could last.

The second special effect was the increase of experienced time. Normally, for each real-world hour, you experienced three hours in Dendro; but during war, each hour in reality would become thirty in-game. This was applied to the entire world, so Masters from the other countries received an absurdly good time bonus.

However, one real life day translating into an in-game month was an incredibly significant change. If you got the death penalty during a war, the conflict would likely have ended by the time you were allowed to log in again, meaning that you’d be unable to do anything more for the war effort.

The third special effect was the victory conditions. Before the War Boundary was activated, both countries would present their win conditions and demands. The losing side would have no choice but to fulfill the demands registered by the winners at the outset. Wartime demands surpassed even the highest-level Contracts in gravity, and it was said that a country that refused to fulfill them would be met with something far worse than mere destruction.

Apparently, this helped ensure fairness. Because Dendro had clear Contracts and victory conditions like this, there was much less deception and far fewer people went back on their word than in real life, making conflicts far more straightforward.

Perhaps that was just how this whole thing had been designed.

During the last war, Dryfe’s victory condition was the fall of the kingdom’s capital, while Altar’s was the destruction of the imperium’s forces — but it actually ended without either side achieving their goal. However, the Old Lunnings Duchy was on Dryfe’s invasion path, and they now effectively had control of it.

Of course, it was possible to fight without activating the War Boundary, but that would only result in an all-consuming struggle, without a clear demarcation for when it should end. Anyone could see that would result in huge numbers of civilian casualties, just like it had during Franklin's Game and Logan's invasion of Quartierlatin. Because of this, the very game-y War Boundary, with its victory conditions and established demands, was the preferred way to wage war throughout Dendro's history.

Therefore, if the coming peace talks went badly, the countries would decide on how and when they would deploy the War Boundary again.

"So, what do you think is our biggest problem if a war does break out?" Marie asked.

"...The fact that none of us are rankers." Because of that first special effect, which limited what Masters could log in to the warring countries, only rankers would be able to stay in Altar and Dryfe. No one in the current party was on any ranking table, so we'd all just be ejected from the War Boundary immediately.

However, entering the ranks at this point would be difficult. The kill rankings, which were based on total kill points, were dominated by wide-scale extermination builds and veteran Masters. You could become a duel ranker by fighting another ranker for their position, but you needed to be a distinguished duelist already to even challenge the lowest — 30th — in the rankings.

We obviously didn't have the time to try for the kill or duel rankings, so our only option was the clan rankings, which were based on the amount of quests completed by the clan's members, as well as the difficulty of those quests. Every quest gave points based on its difficulty, and the higher that was, the more points you received. A difficulty level one quest gave you 2 points, level two was 4, level three was 8, and it doubled that way until level nine, which gave you 512 points. The points you got for difficulty level ten quests varied, but apparently, the minimum was 10240.

"...Hey, shouldn't level ten quests be 1024 points?" asked Nemesis. "That was the pattern, right? Where did that extra decimal place come from?"

I was wondering about that myself, but it seems that level ten quests just give you way more than the others, I thought in response.

Also, the points were split evenly between all the people who participated in the quest. Some said that you could enter the clan rankings by just clearing a few difficulty level ten quests all by yourself, but almost no one was capable of that, obviously. Clans that made it to the rankings were almost always ones with tons of members who did a whole bunch of quests. There were also clans made up of a few elites who'd cleared a handful of difficulty eight or nine quests, but they were a minority.

I could see why Miss Eldritch's Lunar Society was the kingdom's number one ranking clan. It had a huge amount of members, and most of them were no-lifers who believed that Dendro was the true reality. It'd be weird if it wasn't at the top. Lots of ranking clans would be getting temporary members who only wanted to be allowed inside the War Boundary. That made it extremely easy for the order of the rankings to change, but The Lunar Society would no doubt remain at the top.

Speaking of which, the clan rankings were updated every month in real time — which was three months in Dendro time — and the next update was coming up in a week. That was shortly before the peace talks that could very well lead to war, so you could see many clans looking for new members, even in the streets of Gideon.

Also, I'd heard that just before the previous war, Dryfean Masters who'd temporarily joined clans that ended up not making it to the rankings abandoned them in favor of those that did.

That was totally possible and expected. Ultimately, anyone could take part in the war as long as they managed to find a clan that was in the rankings.

"It'll be difficult to enter the kill or duel rankings in time, so if a war broke out, I think we'd have to temporarily join a clan," said B3.

"Well, we don't have a choice," Marie agreed. "Neither I nor B3 killed enough monsters or did enough dueling."

"...When it was still active, Mad Castle would've made it to the lower end of the clan rankings, but we're no longer on any rankings." Oh yeah. K&R was a top-ranking clan, so it made sense that B3's Mad Castle — a PK clan on a similar level — would've been there too, if it hadn't disbanded.

"Why not borrow the club prez's Lunar Society?" B3 asked. "I think she'd let us in."

"I'd... honestly want to avoid that." I felt like that'd make me indebted to her, and I was scared of what that could lead to.

"Besides that... I know that Kashimiya's K&R is in the rankings, but that's basically just a Kashimiya fan club, so getting in would be pretty difficult," B3 continued. That was a shame. Even though it was a PK clan, K&R seemed like a better option than Miss Eldritch's Lunar Society.

Fortunately, though, I already had a good clan in mind.

"I was actually considering snagging some spots in Chelsea's clan. I'll talk to her about it later," I said.

"Ohh, Golden Pirates," said B3. "I suppose there's nothing to worry about, then."

Golden Pirates was the clan belonging to the eighth-ranked duelist, Chelsea, the Wandering Golden Sea. It was a clan that had followed her here from Granvaloa, and it was still quite active. The members regularly did duels, quests, and dungeon raids, among other things, and it was always floating between the 10th and 20th places in the clan rankings — meaning that it would most likely stay on the ranking boards even after the next update.

"I was told that I could bring a party, too," I said. "I think it'll work out."

"I see," said B3. "Once we return to Gideon, you should go get confirmation, though, just in case."

"Good idea." We continued the hunt until the sun began to set, and by the time we returned to Gideon, it was already dark out.

At that point, we went straight to Chelsea to talk to her about letting us into the clan.

We found her at a diner she frequented, and for some reason, she was holding a mug in one hand and looking really peevish.

"Nnghh... Screw love... just screw it..." She was hanging her head and had a dense, dark feeling hanging around her — something I'd never expect from someone so hearty and cheerful.

"Chelsea... don't look so sad," said Juliet — a fellow duel ranker — as she gently rubbed Chelsea's head.

“...Look at those mugs and plates piling up,” commented another girl duel ranker I’d seen before.

Also, they were all underage, so despite appearances, they were actually drinking juice.

“Juliet and... ‘Max,’ right?” I called out to them. “What happened to Chelsea?”

“Ah...! ’Tis a conflict borne of the throes of passion that burden all of mankind,” Juliet replied.

“Oh. It’s the guy with the freaky outfit and nickname,” added Max as she noticed me.

Wait, “freaky nickname?” Does she mean “Light and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson?” Doesn’t she know that only Juliet calls me that? I’m just “Unbreakable” to most people, I thought before focusing on the conversation.

“Relationship trouble?” I asked.

“Indeed,” said Juliet. “Love struck down the horde of gold, and upon the twilight of this very day, it all became as dust.”

“...some relationship problems were tearing the clan apart, and it was disbanded this evening?” Juliet confirmed this with a nod, but that was really bad for us, actually. We came here for a reason, but it meant nothing if Golden Pirates were no more.

“Chelsea... how did it come to this?”

“...You’re really gonna ask that?” she looked up at me with steady eyes and a red face.

Honestly, I was intimidated.

“...Then again, we did talk about taking you on as a temporary member if a war broke out, so I guess it would be unfair if I didn’t explain it,” Chelsea said before taking a deep breath. “It all started because there was a scumbag in the clan who was secretly dating twenty of the girls at once.”

“Twen...” Now that was a hell of an overreach. How was it even physically possible to cheat on such a scale?

“It seemed to be going well for him, but he was exposed at the Love-Duel Festival.” It was a couples event, so... did he schedule too many dates? Honestly, it was actually kind of impressive that it took the festival to finally rat him out.

“The girls he was two-timing followed some weird light that led them to him," Max added. "He was on a date with another woman, so they questioned him, and then a fight broke out."

The Love-Duel Festival and strange lights... that rung a bell. That King of Light guy caused more trouble than just Hannya's outburst, huh?

"The cheater left our clan as if to run away, but the cracks he opened up began to widen... and today, our clan disbanded."

"Now that's just... damn..." The idea that such a hearty crew met such an end made me kind of sad. Well, they were all only human, so perhaps it was only natural for their relationships to fray like that.

"And... you know the thing that pisses me off the most about this?" Chelsea continued.

"No. Not a clue..." I shook my head.

Chelsea made an even more terrifying face and said, "That I had absolutely no part in any of this drama." Her voice was full of both grief and rage.

I honestly didn't know what to say. Juliet also seemed somewhat flustered, while Max was just freaked out.

"...A playboy who can date twenty women at once didn't even try to get her, huh?" said Nemesis telepathically.

Don't you dare say that out loud. She'd probably sink this whole place in Poseidon's liquid gold, I thought in response. Chelsea's power might've been one of the reasons why the cheater didn't make a pass at her. He might've been too scared.

"Screw love..." Chelsea said as the dark aura gathered around her again.

"But Chelsea... y-you are cute," said Juliet.

"Oh man," sighed Max. "I'll treat you to some food, so just cheer up already... I hope my wallet's not too dry..."

I had no choice but to leave Chelsea to them. But... man, we had a problem of our own now. With Golden Pirates no longer an option, we had to find another clan, and...

"...Is it just me, or do you now have no choice but to join that woman's Lunar Society?"

...Ah. Damn it.

Chapter Two: Clan

Royal Capital, Altea, The King's Office

That day, Altimia the First Princess of the Kingdom of Altar was hard at work as the acting queen. The peace offer from Dryfe came right on the heels of the Hannya incident, so she immediately returned to Altea to do everything necessary for the coming peace talks.

"The Second Model Prism Steed production is going well, and both the royal guards and Altea's knights are already supplied with them. The other matter is still encountering difficulties, however. The next report is... Hm?"

After she'd finished reading the report from Countess Quartierlatin, Altimia reached for the next one, which made her tilt her head.

It read: "King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn has disappeared."

This next document was a report from an order she'd put out while she was still trying to avoid relying too much on Masters. At the time, she had instead depended exclusively on powerful tians.

The kingdom had several Superior Job-holding tians who claimed no allegiance to any of Altar's organizations, and Altimia had sent out messengers to try and recruit them. However, since many of them were essentially hermits living far from normal society, the results weren't exactly favorable. Some of them even turned out to have already died of natural causes and passed their Superior Jobs on to powerful Masters.

This report on King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn, would actually be the last one she received.

He was powerful enough to rival even the Arch Sage, and it was rumored that he currently lived and trained deep in the mountains, but...

"He disappeared? And his retreat was burned to the ground...?" According to the report, the messenger had traveled to the hermitage on the mountain Feuer lived on. However, the entire place was completely destroyed, and most of the surrounding land and trees were still scorched. Since there was new grass growing out of the burnt surroundings, the report conjectured that a great deal of time had passed since the burning... over half a year at the very least, according to the presented estimate.

Suspicious of this unusual report, Altimia silently pondered.

It was possible that Feuer had burned the hermitage himself to go on a journey somewhere. He was fairly old, so it was also possible that he saw his death coming and had immolated himself along with the place where he lived.

However, Altimia had the sneaking suspicion that this was somehow part of a much larger plot.

This feeling came with a sense of danger, as if an unseen snake had coiled itself around her leg.

“...Though, I doubt that Dryfe is involved in this.” Regardless, Altimia knew that this unusual incident was definitely something to keep in mind.

The princess continued her work, and after some time had passed, she had finally taken care of all the documents that required her eye or involvement. The last document was a report on her request for retinue at the peace talks.

“I put out a request for Masters to join me at the peace talks, and it looks like we’ll have a great many participants...” A part of her was upset that they hadn’t rallied like this for the previous war, but she concluded that was more of a reflection on Altar’s leadership, not the Masters. There was just no denying that the low participation in the previous war was mostly the kingdom’s own fault.

However, there was something that still didn’t make sense to her.

“Why was Father so adamant about this...?” Eldor, the previous king, was firm in his conviction that Masters were very special beings and should never be employed as tools of war. Altimia had heard him say so herself, and she did understand that point of view to a degree.

However, she had no idea how he’d come to have such a deep conviction in the first place. She thought she may be able to figure it out if she followed in Eldor’s footsteps as the acting queen, but she struggled to understand it even now. In fact, after her interactions with Ray and the others, she was even more certain that the cooperation of the Masters in a prospective war was absolutely necessary.

Altimia changed her mind after she came into contact with a particular person... namely, Ray himself.

“...Was Father the same way?” Perhaps Eldor had settled upon his ideas after meeting someone specific as well.

"Maybe I should look into that, too," Altimia said. "Oh dear. Look at the time." It was already dark out, and furthermore it was almost dinnertime.

Altimia had planned to have dinner with Elizabeth and Theresia today. Once the matter of Elizabeth's arranged marriage was settled, she and Altimia had made up; after Elizabeth returned to Altea, all three sisters ate dinner together far more often than they had previously.

Though, perhaps they were simply trying to create memories together before Elizabeth left for Huang He.

The plan was that she and Canglong the Third Prince of Huang He would leave together the day after the peace talks. That was the final deadline. Even if the talks went badly, Elizabeth would be gone before the War Boundary would activate.

Although, if Altimia was assassinated during the talks, Elizabeth would become the heir to the kingdom's throne. That would most definitely change the manner in which Altar and Huang He would be united.

Everything depended on how the peace talks actually went in two weeks' time. In the meantime, Altimia did whatever she could — even considering scenarios where she herself died.

"Your Highness, are you here?"

There was a sudden knock on the office's door. The person responsible for the knock was none other than Altimia's confidant — Marquis Findle.

"Yes," Altimia answered. "You may enter."

"Pardon the intrusion." Marquis Findle had a single letter in hand.

"What is that?"

"It is a letter for you. The sender is... Lady Integra."

The name shocked Altimia into slightly widening her eyes.

Integra.

Integra Sedna Clarice.

She was an apprentice of the Arch Sage who'd died in the previous war... The last of them all, in fact.

Though she was the youngest of the apprentices, the Arch Sage had recognized her talent, and she learned much from him. Her ability certainly surpassed that of his many other apprentices, and two years ago, as a last task from the Arch Sage, she'd left on a journey across the seven countries. Because of this, she hadn't been present at the battle against Gloria which killed all her fellow apprentices, nor did she participate in the war that killed the Arch Sage.

Unfortunately, Altimia didn't have any means to contact Integra as she traveled the world. In fact, she didn't even know if Integra was alive... but now, she'd received a letter from her.

After pondering for a moment, Altimia took the letter from Marquis Findle.

To Altimia, Integra was like Liliana — one of her few close friends. However, the kingdom's situation had changed drastically over the past two years, and her fellow apprentices as well as her mentor were now gone. That fact made Altimia a bit afraid of seeing the letter's contents.

Regardless, Altimia gathered her resolve and broke the seal to see what was written within.

"...Eh?"

What she read in that letter was something she could have never expected.

"I, Integra Sedna Clarice, have succeeded my mentor and become the Arch Sage. Upon returning to the kingdom, I wish to serve Her Highness Altimia Azurite Altar just as my mentor did."

◇◇◇

Death Soldier, Ray Starling

"Man, what now...?" After finding out that Golden Pirates had disbanded, I spent a lot of time pondering: would it be best to just join Miss Eldritch's Lunar Society, or keep searching to find a better option?

"It would be great if you had some other clan you could get into... but that seems unlikely," said Nemesis.

"Yeah... I don't exactly have connections in a lot of ranking clans."

There were some clans out there recruiting "mercenaries" — essentially, temporary members kept on-hand in case a war broke out. One of these was the AETL Union — the second in the rankings.

As high as it was, though, it didn't have many stand-out members like The Lunar Society's Miss Eldritch or K&R's Kashimiya and Rosa. They just had so many members, second only to The Lunar Society.

The clan itself was... basically a fanclub. It was dedicated to the three princesses of the kingdom, as well as Liliana — who, as Shu once said, enjoyed great popularity even among tians.

The clan known as AETL Union was a combination of their fanclubs for all four of them — it even took its title from the first letter of the princesses' and Liliana's names. Since their goal was, above all, to protect their favorite girls, they actually allowed anyone to temporarily join them in case of war.

They were actually the largest Master faction that had participated in the last war, and some thought they were the major reason Altar avoided complete destruction. AETL Union had always declared that if war broke out again, they would return to the battlefield with the same vigor as last time.

Since my goal was basically the same, I'd actually gone to them before I considered the Golden Pirates, but...

"...AETL Union didn't let me in, huh?"

"That was... well..."

The main reason for my rejection was that video of the incident in Gideon that Franklin had broadcast In it, I was shown fighting alongside Sir Lindos and... yes, Liliana.

After I defeated RSK, Liliana had even nursed me to health.

That seemed to have made them really upset.

I talked directly to the clan's sub-leader — the head of Liliana's fanclub — and he said, "You fought with Lady Liliana and even had her take care of you... You're just too close to her! And that intense expression on her face as she cared for you... GHAAAHHH! I'll never let you in! In fact, I'd rather spit in your face!"

"Fanclubs truly hate anyone who actually gets ahead, don't they..." Nemesis noted.

"It probably depends on the fanclub..." Still, AETL Union wasn't an option.

Well, the fact that they didn't assassinate me outright told me that they were still somewhat reasonable people, at least. Maybe they'd let me in if I asked again...?

"Wait, you're also close to Azurite," said Nemesis. "Joining AETL Union is simply impossible for you, don't you think?"

"...Oh yeah."

"...You even went to a mixed bath with her."

“...You better keep that a secret.” If they found out about that, I’d definitely be as good as dead.

Yeah... as things were, I had to give up on AETL Union.

“...The Lunar Society would probably let me in, huh?” After all, their leader once had me kidnapped just so she could force me to join her clan. If I went to them and actually asked to get in, she wouldn’t even think twice about it.

However, the problem was what came after. I’d only be joining The Lunar Society to participate in the war — as just a mercenary, basically. Alas, it seemed likely that they wouldn’t just let me walk away afterwards. Miss Eldritch would make up all sorts of reasons why I couldn’t be allowed to escape.

This was made even worse by the fact that we were acquainted in real life. It was just impossible for me to get away from her.

Still... Not participating in the war at all was completely out of the question. If the peace talks went awry, war was inevitable. Azurite, Liliana... the fates of many of my friends would hang in the balance, and not being there would leave a really bad taste in my mouth.

“...I really don’t have a choice, huh?” Well, we all had to make sacrifices every now and then.

Even if it was roughly equivalent to leaping into a lion’s den, I had to join The Lunar Society.

But how could I break this to my party...?

“Hm? Well, if it aIn’t Ray? WhAt are ya broOdin’ over?”

As I gathered my resolve and stepped forward, I ran into a familiar person with a voice and height that really stood out from the crowd... Xunyu.

She was holding a cup of Shu’s popcorn in her hand.

...I’m impressed that she can eat popcorn with those claws, I thought.

“Xunyu...”

“Seriously, what’s wrOng? You look like yOu’re about to get naked, tAke off your metal accessOries, chUg some vinEgar, cover yourself in sAlt, run through the doOr, and never come bAck.”

...I was struggling to even picture that kind of scene.

Also, did I really look that bad?

“C’mon, tell mE what happened. I’ll give yOu advice like thE good buddy I am.”

“Xunyu...” She was so dependable... especially for a grade school kid.

“Well...” I told her what happened and that I was actually about to turn to The Lunar Society for help.

Upon hearing that, Xunyu tilted her head.

“Hey, why’rE ya goin’ to The Lunar Society?” she asked.

“Because I don’t have connections in any other ranked clans.”

“That’s nOt what I’m asking,” she said before falling silent for a moment...

“Why nOt just make yoUr own clan?”

...And then saying something surprising.

“...Our own clan?” I felt like it was way too late for a new clan to make it into the rankings.

“A clan you’re in woUld attract the bear likE honey, and the PKs in your pArty would follow yOu too, right? And if yoU and the beAr are bOth in, Figaro will fOllow, and then Hannya’ll comE after her hubby. You cAn probably also grab sOme duel rankers who got nothin’ bEtter to do. A lineUp like that’d make it in the rAnkings, wouldn’t it? Quality ovEr quantity and all that.”

I was speechless. That idea had never crossed my mind.

Though lacking in number, many of the people I knew were powerful, experienced, and well-established. Since clan ranking was depending on completed quests and their difficulty... it wasn’t impossible that a team made up of them would make it in the rankings.

“HonestlY, I think your brOther’s prEsence alone would gEt you on the board,” Xunyu added. “He probAbly has enough quest pOints for that.”

I was about to argue with her, but I remembered that Shu told me that he had cleared many high-difficulty quests — difficulty ten included. And on top of that, he did them either alone or in a small group.

In that case, Xunyu's estimate didn't actually seem unlikely.

"...Thanks, Xunyu," I said. "I'll talk to my group about it."

I can't have imagined what would've happened if Miss Eldritch turned out to be my only option, but I now saw a glimmer of hope. I had nothing but gratitude to Xunyu for showing it to me.

"You're treating that woman like the physical manifestation of despair. Even I feel a bit sorry for her, but I suppose your experience with her was just that rough..." Nemesis remarked. Abduction and confinement definitely qualified as "rough," yeah.

"Well, anywAy, good luck with thE peace talks or wAr or whatever stuff gOes on here," Xunyu said.

"Speaking of which, what are you gonna do?" I asked.

"I ain't joinin' the rEtinue. I still gotta prOtect Cang, and hell, thoUgh I get particIpating in a war as a mErc, it'll caUse problEms to hAve a foreign Master amOng the bodyguards at a peAce talk, won't it? It'll mAke it look like yoU want to fight, and the mOod of the place woUld turn all sour."

"...Good point." Although I was looking for a clan to make sure I could participate in the war, there was no guarantee that it would actually happen. It was still possible that the peace talks would go off without a hitch. Xunyu was actually being very considerate in that regard.

"And thEn... it'll all depEnd on how the peAce talks go," she continued. "If therE's a war, I'll have to negotiAte with the first princEss again. If there's nO war, I'll just go bAck to Huang He with Cang."

"I see," I said. "I'll be sad to see you go."

"Hey, yoU can always just comE visit Huang He. Just so yoU know, it's a toUrist paradise with lOts to see."

"Huang He, huh...?" I couldn't really leave Altar for the time being, but maybe I could go visit some other countries once things calmed down here. Shu said that he'd traveled a lot, and I'd be lying if I said I didn't want to try that.

"...I'd love to visit Huang He, actually."

"I'll show yoU around whEn ya do."

"I'll be counting on you, then." And so, Xunyu and I parted ways.

However, a short while later, a question popped into my mind.

If the kingdom hired Xunyu... who would act as Canglong's bodyguard on his way back home?

◇

After parting ways with Xunyu, I went straight to where my party was waiting for me and reported that The Golden Pirates had disbanded. I then told them I was thinking of getting into the rankings by making a new clan with us and Shu, among others.

B3 responded with, "I guess it's possible that we'd make it in. Though I'd need to know how many points your brother has."

You could always check your own points in the records window, and we could gauge our eligibility by comparing our combined points with what her clan had when it was still active. However, B3 also said that since a lot of clans were gathering mercenaries to get themselves onto the rankings, we would probably need more points than Mad Castle used to have.

I had to know if Shu was up for this, among other things, so I went ahead and contacted him. After checking my friend list to confirm that he was online, I used my Telepathy Cuffs to call him.

When I told him we were thinking of creating a clan, he immediately asked me where we were. I told him the name of the establishment, and it only took him about thirty minutes to arrive.

"Beary sorry for the wait."

"Woow! Ray! It's been so loong!"

...As it turns out, he was accompanied by a familiar face.

"Lei-Lei?!" Lei-Lei, the Prodigal of Feasts. She was the kingdom's fourth Superior, and I hadn't seen her since the welcome party on my first ever day in Dendro.

The fact that she'd spiked my drink still came back to me every now and then — mostly when I was drinking something.

Lei-Lei had a reputation for rarely coming online, and she didn't seem to have a set pattern to her login times. Why was she here now...?

"Lei-Lei and I went on a quest together fur the first time in awhile," said Shu.

"The past few times I could manage to come online recently, Shu was busy making popcorn, so this was our first co-op gig in a long time." Oh yeah — Shu had told me they'd been questing every now and then.

I never expected them to be doing that today, though...

My party was also very surprised to encounter a Superior who was such a rare sight.

"So... let's talk about that clan," said Shu.

"Ah... yeah," I said, after I'd recovered from the shock.

Shu, Lei-Lei, and I sat at the same table, and I explained our current situation.

"I see," said Shu. "Well, you beary much did the right thing by not letting yourself end up in debt to the fox." I nodded at him. I looked at B3, who pondered for a bit, but then nodded herself in agreement.

"Well, furst, let's start by addressing the points we'll need to get into the clan rankings. Here's how much I've got."

Shu opened his records window and showed us. He had several more digits than me, but I didn't know if it was enough to enter the rankings. I looked at B3, and noticed that her eyes were wide open.

"Umm, how does it look...?" I asked her.

"...He has... over twice what our entire clan had before disbanding," she answered. The rest of us were all lost for words.

B3's Mad Castle was a famous Altarian PK clan, and though they'd ultimately lost against the overwhelming force that was Figaro, they certainly weren't short on both quantity and quality of players. They must've completed a huge amount of quests and accumulated an enormous number of points, yet Shu here had over double that just by himself.

...I once again became aware of just how absurd Superiors were.

"...This is more than enough, even considering how many points other clans will be getting by taking on mercenaries," B3 added.

"I see..." I said. It was now clear that we'd make it into the rankings with just Shu on our side.

"Yeah. My name's enough to carry you into the rankings," he said. "But befur that, I have a question for you."

The air around him seemed to have changed suddenly, but I was the only one who seemed to notice. It must've been a pretty minor change that only I could pick up on.

"...What is it?" I asked.

"The day you first logged in, you said that you'd be gunning fur a spot in the rankings." ...Yeah, I could remember myself saying something like that, and even making a goal of it. However, on that very same day, I got the death penalty — and realized how powerless I was. Nemesis and I recovered from that defeat, and that moment served as our starting point before going on to be swept up in all kinds of events.

Still, that didn't change the fact that my overall goal was getting into the rankings.

"If you make a clan now and I join it, you will definitely get in the rankings," he continued. "Even if I didn't join, you could probably manage just with all your friends. Honestly, even if that wasn't enough either, you could beary easily gather mercs with just your name and some pocket money."

I hadn't realized it until now, but he was right — there was a solution available even if I didn't get his help.

"But... will you be able to live with that?" he asked.

I pondered this.

"You think you can bear to become a ranker thanks to others instead of your own merits...? Won't that leave a bad taste in your mouth? More importantly, do you actually have the resolve to found a clan that has me as a member?" He was talking with the same jovial tone as usual, but I could tell that he was completely serious.

His question made me think about the fact that I was actually about to become a ranker.

I was pretty sure that clan rankings weren't what I'd had in mind back when I said that I wanted to do this. I thought I was going to increase my power and get into either the kill or duel rankings.

However, I had basically no chance of entering the rankings based on kill count, and I had neither the time nor the ability to become a proper duelist. The only way I'd ever become a ranker would be through clan rankings, and that was well within my reach. I could get there by either forming my own clan or joining Tsukuyo Fuso's.

Some would see this as relying too much on other people, and I could understand that point of view. The person I was back when I'd decided on this goal certainly wouldn't be satisfied with this state of affairs.

However...

Not saying a word, I looked at Nemesis. She also said nothing, telepathically or otherwise. She was just looking straight at me.

"...Yeah," I said. "I already have my answer."

I closed my eyes, let out a breath... and looked right into Shu's eyes, beneath the costume.

"...You're not wrong, Shu. Back when I set this goal, I probably didn't think that I'd become a ranker like this."

Like he said, changing my ultimate goal like this did leave a bad taste in my mouth. He knew me better than anyone, so definitely could say that about me.

"But as I am now... that would be a huge mistake."

All of that wasn't important to me anymore. My perspective then and my perspective now were just too different. Only about two months separated those two perspectives, but the weight of those two months was immense.

"By limiting myself to my old goals, I'd be unable to do anything for the kingdom... for Azurite," I spoke the name of my friend. "That would leave an even worse taste in my mouth. I just can't do that."

As I was now, I could clearly see what I had to prioritize.

"I'll seize this possibility with all my heart." I was willing to do whatever it took to achieve the things I desired.

Also, I didn't actually think doing this meant I relied too much on other people.

"Whether it's you, my party, or my friends... I'll make a clan with anyone who's willing to join me and become a ranker through that." Their power was their own, but the very fact that we were now united was the result of all the time we'd spent and the memories we made, as the person I'd been slowly transformed into the person I was now.

"I will proudly state that these bonds are part of my power, and I will wield them to fight alongside Azurite." The person I was now had already decided to give everything he had to face the challenges ahead and seize hold of that possibility.

"That... is the choice I've made!"

We were going to make a clan and enter the rankings. This was the path I chose, and I would never regret it.

Silence filled the entire establishment.

Shu, Nemesis... no one said a single word as time slowly ticked onwards.

Amidst this stillness, Shu slowly opened his mouth.

“You pass,” he said, and I felt like he was smiling under his costume. “I’ll pledge my name and power to your clan, O fearless leader.”

“Thanks Sh—... Huh?” As I thanked him, I realized what he just said.

“Leader? ...Me?”

“Well, yeah. Fur sure. Your clan’ll get my name in the roster, but it’ll be your clan. That makes you the clan leader, right?”

...Right. I’d resolved to make a clan, but I hadn’t yet thought about who would lead it.

I looked at my party, and B3 slowly nodded.

“This party, King of Destruction, and anyone else you would invite — they’d all be joining because of you. It wouldn’t make sense for anyone else to be the leader.”

“Yes. Exactly,” Marie agreed.

“Well, it’d attract weirdos because birds of a feath—... Ahem... I mean, you’ll have really diverse members because of your popularity,” Rook said. So they wanted me to be the leader too, huh...?

“You’re the only one fit to lead this clan,” said B3.

“...All right,” I replied. I clearly had no choice, so I just gathered my resolve. If I shrunk back from this, I wouldn’t be able to keep going forward and seize that possibility I wanted. “I... I will become the clan leader.”

The moment I said that, Nemesis started clapping. She was soon joined by Shu, Rook, Marie, B3, Lei-Lei, and...

“...Hold on! Is everyone here clapping?!” I just realized that I’d made that whole speech while everyone in the place was staring at me.

...I was reminded of that moment at the fountain, back when I got the death penalty for the first time.

...Man, is this embarrassing, I thought.

“Heheheh,” Shu chuckled. “I only asked fur your motivations because I didn’t want to hand you my name fur free. But I’m satisfied. That declaration was beary fiery.”

That was your whole reason for asking?!

“Heheh,” Nemesis chuckled smugly. “Getting all fired up when it matters is one of his good points, Brother Bear.”

“I know.”

"Don't just say something like that! You're making this even more embarrassing!" My reaction made everyone around burst out laughing.

"Yep-yep! What a good conclusion!" said Lei-Lei, who was laughing particularly loudly. "Oh, and if you're making a clan, I'm joining too!"

"HUH?" Those words made everyone — even Shu — doubt what we were hearing.

◇◇◇

Gideon the Duel City

After that exchange, the group hurried to submit the clan formation registration. They had to hurry, because there was really no telling when Lei-Lei could make it online again.

The founding of country-affiliated clans and addition of new members could be handled in country-affiliated adventurer guilds, so that was where they were heading.

Ray's party chatted amongst themselves about the new clan, while Shu and Lei-Lei lagged behind, walking together some distance back from them.

"So, what was that all about, Shu?" Lei-Lei asked, making sure that only Shu heard. "If Ray's response hadn't been what you wanted, you wouldn't have actually joined his clan, would you?"

"...You can tell?"

"I've known you for a pretty long time, after all," she said with a smile.

"I see," Shu nodded in understanding.

Just as she assumed, Ray's response did influence Shu's decision.

There were several reasons for that, and aside from a confirmation of his brother's determination, the main one was that the name of the King of Destruction simply carried far too much weight.

"Clans with Superiors create many enemies," Shu said. Sol Crisis had once tried to gain fame by PKing Ray. This was the same thing, except the scale was orders of magnitude greater. That was just how valuable a Superior's name was.

Ray had already had some unfortunate ties to certain people in Dryfe and was targeted fairly often as a result. Shu was worried that his presence in Ray's new clan would only make things worse.

“That’s also why I was shocked when you said that you were joining too,” said Shu.

“Hey, might as well go all in,” she replied. “Once you’re on board, a second Superior won’t change much, right?”

“...When he recovers, Figaro will likely join too... and then Hannya will follow him.”

“Wow. That makes four Superiors, then.”

“...That would make it the country-affiliated clan with the second-highest amount of Superiors, right under Sefirot. As the leader, Ray would attract even more attention than before.”

“It’d be a whole lot of trouble...”

And despite knowing all this, Shu had decided to join Ray’s clan.

“Still, I heard the resolve in his voice, so there’s nothing more to say. I’ll stand by him as both a clan member and a brother.”

Shu believed that if anyone could face the various troubles approaching them, it would be Ray.

Thus, a new clan was born. Led by the newbie known as Ray Starling, it had the highest number of Superiors among all clans in the three western countries.

Chapter Three: The Fearsome Clan

Altea, The Royal Capital, The Royal Castle

There was only one week left until the peace talks, and Altimia was hard at work in her office preparing for it. She had to make sure the country could survive any eventuality... including her own death.

She could envision three scenarios in which she might die.

One — the peace talks could turn out to be a trap.

Two — the peace talks could be genuine, but go very badly, and a battle would break out right then and there.

Three — a third party might target the talks and interfere.

In scenarios one and two, the war between Dryfe and Altar would resume.

However, it was difficult to predict what would happen in the third scenario. The optimal solution would have to be found by those left behind.

Elizabeth was too young to make such decisions, so Altimia decided to entrust this duty to her confidant, Marquis Findle, and her trusted friend, Liliana. She made sure to specify that she wanted them to act as Elizabeth and Theresia's guardians in the event of her untimely death.

"Integra didn't make it in time..." Integra — Altimia's close friend and the Arch Sage's heir.

Her letter had said that she would be returning, but gave no timeframe. So far, there were no reports of her return to the capital, and the peace talks were just around the corner. By now, Altimia was working with the assumption that Integra would not make it and had prepared for the event without taking her presence into consideration.

As she continued her work, there was a knock on the door.

It turned out to be the royal guard tasked to keep watch outside of the gate. He reported that Ray Starling had arrived, and she told him to let Ray into the office.

Ray had shown up in the capital yesterday, and Altimia had asked him to visit her when he got the chance. As a college student, he returned to his other world — “logged out” — quite often, so she was surprised that he agreed to come the very next day.

“Welcome, Ray and Nemesis. It’s been quite a while,” she said, as they both entered.

“Yeah. It has been, hasn’t it?” Ray replied.

“Last we saw each other was during the Hannya incident,” added Nemesis.

“Indeed. I had lots to do in preparation for the peace talks, so I returned to the capital right away.”

“How’s that going, anyway?”

“Quite well. Everything is more or less settled. At any rate, there are two reasons why I called you here. The first is Silver.”

“Silver?” Ray tilted his head. He hadn’t expected to hear his Prism Steed’s name.

“Apparently, a copy of an original Prism Steed’s design is necessary for the repair operations in Quartierlatin. Second Model Prism Steeds are too simplified to be of use.”

“I see,” said Nemesis. “So some corners were cut, it would seem — that makes sense for mass-produced units.”

“Indeed,” Azurite nodded. “That is why the repair operations require structural data from an original Prism Steed. Mr. Blue Screen is at the workshop here in the capital right now. Could you meet with him later?”

“Sure,” said Ray. “So, what’s the other thing you wanted to talk about?”

“...I have a personal question for you.”

“You do?” Ray wondered what it could possibly be, but Azurite came right out and said it.

“You created a clan, didn’t you?”

“Oh, that. You heard about it already?”

“Yes. It’s quite the talk of the town...”

Altimia fell silent, and her cheeks flushed a bit.

The reason for that was the public statement Ray had supposedly made. Altimia hadn’t heard it personally, but just imagining it was enough to make Altimia turn red.

“Azurite? What’s wrong?” Ray asked.

“...Nothing,” she replied. “More importantly, what members have you gathered?”

“There’s me, Shu, the rest of my party, and Lei-Lei. We also invited some other Masters we know, and three of them agreed to join. That makes nine in total so far.”

As far as clans went, it wasn’t particularly large. However, two of the members were Superiors, and two more were famous player killers, so it was already an extremely noteworthy group.

The other three who’d joined were the three girls Ray’s party occasionally quested with — Kasumi, Fujinon, and Io. Rook had invited Kasumi. Her response was, “Wow... A clan that has Rook, Ray, and even Teacher... That’s incredible...!” and she instantly agreed.

The other two hadn’t hesitated to join, either.

...Kasumi actually fainted when she met the other members, but that was a minor detail.

That was B3’s fault. Unfortunately, she happened to be in Barbaroy mode when Kasumi showed up.

Ray also reached out to duel rankers he often sparred with, but so far, none of them had agreed to join. He’d avoided inviting Riser, though, since he’d been entrusted with the Babylonian Battlegroup — Bishmal, though, outright refused, saying, “I ain’t in a clan, but I’m gonna stand by my buddy Riser!”

Juliet, Chelsea, and Max had all said they’d think about it.

Chelsea was still in a state of shock from her previous clan disbanding, so she couldn’t decide whether or not to enter a new clan at this point; Juliet was so worried about her friend that she also decided not to join yet.

Max, on the other hand, was hesitant because Ray’s clan members were a bit... much.

Chelsea and Juliet said they would give their answers once Chelsea had calmed down a bit, but they still hadn’t decided whether they’d join Ray’s clan or create a new one themselves.

“...Your brother makes perfect sense, but I did not expect to hear Lei-Lei’s name there.” Altimia said.

“I was surprised too,” Ray replied. “Also, Shu said that Figaro and Hannya will probably join, but they’re not in officially yet because they haven’t returned.”

That meant that Ray’s clan would most likely have four Superiors. Altimia didn’t know whether to be shocked or exasperated by that.

"Until recently, I could have never imagined that the kingdom's Superiors would gather under a single flag like this... I suppose we have you to thank for all of this"

"You're the real reason, actually. I decided to make a clan because of you."

He said those words as if they were nothing, but they made Altimia's heart beat faster.

"...You always manage to say something that surprises me."

"Really?"

"Be careful, Azurite," said Nemesis. "He might have a tendency to psych himself up and make impassioned speeches when the chips are down, but he can also drop some truly heart-stopping lines even in normal conversations."

"Indeed he can."

"...Is that what you guys really think of me?" The two looked away from him and fell silent, but that was an answer by itself.

Their attitude actually made Ray feel a little self-conscious, so he lowered the Storm Visage down over his face to disguise his expression. It was impossible to tell whether that was his way of saying that he would pick his words more carefully from now on, or a show of his embarrassment at realizing he put his foot in his mouth more often than he'd thought.

"At any rate, setting aside the matter of your mouth..." Azurite began, "we still need to talk about your clan. I want to know about more than just its roster."

"And that would be?" Ray asked, his voice muffled.

"...Could you please remove that mask?"

"All right. So, what do you wanna know?"

Altimia presented Ray with a document. It was a copy of the current, post-update clan rankings.

"Your clan's name, for one" she said. "The rankings have changed quite drastically, and I cannot tell which one is yours."

"Oh yeah, the rankings are totally different from top to bottom now," Ray said.

There were several reasons for this upheaval. First, the dissolution of clans like Golden Pirates and Mad Castle had left gaps in the rankings.

Second, many clans had been actively recruiting new members and gathering mercenaries in case a war broke out, which had given them enough points to enter the rankings for the first time.

The third reason was the AETL Union's recent split, and subsequent loss of members. The clan was a lot smaller now after Liliana's fanclub had left — and the driving force behind that had largely been Ray's attempt to join. Liliana was Elizabeth's protector, and the fact that the clan's sub-leader had refused Ray entry ended up making the second princess' fanclub upset. "Ray Starling is connected to Liliana, which means we'd practically be one step away from Elizabeth herself! What the hell were you thinking, you dumbass?!" they'd cried.

"Shut up! You brainlets can't possibly understand our feelings!" Liliana's fanclub argued back.

Altimia's fanclub had tried to calm the situation down, while Theresia's fanclub was content to act like it was none of their business.

All this conflict ultimately led to Liliana's fanclub leaving AETL Union and creating a new clan, called Liliana FC. The fact that this splinter clan made it in the rankings all by itself made it clear that AETL Union was a force to be reckoned with.

That also meant AETL Union was now actually just AET Union... even though the names of country-affiliated clans couldn't be changed, so it would officially remain "AETL Union."

That wasn't the only disaster they'd met with, though.

Through DIN, they'd also learned about Elizabeth's wedding and found out that she would be moving to Huang He, which had had an absolutely devastating impact on Elizabeth's fanclub. Some were so shocked that they barely managed to log on, some almost went crazy and got the death penalty from a mysterious sunglasses-wearing PK, and some said "Huang He, huh? That's a bit far, but..." and began preparing to leave Altar. All in all, it was not good.

They'd lost some members because of all this, and had dropped in the rankings.

The only silver lining for them was the fact that they weren't aware of Ray and Altimia's relationship. If Altimia hadn't worn a mask while they were operating together, the clan might've been completely torn apart.

As a result, AETL Union had dropped to 8th in the rankings, compared to Liliana FC at 27th — which was quite bad, considering their previous power.

Now, most would've expected the clan in the 3rd place — K&R — to take the Union's spot, but that wasn't what happened. That was all due to a new clan that hadn't been seen on the list before.

"A great many new clans have made it onto the rankings, but I am particularly concerned about the one in second place," said Altimia.

"Huh? Second?"

"I have never even heard of this clan before, yet it's right behind those Lunar Society people. They must be a very serious threat."

"Umm, Azurite..." Nemesis hesitantly spoke up. "That would be..."

"Their name is disturbingly sinister," Azurite continued. Not saying a word, Ray and Nemesis looked at the list on the table... then they both glanced away.

"Could they be one of those fearsome 'PK clans,' as you Masters call them...?" Altimia asked, and neither of them knew how to answer.

"Uhh... well, in a way, it is, I guess?" said Ray.

"...'PK clan' is certainly apt. Obviously those other two fit the description, but I imagine that Brother Bear and the Chinese snake have killed many, as well."

"I see, Brother Bear and Chinese sn—... what did you just say?" Altimia couldn't help but ask.

After all, "Brother Bear" was how Nemesis referred to Shu, the King of Destruction.

That could only mean that...

"...Azurite," Ray looked into her eyes and finally spoke up. A cold sweat stood out on his face. "The clan in second place... is our clan."

"...Huh?" The answer almost made Altimia's heart stop.

She once again looked at the list, focusing on the second rank.

Listed there was indeed the clan that Ray had made in order to protect Altar and fight alongside Altimia. It was also an extremely powerful clan that currently had two Superiors, would soon have four, and perhaps might gather even more in the future. It was a very special clan, both for Altimia and the entire kingdom.

She hadn't even considered that this second-place clan might've been Ray's. After all, she didn't think that a clan with so few members could possibly make it that high, even if it had Superiors.

More importantly, she hadn't imagined that they would give it such a sinister name.

"...Why that name?"

"...Stuff happened." Ray slowly opened his mouth and began telling the story.

◇◇◇

A Week Ago, Death Soldier, Ray Starling.

It was the fateful day on which I finally founded a clan.

We were going through the clan creation process at the adventurer's guild counter. We didn't have to set a HQ or anything like that yet, so we had no trouble filling out the form... but then came the most troublesome part — actually naming it.

The clan name conveyed its reputation. That made it extremely important, and an important decision is always difficult.

The founding members were all extremely unique people, so there wasn't a lot of overlap in the kind of names we liked.

Even if we could find a name all of us actually agreed on, the well-informed among us would find out that they were already being used by, for example, a ranking Granvaloan clan or a bandit gang that used to operate in Caldina or something like that.

We talked about it for more than an hour, right until the adventurer's guild was about to close.

"I have an idea," B3 said as she adjusted her glasses, the light glinting off them as she did so. "It's the method I used to generate my clan name, and it's a fairly popular one in general, too."

She reached into her inventory, took out a piece of paper, and split it into twelve equal parts.

"The founding members of the clan — the six of us, in this case — each write down a word or phrase on two cards. One card is for the first half of the name, while the other's for the second half. They're then put into two separate boxes. Do we have any handy...?"

"Should I make a couple of the paper boxes I use fur my popcorn?" asked Shu.

“Please do.” Shu reached into his pocket-type inventory and took out some flat paper boxes, along with some tape. As he began folding them into actual boxes, B3 continued.

“The clan’s leader will then pull a card from each box. Then, they’d combine the two cards they’ve drawn, a first half and a last half, and the result is the clan’s name.”

“That’s simple, but I’m intrigued,” said Rook. “I also think it works out well that the leader is the one pulling the cards.”

The rest of the group nodded.

“Yes,” said B3. “It’s an easy, fun way to make a clan name. Lots of famous clans have used it, including my own Mad Castle and, to my knowledge, Goblin Street.”

...So you can make some pretty cool names you’d never have come up with otherwise like this, huh? I thought.

Shu quickly finished making the boxes and everyone began secretly writing down their contributions. Personally... I decided to pick positive words. Thus, I put “Life” for my first half, and “Guard” for the second.

“Life Guard” sounded like the pretty mundane profession, but the chances of me pulling both of my own cards was low, and on their own, the words could potentially combine well with a lot of different things.

Eventually, we all finished writing and put the cards in the correct boxes. Nemesis then shook the box for the first half, while Babi did the same for the other one, mixing up the cards inside. Only members could write the words, so we left the Embryos in charge of the shuffling.

Finally, the preparation was done.

“I’ll start.” Everyone focused on me as I pulled out a card from the box for the first half.

Tense, I looked at what was written on it.

“...Eh?” The word on it was... Death — the opposite of what I’d written on my first card.

The extremely ominous word made me fall completely silent. No one else said anything, either. They were all just staring at the second box.

Honestly, I felt like this was already a failure, but I pulled out the second card regardless.

On it, there was the word “Period.”

I put the words together, creating “Death Period.”

“What kinda combination is this?!” I exclaimed.

Both words just mean some kind of ending! This clan ended before it even began! It’s way worse than any PK clan name! I thought.

“...Amazing how you pulled something so... intense... on your first try,” said Nemesis.

“Hey, this is a bit...” This was supposed to be a clan that would protect the kingdom during the upcoming war. With a name like that, you’d think we were Altar’s worst nightmare. I wasn’t sure about all this...

“...I like it.”

...B3? I thought.

“This clan name is awesome! I mean, I’m the one who put ‘Death’ in there, but I never would’ve imagined we’d get a combo like that!”

Hold on a second, Death Shadow, Marie Adler.

“Ohh, now that just rocks! I love names like that!”

Lei-Lei, why are you so excited?

“As fur as I know, there’s no famous clan with that name.”

Well, that’s important, but...

“I’m the one who put in ‘Period,’” said Rook. “If you interpret it as ‘a full stop on unnecessary death,’ it really seems to suit your clan, don’t you think?”

He wore a smile that showed he honestly believed every word he was saying.

“Well, if you read it like that, then, I guess...”

“...From that point of view, your ‘Life’ suggestion would have been catastrophic,” said Nemesis. “‘Life Period — a full stop on life,’ Now that was a PK clan name if I ever saw one.”

“I guess this is a case of the negative of a negative being a positive,” I said.

“Ha ha ha! It suits this bunch beary well,” said Shu, and everyone nodded in agreement.

Anyway, all the members seemed to like the name.

...I still found it a bit unsettling, but I could deal with it if I looked at it the same way Rook did.

“All right,” I said. “The name of our clan will be... Death Period.”

And so, it was decided.

...But it really does sound kinda sinister, huh?

Interlude: The Imperium’s Preparations

A Certain Location in the Imperial Capital, Vandelheim

Three days remained until the peace talks, and it wasn’t just the kingdom of Altar that was busy with preparations for the momentous event.

By now it was well known in the imperium that the imperator’s little sister, Claudiah, would be representing him; just like Altar, Dryfe was gathering Masters to act as her retinue — and one Master was more enthusiastic about this particular quest than the others.

That day, Zeta was at the castle — specifically, in the room she was borrowing for the time being. Safely inside this personal space of hers, she was practicing how to prepare proper coffee. Zeta knew that Sechs, the leader of Illegal Frontier, was a coffee aficionado, so she’d begun learning how to make it herself. She’d found out about his taste for it when he wrote her an email saying that he’d become so good at preparing coffee that even Gerbera had found it delicious. Reading that had actually made Zeta somewhat jealous of the girl.

However, since Zeta wasn’t terribly good at picking up on nuances of taste, she couldn’t quite tell whether her coffee was up to standard or not. She finally decided she could judge it by smell, at least, but when she brought her nose close to the cup...

“Zeta! I’m going to the peace talks! The Unbreakable is gonna be there too!”

...A red-haired, fine-looking man threw open the door without so much as a knock.

The momentum of the opening door shook the entire room. The black coffee that Zeta held in front of her face splashed out of the cup, right on the bandages on her face.

There were now dark polka dots on the previously immaculate white fabric.

“Ah...” The man who’d entered the room — Logan Goddhart — realized what he’d done, but instead of apologizing, he just froze in place.

“Hhaah...” Zeta sighed, putting away the coffee cup and removing her bandages as if it was nothing.

Brown skin, red eyes, a young and pretty appearance... her face was fully exposed now, but Zeta didn’t seem to mind. She merely took some spare bandages out of her inventory and began to replace the ones she’d removed.

This was the first time Logan had ever seen her face. It left him speechless, but not because he was enchanted by it or anything. He was just wondering why she would expose it so casually after hiding it all this time, and he felt as though he’d seen that face somewhere. The recollection was rather vague, though. He certainly hadn’t seen it in person before, but he was sure he’d caught a glimpse of it in some photo or video.

However, before Logan could remember anything more about it, Zeta finished replacing her bandages and called out to him.

“Suggestion,” she said. “Should be a must from now on. Also, you should watch your strength when opening doors”

“O-Okay. Sure,” Logan could do nothing but nod.

“Matter at hand. What business do you have? You mentioned the peace talks and The Unbreakable.”

“Y-Yeah! Zeta! I’m going to the peace talks! I’m gonna beat The Unbreakable and clear my name!”

“Refusal.” Zeta shot down his idea with a single word. She didn’t even bother with an explanation this time.

“Wh-Why?!” Logan asked. “That build you suggested to me is super powerful! There’s no way I can lose against that newbie! Hell, I could take on all of Altar’s Superiors now!”

“Discrepancy,” Zeta answered. “There is a discrepancy in your stated goal. It is possible that the peace talks will lead to battle — but officially, it is not part of the premise.”

“But it’s obviously gonna happen, right?”

“Unclear. That depends on how the talks proceed. Also... should you not focus on raising your level and gathering sacrifices? You are not even level 500 any longer.”

“Ghh...” Zeta was right — at the moment, Logan’s level was in the 300s.

Part of the reason for this was Zeta, but ultimately, Logan only had himself to blame.

Zeta had presented him with a build that took full advantage of his Superior Embryo, Rumpelstiltskin. It was the best build she could devise for him, and Logan fully agreed with her assessment.

In fact, he agreed with it too much.

In his haste to finish Zeta's suggested build as quickly as possible, Logan had reset all of his jobs aside from his main, Hell General, and replaced them with the low-tier jobs necessary for the build. That greatly reduced his level, and spring break was over for him by that point, so he hadn't had the time to regain his lost levels yet after going back to school.

"Word of warning," said Zeta. "It is dangerous for you to go as you are. You still are not prepared to use this new strategy, and with your level, Altar's High Prieste—"

"Don't worry! Your build is a seriously real masterpiece! Level doesn't even matter! Though, just in case, I'll only go after raising my level to 500!"

"Insufficient. That will not be eno—"

"I have been reborn! Watch and witness the power of Hell General, Logan Goddhart! HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH!" Laughing uproariously, Logan left the room.

"Uninformed... He does not listen to other people and is slow to process information. Based on his statements, he probably does not even know that Ray Starling created a clan full of Superiors."

Zeta wondered if it would be good to teach him about the importance of gathering information, but she felt that he might become too concerned with the information he had and act on his own more than he ought to. So for now, she decided against it.

She then closed the still-open door and folded her arms before starting to ponder.

"...Curious." Her current thoughts were somewhere along the lines of, Is that boy really that stupid?

She'd known he was overconfident and particularly demented for someone his age — but after she'd started teaching him, he seemed to have become downright reckless. However, that could very well have been because his pride had been shattered by Ray Starling, Franklin, then Zeta herself, all in a short period of time.

Or perhaps the new build and strategy she'd provided had gone to his head? Even Zeta herself would have described it as "extremely effective while still only requiring the level of thought that Logan was capable of before his losing streak."

For a Superior, Logan was really lacking in adaptability and player skill, and her build had accounted for that while making him as powerful as possible.

Fortunately, Logan himself seemed to really like it.

He liked it a bit too much, in fact — seeing how quickly he accepted Zeta's suggestion and how he'd rushed to make the switch.

Although warped and broken, Logan seemed to trust Zeta, at least. He might've come here to report his next endeavor to the person he could call a teacher.

He really ought to work on his listening skills, though, since he seemed determined to completely ignore her warning.

"...Unease." That single word summed up her feelings about Logan's attendance at the peace talks. If it was just a question of him losing another battle, it wouldn't be that important — but it wasn't out of the question that he'd launch a surprise attack on Altar's forces, ruin the peace talks, get himself onto Dryfe's wanted list, and end up in gaol.

That wasn't the only thing she was uneasy about, though.

She was also worried about the fact that she definitely wouldn't be there herself — meaning that she had no way to stop him. Though, depending on her actions, there may end up being no need to stop him in the first place.

"Time. I should go too," she whispered as she gazed at the vista outside.

Her room was on the south side of the castle, so she had an excellent view in the direction of Altar. There, she saw the Border Mountain Belt, home of the skydragons. However, she seemed to be focused on something beyond it.

◆◆◆

Vandelheim Outskirts, Triangle of Wisdom Headquarters

As an R&D group, the Triangle of Wisdom operated several testing areas. They used them to evaluate new Magingear models and add-ons, and the areas would be active day and night, as there were members of the clan online more or less all the time.

In one of their particularly large outdoor testing areas, they were trying out something rarely seen here — a bunch of tanks.

As the creators of humanoid Magingears, the Triangle of Wisdom rarely used the “old-fashioned” sort of tank. A few members customized them as a curiosity, but that was about it.

However, at the moment there were several tanks of the same model, all erratically moving around the test area and occasionally firing their guns.

This unusual sight was being observed by ToW members, as well as two men who were standing together some distance away.

One was a spectacled man in a lab coat — someone who looked like a classic mad scientist. The other was dressed in a worn military uniform. He had an unshaven face and a cigarette in his mouth, which gave him the air of a stereotypical delinquent soldier.

“The peace talks are in three days, huh?” said the man in the lab coat.

“Did ya hear? Logan’s gonna join as a bodyguard,” the soldier said.

“Bodyguard, eh? That doesn’t suit His Excellency at all. I think he’ll abandon that job and attack Ray Starling.”

“...I can see that, yeah. Better hope the beasty lady can hold ’im back.”

“The King of Beasts has some personal business of her own. I’m not sure if she’ll have time for His Excellency.”

The two men were Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin and King of Chariots, Murdoch Martinez — a peculiar Master who held the rank of captain in the imperium’s army.

“Don’t ya have some business with Ray Starling too?” Murdoch asked.

“I do... I really do,” Franklin answered. His expression didn’t change, but Murdoch could sense that the atmosphere around was different.

“Ya heard he made a clan?”

“Of course. Oh, how I laughed at all of that. The fact that he made a clan, its name, and even the ranking... I just completely lost it. I’d say I haven’t laughed like that in a long time, but I’d be lying.”

Shortly before Ray had made his clan, Franklin read some documents about an incident in Caldina — and the fact that, by some twist of fate, two people he knew very well were somehow together now had made him burst into laughter.

“You okay with stayin’ behind when Ray Starling’s gonna be there?”

“I am. The ace up my sleeve still needs some final adjustments. Also, I'm planning to break Ray Starling regardless of whether the outcome is war or unification," Franklin chuckled. "As I'm sure you're well aware, conflicts between Masters aren't a crime."

"I see. So ya basically handed this chance to Logan on a silver platter, huh?"

"I guess you could say that. Though, looking at the participants, I'm not sure how useful he'll be."

"Hm?"

"With His Excellency and the others, the retinue'll be impressive, but honestly, I feel like anyone besides King of Beasts is overkill... or more like, useless."

The two knew that Behemot, Logan, and many other Masters would go to the peace talks, while King of Thieves, Zeta would operate as part of some other plot.

Franklin and Murdoch would not be participating, however. They would stay behind to protect the imperium on the off chance that Caldina would use the peace talks as an opportunity to make their move against Dryfe.

Caldina, though, had its own share of problems. From what they knew, the country was in the midst of a chaotic situation surrounding UBM orbs that had leaked in from Huang He.

"Oh, right," said Franklin, remembering something. "Take this."

"Is this a... newspaper?"

"It's the latest info on Caldina I bought from DIN." The front page article was titled "WAR BETWEEN CALDINA AND GRANVALOA?!" and the photo attached showed a building engulfed in flames.

It read as follows: "Treasurebeast Orbs have been stolen from Huang He's treasury and taken to various areas in Caldina, where they caused all sorts of turmoil. They even recently led to direct armed conflict between Caldina and Granvaloa. The seafaring country has dispatched four Superiors to Caldina's territory: Miroslava Swampman, the 'Charm of Land and Sea'; the Edwards spouses, the 'Avowed'; and Antimicrobic Soy Sauce, the 'Human Bomb'; Their goal is believed to be the Treasurebeast Orb, which possesses the ability to transform water into dry land. Caldina responded to this invasion by mobilizing Sefirot to deal with the situation."

Reading all that made the cigarette drop from Murdoch's mouth.

"...Over half of The Great Seven Embryos of Granvaloa? Are they insane?" he asked.

"Not in the slightest," Franklin responded. "After all, that orb they mentioned is really bad news for Granvaloa."

"What...? Ohh, I get it," Murdoch said after a moment of thought. "Caldina's got The Earth. Like Legendaria, Granvaloa has a geographical advantage. They keep the other countries in check by surroundin' them from the sea — so in their eyes, a thing that turns water into land? Caldina ain't allowed to have that."

With such an artifact, Granvaloa could have the territory that they so desired. However, the risks might outweigh the rewards. Caldina's Magical Apex might acquire the orb and invade by turning water into land, so Granvaloa had to secure the orb at all costs... or at least destroy it and make sure that a non-Caldinian Master defeated that UBM.

"They're basically doing the same thing we did in the ruins of Quartierlatin," said Franklin. "Granvaloa is a lot more serious, though."

Like the name suggested, The Great Seven Embryos of Granvaloa included seven Superiors. Only four of them had been dispatched on this mission, but it wasn't because they believed that four would be enough. It's just that these were the only four who could fully use their powers even on land. In other words, they'd actually sent all the Superiors they could muster.

"...With all that goin' on, Caldina's gotta focus on their own turf, huh?" said Murdoch.

"Well, Caldina can't just break the orb and have The Earth kill the UBM. The orbs are Huang He's national treasures, so they'd only be making a new enemy. Their relations with Huang He are already strained because of the orb that broke during the incident at Cortana, so if they break one on purpose, everything would fall apart."

Caldina might have had the option of breaking it before, but now that Granvaloa was invading, it was an extremely difficult choice to make.

Granvaloa, on the other hand, would much rather break the orb and make an enemy of Huang He than lose their greatest line of defense — the sea.

And if that wasn't enough to cause chaos in Caldina, there was more. Rumor had it that even Legendaria had infiltrated the country to secure new orbs. Caldina, at the moment, was a volatile powder keg that a single spark could set off.

“If Huang He and Caldina become enemies as well, the two of us might be relieved of our guard duty and sent off to attack Caldina.” In other words, it was possible they weren’t staying behind as a safeguard against an invasion by Caldina, but to keep them on standby for an invasion of Caldina. That was certainly well within the planning abilities of the current imperator.

In fact, their ruler was probably spinning a multitude of strategies in his head at this very moment.

“...By the way, prof — did ya get the list of demands for the peace talks?” Murdoch asked.

“Not yet,” Franklin shook his head. “Though, I heard of a particular demand related to us.”

“Eh? What’s that?”

“One of the demands is...”

Franklin proceeded to tell Murdoch one of the demands that would be offered in the peace talks, and all the tanks in the test area suddenly stopped firing. Those words, meant only for Murdoch himself, made him break out in a cold sweat.

“...Man,” Murdoch mouthed in shock. “You think so too, huh, Captain? I know that His Majesty loves to strategize... but this, combined with the actions of you-know-who — it almost starts to look a little too ballsy. Prof, can ya hurry up with the tank mass production? I’ll increase your pay by twenty percent,” Murdoch added as he pointed at the tanks rolling to and fro.

“I can increase the production speed if I gather volunteer clan members, but... are you sure about this? It’s coming out of your pocket, not clan funds, right?”

“That’s fine. This is all just revving up for a good time, anyway. Also...” he said as he took a drag on his cigarette and grinned. “Fights and parties are both best when they’re flashy. Especially if you’re up against a goddamn land battleship.”

“Oh? You think so too, huh?”

“Fightin’ Caldina’s Rainbow might be fun too, though,” Murdoch said, his face showing an obvious joy that didn’t mesh with his rugged soldier appearance. “Though, I don’t really care if we’re throwin’ down with them or the kingdom. I'll be satisfied as long as there's war with a lotta smoke, big booms, and scrap."

In Franklin's mind, this man, who waited for war with excitement, was a true ludo. He was far less warped than Logan used to be, but anyone who actually looked forward to war had to be either a complete psychopath or someone who clearly saw Dendro as a game — an exciting experience that let you fight on the frontlines without the risk of death.

To him, this was a space in which he could sacrifice everything to satisfy his adventurous spirit.

However, that was... sane.

Compared to Franklin, who never hesitated to trample his enemies underfoot and spared no expense to reach his goals, Murdoch was an extremely sane, healthy, and perhaps even wholesome kind of player.

"Let's do our best in the war," said Franklin. "Even though I have no idea who we'll end up fighting."

"Yeah," nodded Murdoch. "Let's do our best."

Franklin wanted to settle the score with his nemesis.

Murdoch wanted a battlefield that would stir his heart.

These two Superiors, worlder and ludo, waited for the moment when their wishes would be fulfilled.

"By the way, His Excellency isn't the only unusual participant in the peace talks. There's another one."

"And who's that?"

"The strongest non-Superior in Dryfe."

"...Seriously?"

Chapter Four: The Rabbit Skips Through the Darkness

Royal Capital Altea

It was now two nights before the peace talks. The Masters who'd taken up the position of bodyguard were still free to do whatever they wanted.

Those involved could be generally categorized into two groups.

One group of Masters would join Altimia the following morning and act as her bodyguards on the road to the peace talks, which would be taking place at the Altar-Dryfe border. They were able to do this because they had a lot of free time in real life — maybe they'd been laid off, or something similar.

The other group consisted of the Masters who would go straight to the border. They would also be participating in the peace talks, but their real life schedule prohibited them from traveling there alongside Altimia for the entire way, so they would instead meet up with everyone else at a settlement near the border.

"All right, Riser — let's check out one more place!"

"You're drinking too much, Bishmal. We've got bodyguard duty tomorrow, remember?"

Masked Riser and Bishmal — the sixth and seventh on the kingdom's duel rankings — had also answered the call, and they would be part of the first group. They had already left Gideon — their Dendro hometown — and arrived at the capital, where they (mostly Bishmal, actually) were sampling the local bars.

Bishmal clung to Riser's shoulder as they walked through the lively downtown area.

"Hahahah! Hey, I'll just get a ride in your Hermod's sidecar again. You'll wake me up if something happens on the way, won't ya?"

"You're relying on me way too much," Riser sighed under his mask.

What a pain, he thought. However, he didn't argue against Bishmal's idea, which was probably a sign of the companionship they'd forged through their long-lasting dueling rivalry.

"By the way, did ya hear? Our boy Ray started a clan and got in the rankings."

"I heard about it a week ago, yes."

"His clan's in second! That's amazing!"

"It really is."

"...Oh. Sorry, Riser." The position of second place in the clan rankings held a special meaning to Riser. After all, he was the temporary sub-leader of a clan called Babylonian Battlegroup... which had once occupied that very position in the rankings.

The leader, Foltesla, had yet to return, and Shulka — the sub-leader who'd given the role over to Riser — was traveling the world. Riser had no idea where he was now.

After losing Claymill, their original hometown, to the Tri-Zenith Dragon, many of the clan's members had quit. There were so few left now that you could count them on two hands.

Accordingly, they'd dropped off the clan rankings a long time ago.

"It's fine," said Riser. "When our leader returns, the Babylonian Battlegroup will aim for the top once more. All I can do until then is keep the clan going, battle as a duelist, and protect the kingdom."

"Riser..." He'd lost so much to Gloria, but that was exactly why he was so determined to protect what little he had left. That was the primary reason he took up the bodyguard job for the peace talks.

"What about you?" Riser asked. "You didn't join Ray's clan?"

"Nope. I'm not the clan type," Bishmal answered. And if I did join a clan, I already know where I'd go, he added, silently.

"But man, a newbie like Ray's already in the rankings, huh?"

"It's all because of his connections... and his personal strengths."

"I guess. Ray's not the only one who's been on fire recently, though... look at Kashimiya, bro. That guy actually beat Tom."

"...Yeah." Tom Cat — the second in the duel rankings. To Bishmal and Riser, he was like an impassable barrier. Duels were generally one-on-one clashes of solo battle-focused fighters, and Tom Cat's multiplication ability completely shattered that premise. He'd been a wall for Altar's duelists since before Infinite Dendrogram was released.

When Figaro had defeated Tom and become the current champion, Bishmal and Riser had been both shocked and happy. After all, it was clear proof that Tom wasn't unbeatable, which only hardened their resolve to challenge and defeat him.

However, even though Figaro had managed to scale that wall, it remained impassable for both of them.

After Foltesla had disappeared, but before Kashimiya and Rosa had come to Altar or Juliet and Chelsea had started climbing the ranks, Riser and Bishmal fought for third place while challenging Tom every chance they got.

No matter how many times they tried, though, they could never defeat him.

And while they failed time after time, the roster of top duelists began to change.

Kashimiya — a natural at the art of unsheathing, known as the fastest in the kingdom.

Juliet — a talented warrior who used every spatial dimension to its fullest.

Rosa — a master of the one-hit kill, her abilities honed in Tenchi, land of strife.

Time passed, and even more impassable walls appeared in front of Riser and Bishmal. Eventually, they dropped down to sixth and seventh in the rankings. There was even a chance that, given time, Chelsea and the rankers below her would surpass them too.

The two continued to walk without saying a word.

"We've been in Dendro for a pretty long time, huh?" said Bishmal, gazing up to the sky with his eyes full of nostalgia.

"Yeah. Switching between here and reality really messes with your sense of time," Riser replied. "But you haven't changed one bit since the day we met."

"Hey, and you're wearing the exact same thing you were back then. Your suit looked a lot more handmade, though."

"That's because it was. There weren't many crafting-focused Masters around at the time, so I asked a tian craftsman to make it... they didn't exactly know what a tokusatsu hero was around here back then, though, so it was difficult for me to explain what exactly I wanted in a way they could understand. I was just thankful they did as good a job as they did."

Riser's handcrafted tokusatsu hero suit had gone through many upgrades over his time in-game. His earlier ones did have, as Bishmal had put it, a kind of handmade, "amateur" quality to them.

It had become a lot easier to make such suits since then. Tians finally learned what he was talking about from Hero Club's performances, and there had been an increase in craftsman Masters who knew exactly what Riser wanted.

The demand for suits like his remained low, though.

"By the way, I haven't seen ya wear that recently," said Bishmal. "I know that Hermod covers for it, but still." Hermod was Riser's Embryo. It had started out as a large motorcycle, but as it evolved, it had developed a hero suit as an additional form. "Did something happen to it?" Bishmal asked.

"I used it too much. Apparently, the next time it breaks it'll be gone for good."

"Ohh. Well, that'd be a waste. Keep it around as a souvenir, at least."

"That's the plan." They had been walking while talking about the past, and before they knew it, the crowd around them had grown sparse.

"Oh boy, we wandered away from downtown. Better turn around," said Bishmal.

"Shouldn't we go back to the inn and sleep already?"

"No way! The night's still young!" the hearty duelist cried. He and Riser turned around to head back the way they came, but then...

"Masked Riser and Bishmal — the duel rankers, I presume?"

...An unfamiliar voice called out to them.

"Hm...?" Riser didn't care much for the fact that someone was addressing them so casually, but even more than that... he felt that something was very wrong.

They had just turned around to return downtown. However, the voice had come from behind them — from a place that was completely devoid of people only a moment ago.

The two turned back to see a boy, who seemed to be on the shorter side, with his hands completely hidden in his pockets. He was dressed in light clothes with no armor, but his feet were covered by metallic boots.

His most notable feature, however, were the two bunny ears sticking out of his hat.

Rabbit ears... I guess they're like Rosa's wolf ears? Riser thought, remembering his fellow duel ranker. He'd concluded at a glance that this boy was an avatar built in the character creator.

In fact, there wasn't a doubt in his mind that this boy was no tian.

Riser couldn't say exactly how he knew this so strongly. If pressed for a reason, he might say it was because the boy seemed similar to a Master he knew well — a Master he and Bishmal had just been talking about.

"Oh! It really is you two!"

Upon seeing their faces, the boy smiled. Riser's instincts screamed in warning at the sight.

I'll use Reveal... Hm?

He tried to use Reveal on the boy — but the next moment, he'd vanished from sight.

Then, three things happened at the exact same time.

First, Bishmal shouted, "Riser!" and pushed his friend away.

Second, something hit Riser's mask and he heard a voice say, "Tch. What a tough mask. I couldn't cut through it."

And third, blood began spraying out of Bishmal's neck like a fountain.

"Wh-What?!" Riser cried. Skilled as he was, even he couldn't process what had just happened.

It was plainly obvious they were being attacked, though, so he instantly summoned Hermod — his motorcycle-like Type Gear-Arms Embryo. A moment later, he donned the hero suit that came along with it.

"Burstfla—" With the last of his breath, Bishmal tried to activate his ultimate skill that turned his body into flame...

"Ohh. Flame transformation is pretty annoying. Please don't."

...But then the boy landed directly on his head.

The mysterious boy's metal boots had become lethal weapons — they now had guillotine-like blades jutting out of them like ice skates, but much sharper than any mere footwear.

The bladed boots split Bishmal's head open before he could activate his skill. The resurrection period expired in the blink of an eye, and the duel ranker dissolved into motes of light

The boy landed on the pavement with a loud, metallic clang.

“Bishmal!” Riser called out.

“One down,” said the boy, as Riser’s brain finally caught up with the situation.

“Who are you...?!” he roared.

“I won’t waste my time answering your questions. I’m in a hurry.”

The boy showed no intention of even giving Riser his name, but he’d seen more than enough to know that he was an enemy..

An attack...! This is the capital! You can’t fight here... Wait, no! Thankfully, the alley was empty except for them. If they fought, nobody would be caught in the crossfire. Also, Riser couldn’t help but assume that someone who’d just attacked them out of the blue would go on to attack someone else.

Knowing that, he decided he had to defeat the boy here and now.

“Storming-Man, Gusting Bane Of All Evil — Hermod!” Riser activated his ultimate skill before leaping into the sky.

His Embryo followed him, and they became one.

Riser then accelerated using Hermod’s boosters, reaching the speed of sound — and then blowing past it.

As he gained speed, he traced an arc in the sky and began to spin before finally falling downwards like a meteor from the heavens.

“RISEERRRR... KIIIIIIIIIIIIIICK!” This was the ace up Riser’s sleeve — a high-speed, high-powered kicking attack. A single hit from this could easily one-shot an upper-tier Pure-Dragon, or even a Superior Job. It was the kind of attack employed by the tokusatsu heroes whose ranks he’d always yearned to join — a true sure-kill technique.

It was also a skill unique to Hermod — the famed Riser Kick.

Riser opened with his strongest attack, fully intent on killing the mysterious boy...

“Ah...?!”

...Who was already above him.

“Jumping. Kicking. And most importantly, speed. Really, now. You can’t even hope to compare to me on any of these things, Masked Riser.”

Even though he went at several times the speed of sound, he heard the boy’s voice right next to his ear.

“And this is goodbye,” the boy said, slicing through the gaps in Riser’s suit behind both his knees — severing his legs.

With his joints destroyed, Riser could no longer control his kick.

"Ah...?!" Defenseless, he crashed into the pavement with the full force of the supersonic momentum from his ultimate skill behind him.

The impact cracked open a crater-like hole, and the pavement around it flew up into the air without even breaking apart, as though even stones couldn't keep up with what was happening. The sound and resulting shockwave alerted everyone in the area that something big was going on. Lights began to turn on in the surrounding buildings; screams rang out as people caught a glimpse of the scene.

"Ngh..." At the bottom of the crater in the pavement lay the scattered remains of Hermod and Riser, who already looked like a corpse.

"Still alive...? You're pretty tough," the boy said. "I guess you've got some half-baked build that boosts both AGI and END? Well, whatever. This will finish you off."

Peering down at Riser from the edge of the crater, he threw a dynamite-like cylinder bomb at him before turning and walking away.

The explosion that soon followed provoked even more screams, but the boy responsible for it was nowhere in sight.

◇◇◇

Wez Sea Route

The sun had already set. A vehicle sped along the path to the Altar-Dryfe border.

However, this was still Altar territory. Technology was sparse here, so this wasn't a machine, but a car-like Embryo.

"Thanks for driving me, Tomica."

"It's fine, big sis. I'm the one who should be apologizing for bringing you out here this late."

The fifth in the duel rankings, Rosa, had also accepted the bodyguard job, and since she couldn't log on to Dendro when it was morning in-game, she was traveling to the Altar-Dryfe border ahead of time.

She was going there using Oboroguruma — the Embryo of a fellow K&R member, Tomica.

Oboroguruma could seat several people and travel at hundreds of kilometels per hour for long periods of time. It was also a self-driving vehicle that automatically avoided obstacles, so it could maintain these great speeds despite being tethered to the ground.

"If my darling can come online before the peace talks, take him there too," said Rosa.

"I will! Though, he's faster than this car..."

"He's a sprinter, though. He can't maintain that speed for long, so you're still the best transport we've got."

"Eheheh. Thank you." As they talked, Rosa watched the landscape passing by outside the vehicle.

The nights in this land were dark, lit only by the stars, so most people wouldn't be able to see the scenery at all. However, as someone with a build specialized in ambushes regardless of the time of day, Rosa had the Night Vision skill, which let her see the surroundings as if it were noon.

"What a nice view," she said. "I should take darling on a date here."

"Umm... why not make it a picnic with the entire clan instead?"

"I'll do you one better: me, you, and darling. Just the three of us."

"Yes, please!"

"Ahahah! I'll suggest it to him sometime... Hm?"

Suddenly, Rosa's canine ears twitched. Despite what some people assumed, her base hearing ability was no different than a normal human's. However, as an ambusher, she'd acquired the Hearing Enhancement passive skill, and though her hearing still wasn't as strong as a wolf's, she was still quite a bit better at picking up sounds than an ordinary human.

"Sis?"

"...Sounds of battle? No, that ain't it." After noticing the noise, Rosa began to detect a certain pattern to them.

First, there would be the clatter of moving dragon carriages, footsteps, and the thunder of replica Prism Steeds or SMPS.

Then, there would be sounds of battle — or rather, the sound of a single attack.

And after that, silence. All the clamor of travel would vanish entirely.

Rosa knew this pattern well. She'd woven it herself many times over.

She was hearing ambushes.

Someone was launching surprise attacks on someone, then moving on to other targets. Just like Rosa and the others, the targets seemed to be en route to the Altar-Dryfe border. She guessed that they must also be rankers hired as bodyguards for the peace talks.

In that case, the attackers could only be...

“Hm...?!” At that moment, Rosa caught sight of something strange.

For a mere split second, a silhouette had appeared in the scenery reflected in Oboroguruma’s side mirror.

It was a rabbit-eared young man, only about as tall as Kashimiya.

However, the reflection didn’t last, and a moment later, something landed with a thud on the car’s roof.

“E-EHHHH?!” Tomica exclaimed in surprise.

“Tomica! Shake him off!” Rosa howled.

“EEEEK!” Tomica quickly grabbed the handle and drove Oboroguruma into a spin.

The car managed to stay grounded despite the sudden movement, and whoever was on the roof... remained there.

Blades had sliced through the roof, acting as anchors that kept their assailant firmly affixed in place.

“Wh-What’s going on?!”

“Tomica... Sorry, but I’m gonna break this!”

“EEHH?!” Ignoring yet another shocked scream from Tomica, Rosa took out her Embryo. Gashadokuro...

“A Kill Supreme!”

...And engaged the Nobushi Princess’ ultimate job skill, which could only be used as the first attack.

Their assailant’s legs were basically stuck to Oboroguruma’s roof, so there was no possible way for them to dodge this deadly attack.

Despite that... Rosa missed.

Her target had vanished a moment before it landed, and her ultimate job skill only succeeded in blowing away the roof.

“EEEEEK!” While Tomica panicked, Rosa’s mind was silently racing.

She was really straightforward when it came to strategy and tactics — but when it came to pure fighting instincts, she had what some would call a “beastlike sense of smell.” She could tell by this enemy’s reek that he must be after her alone.

“...Tomica,” she said. “I’m gettin’ off.”

“E-EXCUSE ME?!”

“Use your ultimate skill to flee to the capital.”

“Eh?! Ah — I get it! But why can’t you stay with me...?”

“Because this guy would follow us back... to K&R’s headquarters.” That was why Rosa would remain behind. She alone would face the enemy who was trying to kill her and let Tomica escape.

“I got no idea who he is or where he’s from, but... wait, no... this timing... Anyone who dies now won’t be able to come to the peace talks... So that’s your plan, huh?”

“Ah? Sis?”

“Go, Tomica! Go and warn the others about this! Especially my darling!” Rosa kicked open the door of the Oboroguruma and leaped out of the speeding vehicle.

“Remnants of Warrior Dreams — Gashadokuro!”

At the moment she jumped, Rosa used Pure-Dragon-tier bones to create an exoskeleton that greatly improved her stats.

“The Fail-Safe Drive — Oboroguruma!” Tomica also used her ultimate skill, making both her and the vehicle dissolve into a hazy mist.

The enemy tried to catch up to the car and jump on it again, but his body simply passed right through it.

Oboroguruma was now floating like a ghost, passing through objects as if they weren’t there. This was the effect of its ultimate skill.

The enemy was now completely unable to touch either of them, and had no choice but to let Tomica go.

“Stop starin’ at our girl’s ass!” Now fully armored in her exoskeleton, Rosa launched an abrupt attack at her assailant — only for him to vanish right before the hit landed and reappear a short distance away.

“She’s not even a duel ranker, so I thought she’d be a pretty ordinary high-rank, but it seems like she actually has a pretty interesting skill,” he commented.

This was the same boy who’d defeated both Riser and Bishmal at the capital. He’d since left the city to find and ambush Rosa and Tomica, who were moving at hundreds of kilometels per hour.

“You a Dryfean Master?” Rosa asked.

“Who knows? There’s no real reason to tell you, is there?”

“Nope... I’m gonna beat you up either way!” Rosa howled as she charged at the boy.

“Too slow,” the boy said. “You’re like a tortoise. Though, with a shell like yours, cutting your flesh is going to be difficult."

He put his hand, hidden in his long sleeves, on his chin and pondered.

"I'll do this, then." After whispering this, he vanished again — and placed bombs at every opening in Rosa's exoskeleton.

"Huh?!" A moment later, there was a chain of explosions. At point blank range, the bombs were able to easily blow away Gashadokuro's exoskeleton and expose Rosa's flesh.

"If a tortoise shell is in the way, you just crack it open." The boy's blade-boots then pierced into one of the holes left by the bomb, tearing out Rosa's heart in one swift cut.

The wound was fatal, and her head drooped lifelessly.

"Oh, and I already know about that little trick." Rosa had used the effect of her substitute-creating special reward to maneuver behind the boy, but he simply launched a roundhouse kick that sliced her head clean from her shoulders.

"Ah...!" Rosa's face was frozen in a silent scream, full of chagrin; she received the death penalty immediately.

"I suppose that's all the Masters who were on the way to the border..." And with that, the boy vanished, leaving the night road empty.

◇◇◇

Altar-Dryfe Border Surroundings, Vermina Village

That night, at a village close to the Altar-Dryfe border, two girls were talking and gazing up at the stars together. The concept of air pollution didn't exist in Infinite Dendrogram, so the sky was full of beautiful, twinkling lights.

"By the way, classes advanced in Japan, didn't they? Did you make any friends?"

"...None in that realm are worthy of being sworn to the darkness as my companions."

"That bad, huh?" One of the girls was dressed like a pirate and had a youthful face, while the other was clad in black, gothic-styled dress-armor. The former was Chelsea the Vagrant Golden Sea, while the latter was Juliet the Black Crow — respectively the eighth and fourth in the duel rankings.

This village was close to the location of the impending peace talks, so they'd arrived here in the afternoon and were now waiting for Altimia and the other Masters who would arrive tomorrow.

"You're a nice girl, though," said Chelsea. "You're just a bit hard to approach at first."

Juliet tended to speak in an overly complicated way even in real life. She knew it made her seem like a weirdo, but it wasn't something she did consciously. Anxiety over her odd way of speaking also made her tongue-tied whenever she made an effort to talk normally.

Because of all this, she had difficulty talking to people in real life.

In Dendro, however, you had either Masters who viewed her unusual speech habits as mere role-playing and tians who simply took for granted that Masters were odd people, so it was far easier for her to communicate and make friends here.

Chelsea was the closest friend she had, as well as her long-time dueling rival.

"It matters not," Juliet said. "Here in this otherland, there are many I count as sworn friends."

"Yeah, like me and Max," Chelsea agreed. "But you need to make real friends too... Though, I'm probably not one to talk... I still need to find a boyfriend... hah."

"Chelsea..."

In trying to cheer Juliet up, Chelsea had only succeeded in making herself feel worse. She'd never been all that concerned with getting a boyfriend before, but after her clan had collapsed due to relationship drama she wasn't even involved in, she began to feel an odd sense of urgency.

"Umm... you're still in your twenties. You don't have to worry about that yet, do you?" said Juliet, breaking her usual speech pattern.

"Heheheh... Easy for you to say. You're still in your early teens," Chelsea replied, untouched by Juliet's attempts to console her.

"Umm... then how about we go to a... gokon?"

"'Gokon'? Ohh, that mixer-type thing that was popular in Japan a few decades ago. It comes up in manga sometimes. I don't have a guy I could take to one, though."

"What about Riser or Bishmal?"

"...Then it would be just another one of our usual nights out. Also, I don't really see either of them that way."

"I see..."

"If I have to pick someone from our dinner parties, I'd probably go for Ray. He seems about my age, too."

"Eh...?" Upon hearing that, Juliet looked dumbfounded.

Chelsea noticed that and pinched the girl's cheek.

"Ow," Juliet squeaked.

"I'm just joking. Ray doesn't really seem to click with me, so he's probably not boyfriend material, either. But if you're gonna react like that, why don't you go for him?"

"It's not like that... We just hit it off... and I find him easy to talk to."

...And you have basically the same fashion sense, Chelsea added silently. She pictured the gothic armor-clad girl before her standing next to the young man who looked like a messenger from Hell itself, and all she could think was that, visually at least, they were a perfect match.

"His build is so great too," Juliet continued. "I like how it mixes holiness and death while letting both shine..."

"...I was really surprised to hear that he got Death Soldier, though. Speaking of which... It suits your tastes, but you know that the job's useless in duels, right? I mean, the duel ends when you run out of HP."

"I actually don't know how I never heard about that job before... I thought that 'The Death' was the only job with 'Death' in the title."

Apparently, she only cared about the name.

"If you get along with him so well, why didn't you join his clan? He invited you, didn't he?"

"Yeah... The clan's name was cool too."

Chelsea said nothing, but in her mind, the clan name was one of the most evil-sounding she'd ever heard. Even Max, who wasn't present here, was seriously creeped out by it.

"I'm fine this way for now. I'll think it over and give him an answer later," Juliet said.

"I see. Well, that's fine. Being conflicted about your feelings is just part of being young, I'm sure."

"Again... it's not like that...!" Juliet insisted with a pout. It made Chelsea smile and poke at her face.

And then, they heard sounds of clashing metal from outside the village.

"What...?"

“...Besides us, the only ones here already are Roadwell and Hineduck.” The names Chelsea mentioned belonged to Masters who’d also accepted the bodyguard job. Both were duelists floating between numbers 10 and 19 in the rankings, and though they were far below the top 3 and just a bit less impressive than those in the 4 to 9 range, they were still highly capable Masters. They’d been killing time until the peace talks by hunting the local monsters and the like.

“That’s not a normal sound,” said Chelsea. “There aren’t any metal monsters in this area.”

“So, they’re fighting an abnormal monster...? Like a UBM?”

“...Or a PK.” Roadwell had a defense-focused build and wore full metal armor. If someone attacked him, that would no doubt result in a metallic clang.

A moment after they thought that, the sound of a great many explosions reached their ears.

“...Chained explosions,” said Chelsea. “This doesn’t sound like a monster’s breath attack or anything.”

“Chelsea!”

“Yeah! Let’s go, Julie!” The two then summoned their Embryos. Chelsea now held a golden axe, while Juliet grew jet-black wings that carried her towards the source of the ominous clamor.

Once they arrived at their destination, they found no sign of the duelists they knew so well. Instead, a mysterious boy stood with his back to them.

“I was about to go find you myself,” he said, turning around. “You saved me some time by coming here.”

The rabbit-eared boy put Chelsea on edge.

The signs of battle all around were proof that the boy had fought Roadwell and Hineduck and emerged victorious, and his words clearly indicated that Chelsea was next.

“...Where’s Juliet, by the way?” he then asked. “I thought she’d be with you.” The boy also somehow knew that Chelsea was with Juliet, but as he said — she was nowhere in sight.

Juliet was nowhere in his field of vision...

“Corpse-Eating Bird — Hræsvelgr!”

...But then that voice came ringing out from above.

A moment later, a black tornado came raging from the heavens. Its source was none other than Juliet, whose black dress-armor and wings allowed her to melt into the darkness of night.

Before arriving here, Juliet and Chelsea had agreed on their strategy. Assuming that the enemy — PK or otherwise — was strong enough to take on Roadwell and Hineduck, they had made the first move.

That's why Juliet, who was hard to spot in the dark of night, hid in the sky above to attack with her ultimate skill the moment Chelsea had their opponent distracted.

"Golden Bull Tsunami — Poseidon!" Chelsea then used her own ult.

The blades of the double-edged axe in her hands vanished, and the space left behind began to leak liquid gold.

A black crow in the sky, and a golden sea on the ground. An umbral tornado that tore apart all life, and a surge of gold that pulverized all flesh and bone.

Together, they formed a combined attack of two area-of-effect ultimate skills. Whether above or below, no one could hope to evade their range.

Merely by failing to notice Juliet activating her ult, and letting that distract him enough to let Chelsea use hers, the boy had missed his chance to escape.

He fell silent. There was actually enough space between the golden sea and the vortex of feathers for a person to pass through, but it would be consumed in a fraction of a second.

Even those who moved at supersonic speeds couldn't evade this.

Indeed. No one could possibly have enough time to escape...

"■■■ ■■■■■ in the Right, ■■■■■■■■■■ in the Left, Here I Hold ■■■ ■■■■■■■ ■■■ — ■■■■nos, ■■■ros, Ai■■"

...Or so you'd think.

Between the raging noise of their combined ultimate skills, Chelsea could barely make out a quiet, yet notable sound.

She then felt something on her pirate hat, and when she just slightly tilted her head...

"...Eh?"

...She saw two Gems slide off the edge of her hat and fall right in front of her eyes.

A moment later, one of the Gems was activated.

They were Gems containing Crimson Sphere — Pyromancer's ultimate job skill.

These Gems dealt more damage than any other ones on the market, so a non-Superior Job like Chelsea had no hope of weathering the onslaught.

She only barely survived it thanks to the fire resistance she'd incorporated into her build — but a moment later, the other Gem activated too.

This one broke her Lifesaving Brooch. The item nullified the damage done, but after the roaring flames vanished, she found herself surrounded by countless bombs.

"Ah..." Right as she gasped, the bombs went off in a chain, quickly engulfing her in explosions that soon intermingled with sparks of light, vanishing into the sky.

"Chel...sea...!" Juliet, still in the air, had watched what happened to her friend the entire time, but she didn't actually see it. To her, it was as if both the Gems on Chelsea's hat and the bombs surrounding her simply appeared out of nowhere.

Juliet could move and perceive this world at supersonic speeds, but not even she saw what actually happened. Chelsea was just dead before she even realized what was going on.

Juliet clenched her teeth.

She processed the reality that the boy had evaded their ults and then killed Chelsea.

"This enemy... which is he?!" Experienced and talented as she was, Juliet instantly narrowed down the enemy's method of attack to just two options.

The first was spatial control. The enemy might've evaded their ults by teleporting away, then using that same control over space to send bombs towards his opponent.

However, here in Infinite Dendrogram, spatial control was extremely costly. Even Xunyu's Tenaga Ashinaga could only do it with an ultimate skill, and it still came with a cooldown. Chained teleports might have been possible with the perfect combination of Embryo type and resource distribution, but that would only account for the first evasion and the appearance of the Gems.

Juliet did not think it could possibly be teleportation. The bombs that followed were far too numerous for that.

The other option was comparably simple — pure speed.

The boy might be moving at speeds so great that not even Juliet could see him, letting him evade the ults and place the bombs. She'd already encountered a worthy opponent who could move that fast — The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

If it really was down to pure speed, then this boy was just like Kashimiya, but...

...no. There's a... big difference between him and Kashimiya. It's — Juliet pondered the question, but her thought was cut short...

"Don't assume you're safe just because you're up in the sky."

...By a voice from behind her.

"Ah?!"

"You seem to be thinking about something, but there's no point in that," said the same boy who had just eliminated Chelsea. "My power... is inescapable."

"Hgh...! Cursed Phalanx Disorder!" Juliet refused to listen to the boy's bragging and didn't hesitate to use her ultimate job skill against the person who'd hurt her friend.

"Hahahah. Too slow."

But none of her weapons, which tracked their target through the power of curses, actually struck him.

"Uh...?!"

"You people really are slow. Like tortoises," the boy said as he swung his boots at the top of Juliet's spine.

A fountain of blood burst forth as the blade sliced cleanly through her neck.

The boy followed up this attack with a flurry of slashes, all targeting Juliet's weak spots.

Her HP dropped until her Lifesaving Brooch activated, leaving her barely alive.

Even now, Cursed Phalanx Disorder was firing homing weapons at the boy, but he was evading them all with only minimal movement — and as he danced around them, they clashed together and shattered.

"It's over," he said, and then finished Juliet off by sinking his blade-boots into her throat.

That was when her HP finally reached 0.

"Gh...!" And in that very moment, an oppressive, overpowering aura emanated from her.

With his blade still buried in Juliet's neck, the boy looked around.

Feathers...? And fragments of the broken weapons? he thought. The shattered weapons, mixed together with the black feathers, had surrounded the both of them.

The result was like a spherical cage.

"Did you seriously...?"

Juliet had planned for the cursed weapons to shatter.

She'd used Hræsvelgr's wind to change the trajectory of her cursed weapons and keep the fragments of the shattered ones in orbit around the battlefield, making it impossible for the boy to escape no matter how fast he moved.

Wait, how is she even still alive...? he wondered, clueless about the recent change in Juliet's build.

She'd switched one of her low-rank jobs to Death Soldier, giving her Last Command — the skill that allowed her to continue acting after death for a short amount of time.

"...a..." With her head nearly severed from her body, Juliet was unable to speak. The destruction of her spine had also made it impossible for her to move her body.

However, she didn't need that to use her skills.

She just had to think. A single thought would activate the ace up her sleeve.

"...i...e...!" Thus, the skill was activated.

This was the final attack of the Fallen Knight — Dark Requiem.

It blew her body apart, and transformed all her flesh and blood into cursed projectiles.

"Ah...!" The bullets of blood and blades of bone would make short work of the young man. Even with a Brooch equipped, he couldn't possibly survive this.

And the black feathers and fragments of cursed weapons surrounding him left no room to escape.

◆◆◆

Control AI no. 1's workspace

This was a strange space.

The interior was shaped like a large cylinder — but it was so gigantic that each end stretched farther than the horizon.

The scale wasn't the only thing unsettling about it. The entire surface area of the cylinder was covered in seemingly countless smaller cylinders. There was no space between them, and there must have been tens of thousands of them, if not much, much more.

Many of them were empty, but some were "occupied."

The people — or their parts — inside them were many and varied. If you lined up the contents of each cylinder in a row, it would look as though the people inside them were being built, from head to toe.

Strangely enough, the complete humans had diverse sets of equipment on them... and all of them had crests on their left hands.

Indeed, these were all Masters — or more specifically, avatars.

This cylindrical area was the so-called "avatar space."

It was managed by control AI no. 1, Alice, and it was where avatars were reconstructed and stored.

This was the place where Masters who received the death penalty would have their avatars rebuilt, as well as a storage site for the avatars of offline Masters.

In the deepest part of this space, there were several special cylinders. While the others were placed on the wall with no space between them, these were positioned in the middle.

There were fifteen of them. They were marked with numbers 0 to 13, but there were two 11s, separated by the Greek letters "α" and "Ω."

Some of them looked like they had never been used, but some were occupied.

One of them — no. 12 — opened up, and the avatar inside stepped out.

It was the same rabbit-eared boy who'd just defeated so many Altarian rankers.

"Oh man, that was dangerous," he said, removing his shredded hat and grinning wryly. "That could've destroyed my avatar. I really don't want Alice getting on my case about it."

By "that," he meant the final attack that Juliet took such pains to launch. It wasn't something he could've evaded, but...

Our avatars aren't like theirs. We don't have a standby period for storage. That's why I could return here before my avatar was actually destroyed.

To log out, Masters needed to go thirty seconds without touching anyone or passing through barriers or anything similar. This rule was meant to prevent players from fleeing encounters by logging out, but it didn't apply to this boy.

After all... he wasn't a player.

My Brooch broke before I made it here, but that doesn't matter. I took care of all the high-ranking Altarian Masters who accepted the bodyguard duty. The ones who were online, anyway. There's also some who weren't... as well as King of Destruction, High Priestess, and those around them... But they're not my problem.

"No. 12." As the boy counted on his fingers, he heard a voice from somewhere.

The voice had a machine-like intonation, and it was impossible to tell its gender. Even so, the boy who was called "no. 12" knew exactly who it was.

"No. 0. I've said this many times before, but don't call me that when I'm using my avatar. Right now, I'm The Rabbit, Chrono Crown. The infamous Dryfean PK."

The boy — or, control AI no. 12, Rabbit — insisted that no. 0 stop calling him by that name.

Indeed, he was the avatar of a control AI.

Like the Altarian duelist Tom Cat, the twin CEOs of DIN, or Alison — an employee there... This was the form he took when he had to act as a human.

As part of Infinite Dendrogram's management, he didn't have the same limitations on "logging out" or "storage" as a player would. If it weren't for that, Juliet's final attack would've surely destroyed him.

He couldn't have used this method of escape if there had been other witnesses, but Juliet was the only person present — and she was no longer conscious, due to her suicidal final ability.

"You also don't want to be called 'No. 0' when using that name, right?"

"Rabbit, Chrono Crown. About what happened—"

"Oh, you better not complain, No. 0. I just did my job," Chrono said, cutting No. 0's words short. "Besides managing time, I'm also meant to fight Embryos in their sixth forms. By fighting them, I'm promoting their evolution. This time, I just fought Altarian Masters who'd taken up the bodyguard job. That's it, right?"

Chrono spoke as if there were absolutely no problems with what he'd done at all. It was less of an explanation and more of a show of defiance.

"We're done talking, No. 0," he said. "I have bodyguard duty the day after — I mean tomorrow, now. I'm busy."

No. 0 said nothing in response. With the conversation over, Chrono left the avatar space.

He then headed towards the room with facilities that would transport him to Dryfe, but then he noticed something.

...There's a debuff on my avatar.

Chrono noticed a status effect on him... a curse called "Equipment Binding."

The Dark Requiem skill that Juliet had used at the very end of their battle was both an attack and an extremely potent curse. Juliet herself could specify the kind of curse, and she'd unleashed the skill while focusing on a curse that made it impossible for the target to switch equipment.

I guess she didn't pick anything deadlier because she thought I'd just resist it. Lethal curses were powerful, but they could be nullified by Brooches just like Gloria's Fatal Field, and their effect could be further weakened with anti-curse accessories.

That was why Juliet had opted for a curse that was more of a bonus to her attack, not the other way around. Chrono understood her reasoning. Focused curses fueled by a Superior Job's death were extremely powerful, and since the effect was relatively minor compared to a fatal curse, it was more or less impossible to resist or undo.

The curse would stay with him until the next time his avatar was reconstructed.

The damage from the attack had destroyed his Brooch, and the curse had made it impossible for him to replace it. His clothing was covered in holes too, but each article had a skill that automatically repaired them, so at least that wasn't a problem.

So I guess the only real issue is that I can't equip a Brooch now, he thought. Well, whatever. Unless they do something like Juliet did, no one can hurt me anyway. I'll get rid of the curse by asking Alice to reconstruct my avatar next time she's in a good mood.

He concluded that the curse wasn't a problem and moved on to thinking about something else.

My next job is at the peace talks. I'll target any high-rank Embryos there, he thought.

His duty as Chrono Crown was to fight and defeat high-rank Embryos — specifically those in their sixth form.

Like he'd told No. 0, his actions hadn't deviated from his role, but there were some ulterior motives behind them.

I don't know what Dryfe's planning to do at the peace talks, but it should go well if I remove some of Altar's fighting potential. No one was looking at him, but he still hid his mouth behind his sleeves.

Dryfe is still troubled by their dwindling Resources... both food and funds. That's why the best outcome for them is the least costly one. If possible, they'll avoid doing anything that'll be too expensive for them.

His covered mouth warped into a grin.

If all goes as Dryfe wants it to, there's no way we'll have war.

He pictured how everything would go exactly as he wished.

I won't have that huge workload dumped on me again. That level of processing is such a waste of my Resources... They can't make me do it that often.

That was a thought he had not as Chrono Crown, but Rabbit — the control AI in charge of time. He absolutely despised the War Boundary. It demanded more of his processing power than anything else.

During war, time in Infinite Dendrogram was sped up ten times beyond the norm, and as a result he ended up focusing solely on time acceleration.

That made him unable to operate as an avatar, and lowered his active thinking ability to the bare minimum necessary.

He hated being like that, and that was the reason he went out to PK Altarian Masters as the peace talks drew closer.

There's no need for war. We didn't even get any Superiors out of the last one. Giga Professor's Pandemonium evolved after the war, not during it. War does nothing but make life harder for me. It's best if it just doesn't happen.

After arriving at the room which would take him to Dryfe, he whispered, "It's best if the countries just merge without any war."

He was then transported to Dryfe, vanishing from this space to go join the Dryfean retinue and take part in the peace talks.

◇◆◇

???

“...”

“War is not necessary. Only triggers for evolution are.”

“Battles with unreasonable and unfair enemies may also function as such triggers.”

“Thus, there is no reason to stop No. 12’s actions.”

“The goal of the current phase is to gather one hundred Superior Embryos.”

“However, there is no single trigger that causes this evolution.”

“Everyday life, strife, love, hate, anger, grief, hunger, sloth, hope, despair... The triggers are multifarious.”

“Thus, it is best for the control AIs that had become Infinite to act on their own to experiment and discover the triggers.”

“The wait for the one hundred continues.”

Chapter Five: The Night Before the Peace Conference

Paladin, Ray Starling

It was now the day before the peace talks. The Masters who would act as bodyguards had gathered at the parade ground used by the knight office in Altea, where we would meet up with Azurite and the other officials participating in the coming talks.

However, about ten minutes before everyone was supposed to show up, I noticed something strange.

"...There should be more of us here." There were 37 Masters gathered already. First, there were the members of Death Period. Five of us, to be exact—since Lei-Lei and Kasumi's trio unfortunately couldn't make it.

But as for the other 32 besides us, there was Miss Eldritch, Tsukikage, and a whole bunch of people with a crescent moon and closed eye symbol on their clothes... all members of The Lunar Society.

That's right — there were only two clans.

"...I don't see Rosa anywhere," said B3.

"Hmm... I'm not seeing many of the famous rankers, either," added Marie. "Based on my information, this is only about a third of the people who should be here."

I'd heard that some duelists were coming myself, but none of them seemed to have shown up yet.

"Did something happen?" I wondered.

"Ray, should I speed off to DIN and investigate?" Marie asked.

As I considered whether or not she ought to do that, I saw some familiar faces among a group of knights and officials.

First was Azurite — the reason we were all here.

Next was... "Tomica," if memory served. She was the K&R member around my age whom I'd run into back when Rosa ambushed us on the road to Torne.

And finally, there was a masked man, covered in Medical Bandages that enhanced the body's self-healing abilities.

It was Riser the duel ranker.

"Riser?!" I called out.

"Ray... you guys are still fine... what a relief." He had multiple injury-based debuffs. Even walking seemed to be difficult for him, since he was leaning against a knight's shoulder.

"How did you get all those wounds...?" I asked.

"I'll be the one to explain that," Azurite interjected, before telling us what happened.

Shockingly, it seems that Masters — rankers included — had been ambushed en masse.

The one thing all the targets had in common was that they'd all accepted the bodyguard quest.

Riser had been one of them, and although he'd almost died to the bomb left behind by the assailant, his Lifesaving Brooch had activated and kept him alive, barely. He'd then used healing items to stave off death until the locals took him to a nearby state church.

Tomica had been ambushed along with Rosa, but she'd managed to escape back to the capital.

There were also reports that sounds of battle had been heard last night near the village next to the border, and the Masters who'd been waiting there had all vanished.

Riser and Tomica both vouched that their attacker was the same person — a boy with rabbit ears and metal boots.

Upon hearing those details, Shu spoke up. "...That's The Rabbit, Chrono Crown."

"You know him?" I asked.

"Yeah. I fought him back before I was a Superior. He's a PK who hunts pre-Superiors... or rather, Masters in their sixth forms. He's perfectly capable of assassinating dozens of Masters."

"...How did your fight with him go?"

"I don't even know. He did some serious damage to me, but stopped attacking after I caught him in a trap. I still don't know if that's because he actually got the death penalty or if he just ran away. Haven't met him since."

That was impressive, even if Shu wasn't a Superior back then. If The Rabbit had grown stronger since then, he must be even more fearsome now.

"Though, his tricks are more or less common knowledge by now," Shu added before explaining The Rabbit's abilities, strategies, and how to counter them... which wasn't something everyone could do, to put it mildly.

I thought about what he'd said and concluded that I was incompatible with Chrono's fighting style. Shu aside, B3 and Marie would be better opponents for him.

"That's it for his capabilities, but I've got another beary bad piece of info about him," Shu said.

"Oh yes," Marie nodded. "I was trying to find a good opportunity to explain that, too."

Whatever it was, they seemed to find it difficult to say.

"The Rabbit, Chrono Crown... is a Dryfean PK."

"...And he's coming to the peace talks as a bodyguard on their side."

So... that meant...

"You're saying the imperium ordered him to target Altar's bodyguards?" I asked.

"Maybe," said Shu. "But it could easily be something he decided to do himself. I mean, going around and hunting Masters in their sixth forms is just what he does normally. The bodyguard thing gathered a whole bunch of Altarian Masters in a few locations, so he might've seen it as a good chance to score some kills. Hunting Masters is his goal, not a means to some end, and he's never really done anything notable besides that. Really, the weirdest thing here is that he's actually joining their retinue. But if Dryfe did order him to do this..."

"...It means that they thought it was necessary to weaken our retinue," Altimia finished his sentence.

...Suddenly, I'm not as optimistic that the talks will go well, I thought.

"...This seems a little too bold for a Dryfean plot, though," Shu said. "Especially since the assassin is also a part of the official retinue."

"We shall use Truth Discernment and ask the imperium's delegation about it. Then we will know for certain whether they gave the order," said Azurite. "There is now a more pressing problem, however..."

"The gaps in our retinue, huh?" said Shu.

"Indeed. If this turns out to be a trap, our ability to respond to it has been greatly reduced."

If this whole thing was just a trap, then we would have to face the entirety of Dryfe's retinue of Masters — The Rabbit included.

"Would you be able to fight The Rabbit?" Rook asked, looking at Shu, who fell silent for a moment.

"...I obviously wouldn't be helpless. I'm almost certain I'd win, actually. The problem is that I'd be too busy to deal with him myself. If we end up fighting Dryfe, I'd have my hands full with the King of Beasts."

The Rabbit wouldn't be our only enemy there. Marie had told me they'd hired a whole bunch of Masters for their retinue, including King of Beasts — the so-called Physical Apex — and Hell General, who could bolster their numbers even further with his devils.

If Shu had to fight King of Beasts, then it would fall to us to face The Rabbit and Logan.

I silently considered my status as a combatant. My Grudge-Soaked Greaves were sufficiently charged, meaning that I could summon Gardranda, even though it was risky. Monochrome had also absorbed enough light for Shining Despair. I was completely stocked up on Counter Absorption uses, too.

I'd also maxed out my Death Soldier job and leveled Scout to get the Reveal utility skill before switching back to Paladin, which was the job that let me use all the skills I had unlocked.

And most notably of all... Nemesis had reached her fourth form and became a high-rank Embryo.

I was more prepared than I'd ever been, but I couldn't bring myself to say we'd get through a fight like that with no problem.

A sense of unease coiled around my heart like a vine, and even I couldn't say exactly what was causing it.

"It's still not certain there will be fighting... but the outlook is not favorable," said Azurite. The Rabbit killing so much of the retinue had stung her badly, and she was reluctant to continue under the current circumstances.

Suddenly, Miss Eldritch raised her hand.

Not in a manner that fit her gaudy Japanese-style apparel, but with the enthusiasm of a regular student who knew the answer in class.

"...What is it?" Azurite asked suspiciously.

"If we need more people, I can call a couple dozen more from my clan. You'd need to write off more of my debt beforehand, though."

After hearing that offer, Azurite spent a good amount of time thinking it through — then finally, with a bitter expression on her face, she said, "...Please do."

"Thank you for your business!"

Azurite's really desperate, huh? I thought.

Also, this just reinforced to me how powerful The Lunar Society really was. Being a cult centered around Dendro, it had so many no-lifers that Miss Eldritch could casually call up "dozens" of Masters worthy of joining Azurite's entourage.

I heard that it actually had the most high-rankers of any clan in any country, which made them actually pretty reliable in situations like this.

"Tsukuyo Fuso, I also have a request," said Riser as he bowed his head to her.

"Whaddya want, Ri?"

I certainly hadn't expected her to call him that.

"Please use your skills to heal me! I can't just sit by idly while something like this is happening...!" he cried, a hint of grief creeping into his voice. Miss Eldritch fell silent.

Riser must've been so emotional because he wanted to avenge Bishmal and the other duel rankers who'd gotten the death penalty, on top of his desire to protect the kingdom.

"Okay. I'll heal you," said Miss Eldritch with a nod.

"I'll be in your de—"

"But you can't join the retinue." She agreed to heal him, but in the same breath she outright denied him the honor of becoming a bodyguard again.

"Why...?" he asked.

"You know that better than anyone, don'cha? Your Embryo is completely broken. My Mercy of the Holy can fully heal your body, but I can't do anything about your broken Embryo."

"But I can still fight just as I am...!"

"Do you really think a Master can do much without his Embryo? And your build is completely focused on yours, isn't it? You'd only get in the way."

Riser hung his head. He clearly had no counterargument.

...Her words seemed harsh — perhaps even cold — but even so, I could tell that she was being far more earnest than usual.

"...Very well," said Riser. "I won't come, but please heal me anyway."

"Can you give me a reason why?"

"Most of our powerful Masters are leaving for the peace talks. You're going to be summoning even more Lunar Society members who were supposed to stay here. There won't be enough people left to protect the capital in case anything happens." Miss Eldritch listened to him silently. "If I can't join the bodyguards, then I at least want to do what I can here in Altea. That's all."

"...Ugh, you Babylonian Battlegroup members are so stubborn," she sighed before mouthing, "Mercy of the Holy." With that, Riser was fully healed.

"Thank you... I'll make it up to—"

"You don't have to. I'm already indebted to you people. This is just me paying a fraction of that back."

"...Thank you," said Riser, bowing his head.

It felt as though Fuso was purposely looking away from him, which was something I've never seen her do before.

"Do you find it strange for Lady Tsukuyo to behave like this?"

"...Tsukikage." Before I realized it, Tsukikage had snuck up on me and whispered right in my ear.

Fuso didn't seem to notice, though. She was busy using a comms item to contact her headquarters.

"...I would say so, yeah," I said. "She always seemed more, well... ruthless to me."

"It's because she feels indebted to the Babylonian Battlegroup specifically."

"Indebted?"

"The Gloria incident." From what I'd heard of the events surrounding the defeat of the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, The Lunar Society — which was first in the clan rankings even back then — hadn't participated from the start because the negotiations with the kingdom were taking too long.

While that was happening, the second clan in the rankings — Babylonian Battlegroup, to which Riser belonged — had been the ones who stood up to protect the cities of Altar.

However, they were defeated. They lost their home base and ended up collapsing as a clan. Their members had close ties to tians, so their defeat was particularly painful.

Many people thought that things wouldn't have turned out so badly if The Lunar Society had participated from the very beginning — and though she didn't outwardly show it, it seems Fuso was actually bothered by how everything had turned out... which was the reason she treated Riser the way she did.

"Is this unexpected?" Tsukikage asked. It was more than unexpected — I never would have imagined this from her.

Then again... Fuso had been the one who'd treated my wounds back at Torne.

"Lady Tsukuyo is like the moon itself."

"Eh?"

"She is quite charming if you look at her the right way," Tsukikage, gazing at Fuso with a gentle smile.

Ten minutes later, an extra fifty Lunar Society Masters joined us at the parade ground. The speed at which they'd made it here really hammered home why they were the top clan.

"That makes up for most of the lost bodyguards," said Azurite.

"My people are strong. You can count on them... Though, I can't deny that they're a level below duel rankers."

This reminded me of the blockade incident shortly after I first arrived in this world. The Lunar Society had gone up against K&R, and Rosa was defeating Fuso's underlings one after another despite being under the effect of the Lunar Divider Field. That was clear proof that you couldn't compare the power of a duel ranker with that of an ordinary Master.

"It'd be great if we had just one more ranker, at least," said Tsukuyo. "Ah, is Kashimiya online?"

Tomica shook her head and said, "Not yet... He said that he wasn't sure if he'd be able to come online today or tomorrow, so he probably doesn't even know that all this has happened..."

"That so? Could you get him to come with us if he does log on?"

"Yeah! I'm sure he'll want to avenge our sis...!" With Figaro being offline for the foreseeable future, Kashimiya was the most powerful duel ranker in the kingdom, but it didn't seem certain whether he'd be able to participate.

We really lacked fighting strength right now, but without Kashimiya, there were no duel rankers that—

"Did someone mention duel rankeeers?" Suddenly, I heard a very familiar voice — one belonging to someone who definitely didn't belong in this parade ground.

I turned and saw a young man with a giant cat seated on his head — a young man I knew very well.

"Tom...?"

"The Lynx, Tom Cat...?" Azurite and I spoke his name in unison.

He immediately drew everyone's attention as he approached Azurite.

"I haven't seen you since Quartierlatiiin, Your Majesty," he said. "I understand this is rather last minute, but would I be allowed to joiiin?"

"Certainly... but didn't you already refuse once...?"

"...The situation changed a bit, you seee," he said with a slightly dark expression.

I considered what he could be referring to, and instantly thought of last night's ambushes.

"You mean... The Rabbit?" I asked, making him look at me with a shocked expression.

"...Yeah. He and I have a bit of a historyyy. I know that he assassinated Altarian Masters who took on the bodyguard dutyyy, and that he is part of Dryfe's retinueee," he said before clenching his fist as if gathering resolve. "So if we end up fighting Dryfe... let me fight Chrono."

"Tom..." I had no idea what was there between him and The Rabbit. I had no idea why someone who was rumored to have ties to Dendro's management would join the bodyguard squad of one kingdom's ruler.

However, there was a light in Tom's eyes, still shaded by his hair, that made me understand just how serious he was.

"...Then it is decided," Azurite said. She then looked over the Masters gathered at the parade ground... and nodded.

"We're heading to the peace talks." Following that declaration, we all moved out.

◆◆◆

Dryfe Imperium-Occupied Territory, Old Lunnings Duchy

To the people of the kingdom, the phrase “Old Lunnings Duchy” has held several different meanings over the past few years.

Once, it signified the greatest grain-producing region in Altar.

It grew far more crops than it consumed and made enormous profits by exporting the surplus to countries that struggled with food production, like Dryfe and Granvaloa.

However, its time as the world’s breadbasket was tragically cut short just over a year ago.

The sudden attack by the strongest SUBM ever seen — Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria — had resulted in the deaths of just about every inhabitant of the duchy, including Duke Lunnings himself. Those who’d survived either abandoned the land completely or were consumed by despair, often to the point of taking their own lives.

Gloria’s Fatal Field had also made every growing thing within it wither, devastating the fields and turning the land of bountiful harvests into a land of desolation.

After that, it became the Old Lunnings Duchy and began undergoing restoration as a territory directly under the control of the royal family.

However, half a year after the Gloria incident, the region became a battlefield once more.

The Dryfean army invaded through a pass near the Lightning Dragon Mountains, and they found the kingdom’s forces waiting for them there.

Since it was no longer inhabited, the Old Lunnings Duchy was an optimal battlefield, but whether that actually benefited Altar was another matter.

Because there was no one living there, none of those present had to worry about collateral damage and could go all-out.

Countless elites. The Giga Professor and his many monsters. The Hell General and his devil army. And finally, King of Beasts, whose very steps cracked the earth and whose claws could shatter meteors.

All of them unleashed their full power, completely devastating the Altarian army.

After that, Old Lunnings Duchy became Dryfean territory. The imperium acted fast and relocated their farmers to the west side of the region — the side closest to Dryfe. They’d also hired Masters with abilities related to farming and construction, quickly preparing the western part of the region for agriculture and gradually transforming it back into the breadbasket it once was.

Because of all this, it was widely believed that one of Dryfe’s demands during the coming peace talks would be for Altar to formally cede the Old Lunnings Duchy to them, shifting it from an occupied territory to a region that Dryfe officially owned.

◆

Although Gloria had devastated the Old Lunnings Duchy, the destruction mostly took the form of pure biological death. Much of the construction had remained untouched.

There were a few remnants of villages destroyed in the war, but the town of Lunnings in the heart of the region still looked much as it had before Gloria’s arrival.

The same couldn’t be said for its atmosphere.

Lunnings had once been surrounded by verdant grasslands, and it had truly earned its title of “the town of meadows.”

However, there was no longer a single patch of green anywhere in sight — the fields surrounding the town had become nothing more than withered wastelands. And on top of that, Gloria had brought about the deaths of every living creature there, leaving behind thousands of corpses.

Lunnings was no longer the town of meadows. It was a town of death.

Maybe people wouldn’t say it in so many words, but that was the most apt description.

After the incident, the huge amount of corpses had been imbued with grudge, resulting in undead roaming the land; but before the war came, The Lunar Society’s holy men had purified the area and cleaned up the bodies.

Even so, no one had wanted to move there. It had become a literal ghost town.

Now, however, the place housed quite a lot of people — the hundreds of Masters that Dryfe had hired for the coming peace talks

“...Man, we’re spending the night in a place with a hell of a history,” one of them said. “This really is just like a classic RPG.”

“I can already imagine zombies or ghosts showing up and taking us out one by one.”

In a building that had once served as an auditorium, the Masters were exchanging their thoughts about the situation.

This would be where they would spend the night, but it hadn’t actually been their first choice. A lot of them had wanted to use the nearby inn, but the bedding — untouched for over a year — reeked of mold, and rumors started to spread about a tian corpse being found in one of the beds, which made everyone forget all about using the inn or any of the local homes, so they ultimately settled for the auditorium.

Although it had the space, it didn’t have any beds, so the Masters were now setting up their sleeping spots. A few hated the very idea of spending the night in a ghost town and had logged out to wait until it was time to leave.

Interestingly, one of those was Hell General, Logan Goddhart — and right before logging out, he’d said, “There’s no way I’m staying here! I’m logging out back to my room!” ...which was exactly the kind of thing you’d hear from the first person to disappear in a horror film.

“...Wouldn’t it be better to just camp outside?”

“You wouldn’t be able to sleep with all the monsters around, dumbass. This is the most appropriate place here in this duchy. It’s even been purified to protect against undead.”

Villages and towns smaller than Lunnings remained untouched by The Lunar Society and still had undead wandering around as a result. The damage done by Gloria was far too great to easily undo.

“We could’ve just lodged somewhere on the western side of the border, then. It’s already been developed by Dryfe.”

“If we stayed there, we wouldn’t make it for the peace talks tomorrow afternoon.”

“...Altar’s guys are probably spending the night in an actual village or something. I’m jealous,” someone complained.

“If what I heard is true, then you should feel bad for them instead,” the other whispered.

“What do you mean?”

“Apparently, like two thirds of their bodyguards were assassinated right before the talks.”

“HUHH?!” another exclaimed.

“Shh...! And Chrono was the one who did it.”

“...Seriously?” Chrono was an infamous figure in Dryfe. After all, a lot of the Masters in their sixth forms had fought him personally. It was also well known that many players had grouped up to face him... only for Chrono to fight them all off.

All of that wasn’t immediately relevant, but there was another pre-Superior who was just as infamous in Dryfe — King of Light, F. In order to avoid getting on the wanted list of his own country, Altar, he’d primarily targeted the imperium for his “reference gathering material.”

Recently, though, he had become more active in the kingdom itself...

“But Chrono’s also one of the bodyguards, right? Ah. Wait, so the thing that happened this afternoon was...”

“Yeah. That’s what caused the fight.”

There had been an incident in one of the groups heading towards the peace talks. One of the more notable Masters — the third in Dryfe’s duel rankings, in fact — had angrily confronted Chrono about the things he’d done in Altar.

Apparently, The Rabbit’s response was somehow... off.

It had enraged the duelist, driving him to challenge Chrono... only for Chrono to give him the death penalty.

“...But that wasn’t a big deal, right?”

“Yeah. I heard that Princess Claudiah said ‘As long as they cause no trouble for tians, conflicts between Masters are not forbidden.’ So yeah, no one’s getting punished for that fight.”

Legally speaking, that was indeed the case.

However, the fact that no one would get punished despite the current political situation sent a cold shiver down all of their spines.

“He assassinated the kingdom’s bodyguards and took out one of our own... yet all of that is apparently a-ok. What the hell are we supposed to make of this?”

“No idea. Though, she probably thinks it’s not much of a problem if we lose one or two bodyguards. I mean, we don’t have much going for us besides our numbers. The only bodyguards who stand out are King of Beasts, Logan, and that problem child, Chrono. The duel ranker Chrono beat wasn’t even a Superior. Honestly, each one of those three are stronger than the rest of us combined.”

“...Hey, why is that, anyway? We have a whole bunch of tougher guys, don’t we?” In preparation for the war with Altar or Caldina (or both), Dryfe had gathered many Masters, and a few of them were indeed battle-focused Superior Jobs. Good examples were King of Magic Cannons, Heldine Rockzapper; King of Eaters, Cata Lugang Euanjelion; and Flow Princess, Juba. There were many other pre-Superiors, but not a single one of them were present here.

“Also, uhh... Her Highness is the only Dryfean tian here, isn’t she?” That was indeed the case. Besides the Master bodyguards, the only Dryfean citizen present was Claudiah herself. There were no officials, no attendant maids... she would be the only tian in the peace talks.

Claudiah was currently staying in the late duke’s residence in this very town, accompanied by no one but the King of Beasts.

“Assassinations and infighting are allowed... the only tian participant is Her Highness... isn’t this kinda weird?”

“...The worst-case scenario I can think of is that these peace talks will just end up being a pretext to start a war.”

“Huh?”

“Imagine if Princess Claudiah dies or gets hurt here. They go on to make it seem like the kingdom’s doing and then kick-start the war with the Superiors that came here with her — King of Beasts and Logan. At the same time, the ones that stayed in Dryfe got ready to invade Quartierlatin to the east. We only have three of our powerhouses here because they’re more than enough — and maybe the rest are tasked to be the invading force. Princess Claudiah is the only tian here because Dryfe lacks personnel and she’s the only one they’re willing to sacrifice... That seem plausible to you?”

“...What about the War Boundary?”

“It’s not like you can’t fight without it. You just don’t get a clear goal.”

“...And that’s why it’s the worst-case scenario, huh?”

“Yeah. These peace talks could bring about the worst kind of war — a messy one. Caldina would also be too busy with Granvaloa to interfere this time, so it’s a good time to start it.”

“This actually doesn’t sound unlikely...”

The Dryfean Masters had held such conversations amongst themselves several times by now. They were simply bodyguards and didn’t truly know what these peace talks would entail, so they could only speculate as they were.

It was probably safe to say, though, that all of their wild guesses did not reflect reality. The imperator's plan for the peace talks was both far more peaceful... and far more crafty than they could ever imagine.

◆◆◆

Old Duke Lunnings' Residence

The Old Duke Lunnings' residence was a luxurious mansion once inhabited by the Duke and his family, but now it was as empty as the rest of the town. The duke had died when Gloria had descended upon the crop inspection he was attending, while his family was wiped out in a shelter beneath the mansion. No matter how safe their location seemed, nothing could stop the Fatal Field.

Now, a year after it was emptied, there were the sounds of human habitation once again ringing through its halls.

The source of these sounds was a facility at the far end of the first floor — the large bathroom.

Specifically, one might hear the sounds of flowing water.

"Truly, baths are wonderful no matter where you are in the world," Claudiah said in satisfaction as she stretched her legs out of the water.

She'd cleaned up the bath, fixed the magic item that supplied hot water, and drawn herself a warm bath; now, she was enjoying it to the fullest.

Claudiah then glanced at the entrance and called out.

"Would you two like to join me?"

"No."

"I'll refrain." The ones who'd replied were King of Beasts, Behemot, and Leviathan. As befitted hired bodyguards, they were watching over Claudiah even as she was bathing.

"It is rather uncomfortable being the only naked one here," she said.

"Why are you bathing in the first place?" Leviathan asked.

"Eh? Because we have the peace talks tomorrow. If I am to meet Altimia, I must clean myself, no?"

"...I'm not sure if a bath with corpses is fit for that purpose." Leviathan's gaze traveled to one corner of the bath.

In that corner, a human-shaped stain was still visible — likely left behind by a person who'd died and decayed there long enough to leave a mark before becoming an undead and walking off.

It was a sign of death that couldn't be easily washed away.

However, Claudiah didn't seem to mind. She bathed happily, as if the stain didn't bother her at all.

"What of it?" she asked. "I've had corpses fall directly on me before. This is nothing."

She tilted her head and moved her fingers around.

Behemot and Leviathan both noticed that she was making the same kinds of motions that she did while wielding a spear.

"Even during last year's civil war, I had blood and guts on me so many times that I lost count." Claudiah played with her pinned-up hair as she sighed, thinking back on the past.

She was referring to the imperator accession civil war — an event that had happened because of two specific people.

The first instigator was the previous imperator, Xanafald Wolfgang Dryfe.

He was over eighty years old before the war started, but he had yet to cede his throne to his crown prince.

In fact, he hadn't even decided who the crown prince was.

At the time, there were two princes worthy of the throne — the first prince, born to a concubine, and the second prince, born to the imperator's legal wife

The imperator hadn't yet declared which prince would take the throne after him. In fact, he actively had them fight for it, implying that the one who survived would be named crown prince.

However, no matter how fiercely they feuded, neither of them killed the other. The first to perish ended up being the third prince and his wife, who weren't even involved in the conflict.

Xanafald's life finally ended before he named a crown prince.

He had written down all of his thoughts in his will, but they seemed to be pure madness

"Fight over the right to the throne. The one who stands at the top will be the next imperator."

Through this will, his implication had become a statement.

Basically, he'd ordered his family to fight each other. It was unclear whether he was sane when he wrote those words, or if age had taken away his reason. Those who knew Xanafald before his health started to decline, though, would claim that he could have easily written those words while of sound mind

Every single person in the imperial family who had any claim to the throne gathered for a meeting at Dryfe Imperstand in the heart of Vandelheim, and there they were all presented with his will.

Many thought that this would be the beginning of the greatest civil war the country had ever known.

They were both completely right... and very, very wrong.

The two princes and all of their supporters were killed mere moments after the will was read out.

This deed was done by someone nobody had expected — a child of the late third prince of Dryfe, and perhaps the least likely candidate for taking the throne... Claudiah R. Dryfe.

The imperial succession civil war that followed was nothing but the unlikely new imperator's struggle to be recognized — to prove to the empire's powerful nobility that she fulfilled the previous imperator's will. The imperator had to wipe out any detractors, which were far more numerous than supporters.

The only people Claudiah and Reinhard had on their side were their direct relatives — the Barbaros family — along with an insignificant number of officials and soldiers, and their friend King of Beasts, Behemot.

They might be few in number... but in the end, they were more than enough.

“How nostalgic,” said Claudiah.

“ggwp,” said Behemot.

“It was obvious that we would survive, but it’s a miracle that all of you did,” said Leviathan.

“Truly. There were many times when I thought that Uncle Gifted’s old friends, the SMTF, would kill me.”

Before the number of Masters began to increase, the Special Mission Task Force was the imperium’s strongest. They were against the current reign and had attempted to assassinate the new imperator on many occasions.

However, their attempts always ended in death at the hands of King of Beasts, Gifted Barbaros, and Claudiah herself.

“That eventually led to Reinhard bringing order to the country, but...” Because the opposition had been wiped out, the leadership of the country was quite monolithic.

The purges of opposing nobles had created a severe shortage of tians working for the government, but they filled the gaps by assigning capable commoners to act as civil servants and bolstering their military with Masters.

Some would say that they’d just drained the pus from a festering wound... but it was more akin to a lizard cutting off its limbs to become a snake, then ascending as a serpentine dragon. That was how drastically the imperator’s leadership had changed the country’s political climate.

The only thing left was to unify with the kingdom... which is what had led to the previous war.

“Dryfe and Altar’s... I mean, Altimia’s future and ours both depend on the peace talks tomorrow. You will have to be the best bodyguard you can be,” Claudiah said to her friend with a smile.

“ic,” Behemot nodded.

“...Speaking of which, I haven’t had the chance to ask... What are the actual goals of these negotiations?”

“Umm... give me a second,” Claudiah said as she put her hand on her temple as if trying to recall something she’d forgotten. “‘We have three possible goals: the first is to completely cease hostilities between our countries while maintaining the current state of both. The second is to merge with Altar via their surrender. The third is to decide the win-lose conditions for the next war. These goals are ordered by priority, from highest to lowest. If nothing else, accomplish the third goal.'"

She'd explained it in a tone that didn't seem like her own.

"...That's what Reinhard said, anyway."

"I see how it is," said Leviathan as she nodded.

"I will really be counting on you tomorrow," said Claudiah.

"kk," added Behemot.

"After Behemot, you're number one on my list of people to protect," said Leviathan. Time passed by and the night grew darker.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

By the time the sun was setting, we'd arrived at Vermina — the village closest to the Altar-Dryfe border.

Though many of the bodyguards had been assassinated last night, our trip from Altea went smoothly. We would spend the night here, then head to the hall prepared for the peace talks come morning.

After dinner, Azurite called us over. By "us," I meant the members of Death Period and Fuso. Tsukikage and the other Lunar Society members were tasked with keeping an eye on the village's surroundings.

Azurite was accompanied by the three tian officials she'd brought with her.

"Why'd you call us here, Azurite?" I asked. "Did something happen?"

"I gathered you together because I need Master opinions on tomorrow's peace talks."

"Our opinions?"

"Indeed. We decided on our terms before we left, but they were made with a tian bias. There might be some possible ideas and plans that we missed, but you Masters would come up with easily. I want to make these final adjustments before we have to leave for the peace talks."

"I see..." I did understand her point of view, but honestly, our "real" selves didn't exactly have much experience with peace talks, either.

Also, cross-national negotiations here were quite different from the ones you saw in reality.

First, there was the military force... the stats you could bring. Then there was Truth Discernment — which could see through lies — among many other skills available to the participants.

And perhaps the biggest difference was the existence of Covenants.

Covenants were items in the same vein as Contracts, except they could only be signed by leaders of countries and their representatives, and going against them would cause terrible things to happen to the entire country — not just those who signed.

To break a Covenant was to doom the country. I'd even heard that one country that had broken a Covenant had its capital consumed by a giant vortex, leaving absolutely nothing behind. This meant that agreements between countries were far more binding than they were in reality.

That was why the coming peace talks would focus on thoroughly looking over each country's conditions, finding a compromise, and signing a Covenant both sides could accept.

That was the goal, and there would be no going back after that.

"Let me start from the beginning," said Azurite. "First, if both countries agree, we've planned to enter a treaty that would forbid 'any and all warlike action between Altar and Dryfe for the next century.'"

A century. Time in Dendro passed three times faster than real time, but I felt like that would still be long enough to make sure there would never be a war between Altar and Dryfe for as long as I was here.

"Define 'warlike action,'" I said.

"Invasion by the military, unlawful occupation of land, and the activation of the War Boundary... Anything smaller than that could result in accidental breach of the Covenant, so there is only so much we can demand."

"But that doesn't prevent the kind of terrorism we saw in Gideon and Quartierlatin, does it?" Marie asked. "Neither incident involved the military and no land was occupied."

"Indeed," Azurite nodded. "We plan to deal with that in our terms for signing the treaty."

"What do you mean?"

"The talks will involve negotiating the treaty conditions. Dryfe actually requested that we present them with our terms and what we are willing to compromise on."

"That's... pretty direct."

So Altar would be negotiating after laying all their cards on the table, huh? I thought.

"It truly is. However, since both sides have Truth Discernment, it will be pointless to bluff or attempt to guess at any ulterior motives."

That reminded me that one of the three officials accompanying Azurite had a build specialized in reading people. Skills like that weren't limited to jobs, though. There could easily be Embryos out there that specialized in reading people's motives, too.

"And? What are our conditions and the compromises we'd be willing to bear?" Shu asked.

"Our first compromise is obvious," Azurite said. "We will abandon the Old Lunnings Duchy."

That was the land that Dryfe had occupied in the last war.

"Are you okay with that?" I asked.

"...It would be worse to keep it, actually. In all honesty, that territory is pretty meaningless to the kingdom now."

According to Azurite, Gloria had devastated the region and killed most of its inhabitants. That had been followed by the destruction of the nearby town of Claymill and the immense losses during the war, so Altar no longer had enough people to repopulate the duchy.

The Lunnings family would have insisted that the kingdom reclaim and restore their territory, but they were all dead now. Control of the Duchy had officially passed to the royal family, who had little use for it.

It had once been the kingdom's biggest grain producer, but in its current decrepit state, it wasn't even worth touching. All of Altar was rich in arable land, so that one Duchy was far from necessary. The other regions nearby also produced far more crops than they consumed.

Besides, even if the kingdom took the land back from Dryfe, it didn't have enough people to dedicate to its development and restoration, so it would really be more trouble than it was worth.

"Dryfe, on the other hand, needs it more than anything else," Azurite continued. "Based on what we know, the imperium's soil is slowly turning fallow for unknown reasons. They're actually suffering famines right now, so they can't simply let go of the Old Lunnings Duchy. If we tried to take it, peace would be impossible. They'd be left with no other option but war."

"So we have one confirmed com-paw-romise, and we need to present conditions we want in exchange for it, huh?" Shu nodded in understanding.

"As I said, the biggest issue is terrorism committed by Dryfean Masters." Last month, Franklin was responsible for an incident in Gideon; this month, Hell General had caused some trouble in Quartierlatin. Although the worst-case scenarios had been averted, both places could have been completely wiped out.

"It already happened twice, so if we were to experience a third such event... perhaps if the King of Beasts attacks the capital or something similar... the situation would be especially bleak."

Shu showed a slight reaction at the mention of the Superior, but said nothing. Acts of terrorism were lethal preemptive strikes. And even if the culprit was put on the kingdom's wanted list, there was nothing stopping them from just coming back over and over again as long as the imperium didn't do the same.

After all, neither Franklin nor the Hell General had ended up in the gaol for their actions.

"That is why I intend to lead with that," said Azurite.

"You mean..."

"The first condition Altar will present will be... 'a shared wanted list.'"

"...I see." That would essentially create a rule that any Dryfean master who committed crimes in Altar and ended up on the kingdom's wanted list would also be added to Dryfe's list. That would certainly prevent the kind of terrorism that had been committed by Franklin and Hell General.

"This would necessitate the creation of additional conditions that prevent Dryfe from falsely accusing, say, Shu or Miss Fuso of some crime in order to put them on the shared wanted list," Rook noted. I was reminded of the fact that, while I was in Torne, Shu had been locked up as a suspect for a crime. Apparently, that was the fault of a Superior who wanted to frame Shu, but honestly, it wasn't out of the question that countries could conspire to do something similar.

One of the officials wrote down Rook's opinion.

"That is true," said Azurite. "Anything else?"

"This condition would bind Altar as much as it binds Dryfe. Both countries would come out approximately equal in that deal." said B3. "Although Dryfe already occupies it, you're letting go of an entire region. Why not make a condition that's more beneficial for us?"

She had a point. And honestly, I agreed that wouldn't do enough to bind the imperium.

"Indeed," Azurite nodded. "We have several conditions in mind, and I would like your opinion on all of them."

The officials then handed us booklets printed using Secretary skills. They contained a list of conditions the kingdom might present to Dryfe.

"Hmm? I like the demand for reparations," said Fuso after just a moment of looking at the list. "Why not go with that and present it as 'compensation to the bereaved families of those who died in the war'?"

"What's your reasoning on that?" Azurite asked.

"Dryfe became powerful by hiring Masters out of their own pockets, didn't they? That's why I think you should take a bite of their military funding. The more reparations they pay, the fewer Masters they can hire. It's perfect for keeping them in check."

She had a point. Before Franklin's Game, Hugo had told me that the war had been extremely costly for Dryfe. In that case, damaging their finances was a good way to limit their actions, but...

"But if the treaty is passed, warlike action will be forbidden," said B3. "On top of that, the first condition will make it impossible for their Masters to touch Altar, too."

I shared her opinion. What was the point of targeting military funds if we were about to enter a peace treaty?

"You're sooo innocent, B," said Fuso. "They could very well hire freelance Masters, you know? Money talks, and if it's loud enough, you can easily attract Superiors and pre-Superiors who are both skilled and willing to become terrorists. Hey, they could even get their own Masters to do it. They just have to not be afraid of going to gaol. In either case, Dryfe would need more money to hire Masters than they do now, but that's all the more reason to hit them in the wallet."

Oh yeah, they really could do that... I thought in surprise.

Azurite was even more shocked than I was. "That is just... so..." she muttered, clearly shaken. Tians seemed to consider the gaol a much worse fate than we ourselves did. Although there were exceptions like Hannya, whose crimes were minor, the vast majority of the outlaws sent there would never return, making it seem like a death sentence. I supposed that this was one of the differences in tian and Master opinions that Azurite had mentioned.

There were probably some optimizations to be made for the first condition.

"I wouldn't expect less from the un-bear-able, greedy, cunning she-fox," said Shu.

"Why, thank you. Maybe you could learn a thing or two, Mr. 'I'll sell popcorn to buy ammo.'"

What followed was an uncomfortable silence.

...Was it really necessary to create such a hostile mood here? I wondered.

We continued to discuss, but in the end we went for the condition first proposed, plus Fuso's idea.

"Though, we gotta bear in mind that they can also demand much more than just the Old Lunnings Duchy," said Shu.

"Indeed," Azurite nodded. "It's not out of the question that they would want me to marry the imperator so our respective countries could merge."

"...And take Altar as it is, huh?" I said.

"Apparently, the idea is not new."

"Huh?"

"Before the war, Altar and Dryfe were on good terms. I was a transfer student there, and Prince Hallon — the first prince's eldest son — was a transfer student in Altar."

"Oh yeah, you did say something like that. You even had a really good friend there, didn't you?"

"Yes... That same friend is also the person I will be negotiating with... Princess Claudiah."

"So..." Azurite was going to face an old friend and negotiate the fate of her country?

"It is possible that they selected Claudiah for the peace talks specifically because we were friends... Back to the matter at hand, though. Since Altar and Dryfe were on such good terms, there was talk of a possible alliance or even merger by marriage between the royal and imperial families."

I said nothing and waited for her to continue.

"Only my father knew about that idea, other than the Arch Sage — his advisor — and a few other high-ranking individuals. Even I only learned of it recently, from reading the records they left behind."

So it hadn't become common knowledge because it wasn't set in stone, huh?

"Countries that once got along sooo well are now at war," said Fuso. "What a twist of fate."

"...Truly."

"And what'll you do if they come bearing a marriage or merger demand?" Shu asked.

"I would never accept," Azurite instantly replied. "Our people wouldn't tolerate something like that. Also, though Dryfe's military power is growing, as a country it's weakening. Merging with them would only make things harder for the kingdom."

When it came to military power, Dryfe had many Masters, as well as five Superiors, one of which was the famed King of Beasts, the Physical Apex. However, their people were dying to famines, their wealth had been drained by war, and the civil war for the imperial throne had left them with a shortage of leaders.

With so many negatives, the kingdom had nothing to gain from merging with Dryfe.

"In the first place, we have no need for any Dryfean land, resources, or technology. Whether it's war or a merger, Altar stands to gain nothing."

Altar wasn't expansionist — they were even fully willing to let go of the Old Lunnings Duchy.

While Dryfe lacked food production capacity, it was rich in minerals... but that meant little to a non-industrialized country such as Altar. The kingdom's technology, at least when it came to machines, wasn't advancing much... and there was still more than enough R&D to be done in the recently-unearthed ruins in Quartierlatin.

There was really no point in pushing for open war or a merger with Dryfe. It was a net negative for Altar that the war had begun at all.

"Actually... we gained nothing, and lost much," Azurite said as she hung her head.

"Azurite..."

The war had taken so much from Azurite — her people, her teachers, and even her own father.

I couldn't even begin to gauge what kind of emotion went into those words.

Despite that, she raised her head and looked at us before saying, “That is why we must end this. These are the conditions and compromises we will present to them. In exchange for the Old Lunnings Duchy, we would demand that our countries share wanted lists and that they pay reparations. The bargain may be weighted in Dryfe’s favor, but it will end the war.”

She looked us all over before continuing.

“However... just like last night’s ambushes, there could be some trouble at the peace talks... or it could all turn out to be a trap. If that happens...”

“You can count on us,” I said. “If Dryfe bares its fangs, we will protect you... and Altar.”

“Ray...”

“We Masters can help you and your kingdom, right?” I asked, recalling a question I’d asked her back in Quartierlatin.

In response, she said, “...Certainly!”

And so, it was decided. Come what may, we would give our all to seize the possibility Azurite desired.

Thus ended the last night before the peace talks.

When the sun rose, we would travel to an assembly where countless conflicting motives intertwined into a final apex.

Our goal was to get the peace treaty signed and end the meeting without any trouble.

Let the quest... begin.

Chapter Six: Peace Conference

Paladin, Ray Starling

"MUAHAHAHAHAHAHAH! I've been waiting for you, Unbreakable!" Upon our arrival to the location appointed for the peace talks, I was greeted by a familiar voice — though it was laughing in an unfamiliar manner.

It came from the imposing shape standing in the middle of the path leading to our gathering place — a handsome red-haired man known as Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

"Heheheh! From what I can tell, you've only gotten two new low-rank jobs since we last met! And you didn't even upgrade your gear! I'm different, though! I have been reborn! I'm so powerful now, I'm practically a new man." I said nothing and just let him ramble. "...Hm? Ah, I see your Embryo's clothes are different! Did you evolve it to high-rank?! Well, that alone won't be enough to defeat me!"

That was unexpectedly direct of him.

Just like he said, Nemesis' evolution to the fourth form had indeed slightly changed her clothing — she was dressed a bit more extravagantly than before. Her physical appearance didn't change much overall, though, and she herself wasn't too pleased about that.

"I've been waiting for the day I could wipe away the disgrace you and Franklin have burdened me with! It's time for a rematch! I'll beat you and prove my power to—"

"stfu"

"This isn't the time, place, or situation for that." Logan's words were cut short by someone who came up from behind him and grabbed him by the neck.

"Ah...!" he gasped. The immense amount of pressure on his throat left him completely unable to say anything more.

The person grabbing him was a lady I'd seen way back when I first met up with Shu in Gideon. She was grasping Logan's neck with her left hand while cradling a porcupine in her right arm.

Shu had already told me that these two were none other than King of Beasts, Behemot, and her Embryo, Leviathan.

"...Now that I see them, I can say this with absolute certainty," said Nemesis as she looked at Leviathan. "She and I are birds of a feather."

Just like Fuso's Kaguya, Leviathan was a Maiden that had evolved into a Superior Embryo. She'd probably been wearing equipment to hide her true identity before, because the oppressive aura rolling off of her now was impossible to compare to what she'd been like before.

While Kaguya was best compared to the Moon dominating everything from the sky above, Leviathan was the incarnation of violence, bearing the potential to shatter entire planets.

But despite wielding such power, it seemed like she was behaving for now, and even holding back... if only barely.

I was so tense that I could feel sweat start to pool in my palms.

This was one of Infinite Dendrogram's three apexes — the Physical Apex.

Barely able to make a sound, Hell General tapped on Leviathan's hand. He was quickly turning bright purple from lack of air.

"Oh? Hit your limit already? You're in worse shape than I thought," said Leviathan as she let him go.

Logan fell to the ground and gasped raggedly for breath before glaring at her and the King of Beasts and grunting out, "You...!"

"You are here as a bodyguard," Leviathan continued. "Keep the personal rivalries somewhere far away from these peace talks."

"What?!" Logan raised his voice, nearly bursting a blood vessel in rage as he used Instant Equip to draw his sword.

"If you continue to misbehave like this, I can take your head off right now," Leviathan said, grabbing his head again at a speed that made me feel like I was watching stop-motion. It was easy to see that her slender fingers could pluck it off with as much effort as picking a flower. "Have I made myself clear?"

The Hell General had no choice but to nod, and once she let him go, he blurted out, "Shit!" and fled immediately.

To my knowledge, Logan was a Master who primarily fought using his summons and wasn't much of a threat from a close range. Still, he was a Superior, and Leviathan had just made him look like a weakling. Rather than meaning that Logan was insignificant, though, it really meant that the King of Beasts was far too powerful.

“Apologies for the unbecoming sight. Good day to you, Altarians. I have been entrusted by Her Highness Claudiah to welcome you. My name is Leviathan and this my Master, Behemot,” she said before bowing her head. “The peace talks begin in two hours. We have a room prepared for you, so we request that you wait there. Allow me to show you the way.”

“...Very well,” said Azurite, who seemed rather tense — likely because she was facing Dryfe’s most powerful assets. Had King of Beasts been chosen for this role just to put pressure on the kingdom? Or was there some other reason?

“By the way, where’s Chronooo?” Tom asked.

“I do not know,” Leviathan curtly responded.

[I think that King of Beasts is the one greeting us because they’re beary cautious of The Rabbit,] Shu said to me through our Telepathy Cuffs.

[Huh?]

[Assassinations before the event are one thing, but if they attacked us here, it would be complete panda-monium. I’m beary sure that Dryfe wants this treaty to go well.]

That made sense. That must’ve also been the reason why they stopped Logan from causing trouble.

I guess they don’t actually want this whole thing to fall apart, then? I wondered.

[...Or maybe they just want us to relax so we’re caught off guard by the real trap,] Shu added. I could only hope that wasn’t the case.

Last night, we’d agreed that Tsukikage, a few other Lunar Society members, and — by his own wish — Tom would scout the area around the building while the rest of us would accompany Azurite. We would act as bodyguards for her and the officials all throughout the meeting.

As I talked, King of Beasts and Leviathan led us through the assembly hall.

This place had been built right after Dryfe proposed the peace treaty to Altar, but unlike temporary buildings you’d see in real life, it actually looked really well-made.

According to Azurite, it looked exactly like the assembly hall she’d seen in Vandelheim.

Shu guessed that it had been made using a construction-focused Embryo that had copied either the existing building or its blueprints.

Well, there were people like Franklin, who could create monsters, so there was no reason there couldn't be a Master who created buildings just as easily. Dryfe also had many more Masters than Altar, which made it even more likely that they could have someone with such an unusual skill set.

We now have as many Superiors as they do, but if a war breaks out, Altar will still be at a disadvantage, I thought.

"Please wait here until the appointed time," said Leviathan, after she'd led us to a room that looked like the presidential suite straight out of an ad for a luxurious hotel. This had to be some sort of guest room for VIPs.

With her job done, Leviathan left the room. King of Beasts shot one last glare at Shu, but didn't actually say anything.

"...Marie, are there any traps in here?" I asked.

"Hmm... No. Not a single one, and no listening device. I'm almost worried." Marie was a Superior Job focused on hiding and finding hidden things, so I had absolutely no reason to doubt her on this.

"Even if there aren't any traps inside, the right ultimate skill from the outside could easily kill us all," said Fuso, and I glared at her. "Oh, don't make that face. We have our devout patrolling the area." Fuso then giggled mischievously. "Well, we're outnumbered, so maybe they wouldn't be enough. If numbers are their only advantage, though, then you don't have to worry about a thing."

"Hm...?" Was she saying that because her Lunar Divider Field was so potent in large-scale battles?

"So, Rook, did ya notice anything when you looked at their faces?" Shu asked.

"Hell General wanted to fight Ray, while King of Beasts wanted to fight you. That's it, though. At the very least, I'm certain Hell General isn't plotting anything."

"Well, knowing the history between us, that's a beary reasonable reaction even if Dryfe doesn't have some plan in mind."

That's true, I thought.

"So, Ray," he then spoke to me. "Did ya use your Reveal?"

Normally, the stats of high-level people were hard to see. My Reveal was at level 5. That was the highest level I could get as a Scout, but it could still be easily resisted by people who were high enough level. Even the lowest level of Conceal could completely prevent me from seeing basically anything.

However, I'd been able to see their stats without any problem — meaning neither of them were trying to hide.

"Yeah... For some reason, Hell General was only about level 500."

"I guess he started respeccing after he lost to you. That's some bad timing. Fur real," Shu said before looking at Fuso for some reason. "What about the King of Beasts? Unlike in Gideon, she didn't seem to be wearing any Conceal gear."

"Yeah, I saw her stats too, but..."

In a way, what I saw for King of Beasts was even stranger than what I saw for Logan.

Behemot.

Job: King of Beasts.

Level: 1156 (Total Level: 1656)

HP: 108060

MP: 3350

SP: 48980

STR: 10050

AGI: 15315

END: 9980

DEX: 1502

LUK: 125

Her level was extremely high. She was in the same tier as Shu — one of the highest level people I knew. I couldn't say the same about her stats, though. Most of her stats were higher than Shu's — who'd specced heavily into STR — but on average, her numbers were far lower.

My guess here was that these stats were largely unaffected by Embryo stat growth bonuses. They were, however, far from deserving of the title "Physical Apex." For a moment, I thought that she'd been showing me fake stats, just like Marie had done at first, but...

"The King of Beasts isn't scary because of her own level or stats, is she?" I asked.

"Yeah. King of Beasts is bad news because of Leviathan."

“...Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.” That was the thing B3 had mentioned once and the thing I’d learned about before this event — the blueprint for what was considered to be the strongest of all builds in Infinite Dendrogram.

It had been perfected in King of Beasts, Behemot, and that was what gave her the title of “Physical Apex.”

“We talked about this before, but... if a battle breaks out, I’ll be the one fighting,” said Shu. “...Right now, I’m the only one that can handle them. Though, if it was night, the she-fox could use the ace up her sleeve.”

“Hm...?” Oh right... it had to be night for Kaguya to use her ultimate skill. Did that mean Fuso was actually able to stand up to the King of Beasts at the right time of day?

“I don’t recall seeing the details of Prez’s ultimate skill in The Lunar Society’s database...” said B3.

“Ahahah! Oh, B. Of course it wouldn’t be there. It’s my top secret trump card that more or less guarantees my victory... The only one who’s ever beaten me while I was using it is this bear here... You real-life hacker.”

“I don’t wanna hear that fur-om you.” This reminded me that Fuso had once actually given Figaro the death penalty. Shu had gone on to fight and defeat her right after that.

“Well, the best thing we could’ve hoped for in our situation is Lei-Lei being with us,” said Shu.

“...More like the worst thing,” said Fuso with a grimace. “I can totally see myself getting caught up in whatever she does and dying anyway.”

Although Lei-Lei was part of our clan, she wasn’t with us here because of her business in real life. I also didn’t know anything about her fighting style or build. All I knew was that she liked spiking drinks.

“Hey, Shu, is Lei-Lei really that amazing?” I asked.

“...She’s so dangerous that you can ask any of us Big Three about the one person we don’t wanna fight, and all of us will point to her. She’s not ‘amazing’ or ‘strong,’ just beary, beary dangerous.”

...Now that was a lot of emphasis.

“If you ask her about it yourself, or if you ever get a taste of what she does... you’ll know what I mean,” he added.

“...I prefer the former.” I’d heard enough to know that I really didn’t wanna fight her.

An hour had passed since we'd been led to the suite, and an hour more was left until the start of the talks. Azurite and the officials were busy with preparations and final checks. They'd also contacted Altar and confirmed that there were no urgent matters that needed addressing.

At that moment, someone knocked on the door.

"It's... just one person," said Marie, just from one glance at the door. That meant it wasn't King of Beasts and Leviathan. Who could it be, then?

"May I come in?" the person outside asked. The voice was unfamiliar to me — but not to Azurite, apparently.

With slight surprise on her face, she replied, "Come in."

"Pardon the intrusion," said the person before opening the door, revealing a very... princess-like girl with curled blonde hair. She seemed to be about Azurite's age.

"Altimia! It has been so long!" she said.

"It really has been... Claudiah," Azurite replied, and it was our turn to be surprised.

Her Highness Claudiah herself. She was the person Azurite would be negotiating with in these peace talks.

It was shocking to me that someone that important would casually come to visit us in the waiting room.

Azurite, however, just stood up from her chair and greeted her with a handshake.

"It has been... far too long!" Her Highness Claudiah, embracing Azurite warmly.

"Ah...?!"

We were all unsure how to react to this.

"Ugh! It really has been far, far, far too long! After you returned to Altar, we could only talk by sending letters, but even that became impossible because of the war..."

"...Yet you still love to embrace your friends, I see," commented Azurite. Like a child, Claudiah clung to Azurite with tears in her eyes while Azurite patted her on the back as though used to all of this.

They seemed to be off in a world of their own, separated from us Masters.

"...Ah! I-I am so sorry!" Her Highness Claudiah said as she suddenly backed away from Azurite. "I only came to greet you before the talks begin, but when I saw your face, I was just overwhelmed with emotion." She looked bashful and her cheeks flushed a rosy red.

"No need to worry," said Azurite. "I am also happy to see an old friend again."

"Altimia... th-thank you," Her Highness said with a blissful smile.

"That aside, is this not a bit careless of you? You are the representative to your country and the only member of the imperial family besides the imperator."

"Oh, there's no need to worry about that!" Her Highness said. "I mean, I am sure that both countries want the same thing. Neither side really wants to cause any trouble!"

She puffed her chest as she said that, and her words left us all unsure about how to react. The Rabbit and Logan had already made a bit of a mess, so hearing all of that made us all want to chuckle wryly.

"Hm...?" One of us did have a different reaction, though. Rook was staring at Her Highness with a bead of cold sweat running down his forehead.

"Anyway, I just came to greet you! We can chat about personal matters after the talks! See you soon!" And with those final words, Her Highness Claudiah ran off like a gust of wind. While everyone was busy staring at her back, unsure how to react, I walked up to Rook.

"Rook... Did you notice something strange?" I silently asked.

"...I'm not sure how to put it, actually."

"Did she lie or anything?"

"No. She meant everything she said. Nobody's Truth Discernment went off, so I'm sure I'm not mistaken there. But..." he wiped the sweat off his cheek before continuing. "At times, she didn't seem human to me."

"...What do you mean?"

"On the outside, she was exactly as she presented herself, but I couldn't even see what was on the inside. I've never seen someone like that."

I had no words. Rook was extremely good at reading others' thoughts and figuring out exactly what kind of people they were. The fact that he would give such an evaluation, combined with the prospect of Azurite facing her in the peace talks, sent a cold chill down my spine.

◇

The remaining hour before the talks was uneventful, and the peace talks began as planned.

Azurite and Her Highness Claudiah exchanged a formal greeting completely unlike the one they'd shared earlier, and the negotiation began.

...And right after they began, we realized that our chilling premonitions weren't unwarranted.

"Let us begin these negotiations by presenting our goals. To find a compromise, each side must understand what the other wants," said Her Highness. They then exchanged the documents they'd prepared for this, allowing both sides to consider the other's demands and decide where they were willing to compromise.

Upon seeing Dryfe's document, I had to suppress a gasp of shock. I mean, who could blame me for my response, honestly?

Just as we'd discussed last night, Altar's first condition was a counter-terrorist measure — "a shared wanted list."

That condition had also been revised a bit to make sure that once the treaty was signed, false accusations and additions specifically targeting the other country would be strictly forbidden.

Well, one of Dryfe's demands was... "a unified wanted list for both Altar and Dryfe."

It was as though they already knew what the kingdom would demand. That wasn't the end of it, though.

The kingdom's second condition was "reparations to the bereaved families of those who'd died in battle as a result of the invasion."

Dryfe’s second compromise was “the payment of condolence money to the Altarian families who lost family members to the war.”

Altar’s first compromise was “abandonment of the Old Lunnings Duchy.”

Dryfe’s first condition was “the acquisition of the Old Lunnings Duchy.”

I was flabbergasted. The list was a perfect mirror. There was nothing to argue about — all of the conditions were in complete agreement.

Had Altar’s conditions been leaked? That couldn’t be the case. We’d done the final revisions just last night... And this bodyguard duty involved signing confidentiality agreements using actual Contracts. This couldn’t have leaked from us.

Did we have a spy, then? That couldn’t be it, either. With Marie and Tsukikage keeping watch, sneaking in to steal the info would be nearly impossible.

That left only one possibility... that someone had actually predicted all our conditions and demands to the letter, and this was the result of Dryfe’s planning alone.

“I’m so glad! I knew our countries wanted the same thing! There is nothing for us to even argue about!” said Her Highness with a smile, but we Altarians found it hard to share her sentiment.

The officials were also clearly shaken by this unexpected turn of events.

Azurite alone was an exception.

“Hey, Claudiah,” she said.

“Yes? What is it?”

“Like you said, many of our desires are the same, but,” she said as she pointed at the document. “There is one point that is not.”

She was pointing at the only stain on the otherwise perfect reflection — Dryfe’s second condition.

It was “removal of Masters from the wanted list.”

More specifically, “all Masters that were added to the wanted list during the period prior to the signing of the peace treaty shall be immediately removed.”

“Hm...?” I raised an eyebrow. That was something that we hadn’t even considered last night. We were expecting something along the lines of a country merger or a marriage between Azurite and the imperator...

“...May I have your reasoning?” Azurite asked.

“It is simple,” said Her Highness. “If Altar and Dryfe’s wanted lists are to be unified, we would lose two Superiors. We have no intention of fighting Altar anymore, but we still have Caldina and other countries to worry about. Losing two Superiors in a situation like ours would greatly damage our defenses.”

That was actually understandable. Accepting this condition would make it so that both Dryfean Masters on Altar’s wanted list and Altarian Masters on Dryfe’s wanted list would be exonerated.

That would include both Franklin and Logan.

No one’s Truth Discernment went off and Rook wasn’t saying anything, meaning that Her Highness Claudiah truly and honestly wanted this done not to combat Altar, but in order to be prepared for potential aggression from other countries.

...Still, it was really infuriating that two people who’d got on the wanted list for acts of terror would now be totally innocent.

Azurite’s silence made it clear that she felt similarly.

Then again, this was a far more tolerable condition than forcing a merger or a marriage. After all, if this treaty fell apart, those two would still be free to do whatever they wanted. If it meant preventing any further acts of terror, it did seem wise to exonerate them now...

“...Hold it,” said Shu, breaking our trains of thought. He had spent most of his time here focusing on the King of Beasts right behind Her Highness. Why had he spoken up now?

“What is it? I would prefer if bodyguards stay silent during this,” Her Highness said, seemingly a bit troubled and sulky all of a sudden. It made her seem almost childish.

“Sorry, but I just can’t stay quiet on this,” Shu continued, not minding her. “Princess, in case you didn’t realize — you can’t, under any circumstances, undo the wanted list.”

“In case I did not realize... what?” Azurite asked.

“It says that you have to remove the Masters who got on the list prior to the signing of the peace treaty,” Shu said as he made a bitter face and pointed at the second condition. “You know Sechs, whom I sent to the gaol myself? Or Candy, who was beaten by the Superior Killer...? Well, if this passes, they’d all be able to use Altar’s save points again.”

“Ah...?!” He was completely right. Masters ended up in the gaol because being on wanted lists prevented them from using any existing save points, making the gaol their only option. But what would happen if all the criminals in the gaol were suddenly exonerated and, as a result, could use save points outside of it? Would they all be able to come here again? That had probably never happened before, but the possibility alone made this condition into a real landmine.

I looked over and noticed that Marie was also frowning bitterly. That told me all I needed to know about how bad the King of Plagues was. Shu was also so desperate it was actually kind of scary, which told me all I needed to know about the threat posed by the King of Crime.

We'd spotted the hidden danger of the second condition, and Her Highness reacted...

"That certainly is dangerous! Very well — I will change the condition right away!"

...By quickly retracting it.

"I will instead ask that you only remove the Dryfean Superiors," she continued. "They may have caused trouble in the kingdom, certainly, but the imperium still needs them."

She went on to revise the condition. Logan was standing behind them, and the words "the imperium still needs them" made him look really proud of himself.

"Can you really change the conditions that easily?" Azurite asked.

"I can," Her Highness said as she puffed out her chest. "I have been given full discretionary powers. I can freely cover for any holes in our treaty!"

[It's not impossible that they knew about this loophole from the start,] said Shu telepathically.

[I see...] I replied.

They'd presented an outrageous demand at first, something our side would have to refuse, then scaled it down a little to make their real demand easier to swallow. That was negotiation 101 — a technique so basic that even novices knew about it. The exoneration of Franklin and Logan seemed like an easy compromise now, despite how many people on our side would have objected initially.

Now, it seemed that we might be able to try for another concession in exchange for accepting this demand, and once that was done, the peace treaty would be complete. In the end, Altar would only have to give up on the Old Lunnings Duchy — which we'd already planned on abandoning. Everything was going smoothly. War with Dryfe and the danger of terrorism from their Masters would finally be off the table completely.

...Though, I couldn't shake the feeling that I was overlooking something.

It was decided that in exchange for letting Dryfe's second condition pass, Altar would receive even more reparations and a transfer of resources. While Dryfe's second condition had some trouble going through, all of Altar's conditions were accepted easily.

Since they had so many demands and compromises in common, the talks lasted only about two hours, which was rather short for a treaty intended to completely eliminate the prospect of war.

Once everything was settled, the peace treaty looked like this:

Peace Treaty

This document shall forbid any warlike action between The Kingdom of Altar and Dryfe Imperium.
"Warlike action" includes:

1. Post-treaty activation of the War Boundary targeted at the other country.
2. Post-treaty invasion by military forces.
3. Post-treaty unlawful occupation of the other country's territory.
4. Post-treaty requests to Masters involving violence against or kidnapping of key individuals from the other country, or otherwise inciting your country's Masters to commit such acts.

Conditions for Peace: With the signing of this treaty, the Kingdom of Altar and Dryfe Imperium shall do the following:

1. The Kingdom of Altar shall transfer ownership of the Old Lunnings Duchy over to Dryfe Imperium.
2. Post-treaty, both countries shall maintain a common wanted list. (Those mentioned in point 4 shall be exempt from the common wanted list until they are removed from the standard one.)

3. Within a week, Dryfe Imperium shall transfer the listed amount in reparations and resources to the Kingdom of Altar.
4. Within a week post-treaty, the Kingdom of Altar shall have to remove the two individuals mentioned below from their wanted list.

    - Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin.
    - Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

This was the best we could do to prevent terrorism. All that was left was for the leaders or representatives of both countries to activate the Covenant by signing it.

The acting ruler and first princess of Altar, Azurite, and Her Highness Claudiah of Dryfe, who'd been given full authority here, were perfectly qualified to do this.

"It's done!" Her Highness said. She'd written down "Claudiah R. Dryfe" and handed the Covenant over to Azurite.

Azurite looked it over to see if there were any discrepancies between what was discussed and what was written on the official Covenant, but apparently she didn't see anything amiss.

"Ugh! There's no need for you to be so cautious. The Covenant has not been tampered with!" Claudiah said.

Azurite's Truth Discernment yet again remained silent, so she just sighed in relief and said, "It seems you are right."

She took the writing brush. Now, she would finally sign the document, making the peace treaty complete.

Still, I wasn't sure why, but... watching her prepare to sign sent a cold chill down my spine, as if she was doing something really dangerous. Why, though? Was I missing something...?

"Ray?" Shu asked, noticing my apprehension. As I stood there, still unable to pinpoint why all these alarm bells were going off inside my head, Azurite put the brush to the Covenant...

"...Ah."

...And that was when I noticed the Hell General at the edge of my vision.

The sight of him made me recall a particular conversation with Marie, in a flash of insight.

At that moment...

"...STOP!" I shouted out, as if in a fit.

Azurite halted right before she signed and looked at me in surprise.

Everyone was staring at me. Most were simply confused why I stopped Azurite...

...But Her Highness Claudiah was looking at me with eyes so cold they could have been mechanical.

"...I am uncertain how to feel about you raising your voice like that. This is a historic moment, signaling lasting peace between our countries. I did not expect someone to interrupt it like that. You are very like your brother, I see," she said, looking at me as if she found this situation awkward.

"Ray...?" Azurite said as she shot me a worried glance.

Still... I'd noticed something that made me unable to stay silent.

Upon seeing Logan, I remembered the person who'd defeated him in a duel.

Marie had once described her like this:

"Speaking of The Fatal Seal of the Four Seas, she escaped Granvaloa after stealing a national treasure. That got her on their wanted list, and she's more infamous than famous now."

The person who'd defeated the Hell General and the current top of Dryfe's duel rankings. The person who was on every wanted list... King of Thieves.

"Why...?"

"Hm?"

"Why isn't King of Thieves included in the second condition?" Why wasn't the King of Thieves among the Dryfean Superiors that Altar had to remove from their wanted list?

Her Highness Claudiah herself had said that they "would lose two Superiors." She hadn't even counted the King of Thieves, Zeta, who was also surely on Altar's list, too. And yet, that hadn't made anyone's Truth Discernment go off.

My words had made Her Highness Claudiah's eyes grow even colder, and Azurite looked at the Covenant again as though she realized what I meant.

“Oh,” said Her Highness. “It’s true that she is not listed, but she has not done anything within the kingdom, has she?”

“That’s not the point...” King of Thieves was not on the list not because they’d just forgotten to include her. “I should’ve realized what was going on when they completely predicted our conditions.” I had no idea why I hadn’t. Had I been overwhelmed by the shock? Or was that all part of the plan too? “I should’ve realized that they could take advantage of it.”

“Whatever do you mean?” Claudiah tilted her head, but I was half-certain that she was faking it.

She surely knew exactly what I meant.

“The Kingdom’s first condition covers requests made after the peace treaty is signed...” That was our blind spot — the trap that could easily be missed exactly because they’d predicted our demands so precisely. “...But the same doesn’t apply to requests made before the signing.” The treaty would forbid hostile requests after the treaty was signed, but there was absolutely nothing in there against requests made before the treaty existed, even if those requests were fulfilled after. “If you could figure out what we were thinking so easily, or if you were confident you could lead us into doing what you wanted, you could easily have requested someone to commit an act of terror on your behalf before the peace conference even started.”

“But Ray,” objected Azurite. “That would still count as an attack by Dryfe. That would go against the treaty.”

“It wouldn’t,” I curtly replied. She was partially right — the peace treaty included a line that forbade inciting your country’s Masters to acts of violence or kidnapping against the other country. Even if the request was made before the treaty, this line would mean it was still in violation of it.

That was why...

“That’s why King of Thieves isn’t named.”

Claudiah was silent.

“After all... King of Thieves is no longer affiliated with Dryfe — she’s a freelance Master.”

That was why she hadn’t been counted by Claudiah or even alluded to in the writing. If King of Thieves had been mentioned as part of Dryfe’s defense force, that might’ve activated someone’s Truth Discernment.

“If a request is made before the treaty is signed and the Master in question is no longer part of Dryfe, it doesn't actually violate the treaty. That's why Dryfe would receive absolutely no punishment if King of Thieves does something in Altar after this is signed," I said.

Of course, it was possible that they hadn't fully predicted the kingdom's intentions. It was possible that the treaty's terms would end up being completely different, or just that the final document would end up not including this loophole. In that case, they would be able to just send out an order to stop the request. After all, while orders to attack were against the treaty, orders to stop attacks certainly weren't.

I kept going. "And here is the greatest problem of all."

Yeah... the fact that King of Thieves was free to act was just the beginning.

The greatest problem for the kingdom was right there on the treaty, written down in black and white.

"If King of Thieves did what Franklin tried and kidnapped someone to Dryfe... we'd be unable to get them back." If they took someone, Altar would be unable to rescue them. This could perhaps lead to future negotiations where Altar was at a tremendous disadvantage. "Once the treaty is signed, we wouldn't have any way to retaliate against that at all."

"Ah...!" Azurite gasped in realization.

Altar wouldn't be able to restart the war.

Altar wouldn't be able to dispatch Masters to retrieve the victim.

If the kingdom tried it, the treaty would punish us for attacking Dryfe.

The peace treaty would completely paralyze Altar.

In some senses, this would actually be worse than merely giving up or merging with them. Becoming a single country would at least leave room for rebellious factions within, but an opposing country bound by a Covenant would be completely powerless to reach them.

I now understood why Claudiah had come to say hello to Azurite today.

"I am sure that both countries want the same thing. Neither side really wants to cause any trouble!"

Truth Discernment confirmed that she was telling the truth there.

Of course she was. Both countries wanted to let the treaty pass without any problems. They wanted these peace talks to end without things escalating. There was no trap here.

After all, Dryfe's trap would only activate after the signing.

They seemed to desire peace, but there was a cunning strategy hidden just below the surface.

"...Do you have proof of that?" Claudiah asked.

"I don't," I admitted. This was just something I thought of based on what she'd said and the loophole I'd noticed in the Covenant.

It was possible, but I had no proof that they'd actually done something like that.

That was why...

"If my conjecture is wrong, just say it, loud and clear." If that was a lie, Truth Discernment wouldn't miss it. "If what you say is true, you can throw me in the gaol as a delusional madman who endangered this important event." If my worry was totally unfounded, I'd have no regrets even if it led to that.

In response...

"You are completely right."

...Claudiah confirmed everything.

"Claudiah, you...!" Azurite cried out.

"...Franklin told me that your brain really starts working when it matters, but I didn't expect you to notice something so minor. I am impressed that you could see through Reinhard's plan."

"...I don't think it's that impressive, actually." Usually, Shu or Rook would've been the one who noticed something like this. However, Shu was closely watching King of Beasts' every move, while Rook was laser-focused on Claudiah, whom he said he couldn't even read. They couldn't spare the attention for noticing this loophole, and I just happened to stumble over it by chance.

Even now, Shu wasn't saying a word because of how focused he was.

After all, the peace talks were now officially canceled.

"Such a shame. The total casualties would have been far smaller if the treaty was passed without a hitch." Claudiah let out a deep breath. "Because of you, I will now have to pull the trigger and expedite the situation."

She took out a switch much like the one once used by Franklin...

"What a shame. I'd originally intended to signal that the peace treaty was signed, but, well... I suppose it's time for plan B."

...And pressed it as though declaring the beginning... or the end.

Interlude: The Assault on Altea

???

An electronic sound rang out from a device in the corner of the room.

It was heard by a single woman — King of Thieves, Zeta.

She was doing little besides listening to it. The device had been given to her by the imperator, but despite that, it was profoundly simple. Paired with a couple of switches, its only function was to make one of two electronic noises, depending on which switch was pressed.

It was so specialized in range and counter-jamming that this was the only thing it could do — but knowing its purpose, that was more than enough.

The device was intended to inform Zeta in case the negotiations went awry or if the operation was canceled. The sound that had rung out a moment earlier indicated the former.

Their peaceful-yet-subtle plan A had been called off in favor of their more direct plan B.

“Shame,” Zeta said. “This means my desire wasn’t fulfilled.”

Dryfe’s second condition, in its original form, had been Zeta’s own request. Sechs Würfel — the leader of I.F. — was currently in the gaol, and she saw this condition as a way of getting him (and Gerbera) out of it.

However, she did say that she wouldn’t mind it much if Altar refused her demand, or if the entire negotiation process failed as it apparently had just now. If it had actually passed, Zeta would’ve helped Dryfe in their anti-Caldina efforts, but it was fine by her if it didn’t. In her mind, Sechs could get out of the gaol by himself anyway.

All that was left for her was to commence the anti-Altar operation Dryfe had already paid her for — her first and final job for the imperium.

“Very well. Commencing. I will do as requested,” she said, taking out a Jewel... and shattering it.

Motes of light rose up from the remains of the Jewel, then gathered together to form four humanoid figures.

“Demonstration. I will have you show me your power.” Zeta spoke to the people she’d smuggled into Altea. “Expectation. You were already given your instructions. I have high expectations. I’m certain La Crima did fine work with you all.”

Three of the four smiled in response. They were all eager for the chance to show off their power.

The last one, however, was merely staring at the giant castle outside the window with a somewhat distant look.

“...Is that where he is?” Empty as his eyes were... there was a strong will burning deep within them.

◇◇◇

Royal Capital, Altea, Rose Garden

The castle at the heart of Altea had been built in the time of the founding king, the first Azurite. It was the work of his friend who held the title of Great Chief Carpenter, the Superior Job from the carpenter grouping, and it possessed numerous qualities that displayed that fact quite clearly. Some were security measures, but there were also features that merely served to improve the quality of life within the building’s walls.

The most noticeable of these was the rose garden blooming within the indoor courtyard.

The walls of the castle reflected sunlight, meaning that the enclosed garden was as brightly lit as anything outside. Ever since the days of the first Azurite, it was a royal family tradition to have tea parties here with their closest friends and family.

After the death of the previous king, Eldor Zeo Altar, only the gardener frequented this place; but now, by the desire of the royal family, a tea party was being held here once again.

The participants were quite unusual, however.

“Wow! Cang, I’ve never had anything like the tea you brought!”

“I imagine not. It’s Huang He tea. We still had some leaves left untouched, so I thought this tea party would be the perfect time to brew them.”

Sipping tea from a white porcelain cup was the organizer of this little party — Second Princess of Altar, Elizabeth. The smiling boy sitting at the table with her was the Third Prince of Huang He, Canglong.

The two were betrothed, and Elizabeth had invited him to this tea party as a guest of honor.

But they obviously weren't the only participants.

"...Why's therE popcorn at a teA party?" asked Master Jiangshi, Xunyu, as she gobbled up the popcorn in question. The Superior was here as Canglong's bodyguard, and she had removed her Tenaga-Ashinaga. They just weren't fitting for the occasion, after all.

"Umm! I bought it from a bear I met in town the day before yesterday!" said the guest who'd brought the popcorn, all smiles. She was Milianne — the little sister of the royal guard's vice-commander, Liliana Grandria. She had a habit of sneaking into the castle. That was exactly what she'd been doing today, but Elizabeth had discovered her — and since they were friends, she was invited to join. The popcorn was her way of thanking Elizabeth for the invitation.

"I had it in my inventory!" Milianne added. Liliana herself was also here to guard the tea party, and she was deeply surprised by the presence of her little sister. Part of her couldn't help but worry that Milianne would cause some trouble.

She was also completely certain that the castle's security was functioning properly, so Milianne's presence here didn't make any sense to her.

Anyhow, this children's tea party had two more participants — though it was questionable whether one of them counted.

"...They're delicious. I suppose Shu made these?"

"Dor..." The person commenting on the popcorn was Elizabeth's little sister and the Third Princess of Altar, Theresia. Instead of a chair, she was sitting on a giant hamster she called "Dor," and she was also here by Elizabeth's invitation.

"Theresia! Drink the tea Cang brought!" Elizabeth insisted.

"Certainly. Thank you Elizabeth. I'll try it right away."

Like the good sisters they were, they were enjoying tea together. It almost seemed as though this whole tea party had been arranged just for the purpose of inviting Theresia.

...Your Highness, Liliana thought to herself, thinking back to the day before yesterday.

The day before Altimia left for the peace talks, Elizabeth had told her that she would marry Canglong. That was the conclusion she'd come upon after much thought both during and after the Love-Duel Festival.

This will surely be her last tea party here, Liliana thought. If today's peace talks went well, Elizabeth would join Canglong on his departure back to Huang He tomorrow. But even if peace was established, the world would still be in turmoil. Once Elizabeth was in Huang He, returning to the kingdom would be difficult.

That was exactly why she'd invited Theresia to this tea party.

She wanted to give her sickly little sister, who probably didn't have much time left in this world, just one last tea party with her.

She wanted to show Theresia her fiancé and let the little girl see them both having fun together, to assure her that they would be just fine.

Just thinking of all the emotion that Elizabeth had poured into this event made Liliana tear up.

"Dor, dor!" Dor suddenly made some noises that sounded... really fake. It actually seemed like someone who could speak just fine trying to mimic the sound they thought an animal might make.

"Dor...? Ohh, right," said Theresia.

"Theresia? What's wrong?" Elizabeth asked.

"...It's almost time to take my medicine, but it seems that I left it in my room. I'll go get it."

"Why not gEt a maid to dO it?"

"The medicine is precious, so I keep it locked up. I'll be back in a moment."

Once Theresia said that, Dor stood up on all fours and walked out of the rose garden. Xunyu watched them until they were out of sight.

"...You know, I've beEn thinking... Why doEs a sickly princess hAve a rodent as a pet? It dOesn't make sensE."

To someone with a weak constitution, small rodents could be dangerous carriers of pathogens, and Dor wasn't even a "small" rodent.

"Who gave it to hEr, anyway?" Xunyu wondered. "There are mOre sensible pets to cHoose, aren't thEre? Your dragOn's a good example."

After Franklin's Game, Count Gideon had gifted Elizabeth a Pure-Dragon for her protection.

...Though, she'd used it to run away once, so now it was carried around by her bodyguards instead.

"I don't know where she got him, either," said Elizabeth. "He was there by Theresia's side before we even realized it."

"...WhAt?" Elizabeth's answer only confused Xunyu further.

"...Are you saying that a monster snuck into the castle and got close to her?" asked Canglong.

"Father said, 'Such things are to be expected with Theresia... It must have come to protect her,' and then declared him Theresia's pet."

Elizabeth's answer just made both Xunyu and Canglong think for a long time. Specifically, they were both trying to figure out what the previous king meant by 'Such things are to be expected with Theresia,' but neither of them could come up with an answer.

The weight of the mystery almost made the air between them feel heavier, but then...

"But Dor is really cute!"

...Milianne, clueless as she was, completely dispelled that atmosphere.

"Indeed," said Elizabeth.

"...Well, I cAn understand why childrEn would like it," Xunyu shrugged.

"Are you not a child yourself?" Canglong asked her.

The question was shelved, and the tea party continued.

A few minutes after Theresia left, someone spoke to Liliana. It was Sir Lindos, one of the royal guards who was also tasked to act as a bodyguard.

"Lady Grandria," he addressed her.

"What is it?"

"There's trouble at the main gate. Someone is trying to enter the castle without permission."

"Huh? Why not merely confirm that they do not have permission and then ask them to leave?"

"The problem is this person's identity, actually. The individual at the gate is..."

Upon hearing the name, Liliana widened her eyes.

"Huh?! Are you certain it's him?!"

"We need you to confirm. You are among those who were present at the battle a few years ago."

Those words were enough for Liliana to understand that she was needed immediately at the gate.

“Your Highnesses, I must briefly pass my bodyguard duties to someone else,” Liliana told Elizabeth and Canglong.

“Very well!”

“Sir Lindos, keep the rose garden safe. You too, Miss Xunyu. We will be counting on you if something happens.”

“Understood,” Sir Lindos nodded.

“Well, I’m Cang’s bodYguard. I can protEct Elizabeth and yoUr little sistEr on the side.”

“...Thank you. Milianne, make sure you do not trouble them.”

“Okaay!” And so, Liliana headed out to the main gate, completely unaware of what awaited her there...

◇

Liliana arrived at a hallway from which she could see the main gate. Looking down, she caught sight of the guards who had encountered trouble — and the three men who faced them.

They were all clad in caster-like robes, with hoods hiding their faces — the very definition of “shady-looking.”

However, the old man at the front stood out to her more than the others.

He was clad in a red robe and had a long, flowing beard — the very picture of a true master magician. His aura, as well, was completely unlike that of the other two...

“Is that... truly him?”

...And Liliana recognized his face.

It would have been embarrassing not to recognize such an illustrious individual. After all, this was the man who had rivaled the Arch Sage for the title of the greatest spellcaster in the kingdom a mere four years ago.

“Mr. Feuer... Lazburn.” King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn. He was one of the tians Azurite had been looking for, and a true expert on fire magic.

However, he was supposed to be missing.

Liliana had already been informed of that fact, and it made his sudden appearance here in the capital — the castle itself, at that — even more of a mystery.

“Umm, Mr. Feuer Lazburn? What business do you have here?” one of the gate guards who recognized him asked.

However, Feuer wasn't even looking at him. His mouth twitched as he whispered, "...Where?"

"Eh?"

"Where is... the Arch Sage?" Neither the guards nor Liliana could understand what he was saying.

After all, the Arch Sage had died in the previous war. There wasn't a single Altarian in the world who didn't know that.

"Umm, the Arch Sage is—"

"He must be here... If he isn't... he will surely come soon... Does he need... a signal fire?"

The gate guard tried to explain, but before he could finish, Feuer just kept whispering as if he couldn't even hear him.

The guard looked at his partner, but he too seemed confused about what to do.

The only person who knew the best course of action for this situation... was Liliana, who was still watching the interaction from above.

"...GET AWAY!" she screamed.

However, before the guards could react to her words...

"A signal fire... can be arranged."

...Two extra hands sprouted from Feuer's back.

That was only the beginning of his transformation.

Something seemed to be rippling under his skin as his body gained more volume and his silhouette warped grotesquely. Soon, he'd grown an entire twisted extra pair of arms and stood so large that he no longer looked like an old man... or even human. His skin had also turned a blazing, unnatural red.

He then aimed his four arms at the guards and the gate behind them before speaking the words "Crimson Sphere."

In an instant, four giant orbs of fire shot out from the hands of the creature that had once been Feuer. They easily incinerated the two guards and exploded against the gate.

These flaming orbs were far more powerful than standard Crimson Spheres, and even the magic-protected gate melted before them like butter.

The deafening roar of the fire and the rising black smoke signaled to the castle... and the entire city... that something major was happening.

“SHOW YOURSELF! ARCH SAGE!” This would certainly do for a signal fire. The thing that was once Lazburn had committed this brutal act to summon the person he was looking for.

However, he wasn’t the only one who had undergone a terrible transformation.

The appearance of the men who accompanied him had also changed drastically. One had become some sort of hybrid between man and spider, while the other now appeared to be part bat.

Needless to say, they had left humanity far, far behind.

“What... What are they?!” Liliana’s horrified shout surely echoed the feelings of anyone who had ever laid eyes on these creatures.

However, there was one key fact that she could not have known.

Even if she instinctively recognized these beings as abominations, she could never guess that they were the work of a single person... a single Superior Embryo.

◆◆◆

???

There existed a Superior Embryo called “True Form Alteration, Idea.” It was a Type Legion composed of parasitic organisms that snuck into the bodies of animals and altered the abilities of their hosts. This Embryo could make them beautiful, healthy, or even grant them new capabilities.

It could give someone powers that no human had ever possessed — as well as make them human no longer.

Some of its hosts were like Lazburn, who might still qualify as humanoid, but no one would say he was actually human. Regardless of how they were classified, these kinds of mutated hosts shared very little with mankind.

Others simply had their bodies modified to give them abilities far beyond those of their original forms, while still others had their brains modified to hinder their will. Some of its hosts even ended up transformed in both body and mind.

They had all been modified by the Master of True Form Alteration, Idea... La Crima “The Source of Errors.”

They were the subjects of this Superior Embryo, as well as extensions of it. According to Platonism, they could be described as its “forms” or “ideas.”

In one corner of the noble district, a figure watched over these Ideas with emotionless eyes. This figure was none other than the woman who had shattered the Jewel and unleashed these beings upon the capital. Covered in bandages like she had just stepped out of a crypt, she was King of Thieves, Zeta.

“Excellent,” she said. “This is the first time we’ve deployed specimens that were originally Superior Jobs, and despite some minor mental disturbances, their physical state seems acceptable. They can also still tell friends and enemies apart. I will have to send this data to La Crima.”

Her tone was neutral, showing how unshaken she was by the tragedy she had unleashed upon the castle and its guards.

“Beginning. Ignis Idea, Aranea Idea, and Vespertilio Idea have infiltrated the castle.”

The creatures she had released served as assassins. Zeta tended to operate alone, so La Crima — a fellow I.F. member — had given these creatures to her, and she now employed them as combatants in her act of terrorism.

They were also intended to test how such creatures would perform in future I.F. operations, to gather data for La Crima — who was currently in Tenchi, a country full of quality specimens — and to complete the task given to her by the imperator of Dryfe.

“Favorable. Even tian Superior Jobs can be improved to a level above pre-Superior Masters.”

Perhaps the strongest among those she’d been given — “King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn,” codename “Ignis Idea” — was beginning to push into the castle itself, blasting fire from all four of his hands. The spider-like Aranea Idea and bat-like Vespertilio Idea had also passed through the shattered gates and entered the castle grounds.

“Simultaneous. Regina Apis Idea and Apis Idea have also begun their attacks around the castle.”

Black smoke rose and screams echoed from the capital townscape behind Zeta.

To keep the Masters outside the castle in check, she had also created chaos in town by releasing one Idea with a Superior Job as a starting point, along with many of its underlings, all of which were based on high-rank jobs.

The Rabbit had killed many of the bodyguards who were supposed to guard the peace talks, so their ranks had been replenished with Masters who would've originally stayed in the capital. Zeta believed that those who were left would find it difficult to handle what she had dispatched.

"Action. The order had already been given. The timing may have changed, but my job remains the same," said Zeta — the Superior to whom the imperator had given this final request. "Goal. Infiltrate the castle, steal what must be stolen, and erase what must be erased. That is all."

She leaped from roof to roof in the noble district before heading into the chaotic castle herself.

Set off by the peace talks, the imperium's fangs had finally begun to close on their throats.

They would take what was to be taken and kill what had to be killed.

Chapter Seven: Opened Hostilities

Altar-Dryfe Border, Peace Conference Hall

The moment Claudiah pressed the button, the situation changed drastically.

It was as though she had flipped a switch that turned the scene before her into chaos.

Leviathan was the first to act. She'd put down Behemot and jumped towards Altimia with a small blade in hand.

It wasn't a large weapon and didn't seem that threatening on its own, but its edge was covered in some sort of liquid.

She then threw the dripping blade towards Altimia.

"Gh!" However, Altimia noticed the poisoned dagger flying towards her and drew her sword — The Primeval Blade, Altar — deflecting it with ease.

But the moment she swung her sword, Leviathan was already right next to her. "You're mine!"

"Kodachi." Before Leviathan could even touch Altimia, Shu launched a high kick towards her. He was already clad in his Ursine Godcloth, Kim-un-Kamuy, and could use its first strike-limited optical camouflage and presence block effects. His unseen attack hit home, striking Leviathan in the back of the neck.

Shu hadn't been on-edge about the Dryfean Masters' movements for nothing. His attack went exactly as he'd planned, striking for maximum damage.

"Hh...!" The kick that had once instantly eliminated a Legendary monster was so strong that not even Leviathan could withstand it. It blew her away with the force of a cannonball, opening up a hole in the wall she crashed into.

However, her spine wasn't even strained, let alone broken, so she had no problem simply standing back up again. Marie followed up Shu's attack with piercing-homing bullets, but Leviathan turned them to dust with a mere swing of her arms.

Not even five seconds had passed since this battle had begun.

Many of the bodyguards present were clearly perplexed.

The Dryfean bodyguards actually seemed more shocked than the Altarian ones. The fact that Leviathan had just tried to assault the chief representative of the other country left them completely flabbergasted. Based on that, Shu assumed that only Behemot and Leviathan had been informed of this part of the plan.

Besides Claudiah — the representative — and King of Beasts — the imperator's ultimate confidant — no Dryfean present knew the full scope of the plot here.

"I knew this would not succeed," Claudiah said upon witnessing the failure of the assault she herself had ordered.

"It's only because my focus is split. I wouldn't have failed if I just had to kill her," said Leviathan.

"Everyone else can die, but Altimia must be captured alive. You must accomplish this at any cost."

"...I'm not suited for that kind of thing. Behemot should be the one to do this."

"kk" Despite the tense air, their talk was extremely relaxed, casually revealing that they were planning to kidnap Altimia — the acting ruler of Altar.

"Claudiah! What are you planning...?! What was that switch...?!"

"Basically, the peace talks are over," Claudiah said, as if this was nothing. "This young man here... 'Ray,' was it? He unraveled our plan. After being so thoroughly exposed, these negotiations have fallen apart, and any hope of future peace has vanished."

It was now obvious that no matter how favorable the peace treaty seemed at first glance, Dryfe would still hide traps within it. Now, Altar would be more wary at any future talks, making such traps impossible.

"However, it is true that Dryfe does not want war. We will only accept it as a last resort. Therefore, we will simply destroy Altar before that happens," Claudiah said, without any enthusiasm.

"...How?" Ray asked.

"First, we will either capture or kill the second and third princesses, as well as secure Altimia herself."

"Huh?!"

"The switch I had just activated should have signaled that person you mentioned — King of Thieves, Zeta — to assault Altea along with her own collaborators." Her shocking words shook up almost everyone who heard her. The officials tried to contact the capital using comms magic, while Marie was poised to run outside.

Ray had also almost looked at the direction of Altea...

"Don't move."

...But Shu stopped him.

With those words, he was implying that here and now, they were dealing with something that was as important as whatever was happening at Altea... or was even more dangerous than that.

King of Beasts was here — a foe who could kill you the moment you so much as looked away.

King of Destruction was already prepared for battle, and his body was as tense as it could be.

"...Do you really believe the kingdom will fall if we disappear?" Altimia asked Claudiah. She was worried about the capital and her sisters, but as the one who carried the country on her shoulders, she stood firmly against the threat in front of her.

"Of course I do," said Claudiah, pointing at Altimia. "After all, Altar is only Altar because it has you, the descendants of the founding king... the royal family. The country is only in one piece because it has you. If you believe I am wrong, then tell me... is there a single noble you'd trust to hold your country together?"

"Ah...!"

"The most influential of the nobility, the Lunnings family, was extinguished by Gloria. The previous war also took the lives of many illustrious citizens, did it not? The most prominent noble still alive is Marquis Findle, but he is more of a behind-the-scenes type, not suited to lead the country. Who else is there? Count Gideon? He's far too young. With him in charge, there would only be more chaos. Without a proper leader, a country is unable to make Covenants, activate War Boundaries... it would be barred from things that can only be done by heads of state. It would be unable to even function as an independent nation."

Claudiah took a breath before continuing.

"Even if someone tried to seize power to quell the chaos, someone else would rise to stop them. That much is obvious, given the existence of nobles like Marquis Borozel, who tried to gain authority even if it meant assassinating a princess. And I am aware of many of your elite who would swear allegiance to us the moment the royal family was gone. Even the lords who would not join us might just choose some other country to pledge themselves to instead. Marquis Nissa at Altar's southwest is on good terms with Legendaria, for one, so he might desire to be annexed by them. On that topic, Count Keyora in the seaside region to the west has connections to Granvaloa's trading fleet. Granvaloa wants more land of their own, so they would gladly take him... Well, the point is that without the pillars, such things would happen all over, and Altar would disintegrate into warring states once again."

Claudiah declared that the royal family was all that was keeping from Altar from crumbling into many smaller nations. That was how the country had been before the founding king united it, so it wasn't out of the question that it could one day return to that state.

However, it was obvious that Claudiah knew far too much about Altar's state of affairs. Some of what she'd said was unknown not only to Altimia, but even DIN.

Dryfe had been given all of this information by none other than King of Thieves, Zeta.

She was part of Illegal Frontier. The clan's leader, Sechs, knew far more about Altar than most could even imagine, and he had distributed this info to all of its members. Zeta had also gathered a great deal of information herself, and by now I.F.'s database had become extremely vast.

Besides the act of terror at the capital, Dryfe had also requested that Zeta sell them everything they knew about Altar's internal affairs.

The imperium wanted to eliminate the royal family in order to incapacitate the country and split it apart with the influence of other countries. This plan was based on the assumption that the nobles with ties to other countries would act exactly as Dryfe was expecting, but...

...Well, actually, I guess that is a viable plan, Shu thought. For all he knew, the nobles in question might've already talked things out with Granvaloa and Legendaria. The two countries wouldn't participate in the war between Altar and Dryfe, but they would come to take the kingdom's territory in the event that the government collapsed. Legendaria and Granvaloa had nothing to lose from making such agreements.

Dryfe would benefit from this, as well.

If Altar collapsed, they would lose a potential force against the biggest threat, Caldina, but since a splintered kingdom would have very few factions willing or able to stand up to Dryfe, they could easily absorb what was left of the kingdom, along with the other nations opposed to Caldina.

That was their plan here.

...The marriage-based alliance between Altar and Huang He would also fall apart if the second princess was gone. Even if Huang He wanted to retaliate against Dryfe for this, they still have Caldina between them, making invasion impossible. In fact, if that's how things went, Dryfe might even appreciate the damage that Huang He would do to Caldina.

Crossing the Harshwinter Mountains to the north was another way to reach Dryfe, but Shu knew that that was a more dangerous path than Caldina's deserts — it was fair to call it impossible, actually. There had been a Superior who had tried that way, only to have the floating fortress he was so proud of shot down by the local ruler of the skies — Divine Comet Bird, Tunguska. Shu himself had been caught up in that incident.

Dryfe's plan seemed to account for all the tians involved, Altarian or otherwise.

"...Maybe that's how things would go with tians," Shu said as he looked at his little brother. "But what about us Masters? Even if Altar's gone, there'd be many who'd bare their fangs at Dryfe." Even if the country crumbled, there would surely be ex-Altarian Masters who would stand against the imperium. It would be especially hard to prevent VIP assassinations by the likes of Marie or Eishiro.

"Exactly," said Tsukuyo. "Even with the threat of the wanted list, you'd still leave yourself open to a retaliatory strike or two."

"Would you come to Dryfe if the reward was good enough?" Claudiah asked her.

"Don't think that we would change sides that easily."

"We would not mind making The Lunar Society into the state religion," Claudiah said.

"...D-Don't think that we would... Hold on, let me think a bit..." The fact that Dryfe would so easily do what the kingdom had so ardently refused to actually made Tsukuyo falter.

“...Don’t think that all of us can be bought as easily as Miss Eldritch here,” Ray snapped at Claudiah, his opinion of Tsukuyo dropping even lower than he thought possible.

“Oh, I’m certain of that. I know that there are many Masters like yourself. In fact, I am sure that almost all Masters who stayed in the kingdom after their loss in the recent war would be such individuals.”

Masters who only cared about themselves would have already switched to other countries, or they were like the people that Franklin had hired during Franklin’s Game. Many of those that were left were either close to Altarian tians or merely liked the kingdom and wanted to protect it.

“That is why,” Claudiah continued. “I hope you do not believe that we’re doing something so extreme without some kind of measure in place to deal with such Masters.”

“And that ‘measure’ is...?”

“I cannot say it. We are still only in the first stage, after all,” she said, before turning to face Altimia. “We will deal with the princesses at Altea and capture Altimia here. Our anti-Master measure comes after that.”

Those words didn’t trigger anyone’s Truth Discernment. That meant that they actually had thought of a way to deal with Altarian Masters who would attack Dryfe once the kingdom fell.

The fact that they’re not worried about assassinations makes it pretty clear that they’ve come up with something really extreme. That means that the most important thing here is...

Their primary goal here had to be protecting the Altarian princesses from Dryfe’s attack. If the kingdom ceased to exist, things would go exactly according to Dryfe’s plan.

Hell, we can’t let them mess with Theresia... If worst comes to worst... It’ll all be over.

As one of the few who knew what really made Theresia special, Shu began to sweat — and not just because of the King of Beasts. He decided it would be best if they returned to protect Altea as soon as possible.

Between the Masters Chrono had killed and the ones on bodyguard duty here, the capital had been rendered more or less completely defenseless. If the attackers were powerful enough, it would all be over.

There was one major problem with this, however — their enemies here would not let them return to Altea so easily. While fighting King of Beasts the Physical Apex, a retreating battle was a foolish idea.

They'll probably aim for AGI builds like Superior Killer and Tsukikage first. Even if he hid in the shadows, they'd just destroy the entire zone to get to him. And even if they somehow managed to escape, we would be too slow to retreat from the King of Beasts, who's almost certainly faster than either of them. There's no point in trying to run away when they can catch up so easily. It's better to stay and fight them here. With Claudiah around, they can't just destroy everything indiscriminately.

And even if King of Beasts hadn't been here, there was no guarantee that anyone except those who could move at supersonic speeds would even make it to Altea in time.

But staying here and fighting would still take up valuable time that could be used to hurry to Altea. Is it better for us to protect Altimia all costs or force our way out...?

As Shu considered the situation...

"I will ask one thing, Claudiah."

...Altimia, who had been quiet for a while now, spoke up again.

"I will hear it."

"Are you able to stop the terrorism at the capital?"

"Yes. If I press the bottom button on the switch, it would immediately be c—"

As Claudiah revealed the means of stopping her act of terror, she raised up her right hand, still holding the switch — and a moment later, Altimia swung the sword Altar towards it, cutting Claudiah's hand off at the wrist.

Altimia then reached out with her free hand to try and catch the appendage, but even her massive blade had been barely long enough to strike home. She did not have the reach to seize it before Claudiah lashed out with her left hand, knocking her own severed hand away behind her.

The Dryfean Masters stationed behind backed away the hand as it fell, some of them letting out screams.

"...Ugh," Claudiah said with a pout, emphasizing just how upset she was. "You'd cut off my hand just to take the switch from me...? Is that your way of saying that we are no longer friends?!"

Her reaction to having her hand sliced off seemed rather... mild.

"No," said Altimia, denying that idea. "I still consider you my friend, even now. However, as their elder sister and the person Altar depends on most... I will raise my blade against you no matter my own feelings. I am fully prepared to have a dear friend like you despise me for the rest of your life.”

She denied Claudiah’s statement and presented her own will.

Claudiah’s eyes as she looked at Altimia held no anger.

In fact... there was joy in them.

“Heheheh,” she giggled. “So we are alike in that.”

“...We are?”

“Yes. I also intend to capture you even if it means you hate me for the rest of your life,” she said with a blissful smile on her face. “But I will not despise you just because you cut off my hand. Even if you’d cut off my head, I’m sure I’d feel the same. Not even the worst pain you could possibly inflict upon me could make me truly hate you.”

Her eyes were shining with a profound affection... and some other emotion.

“Though, this barely even hurts,” she added. Her whisper was followed by a sound of something metallic being crushed.

The source of the sound was Claudiah’s detached right hand... It had moved on its own to destroy the switch it was holding.

There were sparks coming out of the severed end of its wrist, and a metal frame filled with electric wiring was visible, dripping with a red liquid.

“Claudiah... you...”

“I have been through many battles and lost parts of my original body. I am now what Masters would call a ‘cyborg.’”

She said all of this as though it was nothing before removing her entire right forearm, only to casually take a new one out of her inventory and connect it to the port on her elbow.

This backup arm had no human-like skin on it at all, and the crude form made it seem like a true tool of battle.

“Anyway, the simplest way to stop the operation is gone,” she said. “However, Zeta would leave Altea if I contacted her using comms magic and ordered her to stop. Everything has been sealed using a Contract, so she would certainly obey me immediately,” Claudiah smiled as she presented another way to stop the terrorism.

“...Claudiah?” Altimia said, uncertain what to make of this.

Like before, Truth Discernment wasn’t triggered, meaning that she was telling the honest truth.

That was when they were finally joined by the Masters from outside the building, who’d likely been drawn here by the sound of the first clash with Leviathan. That meant that both sides now had more or less all of their bodyguards present — though Altar still lacked The Lynx, Tom Cat, while Dryfe lacked The Rabbit, Chrono Crown.

“...And the Masters have arrived. Excellent timing,” Claudiah said as she looked around, pointed at herself, then Altimia, with her mechanical arm. “We want to capture you. You want to capture me to stop my plot. We have already exchanged blows. Peace is no longer an option. What shall we do now, then?”

She then used Instant Wear to cover herself in armor.

No... not armor, but some kind of powered mechanical suit.

This blood-red suit had been constructed specifically for her using an MVP special reward material.

“Shall we do our best to capture one another, all while our bodyguards do their best to protect us?” Claudiah then drew a mechanical drill lance — a weapon she’d acquired when she’d defeated an Ancient Legendary UBM.

She spun the giant lance as if it weighed nothing in her hand.

“This is not exactly what Reinhard planned, but I’ve made it quite a bit simpler.”

...So that’s how it is, huh? Shu thought as he clenched his teeth.

Claudiah had told them about the assault on Altea and the means to stop it specifically to give them more reasons to stay and fewer reasons to escape. This also made it impossible for the Altarians to just kill Claudiah, because they needed her alive to call off Zeta’s act of terrorism. Even if they tried to do it themselves with Charm, the Contract would prove impossible to break if Claudiah died.

Even if they’d chosen to hurry to the capital despite all this, it would be difficult to actually protect it against the King of Beasts’ speed.

Therefore, the quickest way to stop the assault on Altea was to capture Claudiah.

They were forced to play along with what she wanted, and they had to win in spite of that.

“Well then... Let us begin.” Claudiah pointed her drill lance at Altimia and declared the start of the battle.

Despite that, most of the Masters didn’t move.

Some just couldn’t keep up with this turn of events... or this change of plans that seemed borderline insane. Others were just so focused on what they had to protect that they didn’t move an inch.

Their hesitation didn’t last, however, and the experienced Masters quickly leaped into action.

However, there were four Masters that did act immediately, while the others were still frozen.

Hell General, Logan Goddhart, quickly understood that he was now allowed to fight and destroy Ray Starling — so he immediately implemented his new strategy.

King of Beasts, Behemot had made Leviathan switch from her Maiden form to the Guardian form that would allow her to unleash all her stats.

High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso activated Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light, setting “Dryfean Masters” and “total level” as the targets.

King of Destruction, Shu Starling closed in on Leviathan while she was still transforming.

“FHAHAHAH! Let’s go! Call Devil—” Right before Logan summoned his devils, all the Dryfean bodyguards had their levels divided by six...

“Fatal Field.”

...And when Tsukuyo used another skill, all of them except for King of Beasts instantly died.

Many survived for a few heartbeats thanks to their Brooches, but the continuous field of instadeath quickly shattered the items and brought them to a silent end.

This was accomplished via the Superior MVP special reward — Gloria β’s item skill Fatal Field, which “Instantly killed all humanoid creatures under level 100 within a radius of 500 metels.”

Almost all Dryfean Masters present received the death penalty before they could even know what was going on, much like the Masters that had tried to face Gloria itself.

Tsukuyo had employed a combo of Faint Light set to divide the total level by six and Fatal Field, which instantly killed everyone under level 100. Although its effect was limited to humans, the result was even more fearsome than the Fatal Field of Gloria itself. It was one of Tsukuyo Fuso’s trump cards, and the only one who'd survived it was King of Beasts, whose level was above 600.

Despite being a Superior Job, even Hell General instantly perished simply because he was in the process of regaining his lost levels.

"...How pathetic," said Leviathan as she grew, shedding her human form. "So, what will you do now?" She looked down at Shu, who was clinging to her, as she posed this question.

Instead of answering, he merely looked back at his brother.

He was certain that what he was about to do was the optimal course of action and that it gave them the highest chances of winning against King of Beasts... but he still hesitated.

After all, this meant sending his brother and his friends to certain death.

The primary reason Claudiah had made this gamble in the first place — the thing that more or less assured her victory — was King of Beasts. Fighting her without Shu, the strongest among them, was essentially a death sentence.

However, Ray's eyes showed no fear whatsoever. His resolve had already drowned it all out. Thus, Shu gathered his own resolve and decided to leave the strongest enemy here.

There was only one thing left to say.

"I'm leaving this to you."

"You can count on me." Right after that, Shu put all his strength into his legs. His immense STR shattered the floor, and he and Leviathan — whom he was holding on to tightly — both felt the impact.

By sheer leg strength alone, he could move at extreme speeds. Leaping into the air with the force of a cannonball, Shu disappeared through the hole in the wall that had been left behind by Leviathan.

And the battle here was left to his little brother...

◇

Most of the Dryfean bodyguards were dead.

Shu Starling and Leviathan had left.

The two princesses were left behind — one holding a sword, and the other brandishing a lance.

Besides them, there was Death Period and The Lunar Society...

Altarian Masters in total.

Dryfe, on the other hand, only had one Master left.

She was, however, the strongest Master in Dryfe as well as Dendro's Physical Apex... King of Beasts, Behemot.

She stared silently at the hole in the wall... seeing off the two who had vanished into the distance.

"...I don't have anyone to fight now. No fair, Levia." Behemot was shocked enough to stop speaking in internet slang and actually heave a sigh. Though she was surrounded by Altarian Masters, she seemed disappointed, as though she thought nobody but Shu could possibly pose a threat to her.

"Well, all right..." she said as she faced Altimia. "I'll just quickly capture the princess... and then go to Sh—"

"No." One Master cut her words short.

"It's not my bro you're gonna fight."

"Hm?" The Master — Ray Starling...

"We are your enemies here... We will stop you, King of Beasts,"

...echoed his brother's words, all while looking directly at the Physical Apex herself.

Behemot then looked around to see that his companions shared his resolve.

She blinked over and over as if seeing something really unusual.

"op..." The beastly jaw then warped into a smile. "But I like it." A ferocious aura poured off of her as she prepared for battle.

Thus the curtain rose on Ray Starling's first battle against an "Apex."

Chapter Eight: The Battle of the Masterless

XXXX Years Ago

A verdant and vast scenery stretched out as far as the eye could see. The wind-caressed leaves brushed against each other and water trickled through the streams as birds flitted to and fro, singing their songs. The trees were painted in all shades of green, their fallen leaves covering the ground in a blanket of fertile colors, and the sky above was as endless as it was blue.

It was a scene that seemed completely untouched by the hands of man.

Surrounded by all this nature, there stood a solitary young man — who could just as easily be described as a “boy.”

For reasons unknown, he was holding a pocket watch in each hand.

“Nothing in this scenery is real,” the youth suddenly said. Despite his young appearance, he seemed to have the aura of an aged and exhausted old man.

The years experienced by his mind far exceeded those of his body. He only appeared young because his flesh had been restored by a particular Infinite Embryo.

“The air and trees were replicated by Infinite Vicissitude. This sky is presented to me by Infinite Illusion. And even this body that senses it all is yet another creation of Infinite Birth.”

Like an old man whose grip on reason is finally slipping away, he continued his monologue — though it almost seemed as though his words were directed at the watches in his hands.

“But that doesn’t mean that nothing here is real. My flesh might be artificial, but my life is not... and so is the power that you wield.”

The aged youth spoke, still looking at the watches.

“Ignoring that one, this is the twelfth Infinite Embryo... Infinite Time. The flow of time exists for all things. That makes it impossible for it to be fake — which means that it’s ultimately as real as can be.”

He paused, exhaled... and put on a wry smile.

"And it... is what will finally snuff me out. Real as it is, my life seems to have a limit."

"..."

"I will die and you will remain. That is what it means to become Infinite. It's different for Embryos in their seventh forms or below. When their Masters experience their ultimate death, their Resources are crystallized and leave behind copious amounts of 'nourishment'... form zero Embryos. Infinites, however, live up to their name and can remain active indefinitely as long as their cores aren't shattered... Though, unlike when their Master is alive, reconstruction can become impossible for them."

Another pensive pause.

"But even your infinity will end. The time will come when our project will be... complete."

"..."

"...In these final moments, I will talk about myself." He slumped himself down against a tree. Though he looked like a young man, he moved as if it was a difficult task.

"This is the only place I know. I was born here, I matured here with you... and I will die here."

"..."

"I'm not displeased with that. We... are all like this. Seeking the end of the line, we walk an endless path as we develop Infinite Embryos. That is our nature. In fact, as one who became Infinite, I'm among the lucky few. My life had meaning, and I was able to live my life to its utmost limit."

He sat and talked with his eyes fixed on his pocket watches, but then suddenly his arms became limp. It was as though he was losing his ability to support his own body.

"There is... one thing I regret, though." He looked up to the sky he'd called fake as his voice became a whisper.

"I wanted to try living in the real world someday. I wanted to see a different sky."

As if he had never been granted even that much, he looked at the blue sky above with somewhat sorrowful eyes.

A songbird flew by, and he watched it with envy.

"But you will remain active forever... You might have a chance to live in the real world.”

“...”

“Heheh... I guess... even I became a bit sentimental in my final hours. I never talked to you even once until now...”

His Embryo was a non-living creature and had nothing that could be called “an ego.” Thus, no matter how much he talked to it, it would never respond.

“If you are able... to live in the real world... once the project is over... tell me what... the world was like... See it... in my stead...”

“...”

“Heheheh... Well... It’s not like I know... if there’s... an afterli—” He stopped talking before he could finish, and his mouth never moved again.

“...m...a...” The pocket watches began to creak slightly as they tried to make some sort of sound.

However, its — his — Master didn’t hear him... or anything else, for that matter.

“...ma...s...ter...” The Embryo that wasn’t supposed to be able to speak called out to him, but received no response.

Soon after, the birds stopped singing and the color of the sky changed. The clear blue above vanished, leaving behind a ceiling of stark metal.

With the sole user gone, the false blue sky disappeared and once again showed its true appearance of a lifeless canopy.

His hands still gripped the pocket watches even as they grew colder.

“...”

“Confirmed the death of the twelfth’s Master, Mr. Chrono Crown. Relocating the remains to the appropriate location. Retrieving the twelfth and transitioning to autonomous operation training.”

Responding to the inorganic voice’s words, someone carefully picked up his remains.

As that happened, a third pocket watch fell out of the dead youth’s breast pocket.

Along with the two that were still clutched in his hands, there were now a total of three.

Each had a different Greek word carved on them. They were “Χρόνος,” “Καιρός,” and “Αἰών” — Chronos, Kairos, and Aion.

All three of them made quiet sounds as time marched on... Every tick and tock feeling much like silent weeping.

◇◆◇

Present, Altar-Dryfe Border, Grove

Claudiah had announced the start of a battle at the peace talks and Zeta had unleashed countless Ideas upon Altea, catapulting the forces of each country into a state of conflict.

And close to the location of the peace talks, there was yet another clash occurring.

"Oh boy, I really didn't think you'd call me using secret comms."

"...You don't know why I called youuu?" Two men faced each other in a verdant forest some distance from the peace talks.

One was a young man with a plump cat seated on his head and long bangs covering his eyes.

The other was a boy with metal boots and rabbit ears.

The former was The Lynx, Tom Cat, while the latter was The Rabbit, Chrono Crown... and both of them were the avatars of control AIs.

"No. Though, I gotta ask, Tom Cat... Why are you all the way out here instead of doing your odd-jobs or dueling? This is what people call 'neglect of duty,' isn't it?"

Even this far away from civilization, there was no guarantee that they wouldn't be observed, so Chrono opted to call Tom by his avatar's name, and Tom did the same to him.

"...I'd say that you did something pretty arbitrary yourself, Chronooo." Even as he spoke, he was simultaneously using his true form to gather information about the situation back in the kingdom.

Due to Chrono's ambushes, Altar was at a clear disadvantage at both the capital and the peace talks.

"Arbitrary? Is that why you went out of your way to call me here?" Chrono asked.

"Yeah," Tom replied. "Though, I don't really get iiit. What you did ended up helping Dryfe, but there was no guarantee that would be the result. In fact, it was more likely that it would've just made the relationship between the countries even worse."

Tom's words made Chrono tilt his head in confusion.

Upon seeing that, The Lynx said, “I knew it... You and Bandersnatch don’t understand human psychology at all.”

That was the difference between them and a creature-type Embryo like Tom... or rather, Cheshire.

Non-creature-type control AIs naturally had difficulty with this. The two Tweedles were also non-creatures, but their immense processing power, the highest out of all control AIs, allowed them to overcome this limitation. The same couldn’t be said of Chrono... also known as Rabbit, the control AI in charge of time. He was a non-creature-type, and most of his processing power was dedicated to keeping time in Infinite Dendrogram running at the base 3x speed. He didn’t have much spare processing power he could use for humanlike thought, so his mentality was at about the same level as a normal human’s.

Because of this, Chrono, being Rabbit’s avatar, was somewhat simple and short-sighted. It was also the reason why his role was being a PK — it didn’t require much forethought to be one.

The other control AIs actually would’ve preferred if Rabbit focused solely on time, but Rabbit himself had insisted on engaging in avatar activities.

“Human psychology... huh?” Chrono whispered as he looked up at the sky.

For a moment, his eyes had a hint of bitterness, but then he looked back at Tom... and glared at him.

“Of course I don’t understand it... THERE’S NO WAY I COULD!” He raised his voice as he blew up at Tom. “Unlike you, I didn’t have the time to learn to understand people as an avatar! I’m the one who’s always been doing nothing but make this world faster so you all could have time to prepare!” The smug boy who’d dominated Altar’s rankers was gone, leaving behind a mess of a child shouting out everything he’d been bottling up inside for so long. “Yeah, I know what you’ll say — the revised project needed more time and I was the only one who could get it! I’m the only one specialized in accelerating time!”

Tom said nothing and merely listened.

“But until we started accepting new Masters, THAT WAS ALL I COULD DO!” Chrono’s screaming now bordered on blood-curdling. “I was only able to even move with this body when they showed up and I could reduce the speed to just 3x! That was the first time I ever got to walk in this world! Do you understand how I felt?! OF COURSE YOU DON'T!" His voice was heavy with either rage or chagrin — it was hard to tell which. He was releasing his pent-up frustrations, but it seemed as though his feelings had completely taken control of him.

"Chrono..." Tom knew what was going on with him. Alice had said that there were two ways non-creature Embryos handled having their own avatars. They either ended up being cold and calculating regardless of how they presented themselves... or they proved unable to control the emotions surging through their new bodies.

Chrono was undoubtedly a prime example of the latter.

He'd only had an avatar for a few years — only a tiny fraction of the time the others had theirs.

This outburst was a manifestation of this problem.

"To live in the real world! That was my Master's... Chrono Crown's only desire in life! He wanted to escape this cage and live in the real world! But the destination was too far away and he didn't have nearly enough time to reach it! THAT HAS TO BE WHY I WAS BORN ABLE TO CONTROL TIME!"

Tom still said nothing, but he could understand where Chrono was coming from. Tom himself was born the way he was because of his own Master's wish — a desire for a friend.

"With his last breath, he asked me to share my memories of the real world with him once my end came! It took so long, but I can actually do that now! I now have his face and I carry these pocket watches! I can finally walk around this place freely... the real world... DO YOU KNOW HOW I FELT?! You were in charge of managing culture... CAN YOU EVEN UNDERSTAND ME AT ALL...?!" Chrono clenched his teeth painfully before continuing.

"And now, what, we're gonna have a war? We're gonna raise the War Boundary?! The last time it was used, everything went back to the way it used to be for me! Once it's activated, I can't do anything anymore! I stop being free! I'll have fewer things to tell my Master once my end comes! Fewer memories to make in the real world! AND THAT'S MORE IMPORTANT TO ME!"

That was his reason for the focused PK spree. The war would rob him of his ability to do anything, and he hated the phenomenon more than anything else.

After all, it came at the cost of the time he could spend as himself — the time he could use to fulfill his Master’s wish.

Thus, he cried, “It’s a waste of time! I’M IN A HURRY!”

Tears began flowing from Chrono’s eyes — tears of crimson red blood. The Embryo that had once possessed no ego of its own was now sobbing uncontrollably, barely able to contain the wellspring of emotion inside him.

“If that’s what it takes to prevent war... to prevent that meaningless waste of time... I will gladly destroy one side so thoroughly that they can’t even think of waging war! What’s so wrong about that...? WELL, GRIMALKIN?!”

“...Chronos Kairos Aion.” The two control AIs faced each other and called one another by their true names.

Chrono saw Tom as an obstacle and an object of envy who had everything that Chrono so desperately wanted.

Tom saw Chrono as a colleague who was about to stray from the path and a fellow Embryo who knew well the pain of losing his Synchronizer.

The two control AIs faced each other head-on.

“...The situation has changed,” Chrono suddenly said as he removed his hands from his pockets.

Each of them held a pocket watch. Of the three in total, these were the ones that weren’t his core.

“I’m going,” he said as he wiped the bloody tears with his sleeves and glared in the direction of the peace talks. “I’m also monitoring the situation there and in the capital. I know that Dryfe will win if the princesses are secured. I don’t have time to talk to you. I will go there and kidnap the princess myself. No one can keep up with me. I’ll then do the same at Altea. That will fulfill Dryfe’s goals... and prevent the war.”

“...I won’t let you,” said Tom. “This isn’t something that we control AIs should involve ourselves with. Masters are supposed to be free. We shouldn’t arbitrarily influence their actions and their results.”

“Then why are you in a place like this, huh?!”

“I wouldn’t have come here... if I didn’t have to stop you.” Chrono’s avatar was out of control. He had to be stopped.

Despite that, Tom didn’t even think of getting Alice to do it, as she’d done with Tom himself back in Gideon.

Chrono's outburst had to be dealt with, but since it was an outburst on behalf of his late Master, Tom thought that it would be wrong to stop Chrono using such drastic measures.

Thus, he'd decided to confront him directly.

That was why he'd only asked Alice for one thing.

"Chrono," Tom said. "I talked to Alice and told her to deactivate your avatar if you touch an Altarian tian before defeating me."

"...What?"

"You know what that means." The cat on his head transformed into Tom and multiplied until there were eight of them. All eight then surrounded Chrono. "If you want to pass... you'll have to defeat me first... Think you can do that as The Rabbit, Chrono Crown?"

Emphasizing the form Chrono inhabited right now, the eight Toms prepared to fight him.

Chrono glared at them before chuckling. "Hah! Do you have even a single victory against me as The Lynx, Tom Cat?!"

A moment later, their battle began.

Thus began this conflict between two Control AIs — two Embryos who knew the pain of losing their Masters.

◇◆

Type Infinite Legion. The Infinite Multiplication, Grimalkin.

He was one of the Embryos that had reached its eighth form and became Infinite. Even with his abilities constrained to the limits of the sixth form, he could simultaneously control eight Toms and easily replace them if they were killed.

The only way to defeat him was to either destroy all of them at once with an AoE attack or cut them all down so fast he couldn't multiply again. However, both of those things were difficult, as proven by the fact that only two of the many who had challenged him in Altar's rankings had actually defeated him.

Still, Chrono Crown was perfectly capable of destroying the Toms with sufficient speed.

"Gh...!" The moment Chrono vanished, each of the eight Toms suddenly found bombs floating next to their heads.

The Toms all quickly jumped away, but the bombs blew up only a moment after appearing. Even with their speed, only half of the Toms managed to get away before their skulls were blown to pieces.

The dead Toms then transformed into cats and vanished.

That was dangerous! Tom thought. All eight clones shared a single consciousness, and if the first one to notice the bombs had been just a moment slower, they all would've died.

Yeah... this matchup isn't in my favor! Embryos were all subject to the rules of compatibility, and Infinite Embryos were no exception. All other things being equal, who had the advantage or disadvantage in their conflict would be decided by the nature of their powers.

Tom knew full well that Chrono could kill him faster than he could multiply. They had trained against each other shortly after Grimalkin had become Infinite.

Tom quickly activated Octachrome Cat — Grimalkin to make up for the lost Toms, only to lose half of them again in the bombing that followed.

If his reaction was ever just a moment too slow, he would lose too many of his duplicates at once and be overwhelmed.

...Bombs, huh? They suit his powers better than I thought.

The bombs appeared next to Tom as though Chrono had placed them there after completely stopping time.

Obviously, this was possible due to the power of Chrono's Embryo.

The full name of his original form was "Infinite Time, Chronos Kairos Aion."

It was an Embryo that could control the speed at which time passed for the target.

The watches he held in his hands, Chronos and Kairos, were extensions of his being and a remnant of the time before he'd become the Type Infinite World Embryo he was now. Before that, he had been Type World-Rule-Calculator.

Chronos, held in his right hand, was two times faster than normal clocks, while Kairos, held in his left hand, was ten times as fast.

That knowledge alone was enough to guess at their abilities.

Chronos had a skill called "World Time Acceleration," which was an AoE AGI buff that accelerated the time passing for his nearby targets — such as his own bombs or the air touching around him — by two.

Kairos, by contrast, possessed a skill called "Subjective Time Acceleration," which was a single-target AoE AGI buff that multiplied his own speed by ten.

Together, the two skills multiplied Chrono's AGI by 20.

His avatar was specialized in AGI and had it at 13,000 — so once activated, the skills took it all the way up to 260,000.

Tom himself was AGI-focused and could move faster than the speed of sound, but he had trouble even seeing Chrono.

And this is just his normal speed. He still hasn't used his ultimate skill to reach his maximum potential...

As far as Tom knew, Chrono's ultimate skill doubled the effects of both pocket watches, bringing his total AGI well above 1,000,000.

He does have weaknesses, though.

Tom had known his fellow Infinite Embryo for thousands of years. Though Chrono had only recently begun fighting as an avatar, Tom already knew his flaws.

There was also the fact that Tom had operated as an avatar longer than any other control AI. He had a great deal of experience and knew his opponent's abilities well enough to predict such things.

Among the smaller flaws, you have the fact that both his hands are occupied by the pocket watches. Chrono couldn't use his hands because he was holding these extensions of himself. That was why his main weapon was his metal blade-boots.

However, since he could still use things like bombs and Gems by holding them between his fingers, this wasn't too much of a flaw.

But there was a bigger one Tom had spotted.

...It also looks like his avatar form doesn't actually allow him to make full use of his speed. In terms of speed alone, Chrono surpassed Tom twenty times over. He could actually defeat all eight Toms at once, and there must be a reason why he wasn't doing that.

He's using nothing but bombs so far. I knew it... he has to slow down to use any direct attacks.

That was the primary flaw behind Chrono's extreme speed. No matter how fast he was, it meant nothing if he couldn't actually attack with it.

After all...

His avatar is hyperspecialized in AGI, so his END is really low. There's no way he himself would escape unscathed if he attacked someone at dozens of times the speed of sound. The faster you crashed into something, the stronger the impact. That was basic physics.

A person's body could handle the impact of an attack using their own STR; even AGI-based attackers only needed about a tenth of their AGI's worth of END to withstand the recoil of their super-fast attacks.

Chrono, however, fought at speeds that were far too great for his body to handle. His avatar's AGI surpassed the insane level of 260,000, but his END only barely made it into the quadruple digits.

That was why he only dealt direct attacks with his blade-boots after first using his great speed to enter the enemy's blind spots, then slowing down enough that he could talk to his opponent.

Otherwise, his legs would be destroyed by his own kicks.

This also explained why Chrono was so focused on indirect attacks using bombs.

Kashimiya the Kingdom's Fastest also fought by boosting his AGI, but he used the Blade Speed-Through skill which removed as much of his opponent's END as he had AGI. This completely nullified any resistance that might hurt him as he sliced off an opponent's head as though it was nothing.

As a control AI avatar, Chrono had no job skills like that — in fact, there was no way he could even get them, making them impossible to incorporate into his strategy and leaving him with no offensive options other than simply slowing down before attack and or approaching indirectly.

That was Infinite Time, Chronos Kairos Aion's greatest flaw.

Though, that flaw only exists for him as he is right now. This weakness was only present because Chrono's power was currently limited to that of a sixth form Embryo.

If Infinite Time was in his seventh or eighth forms, it would be as though that flaw had never even existed.

At his current power level, he can't even use his main weapon... the blade "Time-Breaker." I thought I could overcome or stand my ground against him because his firepower was low, but...

It seemed that Tom was wrong — Chrono was starting to overwhelm him, even now. He was forced to fight a defensive battle, evading the explosions and running while replacing any Toms he'd lost.

Tom had far more experience in avatar fights, but Chrono had developed an item-based strategy that worked really well for him.

That was why he used bombs and Gems, and why he'd made it so he could jump around in midair.

...He's probably using an accessory with something like Air Skip. He might also have some equipment on him that reduces the impact from landing.

It was worth noting that Chrono hadn't had a body at first; he'd only developed this power once he started traveling around Infinite Dendrogram just a few years ago.

He might be better at fighting than I am, Tom thought. Well... then again, I'm basically just brute-forcing most of my battles with my multiplication powers. This reminds of something the King of Kings told me once. Rockfell said, "I see no end to you. You are inexhaustible, I assume? This is nothing to fear, though. In fact, it's quite boring. Tiresome. Show me something different."

During The Era of the Peerless Three... when Tom was "The Lynx, Schrödinger Cat," he had the output of a Superior and could have a maximum of 800 copies of himself.

...Despite that, King of Kings had exterminated all of those Toms and had proceeded to scold him in those words that he still remembered to this day.

Though, as far as tians went, King of Kings was far outside the norm.

...I guess it's also a matter of how our processing power is implemented.

Tom was focusing on both battle analysis and recollections of the past, yet his movement in battle remained flawless. Because he was adept at parallel thinking, he could easily ponder such things while controlling eight bodies at once.

I'm specialized in pure volume, so I can't improve my battle technique by that much.

If each of the Toms were like some of the absurd battle experts he'd seen here in Infinite Dendrogram, he could easily dispatch Chrono despite his enormous advantage in speed.

But since that was impossible in this situation, he had to take a different approach.

"Tom Cat! Is this your idea of stopping me?! To go on the defensive and stall for time?!" Chrono said, slowing himself down.

"Who knooows? Maybe I'm actually just in the middle of setting up a trap for you..." one of the Toms replied, a moment before a Crimson Sphere Gem went off behind him and he was instantly incinerated.

This started a chain reaction, and a few more Toms were reduced to ash.

...He has so many consumables. Did he go around buying up any that appeared on the market or does he have ties to people who make them? Regardless, I'm impressed he built all this up in just a few years.

This battle seemed to be a tug-of-war between Tom's multiplication speed and Chrono's item supply.

However, Tom didn't intend to be locked into a battle of attrition like that.

But Chrono... You're using items made by tians living in the present.

Tom was well aware that when it came to tools of war, the era that had turned the entire continent into a battleground — the era when Cheshire had operated as Schrödinger Cat — was far more terrifying than the current one.

However, all those things were of an age Chrono could never know. There were countless weapons he had no knowledge of, since he had been forced to focus solely on the world's time acceleration... countless nightmares that had faded into history.

"...It's funny to think about," Tom muttered with a wry grin. After all, he was the one who'd gone around destroying such tools to prevent them from breaking the balance when the time came.

And now I'm about to use them... that's pretty bold. But he believed that there was no other way to stop Chrono's rampage.

"It's been a while since I've worn this." Reaching into his own inventory one Tom took out a transparent cloak with the texture of silk and wrapped himself in it.

The next moment, that Tom vanished — along with every trace of his presence.

This was a magic cloak called "Nobody Whisper," and though he had many such artifacts, this was the most important piece of equipment for his current strategy.

Back when he'd been operating as Schrödinger Cat during The Era of the Peerless Three, he needed something that would help him stand a chance against everyone else, so he'd brought the necessary materials to a particular Superior Job and had that person create this item for him.

It had incredibly high-level Presence Block and Optical Camouflage skills, letting it conceal the presence of those who wore it and hide them visually.

It only seemed good for hiding, but since Tom only needed one of himself to create more, it was an incredibly valuable item for him. This piece of gear had been Schrödinger Cat's close friend during The Era of the Peerless Three.

However, he didn't use this cloak very often these days.

It was too powerful to use in duels, and it was known that something like it had been used by the late Schrödinger Cat, so Tom Cat using the exact same item would raise uncomfortable questions. Also, he had avoided using it against Prism Soldiers because their senses weren't based on sight or even presence.

But there was no problem in using it against a colleague who knew his entire history.

There's also this... I planned to keep it gathering dust in my inventory forever, but if this is what it takes to stop you, I have no choice. All seven Toms who weren't in hiding reached into their inventories all at once.

All Toms shared inventory between them. Thus, it was impossible for them to remove something that another Tom had already taken out — like Nobody Whisper — but there were enough of this for all of them.

The seven Toms took out some... collars.

They all exuded a miasma, obviously marking them as deeply cursed items.

As three of the seven Toms died to Chronos' explosions, they equipped the collars on themselves.

A moment later, Chrono's bombs killed all the ones that were left...

[Murder-Suicide... activate]

...And the collars all produced a twisted, unsettling sound.

◇◆

The center-west land which was now the kingdom had once been a land of conflict, where many small countries had vied for dominance. That chaos eventually spawned the King of Kings — that anomaly of a man who subjugated almost every country into one great nation.

That was the beginning of The Era of the Peerless Three — King of Kings, Draconic Emperor, and The Lynx.

The era ended with the sealing of the King of Kings, the death of the Draconic Emperor, and the disappearance of The Lynx. The vacuum they left behind only led to more wars. Until the Sacred King — the first Azurite — united the center-west to form the Kingdom of Altar, there was no peace in this land.

During these conflicts, many weapons were created and many grand strategies were woven. One of the latter was the suicide tactics of Death Soldiers. Slaves with Death Soldier jobs would be sent into enemy grounds to crack open their defenses with the force of their final exit from the world.

This strategy had a few flaws, though.

Though Last Command allowed the user to move even with 0 HP, they still needed limbs to move with. On the battlefield, it wasn't uncommon for people to receive wounds that rendered them completely immobile.

There were even some unusual cases when the bombs they were wearing detonated too early, blasting them into bits that had far worse problems than mere lack of mobility.

Even the country that used this tactic felt it was suboptimal. They had no moral objections to letting their slaves die, but they did see it as a waste of resources.

They believed that they had to make their Death Soldiers' deaths count and give them ways to kill their enemies more efficiently.

The people in charge were so focused on not letting their slaves' deaths go to waste that it would be darkly hilarious, if they weren't completely serious about it.

The one who finally provided them with a solution was a single High Alchemist — not even a Superior Job. He didn't have any transcendental skills, nor was he a genius like Grand Artificer Flagman of the pre-ancient civilization. The only thing unusual about him was that he had Lich as a sub-job.

However, because of this build... or perhaps because he was the kind of person who would choose such a build at all... he was adept at controlling grudge.

He was among the best minds of his time when it came to crafting grudge-based, or rather cursed items, but that certainly didn't mean that he was respected. Most of the things he'd made were useless in almost every situation, after all. A good example was CBR Armor, which granted Bleeding, Doom, and Weakness to all who wore it.

He was an artificer who specialized in devices that tortured their wearers. He'd made a living by primarily selling torture devices, but one day, he developed something that drastically changed the course of his life.

It was a collar-like item called "Stone Equals Gold."

It sounded like something an Alchemist would make, but also far from it at the same time. The name, however, was just something chosen by whoever made it — what mattered most was its function.

This collar only did one thing — upon the wearer's death, it passed on a curse to the closest living creature.

That didn't seem like much, but the curse — Murder-Suicide — was extremely potent. Even if the target was much stronger than the original wearer, it could kill or at least incapacitate them.

That made it possible to exchange the life of a slave — worth as much as a pebble — for the life of a hardened warrior that was worth their weight in gold. The Death Soldiers' lives would never be wasted again.

Some were worried that if the skill targeted the closest people, it could set off chain reactions that would obliterate the whole legion of Death Soldiers before they made it to the enemy lines, but the alchemist took care of that by developing an accessory that excluded people from being targeted by the Murder-Suicide curse. The leaders who used the suicide attacks endlessly praised the alchemist for his work and quickly decided to mass-produce the items for use in actual battle.

However, Stone Equals Gold never saw any official use. The very night it was decided they would be mass produced, the alchemist that developed it and the military officers that planned to use it were all killed by a certain someone.

On top of that, the completed prototypes and the research documents had completely vanished. With everyone who knew about it and the relevant documents having disappeared, this invention was forgotten by history.

And it never was discovered who, exactly, had killed them all and took the prototypes...

Now, this was mostly irrelevant, but the alchemist in question... the horse-man alchemist had left behind research documents pertaining to the manipulation of grudge. These documents had been stored somewhere unrelated to research on the collars, and they were eventually found by one of his descendants.

The descendant in question used the documents to become a Necromancer and develop original necromantic magic of his own... but that was a different story.

◇◆◇

Chrono’s bombs killed off four Toms, and the collars they were wearing — Stone Equals Gold — all activated. The four curses released by their deaths all homed in on the closest target — Chrono.

“Ah...!” He gasped and threw a bomb at the roiling miasma of curse heading towards him, but it seemed to be unaffected.

He instantly realized that this was the kind of curse that would follow him forever, and that its presence wasn’t affected by explosions or physical attacks.

Compared to Chrono, the floating curses were extremely slow, and he could easily put some distance between him and them.

In that case...! Chrono considered using someone else as a shield that would take the curse in his stead.

“Huh...?!”

But he quickly realized that wasn’t an option as he recalled Tom’s words came back to him.

I talked to Alice and told her to deactivate your avatar if you touch an Altarian tian before defeating me.

“That little...!” Chrono now understood that Tom had said that not just to force him to fight, but also make it impossible for him to escape this curse.

If he as much as tried making a tian take the curse for him, he would instantly be immobilized and the curse would kill him.

He then thought of using Masters, but the only ones remotely close by were bodyguards who, naturally, had tians they wanted to protect. Monsters might have been an option, but Chrono didn’t sense any of those in the area either.

They ran away... wait, no! This wasn’t an area where any powerful monsters lived, so he first assumed that they had been driven away by the sound of explosions, but then he quickly rejected that idea.

Almost masked by the scent of the surrounding flora, he could just barely detect another scent in the air. That was enough for Chrono to understand that Tom had spread some sort of concoction that repelled monsters.

Tom was the one who’d called him here originally, meaning that he’d planned all of this. He’d actually come here to prepare for his plan not after the Altarians had arrived here in the morning, but last night — when Ray’s group were talking to Altimia.

Since Tom could be in several places at once, it was child’s play for him to “leave” without anyone noticing. Plus, he could split up to do his preparations even faster.

He’d done all of this just to call Chrono here today and force him into this situation.

This was all planned...?! As if demonstrating his immense experience, Tom had led Chrono directly into a trap.

However, there was more to this trap than that.

As Chrono ran away, the surrounding surface and trees exploded and scattered debris into the air, forcing him to slow down and dodge.

“Gh...!” Small pebbles and pieces of wood. Normally, such things would be meaningless.

However, Chrono moved at 26 times the speed of sound, so they could easily pierce his body. Therefore, he had to either change his trajectory or slow down to the point that the impact wouldn’t hurt him.

However, the more he slowed down, the closer the curses came to him.

Eventually, the distance between them dwindled...

“Ah...!”

...Until it became non-existent.

The curses released a black light — the mark of their application. There were four flashes — one for each curse — and once they’d dispersed they left nothing behind... except Chrono, lying on the ground.

Upon seeing him, the last Tom — the one in hiding — approached him, still wearing the Nobody Whisper.

He was wearing the accessory that he had retrieved alongside Stone Equals Gold.

He hadn’t used any more Toms to make sure that the curses focused solely on Chrono, and it ended up working out for him.

The curse definitely targeted Chrono, he thought. Chrono’s corpse lying on the ground was all the proof he needed.

The four curses were fatal, too, as proven by the bits of light that soon began to rise from his body.

This was a bit aggressive, but if it stopped Chrono’s rampage, then... Hm?

Tom had noticed something strange.

Though there were bits of light rising from Chrono, his remains didn’t seem to be vanishing. He was a control AI avatar, of course, but his disappearance and Resource retrieval after death should have functioned exactly as it did with Masters.

“There you are, Tom Cat.”

The next moment, Chrono’s prone body vanished, and countless bombs and Gems appeared all around Tom.

“Kh?!” As Tom jumped back, he realized his failure.

He’d created a wall of pebbles and pieces of wood to keep Chrono from escaping.

They had fallen to the ground by now, and as Tom — still invisible — stepped on them, he'd unwittingly given away his position.

Though Chrono didn't know exactly where Tom was, he was able to seed the items all over his approximate location.

But the curse hit him...! How is he okay...?! Tom thought in shock as he evaded the items and multiplied again.

However, before he could find his answer, the bombs all went off at the same time, scattering all the Toms to the winds.

"Gh...!" Only a single Tom was left alive. However, he was far from unscathed. Though the explosions didn't take his life, he'd defended against them using all four of his limbs, and they had all been seriously wounded. It was difficult for him to even move anymore.

Chrono slowed down and stood before him.

"Just like you know me, I also know you," he said. "Your multiples are created based on the healthiest existing one... There's only one of you now and all your limbs are hurt, so any clones you create will be the same as you are now."

Tom could certainly create more of himself still, but since they would all have wounded limbs, it was nearly impossible for him to keep fighting.

It was difficult to even equip more Stone Equals Gold.

"...How did you dodge the curse?" Tom had been certain that the curse had landed. Besides specialized MVP special rewards, there was no gear that would allow anyone to survive Murder-Suicide, and even then, weathering a whole four of them would be next to impossible.

Also, due to the curse imposed by Juliet, Chrono was unable to switch gear.

Tom asked this question because he knew without a doubt that his attack was unavoidable, and instead of responding, Chrono merely glanced at the place he'd been lying on the ground.

However, that was the answer.

Following Chrono's gaze, Tom saw a few things that were turning into bits of light as they vanished.

They were...

"The corpses... of birds?" Four songbird-like monsters were lying on the ground. Tom hadn't seen them at first because they were under Chrono, and they were what made him falsely believe that Chrono's avatar was disappearing.

Murder-Suicide was a skill that launched curses at the closest creature. It didn't even have to be human — any creature could work as a shield against it. They just had to be closer to the originator of the curse than you.

However, Tom had preemptively driven away all wild monsters to prevent exactly this.

But then... where did these songbirds come from?

"My Master yearned for the real sky... He also loved the songs of birds."

The one to answer Tom's question was Chrono himself.

His voice was thick with nostalgia. He was remembering the death of his Master, looking up at the sky and listening to the songs of the birds in the natural scenery created by Infinite Illusion.

"Because of that, I kept a bunch of songbirds of my own in a Jewel."

"Ah...!" Chrono himself had monsters, and right before the curse landed, he'd released them to take his place.

This was truly ironic. If Chrono had kept battle-focused monsters on him instead, Tom would've instantly noticed.

But because they were small and powerless songbirds, he was unable to realize that the curses had missed or that Chrono was faking his death.

"...I guess I should apologize, then?" Tom asked.

"It's fine. I just kept them inside... Honestly, I was never able to understand what was so good or bad about their songs, anyway."

Tom said nothing. Chrono's voice had made it rather evident that he was most bothered by the fact that he had failed to understand something that his Master had loved.

However, he then composed himself and looked down at Tom with cold eyes.

"...It's over, Tom Cat. You can try buying time by creating more powerless clones. I'll just spread some consumables and burn them all up again. I used a lot of them on you, but I still have enough for that."

He then took out his hands out of his pockets.

Between the fingers of the hands holding the watches, there were several Gems.

Tom still said nothing.

"Goodbye, The Lynx, Tom Cat," Chrono said, throwing the Gems over

Tom.

Chapter Nine: Vorpal Rabbit, Vorpal Hare

Royal Capital, Altea, Urban Area

The capital of Altar was in a state of chaos.

It had been unexpectedly assaulted by a horde of bizarre creatures that attacked people indiscriminately.

The humanoid beings had bee-like features. They were Apis Ideas — the high rank-based “Ideas” created by the Superior Embryo known as “True Form Alteration, Idea.” Their number in the city easily exceeded five hundred.

“BZZBZZBZZ...”

“KYAAHH...!” The Ideas, marked with black-and-yellow warning stripes, were scattered around the city, attacking any tians they saw with their deadly spear-like stingers.

“Shit! I can’t let this go on!” The city guards pulled their swords and charged the Apis Ideas, but they could only barely scratch their tough exoskeletons.

The Apis Ideas easily dispatched such resistance and continued their slaughter.

Even though these Ideas were in some sense “mass produced,” their stats surpassed even Demi-Dragons, matching level 500 Masters with C-rank stat growth bonuses — double that of tians. No capital guards could handle them, and even the Masters staying in the city were having a hard time.

However, there were some who seemed to be putting up a good fight.

“BZZBZZBZZ... BZZ?” Three Apis Ideas were wandering around in search of more prey when suddenly, a single whistling arrow landed between them with a sound like the cry of a bird.

“All together... Fire!” A moment later, the Apis Ideas were showered by a downpour of arrows raining from the sky.

This was the effect of Early Summer Arrow Rain, a skill of the Tenchi job Heavy Bow Samurai. It fired a hundred arrows with each use, and with 30 people firing, that number went all the way up to 3,000.

Pierced by a thousand times more spears than they had to defend themselves with, the three Apis Ideas quickly died.

And then, a moment later, they began expanding from inside before exploding violently.

“Yeah, they really do blow up when they die.”

“They look like old-school tokusatsu enemies. They even die the same way...” Two women were talking as they watched the Apis Ideas blow up.

They were part of the third-ranking clan in the kingdom and its greatest PK clan, K&R.

In particular, this was the clan’s ranged swarm tactics group. Many of its members were inexperienced Masters who were still in the middle of the leveling process, but the two directing them — the leader and her assistant — were veterans. They’d actually been with Rosa back in Tenchi before K&R was even a thing.

“The squad tactics group is having a hard time, too. Some were taken out by the explosions,” said the assistant.

“Then we’ll have to keep fighting them from a distance. We got anyone else who’s resisting?” asked the leader.

K&R’s headquarters were located in Altea, so once Zeta launched her act of terrorism on the capital, every member online instantly swung into action.

With most of K&R being battle-focused, they were one of the more powerful factions in the fight against the Apis Ideas.

“The gulf in power between these guys and tians is really bad. Also, there’s something going on in the castle, so most of the knights are busy with that.”

The leader of the group glanced in the direction of the castle and saw black smoke rising from it.

It was definitely under attack.

“Part of the squad tactics group also went to the castle, but we lost contact with them after they said that they ran into some kind of flaming monster. Our member list says they’re offline, so they probably lost the fight. What do we do?”

“...We can’t use our tactics indoors, anyway. Let’s leave the castle to the other Masters.”

“It appears that most of the skilled fighters from The Lunar Society are acting as bodyguards in the peace talks. Those who are left can’t fight the bee-men by themselves.”

“So, the same Lunar Society that beat us up back then is helpless now, huh?”

“Their swarm tactics revolve around their priestess’ debuffs. I want to believe that we’d have been more evenly matched if it weren’t for that.”

“...And besides The Lunar Society, we have... Death Period, who are probably all on bodyguard duty. What about AETL Union and the like?”

“It doesn’t look like there are a lot of clans that have the numbers. AETL Union lost a bunch of members and they’re now scattered over other cities... Same for the Editing Division and Alliance.”

“Why now, of all times... Is there anybody else at all?” As she learned the state of the other major clans, the leader of the group scowled.

“Babylonian Battlegroup is doing something. That mask guy who’s sixth in the duel rankings was seen fighting the bee-men alongside his underling... the hippogryph rider.”

“There’s not many of them, but they fight as well as maxed-out Tenchi fighters. We can count on them.”

“...Oh, that does make them sound like they’re pretty strong.”

“Did you remember something?”

“...Yes. Tenchi’s battlefields were scary.”

“We’ve gotten a bit rusty since coming to Altar. War’s close, so let’s refresh our skills with these bee-men.”

“Yeah... I gotta say, though, the timing is awful.”

“You mean with our clan leader?”

“Yeah.” In response to her assistant’s words, the leader of the swarm tactics group shrugged and grinned wryly.

“You wanted to show off to him or something?”

“I mean, I did, but... it seems to me that the group’s morale is way higher when he and Big Sis are around.”

“Well, they were the ones leading us on all our hunts so far. We never had a swarm battle without both of them, but I guess bad timing can do that. This is the perfect opportunity to see how far we can go without them.”

She paused for a moment before continuing.

"Also... I'm sure he's in the middle of a real deadly battle right now."

She was looking far into the west... the Altar-Dryfe border.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe Border, Grove

The moment when Chrono released Gems on Tom and right before they burned his avatar to ash... a single car charged towards them.

"What?!" Chrono hadn't even felt it approach.

The car made no sound at all. You couldn't hear the branches crunching under the tires or even the sound of air rushing past it. It barreled towards them, passing through everything like a ghost.

Chrono had recognized this car.

That's the Embryo from the other night... It was in fact the car-like Embryo that had escaped him when he assaulted K&R's sub-leader, Rosa. Its Master was Tomica and its name was Oboroguruma.

Just like back then, it was in its ultimate form, and it was charging straight towards Tom, who was still lying close to Chrono.

Chrono quickly backed away, and as Oboroguruma passed by, the passenger seat opened up and someone pulled Tom inside.

A moment later, the Gems lit up behind it, covering Oboroguruma's rear in Crimson Spheres.

"EEK?! It's getting kinda hot! I really hope my Oboroguruma is fireproof!"

"Tomica, you should really get a better grasp of your own Embryo's abilities." While Tomica was teary-eyed and shrieking, the person sitting in the passenger seat was really composed.

Tom, who was pulled to the back seat, was really surprised to see who it was.

"You're..."

"Mr. Tom... There are two things I want you to tell me, and please make it brief," he said as he raised two fingers.

"I want to know your relationship with that boy, and if he is the one who assaulted all the other rankers. That is it."

Tom thought for a moment before saying, "If I get the death penalty, he'll go kidnap the princesses. That's our relationship. And yes, he is the one who did it."

"Thank you for the easy-to-understand explanation." He nodded, even though the explanation was somewhat lacking, before putting his hand on the door.

"Tomica, please take Tom somewhere far away. I'm getting off here."

"Eh? Ah. Umm...!"

"Tom... Will you pass on your opponent to me?"

"...Yeah. It's not like I can do anything against him at this point."

Despite doing all the preparations necessary to overcome his incompatibility with Chrono, Tom was defeated. He had no hope of winning now.

Thus, he now entrusted his hope to this person here.

Of course, he was somewhat averse to letting someone else handle his colleague's rampage. Tom wanted to handle it himself.

However, he was also certain that if there was anyone in the kingdom who could beat Chrono — the master of acceleration and someone who lived in an entirely different world in terms of time — it could only be him.

"This is it for me. I'm handing it all off to you."

"Thank you. I'm glad I came here prepared to duel. Tomica, thank you for taking me all the way here," he said with a smile as he opened Oboroguruma's door.

A moment later, as though someone had been waiting for the door to open, a bomb was flung into the car.

Obviously Chrono was the one who'd thrown it. He'd already caught up to the Oboroguruma and was running alongside it.

The car negated all attacks from outside, so Chrono had been waiting for the perfect opening to finally finish off Tom.

The bomb was similar to dynamite and had more power than most of his others. He'd thrown it into the car at supersonic speeds that nobody could follow, and a moment later, it... didn't explode.

The bomb merely landed inside Oboroguruma as if it was nothing more than an inert object.

"...What?" Still accelerating, Chrono opened his eyes wide.

He looked inside the car and saw a cut wire lying right next to the bomb.

That could only mean that someone had cut it off the moment before it exploded.

However, the biggest problem with that was that...

I... didn't see it?

...Despite being in a state of acceleration, Chrono hadn't witnessed the moment the wire was cut.

He wondered if that was even possible when...

"Ah...?!"

...At that very moment, Chrono's avatar warned him of an impending danger, like the feeling one gets when something stabs towards your closed eyes. It was a sense of danger that he felt on the back of his neck.

"...!" Chrono instantly activated his ultimate skill. By doubling the AGI buffs of both World Time Acceleration and Subjective Time Acceleration, he briefly broke 1,000,000 AGI.

Then, without even looking back, he ran ahead as fast as he could.

A moment later, a slight pain pricked the skin at the back of his neck.

"Ah...?!" He continued to run as he put the back of his left hand against his neck.

His neck was wet, and the fluid on the back of his hand was red.

It took him a moment to understand that this was his own blood. Someone had actually cut him.

Impossible... Who could possibly attack Chrono from behind while he was accelerating? And more importantly, how? As far as he knew, even King of Beasts, Behemot couldn't match Chrono's AGI.

He racked his brain for anyone who could do this to him...

"Ah, right... There is one person."

...And came up with a name and a face.

Chrono had info about him, as well. After all, he was originally one of the targets he planned to kill on that night.

However, he'd been offline, so they hadn't encountered each other. He wasn't among the bodyguards, so Chrono had completely forgotten about him.

"Gh...!" Chrono stopped and looked behind him.

He chose not to chase Oboroguruma or put more distance between himself and his opponent.

Oboroguruma's Master was allied with his pursuer, after all. It was possible he'd ordered her to drive a route that would allow him to catch up on purpose. If Chrono focused too much on attacking Oboroguruma, he would certainly lose his head.

With that decision made, he decided to face the one chasing him.

He didn't say a word. Maintaining his base acceleration, he prepared to use his ultimate skill at any moment. Chrono already knew that, although his base acceleration speed was lower than his opponent's, he could become faster than him by using his ultimate skill. That was why he stood in place and waited for his pursuer, ready to make his move.

However, his opponent approached him far slower than Chrono was expecting.

His feet made gentle sounds on the dirt floor of the forest as he walked closer, step by casual step.

"I'm sorry I made you wait." He stepped out from between the trees, revealing a boy even younger than Chrono. He was short even given his age and wore a woolly coat. At his sides hung were two sheathed odachis, both bitten into by chains that were decorated with rabbit skulls and shark heads.

His appearance was difficult to forget, and his name was...

"I knew it... Kashimiya."

The young boy's name was indeed The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

He was the duel ranker who'd risen to second place after defeating Tom, as well as the owner of K&R.

He also bore titles like "The Kingdom's Fastest" and "The Guillotine."

"Yes. And you are... Chrono Crown, yes?"

"...Yeah." Chrono wasn't that surprised that he called him by name.

The ambushes that night weren't easily linked to him, but Kashimiya actually knew his name because K&R's Tomica was there when Shu Starling said that the culprit was Chrono, and she passed it on to him.

...It looks like I'm his mark here, Chrono thought.

He now understood that he was Kashimiya's target, and he already knew his motivation.

"I see. Fifth in the duel rankings... Rosa was a member of your clan, wasn't she? I guess you came here to avenge her."

"Huh?"

"...What do you mean, huh?" Chrono had absolute confidence in his assumption, but then Kashimiya tilted his head quizzically in response, leaving him thoroughly confused.

"Oh no — this isn't revenge for Rosa. I didn't hunt down Tsukuyo Fuso for that, either." Kashimiya rejected Chrono's assumption while bringing up the name of the leader of The Lunar Society, which had annihilated K&R three months ago during the blockade incident.

"Rosa is a PK, so if someone PKs her, then fair's fair. Same goes for me, of course, and I always tell my clan that there's no need for vengeance PK."

"...Then, are you here as an Altarian Master joining the princess' retinue?"

"That... isn't exactly it either."

"Then why are you here?!" Chrono couldn't help but raise his voice at this person who'd interfered with him finishing off Tom.

Kashimiya made a somewhat perplexed expression before speaking up, his tone clear as crystal.

"I'm here to cut you."

"...Huh?" Kashimiya said that he wasn't here for vengeance, or to protect anything... he just wanted to cut Chrono.

"What... do you mean?"

"Umm... you are the one who attacked the rankers, and you are the fastest PK in Dryfe, right?"

"What of it...?"

"I almost never get to cut someone who's faster than me. I thought this would be the perfect chance. Just a few moments ago, you moved faster than I could cut off your head."

Kashimiya plainly and honestly stated that he was only here because he wanted to cut someone who was faster than him.

That answer made Chrono so angry that a vein popped out on his forehead as he shouted at Kashimiya, "Are you screwing with me?! Do you have any idea the emotion I've been putting into this?! How desperately I tried to beat Tom?! How hard I'm trying to prevent the war?! DO YOU HAVE ANY IDEA?!"

"No. I have no idea. I don't really care about that..." Kashimiya said as if it was nothing.

"You little...!"

"Also, didn't I just say it?" Faced with Chrono's rage, Kashimiya kept a composed face and explained his logic.

"Both you and I are PKs who kill other players for the sake of our goals.

That's exactly why we don't have to consider our opponent's feelings or the weight of their reasons, right?"

"What...?"

"I mean, we PKs often kill other people for our own convenience, right? It's weird to expect consideration for your feelings when you're about to be killed."

Kashimiya wasn't here to avenge Rosa — she was, after all, a fellow PK. PKs killed others for their own gain, so it was only natural to be PK'd themselves in turn.

That was why Kashimiya intended to fight Chrono here.

In a situation like this, there was no reason for him to consider Chrono's situation or emotions whatsoever. Not even Chrono's talk of stopping the war meant anything to him.

Kashimiya wouldn't change his outlook even if Chrono had told him everything — control AI secrets included.

He only cared about two things — to cut someone faster than himself and enjoy a fight to the death with a fellow PK.

Chrono had no choice but to acknowledge one thing about the boy.

Isn't he a child in his own reality...? Ohh, but, then again... he thought as he was hit with a sudden realization. No ordinary child would be the leader of a country's largest PK clan.

Kashimiya hadn't gotten where he was by mere chance — his position was fully deserved.

"...I heard that K&R has a rule about getting the target's consent before PK'ing them," said Chrono. That was Kashimiya's own rule — they only PK'd after giving a warning and obtaining consent to fight.

Kashimiya nodded before raising one finger. "Yes, but there is one exception," he said.

"Exception?"

"'There's no need for that when the target is also a PK.' I've believed this since before I founded the clan."

Just as he'd already said, when he faced a PK, he would do so without considering their circumstances or emotions.

That was why he was said to be Altar's strongest PK. Eldridge, Barbaroy Bad Burn... he was strongest among them because he'd systematically fought and defeated them all.

"I see. I get it. I understand... That's enough."

Chrono let out a deep breath before glaring at Kashimiya.

"I'll find and kill Tom once I've PK'd you. You only added an extra step to the process."

"Yes, please do so. I'll PK you too."

Chrono grasped his two pocket watches and let his bloodlust overtake him.

Kashimiya also moved the chain holding his odachis. These were his Embryo, "Unsheath at Will, Inaba." Doing this helped put him into a stance from which he could unsheath both his odachis — a stance that was unique to him.

The two faced each other like gunslingers in a classic western. Then... both of them vanished.

This was the start of their battle to the death.

One was the avatar of a control AI and the fastest person in Dryfe — The Rabbit, Chrono Crown.

The other was the second in Altar's duel rankings as well as their own fastest Master — The Unsheath, Kashimiya.

Thus began the deadly struggle between the vorpal rabbit and the vorpal hare.

It was safe to say that it would be settled in one single instant.

◇◆

The kingdom's duel rankers and PKs well knew that you could only see Kashimiya's slashes after he had already performed them.

Your head would fall off, and only then you would know that you had been cut.

Everyone Kashimiya defeated had experienced this.

This was the result of his pure speed and nothing else. Thanks to The Unsheath's skill, Godlike Unsheathing, Kashimiya's AGI while he drew his sword was multiplied by a hundred. That gave him over 500,000 AGI. His slashes made the speed of sound seem slow, and no one could see them coming.

And thanks to Inaba's skill, Hareshark Nullstep, Kashimiya could instantly cover the distance between him and his targets. He and his blade moved at fifty times the speed of sound, and you needed abilities like Tom's to have any hope of countering it.

However, right here, there was an exception.

The Rabbit, Chrono Crown.

In his accelerated state, he had 260,000 AGI — about half of Kashimiya's — and that was enough for him to see the start of the unsheathing, which others couldn't even notice.

"The World in the Right, Perception in the Left, Here I Hold the Eternal Law — Chronos, Kairos, Aion." Before Kashimiya could close the distance, Chrono used his ultimate skill.

Chronos in his right hand and Kairos in his left hand had their speeds doubled, making Chrono's AGI four times greater than it was previously.

That reversed their relative speed — Chrono now moved twice as fast as Kashimiya and used that speed to jump backwards.

The impact of the landing was harsh even with his accessory that reduced the damage, but that was a small price to pay to prevent the deadly blade from reaching him.

He'd evaded the blade that went at fifty times the speed of sound by a distance of about two hand spans.

At the same time, Chrono scattered Gems all around Kashimiya.

Kashimiya could only move extremely fast while in the act of unsheathing. Thus, if he was attacked the moment his sword was fully drawn, it would be impossible for him to dodge.

At this rate, Kashimiya would be destroyed while his right hand was still fully extended from his impossibly fast draw.

But contrary to Chrono's expectations, Kashimiya then began unsheathing with his left hand.

There was no time at all between the switch. As though he'd expected for his first attack to miss, he instantly grabbed the hilt of the other odachi with his left hand.

And so, without Godlike Unsheathing ever stopping even for a moment, he continued to draw his second blade. He also used the Hareshark Nullstep to zigzag through the Gems and approach Chrono in order to launch the blade at his neck.

You little...!

The lack of time between the switch to the second unsheathing threatened Chrono like few things could.

Kashimiya was performing a ludicrous feat that could only be called "continuous unsheathing," connecting everything he did into one single action.

The blade that moved with the Godlike Unsheathing buff was all you needed to know that there was no opening between the two unsheathing actions.

Inaba was an Embryo specialized in supporting just the act of unsheathing. This was possible due to both the existence of the chains supporting the blades and Kashimiya's own supreme skill.

It took a true talent to get a Superior Job from the "The One" grouping at his age, and this continuous unsheathing was all you needed to see to know that his rank was well-deserved.

Still... I'm faster than him! Chrono thought. No matter how skilled or speedy Kashimiya was, Chrono knew he could surpass him. To Chrono, Kashimiya's unsheathing was only about half as fast as him, so he could see and evade the strike just fine regardless of its speed.

Once again, he evaded the blade by a distance of two hand spans.

Kashimiya had used both his odachis, and Chrono was about to toss out his Gems again, but...

...What?

...He noticed that Kashimiya's right hand was reaching for another sheathed odachi.

And no, it wasn't his first odachi returned to its sheath.

It was actually a third odachi.

Instant Wield...! Chrono remembered the existence of the skill that allowed to instantly switch weapons, and it made him gasp.

Kashimiya's current posture was quite unusual.

It was as though he was preparing to slash down from the shoulder — an attack that should have been impossible off a draw.

However, no matter the angle, Inaba's chains supported Kashimiya's unsheathing. And the fact that his speed remained at its peak was proof enough that his draw was still, as the skill's name suggested, godlike.

The third blade went for Chrono's neck diagonally.

The surprise factor let Kashimiya close some of the distance between them, but Chrono was still able to evade the slash.

He'd unsheathed once with each of his hands, then did it a third time thanks to Instant Wield. Thinking that he had evaded all the continuous unsheathing Kashimiya was capable of, Chrono once again threw out his items... but then The Guillotine's left hand began unsheathing his fourth blade.

Impossible...! He'd already used his Instant Wield. The skill had a cooldown, so he shouldn't have been able to use it again this quickly.

However, there was one method of making this possible...

...Does he actually have a skill that lowers the cooldown on Instant Equip?!

Embryos evolved according to their Masters. Kashimiya's Inaba was specialized solely in supporting Kashimiya's unsheathing.

Thus, if Kashimiya found it necessary to always have sheathed odachis at the ready, it was entirely possible that his Embryo could evolve to overcome the flaws of Instant Wield.

Chrono's guess was on the right track, but it also somewhat underestimated the full picture.

Kashimiya was using a skill called "Willblade — Inaba." This was Inaba's ultimate skill, and it was actually an always-active skill that completely nullified the cooldown of Kashimiya's active skills.

This allowed Kashimiya to swing his blades however he wished, without any time in between.

That was the true power of Kashimiya's Unsheath at Will, Inaba.

It let him to use skills continuously without any delay, like the white hare hopping across the sharks between the waves.

...That Embryo is giving its all to support Kashimiya's unsheathing, Chrono thought. After just barely evading the completely unexpected fourth, he saw Kashimiya still chasing after him as he prepared to draw a fifth odachi.

Inaba was indeed doing all it could to support its Master's combat abilities.

However, that was the extent of it — support.

The Embryo had no effect on Kashimiya's combat technique.

The Embryo isn't increasing the power of his unsheathing or making it automatic or anything like that... It's only helping him do it continuously. The technique is Kashimiya's alone.

The lack of Instant Wield's cooldown did not automatically make him a powerful combatant. Replacing the blades meant nothing if his draw technique was inadequate. In that case, he'd still lose the acceleration from his Godlike Unsheathing.

The fact that he was maintaining his speed instead meant that his technique was nothing short of perfect.

Kashimiya was the one controlling the chains holding the sheaths, using Instant Wield at the precise time to maintain his continuous unsheathing, and positioning himself using Hareshark Nullstep.

With support from his Embryo, even a young child has reached this level... There was no opening even between the fourth and fifth slashes.

Flawless, flowing, and continuous unsheathing.

This unique attack was woven from the triple threads of Kashimiya's job, his Embryo, and his own supreme skill.

It was the godspeed eight-chain slash attack... the "Personalized Mystic Slash — Octachrome Lightning." It had instantly killed all eight Toms when Kashimiya had faced him... and it was something that he alone could do.

...The world is so vast... Master.

Though his whole body trembled at the approaching blade, Chrono was also thoroughly astonished.

This feeling was greater than even his rage at those trying to get in his way. Still, it wasn't enough to take away his will to fight, and he had no intention of stopping now.

Evading Kashimiya's blades, Chrono searched for a way to win.

That's the fifth... I guess the colors of the sheaths are different to make sure he doesn't take out the wrong blade?

Thanks to the sheath coloring, he could differentiate between odachis he already used and ones he hadn't yet brought to bear, making it easy to predict which odachi he might use Instant Wield on next.

To a normal onlooker, this would seem like eight slashes all done within the blink of an eye. Just as he had during his battle with Tom Cat, Kashimiya could instantly kill eight people, or slash a single person eight times, killing them even if they were equipped with a Brooch.

It was a continuous sure-kill slash. That seemed like a contradiction, but that just made it more deserving of the prefix "Mystical."

However, this blade had yet to reach Chrono's neck.

That's... the sixth! No matter how fast his draw was, it didn't change the fact that Chrono was faster.

Though the distance between them was becoming smaller and smaller, the Octachrome Lightning had yet to reach him.

...His unsheathing technique is peerless... but he shouldn't be able to continue this forever. There has to be an opening somewhere.

Chrono's guess was correct. Just as it said in the name, "Octachrome Lightning" could only strike eight times. Kashimiya had yet to find a way to take his technique any farther than that.

Thus, Chrono prepared to go on the offensive once the slashes stopped.

...Though, I'm running out of bombs and Gems. He'd used too many of them during his ranker hunting and the battle against Tom, and his consumable supply was nearly exhausted.

Though, then again...

"...I can't win against him with items, anyway." Chrono felt that ordinary bombs and equipment wouldn't be enough to finish this Master off. This one long moment was enough for him to see that Kashimiya was no doubt the most fearsome human being that he'd ever faced as an avatar.

Thus, he'd resolved to give his opponent all the recognition he deserved.

...I can catch up to them even with just one leg left. I'll finish off Tom and then go on to kidnap the princess.

The reasoning behind this thought was simple: Chrono had finally decided to take Kashimiya seriously and defeat him properly.

This opponent was worth sacrificing a leg.

Chrono was about to use the greatest ace up his avatar's sleeve.

In essence it was a blade-kick launched while in a state of maximum acceleration using his ultimate skill. The force of the impact would always shatter the leg that delivered the kick, but with the force of over 1,000,000 AGI behind it, it could even pulverize Mythical metal.

It was the only sure-kill ability that Chrono had given a name — "Dead in Zero."

Using it, his opponent would die before they could even perceive that any time had passed.

Of course, it's likely that he's wearing a Brooch... but that won't be a problem. If the critical injury was nullified by the Brooch, the damage to his leg from the impact would also be nullified. He would then just have to launch another attack, which would most certainly kill Kashimiya.

Chrono moved over two times faster than his opponent, so he had the time for that.

There was also the fact that a single hit would be enough to break Kashimiya's unsheathing and briefly return his speeds to mundane levels.

I just need to... find the right moment! Chrono evaded Kashimiya's seventh slash as he waited for the perfect chance to use Dead in Zero.

And so it came... Before unsheathing the eighth, Kashimiya slowed down just a fraction. Perhaps he was thrown off by facing someone who was faster than him for the first time, or by the fact that none of his previous seven strikes had even scratched his enemy.

Brief as the mistake was, Chrono didn't let it slide.

He jumped next to Kashimiya and kick-slashed towards his neck. The next moment, Chrono's right leg was cut off from behind the knee.

Shock overcame him as he realized something.

Kashimiya hadn't slowed down by accident. It was no mistake at all — he had deliberately changed the speed of his continuous unsheathing.

Right before pulling the next blade out, he slightly lowered his speed as he activated a particular skill.

The skill's name was "Iai strike," and it doubled the user's AGI when the opponent entered his range.

Meant for launching a counter strike, it was one of the basic skills in the art of unsheathing.

However, combined with Godlike Unsheathing, it let Kashimiya move at a speed that matched even Chrono's.

Kashimiya had expected Chrono to do exactly as he did — to anticipate that he would eventually stop and try to attack him during that gap between attacks. And as a fellow fighter who moved at divine speeds, he knew that Chrono would try to attack directly instead of using his items that had failed again and again.

Thus, he'd lured him to his side and launched a counterattack.

It was a bit of a gamble, but it had allowed Kashimiya to take Chrono's right leg.

"Not yet...!" Despite the loss, The Rabbit hadn't given up. Right before he hit the ground, he thrust out his pocket watches as though attempting a handstand, and then pushed away to launch himself again.

His ultimate speed was still active. He would use his remaining left leg to take Kashimiya's head with Dead in Zero.

The Unsheath also had his new odachi ready and began to draw it with his right hand.

He swung the final blade into the trajectory of Chrono's approach.

However, the stroke was completed before Chrono even entered Kashimiya's range.

Shocking as it was, this wasn't a measurement error on Kashimiya's part. He actually had swung the blade at the right time to meet Chrono's attack, despite his immense speed.

Chrono had just made him miss.

One of Chronos Kairos Aion's skills was World Time Acceleration, which doubled the speed for the selected nearby targets.

However, there was no limit to what or who could be picked — even his enemy was an option.

By accelerating Kashimiya right when he began the unsheathing, he forced him to swing his blade at the wrong time, so he cut through nothing but air.

I have you now! Right after the blade passed him by, Chrono used the opening before Kashimiya swung the sword in his left hand to launch his blade-boots towards the boy's head.

However... his left leg was then shattered.

This was done using the sheath of the odachi Kashimiya had used for his last draw. Since it was supported by chains, he'd swung it at Chrono's left leg before the acceleration from his unsheathing ended.

Of course, the sheath wasn't a blade, so Blade Speed-Through didn't apply to it. As a result, it shattered on impact.

The damage didn't end there. The shock shattered the chains holding it, and since he was connected to them, even Kashimiya was hurt.

However, the damage it dealt was extreme. This speed-based attack was much like Chrono's Dead in Zero, and it literally shattered his leg.

Did he predict my actions again...? No! He actually sensed that his speed was different the moment he began unsheathing... and instantly switched tactics! Kashimiya had realized that his slash would miss, so he quickly swapped to using his sheath instead. This split-second decision had successfully removed both of The Rabbit's legs.

What an incredible person... To think the world has... such people in it...?

As Chrono fell, Kashimiya prepared to unsheath using his left hand and finish him off.

However, instead of feeling the frustration he'd felt at the beginning of this fight, Chrono was simply shocked... and astonished.

Things beyond imagination... Things I can't hope to match... They exist not just in nature, but among people, too. This has to be the world that my Master wanted to see... Ohh...

As he fell, Chrono's eyes were turned towards the blue sky above. He pondered its beauty and the supreme technique he had just experienced.

I'm sure that both of these things... will be memories worthy of telling to Master... Hahah... Seriously...

"The world is... so vast..." Kashimiya's final slash cut Chrono's head clean from his shoulders like a guillotine.

With that, The Rabbit, Chrono Crown dissolved into bits of light.

Even though he couldn't fulfill his goal and was indeed defeated right in the middle of pursuing it, he seemed unexpectedly satisfied.

Embracing the memory of that one moment when reality surpassed his imagination... he vanished into the air.

Interlude: The Spectator

A Certain Place at the Altar-Dryfe Border

There were currently three battles happening at the Altar-Dryfe border. Though the battle between Chrono and Tom — and then Kashimiya — had ended, the battles sparked at the peace talks had only just begun.

The combatants on those other battlefields probably weren't even aware of the deadly fight that had just taken place.

However, there was one who watched over each of these raging conflicts.

Kashimiya and Chrono's fight is over. Switching view.

Hiding in the shadow of some trees, a man scribbled something on his notepad with his eyes closed.

He was the thirtieth in Altar's kill rankings — King of Light, F.

The man who'd fought Ray on the Love-Duel Festival was yet again looking down upon everything.

As expected, The Unbreakable's fight was one to behold, but there are many others worth seeing, too.

The sights observed by his Embryo, Zodiac, were projected directly into his eyes. His left was focused on a single battle — the one involving Ray's group — while his right swapped between several of them.

The first was the now-finished duel to the death between Kashimiya and Chrono; the second was the martial dance between the two princesses; and the third was the clash between the machine god and a giant kaiju.

F could see so many rare occurrences merely by being in this place, at this time. In fact, there was so much to see that it was actually beginning to make him anxious.

On top of that, there was one thing that he was completely missing out on.

Due to a connection of his, he knew about the assault on Altea that was happening right now. However, the capital was far from the Altar-Dryfe border. That put it well beyond the range of his Zodiac's remote control, so he could only observe one of the two battlegrounds.

F had prioritized Ray — the one who'd beaten him and left an impression he himself had yet to fully make sense of — and followed him here to the border, but he definitely found it unfortunate that he couldn't see Altea too.

The capital has more people, though. I can only hope that I can catch a glimpse of what's happening there through someone's recording.

He considered Zodiac's observation to be the best and most optimal way of gathering material, but if something was too far away, then he had to resort to inferior methods.

"Hm...?" Suddenly, something strange appeared before his right eye, which was currently fixed on the clash between Shu and Behemot.

It was a monster that looked like an eyeball that had somehow sprouted wings.

F already knew about a creature much like this. If that was the same kind of monster, then it was probably doing the same thing as F right now.

...Mr. Franklin.

"The Weakest, The Worst" — Dryfe's infamous mad scientist. One of his creatures was watching over the Altar-Dryfe Border just as F was.

Was he doing it from a distance, though? Or was he actually...?

He silently pondered it for a moment. F had noticed Franklin, but had Franklin noticed F?

He didn't think that it mattered much, in the end.

He was merely a spectator who wouldn't be caught up in any of these battles.

F simply shrugged and went back to his observations... And that's precisely when it happened. An event that could only be described as earth-shattering...

To be continued

Afterword

Cat: “It’s time for the afterwooord! I’m Cheshire, the ‘Cat’ who lost two volumes in a rooow!”

Bear: “I’m Shu, the ‘Bear’ who spent the past two volumes duking it out with the unbearable muscle-headed she-kaiju.”

Xun: “I’m ‘Xun,’ shOrt for ‘Xunyu.’ And beAr, it looks to me likE you’re gonna do the same fOr a third volume.”

Cat: “It’s been a while since we had an arc that spans several voluuumes.”

Bear: “Yeah. The last one was Quartierlatin.”

Cat: “Please enjoy the stormy peace talks arc.”

Xun: “AnywAy, let’s move on tO the state of things. The animE’s over.”

Cat: “Yes. The final episode has aired. A big you ‘thank you’ to those who watched it.”

Bear: “It’s been something, but I’m beary glad it went by without a hitch.”

Xun: “Let’s alsO thank the stAff and the cast for thEir work.”

???: “Yeah, but that’s not all! Volume 1 of the Blu-ray is out in Japan and it comes with a 500+ page novel with starring the bear! Volume 2 is also out and it comes with the stellar OST! Volume 3 is coming soon and it’ll have a production material collection! And all of them come with special episodes of ‘The Whys and Whats of Dendrogram,’ written by the author himself!”

Cat: “...Listen to that sudden onslaught of marketing.”

Bear: “She-fox...”

Fox: “Yeah! That’s me! The ‘Fox,’ Tsukuyo Fuso! THE ONE WHO WON’T GET A VOICE IF THE ANIME DOESN’T GET A SECOND SEASON!”

Xun: “You mentionEd that in the last afterwOrd... You’re still hUng up on that?”

Fox: “The anime is available on most streaming sites! Those views seem to be important these days, so please check it out!”
Cat: “She’s way more serious about this than we are...”
Bear: “Let’s put aside the overbearing she-fox and make room for the author and his serious comments.”

Dearest readers,

Thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

The coronavirus is having quite an effect on the world, but novels can be enjoyed indoors; as someone who writes them, I see this as all the more reason to work hard, so I can hopefully alleviate your boredom. Please stay safe.

Now, as you probably know, featured on the cover of this volume are Juliet and Kashimiya.

The former is actually the protagonist of the spin-off manga, Crow Record. I wrote the plot myself, but I do not get a chance to write afterwords for it, so now that Juliet’s on the cover, I figured I would talk about it here instead.

Crow Record is a Monthly Comic Alive manga with a story focused on a group of particularly feminine characters: Juliet, Chelsea, and Max.

However, those close to me often tell me that my female characters have the hearts to rival the manliest of warriors or that I do not feel or understand what they call “moe.”

I also often hear that Nemesis does not seem like a heroine. Please be assured that she is.

Occasionally, I felt like my writing on Crow Record might also drift in that direction. I even had to stop myself from adding a few too many battles between unnamed male characters.

Still, I took the criticism to heart and actively tried to keep feminine cuteness and appealing presentation in mind while writing it, and I believe I properly conveyed the charm of the female-centric cast.

Though, a lot of that is thanks to La-na’s splendid work with the characters’ gestures and expressions. Personally, I am a big fan of Shion’s face during the comedy scenes.

If this talk of Crow Record piqued your interest, please do go and give it a try.

Since we are on the topic of manga, I also suggest taking a look at Kami Imai's masterful manga adaptation of Infinite Dendrogram's original story. Volume 7 came out just recently, and just like the ones before, it is full of intense action.

Lobohta, who appears in the short stories that come with manga volume 2 and beyond, also has a couple cameos in Crow Record, so make sure to check it out if you like Pomeranians.

In other news, like Cheshire and the others have mentioned, the anime adaptation of Infinite Dendrogram has finished airing.

This was the first time my work was adapted into an anime, and it left me with both fond memories from the time working on it and regrets regarding the way I handled some things.

However, both the negatives and the positives are meaningful to the product as a whole.

This is not limited to anime — you could also say the same about the novel I write.

Regardless, I have something I can create, and I will hopefully entertain and move you to the best of my ability.

Please look forward to more Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: "Anyway, time to wrap up volume 13! The next one will be really inteeeense! VOLUME 14 IS COMING OUT AROUND OCTOBER! ...Huh?"

Xun: "No one gOt in the way this timE. Kitty actuallY got to do the announcemEnt for once."

Bear: "Well, he's control AI No. 13. If he couldn't do it fur this volume, it wouldn't happen ever."

Xun: (...We're treating this like a birthdAy?)

Fox: "13 volumes... We sure came far, didn't we?"

Cat: "...I DID IIIIIIT! I GOT TO ANNOUNCE THE NEXT VOLUUUUUUUUUME!"

Xun: "Look at thAt outburst of emotiOn..."

Bear: "Anyway, we'll be waiting fur you all!"

Bonus Short Stories

* May contain spoilers. Please read these after finishing the volume.

The Land of Strife

Reiji Mukudori

“What kind of country is Tenchi, anyway?”

On a day much like any other, I posed that question to my Tenchi-dwelling friends from college.

“Oh dear. Why would you ask that?”

“I just felt like learning more about the place.”

Marie had gotten me curious when she’d said that Tenchi’s Nanshumon clan actually used the Death Soldier job, which I’d picked as my third. All I really knew about the country so far was that the median level of tians there was exceptionally high.

“You’re all from there, right? Can you tell me more about the country’s culture? The general vibe?”

“Hmm... the vibe, huh? I’d say that it’s...” Akiyama stopped mid-sentence, only for the other three to finish it for him in unison. “The land of strife.”

I’d heard the exact same description many times now, both in and out of Dendro.

“Not a month passes there without civil conflict,” Fuyuki — who was affiliated with the Hokugen’in Daimyo clan — said, reminiscing about something. “We had one just recently, in fact. Civilian casualties are rare, if that’s what you’re worried about, but the tians who take to the battlefield have a strong ‘BRING IT ON’ attitude. They’re all really tough, too.”

“It’s basically the Sengoku Era with leveling thrown in,” Kasugai added as he nodded. “The tians there are also skilled at martial arts, so they’re often way stronger than mid-tier Masters.”

“It’s pretty advanced, though. There’s a bath in every home, and most of them even have flush toilets," Natsume said.

"Well, Altar's a traditional fantasy land, but it's no different in that regard," I said as I remembered all the facilities the kingdom had.

The people of Dendro enjoyed many of the modern comforts we had here on Earth. Most of them had been introduced by people who had "Cat" as their last name — probably members of the dev team, specifically Tom.

"What about you, Akiyama? Got anything to say about Tenchi?"

"Well... I don't live on Tenchi's main island, but I can say that the cuisine has a Japanese vibe too. Though, due to the different flavors, they often use unconventional kinds of meat or western veggies, so even though the food is Japanese at its core, it often seems somewhat... thrown together."

"Ah. I get what you mean! It's a bit fancy and colorful!" Natsume voiced her agreement.

I knew what they meant. Dendro had ingredients we didn't have on Earth, like monster meat or Remberries.

"Oh, and though Tenchi is constantly at war with itself, they do have someone at the top."

"The 'Conquest General,' right?" I asked. "From what I can tell, that's Dendro's 'Commander-in-Chief of the Expeditionary Force Against the Barbarians' AKA 'Shogun.' What's he like?"

"Hmm... compared to actual historical people... he's not Ieyasu, at least."

"Not Yoshiaki Ashikaga either, that's for sure."

"I guess he's closest to Yoshiteru Ashikaga."

"That's the one they call 'Swordmaster Shogun'..." I said in mild amazement.

I did expect the head of a country in Dendro to be strong, though — just like Azurite in our own Altar.

"But apparently, he's weaker than his predecessors from ancient times. Our Daimyo said that the Conquest General's powers change depending on how much land he owns, and he doesn't have all that much of it right now."

"I mean, Tenchi's an island country, so there's a limit to that anyway, right?"

It might not have always been an island country, though, huh? I wondered.

Time passed by as we talked, and when it was almost time for the next lecture, we split up and focused on our studies.

I learned quite a few things about Tenchi. The question now was... would I ever get a chance to go there?

The End

A Popcorn Deficiency

Death Soldier, Ray Starling

Recently, Shu had begun going on regular hunting trips.

The quest he'd done with Lei-Lei hadn't been his only recent endeavor. He'd also been seen riding Baldr to distant lands many a time. He'd said that he was out making money so he could buy as much Baldr ammo as he could, and though that was fine and all, there was one little problem.

We were having dinner together one day when I handed him a letter. "Here. It's for you," I said.

"Fur me? What is this, fanmail?"

"...Well, knowing you in real life, I can understand why you'd assume that, but no."

Our letterbox used to be filled with letters addressed to him, and I vaguely recalled many envelopes being strangely heavy. That was in reality, though. This ursine goof right here in Dendro would never get any fanmail... except maybe from little kids.

"That's a petition I was asked to pass over to you."

"A petition...? Ohh..."

Shu opened the envelope, read the letter, and nodded in understanding.

"This person wants me to start selling popcorn again."

Someone was petitioning Shu to resume running his "KoD's Popcorn" stall.

Apparently, he'd only started selling popcorn to make some money while King of Beasts was in Gideon. He couldn't leave the city while she was here, but he still wanted to make a profit he could turn into ammo, however little it may be.

Demonstrating his immense skill as a cook, his popcorn turned out to be so good that he gained a devoted following of regulars and, well, business was booming. But with KoB having left Gideon, Shu was now able to resume hunting and make money far more efficiently, so he'd simply ended his venture into the popcorn industry.

The supply was gone, just like that, but the demand from the fans was still there, and one of them had gone on to write this petition.

By the way, this person was none other than my friend and duel ranker, Chelsea. She'd become a fan of Shu's popcorn too, and after her clan fell apart, she'd wanted to turn to it as comfort food, only to have no luck finding him or his business.

I'd found her in an awful state. Her eyes were lifeless, and if Dendro had a stat for sanity, hers would've been at rock bottom.

Once Chelsea had noticed me, she cornered me against the wall and slammed her hand into it so hard it shattered — her Poseidon gave a huge bonus to STR growth — before giving me this written petition to deliver to Shu.

Though "asking" might've not been the right word, since I felt like she would've done something really drastic if I'd refused. Her clan disbanding, her complete lack of involvement in the saucy love drama, and her popcorn deficiency must've put her in a really bad spot...

Is the popcorn thing really as bad as the other two, though? I wondered.

"...Shu, you didn't put anything weird in your popcorn, did you? Why is it so addictive?"

"How beary rude! I told you I only used clean and proper ingredients, all bought on the market!"

"So you're skilled enough to get absurd results even with ordinary ingredients, huh? Oh, and though that's the only actual petition I got for you, people ask me if you're gonna sell popcorn again all the time. Max did just recently, and Nemesis is asleep right now, but she often says that she misses it."

"It got more fans than I imagined, huh?"

KoD's Popcorn went on to make a return when Shu started making lots of it and storing it in inventories to sell on consignment.

Getting to eat the popcorn she loved so much did end up making Chelsea feel a little bit better.

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 14 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 13
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2020 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2020 Taiki

Cover illustration by Taiki

All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2020 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo

English translation © 2020 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club

The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

Ebook edition 1.0.1: December 2020
Premium E-Book

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
14. The Physical Apex

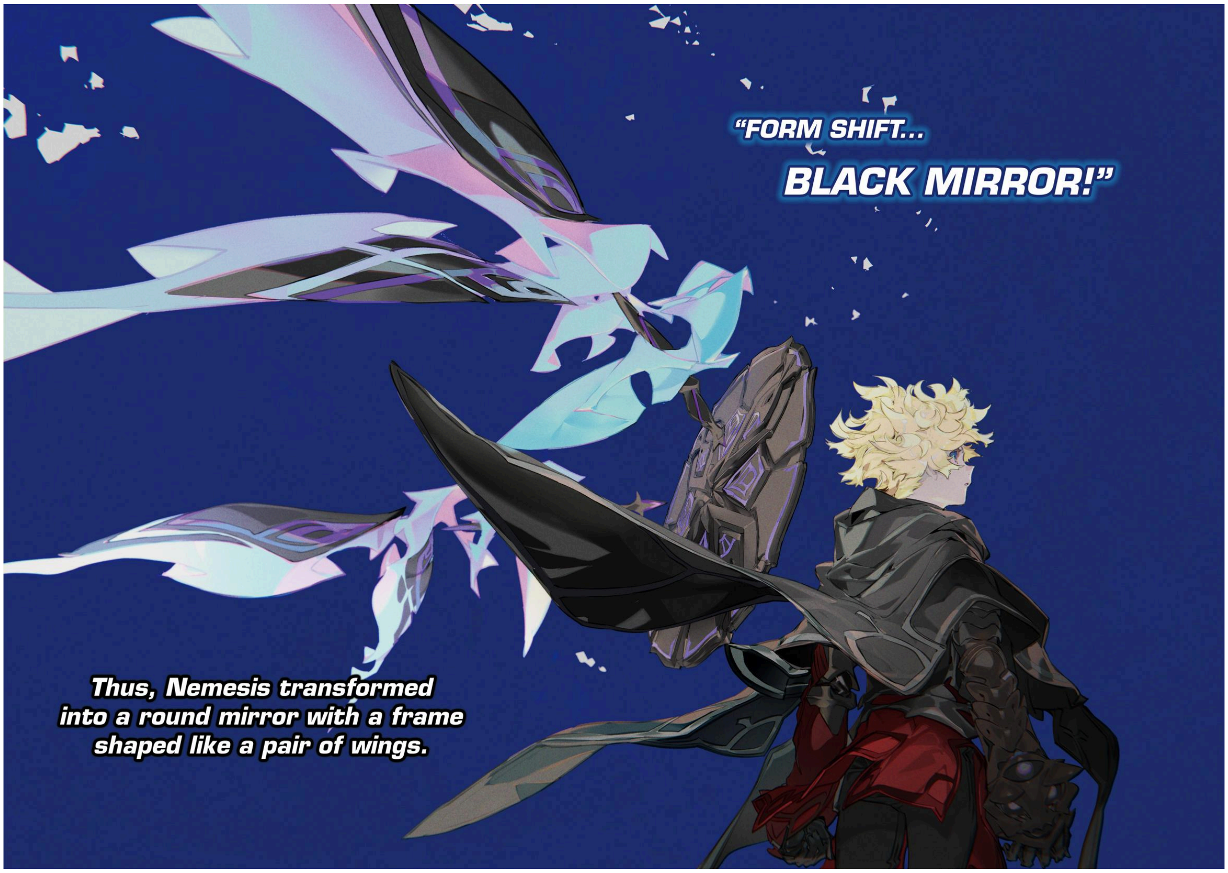
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
14. The Physical Apex

Infinite Dendrogram

14. The Physical Apex

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



“FORM SHIFT…
BLACK MIRROR!”
Thus, Nemesis transformed into a round mirror with a frame shaped like a pair of wings.

Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis
High-Rank Embryo Form

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Interlude: First Contact

Chapter Ten: Guardian-Jaguarman Theory

Chapter Eleven: The Black Mirror

Chapter Twelve: A Dear Friend

Chapter Thirteen: Trails in the Sky

Chapter From the Past: The First SUBM

Chapter Fourteen: Soaring and Indomitable

Chapter Fifteen: The Final Choice

Chapter Sixteen: The Conclusion

Chapter Seventeen: Aftermath

Interlude: Another Story

Afterword

About J-Novel Club

Copyright

Interlude: First Contact

August, 2043, Vandelheim

Not long had passed since the release of Infinite Dendrogram on Earth.

The capitals of the seven major Dendrogram countries were swarming with players who'd been lucky enough to acquire the necessary hardware before it sold out, and most of them were beaming with excitement and wonder.

The imperium's capital was no different in that regard, and although the people here found these new entities — marked with gems or crests on their left hands — rather strange, they had no trouble accepting them. After all, these "Masters" had long been attested to within their recorded history, and had even played a major part in it.

Still, they were enough of a curiosity to attract a lot of attention.

There were some exceptions, though. Particularly, one little creature that had the build of a hedgehog, but the features of a porcupine.

It was wearing a cloak far too big for it, which dragged behind it.

There was no name above its head, so people knew it wasn't a monster. Most just assumed it was a tame creature and paid it no mind.

The few stares it did draw caused the creature to make a quiet, annoyed sound as it walked, keeping its distance from the road.

None of the passersby noticed, but the tiny body hidden by the cloak — specifically, the shoulder — had a gem on it... an Embryo in its zeroth form.

Indeed, it... or rather, she was not a monster, but a Master. She'd merely chosen the appearance of an animal and picked Vandelheim as her starting point.

"Hmm..." As she walked, she suddenly heard a lady's voice. At first, she thought that this was irrelevant to her, but then...

"Why are you pretending to be an animal?"

"Ah?!"

...The lady addressed her directly, making her gasp. After that, there was no question that the woman was definitely talking to her.

She quickly looked in the direction of the voice and saw a lady with golden hair in curls.

"Aha. So I was right," the lady said, her tone analytical. She had no gem or crest on her left hand. This person was supposed to be an NPC... but she had trouble seeing her that way.

"...Who are you?" she unwittingly asked the lady, going against her intention to avoid using normal words at all.

Without showing a hint of surprise, the blonde woman answered, "My name is Claudiah. And yours is...?"

After a moment of hesitation, she gave her her avatar's name: "...Behemot."

"Can I call you 'Betty,' then?"

"...Please don't." She didn't want to hear her real-life nickname here; for it would only remind her that the people who'd called her that were gone.

Behemot had come to Infinite Dendrogram in order to take a walk outside without having to actually interact with people. She'd thought that taking up the appearance of a harmless animal would make people ignore her, but Claudiah had seen right through her.

"Would you like some tea? You've certainly caught my attention," the lady offered.

Behemot had found Claudiah very curious, and it didn't take her long to accept. "...I can't hold tea cups, though," she added.

"We have small tea cups meant for the fairy folk of Legendaria."

This conversation was likely the point where Behemot had stopped seeing Infinite Dendrogram as a game.

While they were having tea, Claudiah talked about herself before Behemot could really ask any questions.

She said that she was part of the imperial family, that she was among the strongest combatants in the country, and she was out in town to investigate these Masters that had begun appearing so suddenly.

She also said that she called out to Behemot because she was simply very curious about her.

"...Was it because I was the strangest one?" Behemot asked.

"Appearance-wise, yes," Claudiah replied. "But that is not the reason why I called out to you."

"Hm?"

“May I ask you a question now?”

“What is it?”

“Why did you choose this country? According to the other Masters, there were six others you could have appeared in, so why did you choose the imperium?”

Behemot was silent for a long moment. She didn’t know whether her honest answer would be something she could say to a member of the imperial family, but ultimately decided that it didn’t matter.

“...Because the city looked like it’d be really refreshing to destroy.”

“I thought as much. I saw it in your face,” Claudiah said without much surprise.

Hearing that, Behemot understood the reason behind this meeting. Claudiah had singled her out because, to her, she looked like the most dangerous of the new Masters.

“...You can tell by this face?”

“I can. I myself feel the way you do sometimes.”

“You? A princess?” Behemot asked, somewhat surprised. Claudiah smiled at her, but then spoke with no joy in her voice.

“The burden I bear sometimes starts to feel like a nuisance. Even though I want to focus on the one thing that really matters to me, my circumstances force me to constantly hold myself back. Every now and then, I feel like just breaking everything that ties me down.”

With those words, she let out a somewhat gloomy sigh.

“To destroy everything that troubles me... to create an environment where I can focus entirely on one single thing... I wonder if the previous one... the King of Kings felt the same way.”

Behemot didn’t understand what Claudiah meant by those words. All she knew was that she was being completely honest — which meant that they were alike.

“Though, I really cannot afford to be as irresponsible as he was,” Claudiah added.

“You seem to have it pretty tough.”

“Indeed I do. Tough enough to want a friend who will help me.”

“Hm?” Behemot tilted her head as Claudiah took her little paw.

“Behemot,” she said. “Would you be my friend? Grow strong and help me.”

Behemot was shocked to hear that. She hadn't come to Infinite Dendrogram to interact with people. In real life, people just annoyed her; merely seeing large groups made her want to crush them.

She'd only come to this world because she wanted to remember what walking outside was like.

Going by her original intention, the only real option for her was to refuse Claudiah's offer.

"...There's no guarantee that I'll actually become that strong, though."

However, that wasn't what Behemot did.

For some reason, she didn't find interacting with Claudiah irritating in any way.

Behemot hadn't known her for long, but she felt almost as close to her as she had to her late father. Perhaps Behemot felt some instinctive affinity towards Claudiah the same way the princess had easily seen Behemot's true desire.

"My Embryo isn't born yet. What if it's really weak?"

"I am sure you will become stronger than anyone else," Claudiah said as she gently caressed the Embryo on Behemot's shoulder. "I can see it in your face."

Those words sounded like they were spoken by someone else.

◇◆

That day, the two girls became friends.

This was the birth of the Master who would eventually be called "The Physical Apex."

Chapter Ten: Guardian-Jaguarman Theory

Paladin, Ray Starling

The peace talks had failed, and a battle had broken out.

Fortunately, the kingdom had considered the possibility that we'd end up fighting the imperium here.

King of Beasts, Behemot — the one we had to be most wary of.

Hell General, Logan Goddhart — another Dryfean Superior.

The Rabbit, Chrono Crown — the one who'd assaulted Riser and the others.

The Ram, Claudiah R. Dryfe — the Dryfean representative.

We'd considered their fighting prowess, and also come up with a way to deal with any unknown variables — namely, Tsukuyo Fuso's Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light and Fatal Field combo.

No one below level 601 could survive it. Anyone who wasn't a Superior Job didn't even have a chance, so this move instantly wiped out all the Dryfean high-ranks with Embryos we weren't aware of. We actually didn't expect that the Hell General would be affected by this combo too, so that was a really lucky break for our side.

King of Beasts' Leviathan had also been lured away from the battlefield by Shu.

And The Rabbit, whom we were pretty concerned about, showed no sign launching an attack. Tom had said that he had business with him, so perhaps he was keeping him occupied.

Regardless of what was going on elsewhere, right now the only Dryfeans we had to worry about were Claudiah and King of Beasts.

In other words, we were up against the most terrifying tian and Master the imperium had to offer.

The tremors caused by Shu and Leviathan's battle off in the distance shook the hall as both sides stood facing one another. One sudden movement would be enough to escalate things into an all-out battle. The lines had been drawn, and either side could make their move at any moment.

I was the one who challenged King of Beasts, so I could be the one to die first once the fight commenced in earnest.

“I won’t allow that,” Nemesis said telepathically. “Apex or not, I won’t allow her to kill you.”

Nemesis’ words were reassuring.

The Death Period and Lunar Society members around me were preparing for KoB’s next move.

Rook had already used his Union Jack to become the Liz-based Metal-Devil-Man, which ignored all physical attacks.

Marie had transformed Arc-en-Ciel into its ultimate skill form and loaded it.

B3 donned Magnum Colossus and prepared to use Heaven’s Weight, or her ultimate skill if necessary.

Tsukikage had vanished into the shadows, and the other Lunar Society members I didn’t recognize were also readying themselves for battle. A few of them were casting AoE buffs, so our stats were significantly boosted.

And finally, without so much as a word, Fuso herself had already made a move.

Using my Reveal skill, I could see that she’d switched her Lunar Divider Field: Faint Light from level to AGI.

Faint Light only affected stats, so it couldn’t limit bodily functions like the standard Lunar Divide Field had done to me or K&R... but dividing AGI by six still had a huge effect.

Between that and everything else, we were fully prepared for this.

As for myself, I was ready to use my fourth form and Shining Despair.

Our side couldn’t possibly be in better shape for this fight.

“Ugh...” And despite all of that... I still found myself breaking out in a cold sweat.

I’d fought many creatures a lot stronger than myself — Gardranda, Gouz-Maise, RSK, Monochrome, Gigaknight, and the pre-ancient civilization’s whale, to name a few. But despite that, I could tell that King of Beasts, even though she looked like nothing more than a cute little critter, was stronger than any of them.

Only a few seconds passed, but they felt like minutes as chills ran through my body and I looked for a chance to make my move.

These long seconds made me wonder about something: why wasn't KoB doing anything?

The answer to that question probably didn't have anything to do with her, but instead...

"Altimia! I have an idea!" Claudiah clapped her hands and said, breaking the tense silence of this 2 vs 87 face-off.

I almost launched into an attack at the sound of that clap, but I managed to stop myself.

"...What is it?" Azurite asked.

"If we stay here, we will only get in Behemot's way. Your Altarian Masters will also find it difficult to fight while protecting you, will they not? In addition, this will be our first fight in quite a while, and I do not want anyone to interfere. With all that in mind, how about the two of us take our battle elsewhere?"

She said all of this with a smile, leaving me almost completely flabbergasted for a moment.

I considered the possibility that this was nothing but a distraction to shift our attention away from KoB, but she herself was looking at Claudiah and barely moving.

Fuso shook her head and spoke against Claudiah's idea, "...No no no. Hold on. That's no good. You'll just lead her somewhere you can call in reinforcements and take her prisoner. It's such an obvious trap."

Her assumption was reasonable. We knew the extent of the Dryfean forces present here, but they also had two more Superiors — that Franklin and another one I'd never met before, Murdoch Martinez.

If either of them was lying in wait for Altimia, Altar would instantly lose.

"I did not solicit your opinion on the matter, but your concern is not unreasonable. Regardless, you need not worry," Claudiah said as she reached into her inventory and took out a large machine. "The stage of our battle will be visible to all, yet beyond their reach."

The object she'd removed from her inventory was a jade green artificial horse.

"That's..." Upon seeing that color, I recalled a certain name that Mario had mentioned back in Quartierlatin.

It was one of Grand Artificer Flagman's five Prism Steeds — the one that had been discovered in Dryfe.

The bicorn of the wind... Jade Storm.

"Let us fight to our hearts' content up in the sky, Altimia," Claudiah said, mounting the Prism Steed and spurring it high into the air.

Marie, B3, and Tsukikage tried to stop her, but King of Beasts blocked their way.

However, she didn't use this chance to attack us. Instead, she only looked at Azurite to see how she would respond.

"So that's her plan...!" I said as I gazed up at Claudiah. I immediately realized that she likely wanted to fight Azurite over 10,000 metels in the sky — the height at which I'd fought Monochrome. That was a height few living creatures could reach.

They definitely wouldn't be interrupted there.

Franklin's monsters wouldn't be able to go that high, King of Chariots fought with land-based tanks, and no matter how strong she was, I was pretty sure that King of Beasts wasn't capable of flying around freely. Well, maybe Franklin could conjure up some monster suited for high altitudes, but Azurite would likely make short work of any creature whose abilities were all focused on that one thing. No one said that their Truth Discernment was going off, so Claudiah had to have been completely honest about just wanting a real one-on-one with Azurite.

She obviously knew about the kingdom's SMPS production, too, since she'd assumed that Azurite was perfectly capable of fighting her all the way up there.

Though, she'd probably also considered the gap in power between Jade Storm — an original — and the mass-produced SMPS units.

"Kh...!" The worst thing about this was that if we didn't go after her, we would lose our only means of stopping the acts of terror currently happening at the capital. Since Claudiah was the only one with the power to call it off, we simply had to capture her.

If we didn't go after her, she would merely watch us from on high and wait for King of Beasts to defeat us. And if by some chance we emerged victorious, Claudiah could just make her escape back to Dryfe. Seeing how fast she flew upwards, it seemed like it would be difficult to catch up to her.

That meant that if we didn't chase her down, we would be unable to stop the terrorism at the capital regardless if we won against KoB or not.

"How cunning," said Nemesis telepathically. "Also, while fighting at that height, a single mistake could mean plummeting to your death. That almost happened to us when we fought Monochrome, after all."

I wondered if that was part of Claudiah's plan too, but I couldn't come to a conclusion about that. I'd managed to see through her manipulation once, but I couldn't keep up with her thought process all the time.

To me, Claudiah seemed more like some inhuman creature that merely looked like a human being.

This whole thing might've been a trap, but...

"...It seems I am left with no other choice."

...Azurite had already gathered her resolve.

Even if this was a trap, she had to follow. This was the only path left. To protect the kingdom and save her sisters back at the capital from deadly danger, she would face her dear friend at a precarious altitude few could survive.

"Azurite..."

There were only two things I could do for her now. First was to stay here and fight KoB. The second was...

"Silver!" My steed responded to my call and leaped out of my inventory.

"Ray?" said Azurite, turning towards me.

"If you're gonna go there, ride Silver. You can't really fight an original with an SMPS, right?"

Like Jade Storm, Zephyrus Silver was a proper Prism Steed. Although he wasn't one of the five famous originals, according to Mario, Flagman himself had worked on this one as well. He was either an unofficial prototype or an experimental model, but if Azurite was going to have a mounted battle against someone riding Jade Storm, Silver was no doubt a better pick than the obviously inferior SMPS.

"...Are you sure?"

"Yeah... I can't fight KoB while riding Silver, anyway."

The moment she took to the sky, our battle against KoB would truly begin.

And it would be best if Silver wasn't involved in it.

Therefore, handing him to Azurite would increase both our chances of victory.

"Oh yeah!" Fuso exclaimed as I handed Silver's reins to Azurite. "Why not have the princess ride an SMPS while you come with her on Silver? You'll win if it's two against one, right? Oh! I can join too. That'll make it three against one! Easy, right? Wait—maybe everyone with an SMPS can go! That'll make it a real piece of cake!"

Silence ensued. I was fairly confident that Azurite and everyone in Death Period, myself included, thought that Fuso's craftiness surpassed even Dryfe's.

"...solo," said KoB. It was just a single word, but it felt like she was saying, "Your princess is the only one who'll be going. Say something that stupid again and I'll totally lose it. Quit making me wait. Roar."

So there you had it.

Also, KoB didn't seem inclined to do anything to Azurite as she was leaving, but I couldn't tell whether she was just following her employer's orders or if she also wanted Claudiah to leave the scene of battle.

Was she trying to set up an environment where she could fight us without restraint...? A situation where she wouldn't have to worry about protecting anyone or be mindful of the one person she couldn't kill?

"Very well. I'll go alone," said Azurite before mounting Silver and looking at me. "I'll be borrowing him for a bit... Ray."

"Yeah. Let's meet again after the battle, all right?"

After that exchange, Azurite pulled on Silver's reins, turning him towards the sky, where Claudiah was waiting for her.

The moment she left the hall...

"set."

...King of Beasts moved like a monster finally freed from its chains.

In an instant, her silhouette transformed.

Vital areas, like the heart, were now covered by tile-like armor plating.

The hands and legs were covered by bands that looked like little pet socks.

Semi-transparent, crescent-shaped blades floated next to her forelegs.

There were rings around all four of her limbs.

And finally, there was a small cloth bag hanging around her neck.

A single look was enough for me to tell that they were all MVP special rewards or something on the same tier.

Also, the sudden change in gear made me realize that she'd used Clothing Switch. It was a skill used for costume changes in theater or switching from normal clothing to battle equipment in an instant. That meant that...

"All this time, she was wearing her 'normal clothing'..." She hadn't been taking us seriously so far, but now that she recognized us as actual enemies, she would face us with all her strongest equipment.

"...start." Following that single word, KoB vanished... and the wind began to swirl with blood.

What had once been human beings had become nothing more than shreds of flesh and bloody mist before turning into bits of light and disappearing.

The unfortunate victims were the members of Lunar Society, who were standing at the very back of our group.

The only thing showing us where King of Beasts was and what she was doing were the ones turning into blood mist as she killed them.

"She's fast! Gbwugh!"

"How?! Lady Tsukuyo should be lowering her AGI...! GHUH?!" I couldn't see KoB — all I could see were the results.

The screams and panic continued as KoB reaped through them one after the other.

They were all no doubt wearing Brooches, but it didn't seem to matter at all. Was she using a skill that nullified it somehow? Or was she attacking multiple times and I was just too slow to see it?

Regardless, KoB dashed through the bloodied air, the very embodiment of an unstoppable force.

"The Shades and Death, They Beckon — Erlkönig." The shadows under their legs wriggled and moved to attack KoB, but even I could clearly see that they weren't fast enough to catch up.

The Lunar Society members also had ultimate skills of their own, but they were hesitant to use them for fear of collateral damage.

"That doesn't matter. Use them," said Fuso.

And just like that, their hesitation was gone. Targeting their surroundings, they all used their ults or job ults.

Countless flashes and explosions followed, engulfing just about every Lunar Society member.

When it was over, none of them remained... and KoB alone stood there as if nothing happened.

"...clear," she said as she licked a wound on her front paw. She likely meant something like "Clean-up's done."

Her words, combined with the fact that she'd targeted only the lesser Lunar Society members while ignoring Death Period, Fuso, and Tsukikage helped me understand exactly what she'd done here.

She'd purposely paused her rampage only after we were the only ones left. My guess was that she'd eliminated the other Lunar Society members for the same reason why Fuso cleaned up all the Dryfean Masters — to get rid of unknown variables.

Fuso and Tsukikage were prominent figures, and both Marie and B3 were well-known PKs. Rook and I had also had our abilities exposed during Franklin's game and the Quartierlatin incident.

That was why she'd prioritized getting rid of the Lunar Society members, whom she knew nothing about.

"...Or it could be that she merely wants to save the cherry on top for last," said Nemesis telepathically. Seeing how KoB hadn't targeted Fuso, who was actively dividing her speed by six, that seemed even more likely. If all she wanted was a quick victory, Fuso would be her highest priority, and she wouldn't just be standing in place like she was doing now.

"Is she trying to show off how trivial all this is for her?" Nemesis wondered.

Perhaps, but she could have some other reason, I thought.

...Regardless, it was clear that to KoB, the battle against the Lunar Society members was but a way of adjusting the situation. She'd exterminated eighty veterans like it was child's play, and their retaliation had left only a single scratch on her.

Though they were all Masters, the gap between them and her was immense.

And I could see just how immense by using my Reveal skill.

Behemot.

Job: King of Beasts.

Level: 1156 (Total Level: 1656)

HP: 82015 (+23650050)

MP: 3350 (+0)

SP: 48980 (+0)
STR: 10050 (+216900)
AGI: 15315 (+210059) → 37563
END: 9980 (+232020)
DEX: 1502 (+1058)
LUK: 125 (+100)

The stats shown to me by Reveal were boosted by absurd numbers. Even her AGI, which had been cut to a sixth of its maximum by Faint Light, was still high enough to make her several times faster than the speed of sound.

The difference was so vast that it gave me chills.

This explosive increase in stats was also far above what any job could grant.

B3 had once told me the name of this phenomenon, and Shu had told me how it worked.

“So this is the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory in action...!”

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, mountainous area

There was a low, yet immense rumbling. The air itself seemed to vibrate over the expansive horizon.

The noise was like high-ordinance bombs blowing up over and over again.

It was definitely not caused by any explosives, however — they were actually the sounds of gigantic objects crashing into each other.

At a distance of over 10 kilometels from the assembly hall, two enormous silhouettes were clashing, causing booming impacts loud enough to drown out the nearby landslides.

One was a gigantic machine god.

With its entire frame focused on firepower, he was the pinnacle of weaponry. However, instead of using any of its many weapons, its wielder was using its fists like a master of the martial arts.

The figure’s name was Baldr, and it was the Superior Embryo of the King of Destruction, shifted into his full-offense mode.

The second silhouette was the Queen of Beasts.

She was akin to a gigantic dinosaur from the depths of prehistory. With porcupine-like spines growing out of her back and limbs that seemed to be all muscle, she was violence given form.

Her name was Leviathan, and she was the Superior Embryo of the King of Beasts, shifted to her solo-full power mode.

The two giants surpassing 100 metels in height were exchanging blows, destroying the mountains around them.

Baldr launched a fist at Leviathan. She caught it with her right hand, only to have it shatter; she then used her superior speed to retaliate with her left.

It was an all-out battle — a violent clash straight out of mythology, and it was immense enough to shake the entire visible horizon.

...I guessed as much, but it turns out she really is a match for me even by herself, huh? Shu thought, realizing that he'd made the right choice by separating her from King of Beasts.

The fact that Leviathan was a match for Shu and his Baldr truly said all that needed to be said about how absurdly powerful she was. After all, Baldr was now significantly stronger than it had been back when Gloria attacked.

When Shu used The Unmatched God of War — Baldr, the power of the resulting transformation was based on his STR.

Currently, Shu's base STR was about 180,000.

Because of this, even AGI — the stat that was buffed the least— was over 90,000, while his END reached 180,000 and his STR was doubled to become 360,000.

His HP also broke the 10,000,000 mark, and not even Mythicals could hold their own in a fistfight against him.

In fact, even the Hell General's fully buffed Mythical devil wouldn't be much of a threat to him.

Yet despite all that, Leviathan was fighting against Baldr as an equal... and she was separated from her Master, while Baldr's had used his ult.

"GGHRAAAAAAAAAAAGH!" Leviathan's violent assault made Baldr's armor creak, but Baldr fired back with a high kick — a kodachi — aimed straight at Leviathan's neck.

It was an attack that could knock someone's head from their shoulders, but Leviathan got away with only a bit of torn flesh.

The scale of this fight was the stuff of legends, but since they were equally matched, it seemed to them like a simple fistfight between two people.

...I used my ult and we're still just equal, Shu thought. I guess this is 'cause of the direction she took as an Embryo.

As Shu pondered, he came to understand the reason why this battle had no clear superior force.

Queen of Beasts, Leviathan was the Guardian who possessed the highest stats of all, and the reason for this was simple: she'd sacrificed everything else for it.

She had no skills besides her ult — which all Embryos possessed — and every ounce of her remaining Resources went to body size and physical stats: HP, STR, AGI, and END.

After all, that was the core of her Master's desire. She sought someone who could protect her and had enough sheer power to crush anything in her way.

That was what made Leviathan the apex.

Baldr might have surpassed her in STR, but she was above him in every single other stat. Her HP was over 20,000,000, while her STR, END, and AGI all broke 200,000.

She was an entity that could reduce entire countries to rubble merely by walking through them.

And she had become what she was through the hyper-focusing of Resources.

Endless buffing, forced debuffing, spatial manipulation... she had none of the unique abilities usually possessed by Superior Embryos. Instead she was specced solely into stats.

No other Guardian surpassed her in that regard.

That might seem contrary to the Maiden type's focus on "giant-slaying," but closer inspection would reveal that wasn't the case. This too, was a way to defeat those stronger than yourself — the ultimate manifestation of this one seemingly-unfair notion: every giant will fall if you are simply bigger and stronger than they are.

In fact, Baldr might have been the more impressive one in this scenario, simply because he was able to fight with her toe-to-toe.

KoD's Baldr's power wasn't as pure as Leviathan's. Wide-area firepower, ammo-production, dominance on both land and sea, an array of transformations... Dedicating all these Resources to this wide variety of functions left it with little left over for pure physical enhancement. Even after using its ultimate skill, its stats still couldn't match Leviathan's.

It was unheard of for an Embryo as versatile as Baldr to be a match for the manifestation of pure power that was Leviathan.

The abnormal thing here isn't actually the Embryo... but the Master, Leviathan thought as she fought.

She was genuinely impressed. She only knew two other entities that could match her like this.

My speed is higher, but he reads my movements and attacks me when he can minimize damage to himself. But these aren't mere tricks... he's just using his power in the most optimal way... I see... So this is what it's like to be awed...

Leviathan was surprised, but she also derived some enjoyment from this — in spite of the fact that she was taking more damage as a result.

As things are, I could probably win even as I am now. Shu had predicted the overall damage and thus the ultimate result of this fight.

When it came to stats, Baldr was below Leviathan. However, it made up for its lackluster AGI with its flair for battle and ability to read the enemy, letting it deliver attacks using its superior STR. Baldr wasn't exactly coming out of this unscathed, but Leviathan was the one who was suffering more.

Also, at certain points of this battle, Shu could use Baldr's various armaments to give himself an advantage, while Leviathan had absolutely no means of expanding her range of strategies. After all, she didn't have a single skill she could use on her own.

Leviathan may have had the highest stats among Embryos. However, it had to be said — that didn't mean that she was the strongest.

The true power of Embryos and UBMs lay in their unique skills. When faced with special abilities that warped the universe itself, pure stats would always fall short.

And without skills, all she could do was use physical attacks. She was like an RPG boss that had max stats but could only use the "Attack" command, and it wasn't hard to counter those.

Again, her immense stats didn't mean that she was — or ever would be — the true strongest.

“Gh...!” Despite that, and the fact that Leviathan was currently being overwhelmed, Shu was starting to panic.

From his perspective, he had to defeat Leviathan as soon as possible. He knew that if he didn’t, the consequences would be dire.

“Those left behind are worthless weaklings,” said the Queen of Beasts with a muffled voice. “But Behemot, like myself, couldn’t leave Gideon while we were busy keeping you there. I’m sure she is savoring her first taste of real freedom.”

“...That so?!” Shu replied as he punched with Baldr’s fist.

“I also haven’t had a chance to enjoy something like this for a long time... Let’s have fun while Behemot’s still playing around.” Leviathan smiled—injured, but still full of vigor.

The two displayed opposite emotions, but the reason behind them was the same.

King of Beasts, Behemot was the source of both Shu’s panic and Leviathan’s confidence.

Leviathan was in some senses the “greatest,” but she was not the “apex.” “The Physical Apex” was the title given to Leviathan and her Master as a duo, and the reason for this — what really elevated simple excellence to the level of absolute apex — was the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.

◇◆

The build known as “Guardian-Jaguarman Theory” swept the world of Infinite Dendrogram back when it was leaving the early stages of its post-release phase. At that time, absurd Superior Embryos were almost non-existent and nearly no Master had attained the uncapped Superior Jobs. The dominant Masters were level 500s with high-rank Embryos.

It was a time when everyone still considered and sought power that made sense.

Most of the player activity went into theorycrafting about what might be the strongest possible build, and many people conjured up numerous configurations worthy of that title: Nobushi Ambusher OHKO Theory, Sacrifice MP-Spec Theory, and Gem Production-Spam Theory, to name a few. Many discussions were had both within Infinite Dendrogram and the communities outside of it.

And out of the many that were considered, the one that came out on top as the “strongest possible build” was the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.

The jaguarman job grouping didn’t get much attention during the period when there were only tians. It had poor stat growth and only one skill. In that respect it was similar to Death Soldier, but not quite as absurd. Still, it wasn’t a job you’d pick if you wanted to get stronger. The only tians who selected it were members of certain Legendarian tribes with traditions surrounding the job.

Jaguarman’s only skill was Beastheart Possession, which gave the user a bonus to their stats based on the base stats of the monsters within their Minion Capacity.

The power of the bonus was based on the user’s skill level, but even at level 10 — the maximum allowed by the high-rank job in the grouping, Beast Ogre — Beastheart Possession only granted the user 60% of their monsters’ stats.

And despite having this as their only skill, the grouping gave a disproportionately small Minion Capacity. In order to employ the most useful monsters, you’d have to fill all your other job slots with options from the tamer grouping. However, doing that greatly limited the battle-focused skills you could take — so even if you used all your Minion Capacity on a Pure-Dragon, you end up with high stats and nothing else.

And “high” in this case was only 60% of a Pure-Dragon’s stats. Since Beastheart Possession only used the monster’s base stats, you couldn’t even benefit from tamer skills that buffed your monsters. There was also the fundamental problem that capturing powerful monsters like Pure-Dragons was difficult, and the amount of people from the jaguarman grouping that were using them in any case was smaller than one percent.

As a result, tian Jaguarmen could only ever aspire to be a hybrid between a mediocre vanguard and a mediocre tamer.

The one exception was the jaguarman grouping’s Superior Job, King of Beasts, which had a version of Beastheart Possession that gave a 100% bonus. Still, that didn’t mean much when Pure-Dragons were the strongest monsters they could use. Because most well-developed Superior Jobs surpassed the Pure-Dragons’ stats, King of Beasts was considered to be low-tier.

Even though it was a battle-focused Superior Job, no one believed it could ever be the strongest choice.

That all changed after Masters began growing in number.

One of the Masters researching builds once came a realization and made the following proposal: “Wouldn’t Jaguarman’s skill have crazy good synergy with Guardian type Embryos?”

The importance of this realization was not to be underestimated. After all, being Embryos, Guardians took no Minion Capacity no matter how strong they were, and it wasn’t uncommon for high-rank Guardians to surpass Pure-Dragons in power.

Unlike a tian, a Master with a Guardian Embryo wouldn’t have to worry about wasting job slots just to make Jaguarman work, and they wouldn’t need to go through any trouble to get powerful monsters. This meant that they could fill their slots with battle-focused jobs and use the jaguarman grouping for a pure stat boost. Even if they used their Jaguarman job as their main, they would still have access to utility battle skills and item-based active skills.

Once people realized that this would almost certainly create the strongest frontline fighter, the argument about strongest build was, for the time being, considered settled.

The Guardian-Jaguarman Theory spread as soon as it was presented on discussion boards.

Many Masters with battle-focused Guardians chose to go with this build. They left their mark on every country’s arena, displaying the build’s power and making it even more popular.

The reason for its quick adoption was that it was extremely powerful and you only needed two things for it — jaguarman grouping jobs and a Guardian Embryo.

During this time, if anyone appeared on forums or discussion boards saying something like, “I’m about to start. What’s a good way to be really powerful?” they would be met with, “Hope and pray that your Embryo’s a Guardian.”

Of course, there was an Embryo for each Master, and all of them were unique. Each individual Embryo synergized best with different jobs.

However, this was one of the easiest ways to become strong.

But even among those who adhered to the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory, some were working to improve their build even further. They wanted to follow this theory to its logical conclusion — to take the concept to the next level by finding the conditions to unlock King of Beasts and taking the job.

Unfortunately, the conditions were lost even to the tribes that traditionally used the jaguarman grouping jobs, so the Masters searching for them were faced with quite a challenge. Still, they pressed on, hoping to find the ultimate expression of this theory and claim the throne of "Physical Apex" as their own.

However, after nearly three Infinite Dendrogram years after Guardian-Jaguarman Theory had been uncovered, the Masters still using it were few and far between.

Of course, it was powerful enough to still see some use, but those who passionately searched for the best possible builds had cast it aside.

There were several reasons for this.

First was the increase in Superiors, who had powers so absurd that they made their Embryos look tame.

Second was the increase in the amount of Superior Jobs. The lack of level caps let those who had them grow stronger essentially without limit, so those who truly desired overwhelming power decided to search for SJs to take, even if they were unrelated to the jaguarman grouping.

Both were valid reasons, but they were not enough to truly kill Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.

The third reason was almost a combination of the other two, which made it the most compelling reason to quit this build.

A Guardian Superior Embryo fully specced into stats, and King of Beasts — the jaguarman grouping Superior Job necessary to complete the theory. The ultimate goal of the idea — the throne of the "Apex."

That throne was already occupied.

Queen of Beasts, Leviathan and King of Beasts, Behemot — a Superior Embryo that was utterly devoted to stats, and a Superior Job that transferred all those stats to the user.

The throne of the King of Beasts had already been taken by the most suitable individual.

Thus, anyone seeking it had given up. They knew they couldn't surpass her as long as they walked the same path.

The "Apex" they were all heading towards had already been claimed, and the king would never relinquish it.

Some rerolled their build and began searching for other paths to power, while others lost all passion for the game and just quit altogether. Those who were serious about becoming stronger had long since left the theory behind, leaving only those who were satisfied with being relatively strong.

This was the ultimate end of the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.

◆◆◆

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

"Hmm hmm hmm..." Thanks to a skill that linked Behemot to Leviathan, Behemot could sense that her Embryo was having a great time.

Through this connection, she knew that Leviathan was truly enjoying her battle with Shu.

I also wanted to fight the bear... I mean, Shu, she thought. Thanks to information given to Dryfe by Zeta — information collected by Sechs himself — Behemot knew Shu's skills, including his ultimate. Therefore, she knew that Shu was the only Master Behemot and Leviathan could fight with all their strength.

Leviathan was fighting him by herself now, and the joy reaching her made it clear that the information was reliable.

...Levia and I became a little too strong. That thought was correct — even Mythical UBMs couldn't last long against them; humans didn't even stand a chance.

She could hold back, sure, but she found that extremely boring.

Her high AGI made the time she experienced far too drawn out, and her STR gave her limbs more power than she ever needed. People shattered if she as much as slowly caressed them, but she found it boring to move like that.

Regardless if they went all-out or not, there just weren't any enemies around that they could really have fun with.

Since Behemot became a Superior, she could count the beings that put up a fight on one hand.

When I think about that, Shu is a real rarity. She was convinced that he might've been the first Master she'd met who could withstand her full power.

It's not just battles, either... just talking and hanging out with him is kind of fun. Games and fights weren't worthwhile if they weren't between people who were on the same level.

Thus, to Behemot, Shu was in the truly precious category of "worthy opponent."

...He reminds me of dad a bit, though. That makes me feel sad at times. Behemot caught herself feeling a little down for a moment, but she quickly walked back that thought.

Also, I wouldn't expect any less of him... He went straight for our weakness.

Thanks to Beastheart Possession level EX, Behemot received the immense bonus of 100% of Leviathan's stats.

However, that also meant that Leviathan wasn't as strong as Behemot herself.

If Leviathan fell before her Master did, Behemot's stats would drop to normal levels.

Did he separate us because he didn't want us to have each other's backs, or because he has an idea what our ult might be? Regardless, Behemot couldn't join Leviathan's and Shu's battle yet. If the Altarian Masters were left to their own devices, they would go after Claudiah, like Tsukuyo had said they would.

Still, if Leviathan fell, beating Shu would be far more difficult.

To protect Claudiah, Behemot had to defeat all the Masters currently present before Shu defeated Leviathan, then go meet up with her Embryo.

...That's troubling, but...

"...fun." Her ultimate target here was Shu, but she thought that the battle she currently faced might be kind of enjoyable, too.

She particularly liked what Tsukuyo Fuso was doing. The High Priestess had lowered Behemot's AGI to a sixth of its total value.

This is really good. She'd initially intended to target Fuso last, and this debuff was just another reason to do it.

After all, thanks to being slowed down, there were now Masters that could actually keep up with her even if she moved at full speed: Eishiro, Marie, and one other.

Buffed by the Lunar Society members before they got the death penalty, the three could keep up with Behemot as long as Tsukuyo's debuff was active.

Though, it looks like the shadows from Tsukikage's ult aren't as fast as he is. I guess their speed doesn't scale with his AGI. That's some new info.

Still, if he used them to surround her — like he was doing now — the shadows could at least support the others' attacks.

Behemot looked around. Nine were left. She subtracted the three tian officials.

Among those left were Tsukuyo, Eishiro, Marie, and Barbaroy — four famed rankers and PKs.

Besides them, there's Rook Holmes, who beat Franklin's favorite... and Shu's little brother, Ray Starling... I know most of what they can do.

Behemot now had a full grasp of who she was facing and quickly began to analyze the situation.

There are three ways they can beat me. First, they could go for an instakill by targeting and destroying my vitals and leaving the injury-based debuff to finish me off. They probably already know my buffed total HP. I'm not wearing any status-hiding gear now, since showing it off makes for good intimidation. Anyway, if they know how high it is, I don't think they'll try to slowly chip away at it.

That was a DPS check the Altarians would easily fail.

Thus, they would probably target her neck, brain, or heart to destroy it and kill her via injury-based debuffs.

If their second duelist, Kashimiya, was here, they would've gone for my neck. I'd probably have to use different gear. The people who're actually here will probably aim to destroy some part of me using Ray's counterattack or the piercing and powerful laser... Shining Despair. Besides that, Adler could use Arc-en-Ciel to shoot me in the vitals. She's capable of using the Art of Vanishing to disappear and surprise me with a point-blank shot. I'll have to keep an eye out for her. If she vanishes, I'll prioritize moving around over attacking.

Behemot recalled everything she knew about the Altarian Masters and thoroughly considered how she would handle this battle.

Those are the only attacks I really have to watch out for. In terms of pure damage, there's also Burn's spam attack after using Emancipated Giant — Atlas, but knowing my defense, it wouldn't do much. Same as always. The only crits I need to avoid are the kind that use fixed damage, energy or magic damage, and anything that ignores defense. I considered that The Lunar Society might use the fixed damage item spam tactic they used on Gloria, but that's impossible now that I've thinned out their numbers.

Behemot was deep in thought, considering her opponents' pasts and achievements.

The second thing to be wary of is the High Priestess using Faint Light to divide my HP and then casting her ultimate final skill to take me out in one hit. Looking at her current level and the HP I'd have after the division, she'd blow away about half of my entire body. If that took out a vital point, I'd die right then and there. Though I doubt she'd be quick to use a skill that costs all her levels. After all, unlike with Gloria, she wouldn't gain much from beating me.

She knew them and was wary of what they could do, but that was exactly why she thought this particular scenario was unlikely.

Also, if she tried that, I'd just kill her first. That skill has a cast time, so there'll surely be a chance for me to strike. Even if Tsukikage protected her in his shadows so she could chant there, her speed debuff would disappear. I would just kill Tsukikage, then kill Fuso when the shadows spat her out after. That would be the end of that. It would cost me my backup plan, but it's a sacrifice I'm willing to make.

She also thought of countermeasures for every scenario.

Behemot already knew the powerful aces up their sleeves, as well as their weaknesses.

The third thing to watch out for are debuffs. There's Holmes' Charm, Adler's Arc-en-Ciel specced in debuffs, and Tsukikage's fatal King of Assassins skill. Though, I've got MVP rewards that counter debuffs.

The rings on her limbs were Sufferward Bands, Bourdrim.

Its passive skill, Sufferward Prison, gave her resistance to poison-type, mental-type, curse-type, and limit-type debuffs, and the effect scaled with her END.

With Beastheart Possession active, her END was so high that it was hard to imagine her resistance ever being overcome.

...Though, there's the goblin that Ray can summon. The compressed debuff she used to beat the second Gigaknight in Quartierlatin might be able to break through my resistance. Same with Fuso. I never heard of her using compressed debuffs while Faint Light is active, but she might be able to do it. I'll have to be really careful if she compresses the night.

Despite being deep in thought, Behemot was alert. She wasn't about to be overconfident.

That's all I need to watch out for. Those are the only things that truly defeat me here, so I better do my best to avoid them.

"What is it?" Tsukuyo suddenly spoke up. "You're just standing in place and giving us a mocking glare. Are you really that confident you're going to win?"

Mocking glare? Confident? I'm pretty sure the time we experience is pretty different, but I guess I was lost in thought long enough for them to notice. They totally misread me, though.

Indeed. Behemot had merely analyzed the battle and identified any factors that could cause her defeat.

Shu, who was fighting Leviathan; the Altarians here, ready to face Behemot; the rankers that could potentially come to their aid... She had memorized everything she could about all of them.

During her stay in Gideon, she had properly investigated the Altarian rankers and what they were famous for.

You gotta know the meta... You gotta know how to counter your enemy. She gathered all the info she could find and thought of ways to deal with any situation. She was thorough when it came to this, and there was a solid reason for it.

I'm the King of Beasts, after all. I don't mean to brag, but I'm the strongest player in the three western countries... and that makes me the Master whose abilities are better known than anybody else's.

Behemot knew that the information about her MVP rewards and skills was more or less common knowledge.

The only exception was the accessory hanging over her neck.

Compatibility was an important part of battle. Some would say compatibility didn't matter if you were overpowered enough, but if the same could be said about your opponent, then that argument fell apart.

If my opponent knows me, I also have to gather info about them. Behemot knew that if she didn't do this, she would eventually be defeated.

Thus, this was the obvious course of action to her.

Despite being the strongest, she would fight weaklings with due care — and then some.

The phrase "Lions give their all when hunting rabbits" might come to mind for some, but that misrepresented the scale. This was more akin to a dragon analyzing an ant before challenging it to an all-out battle.

I don't wanna get the death penalty and be separated from Infinite Dendrogram for a whole day. Claudiah's clever, but reckless... and she's my friend. I have to do everything I can to protect her and what's important in my world.

Behemot looked up at the sky to see jade and silver lights drawing arcs between the clouds.

It seemed to her that Claudiah was having fun as well.

...Yeah. If Claudiah's enjoying herself, then I'll go and have a good time, too.

The unknown variables had been removed. She'd thoroughly considered all the ways she could lose.

This was how she began a battle that she intended to win.

Still, there were a few unknown factors.

Behemot only had the information that she had gathered. If anyone here had grown since she'd learned about them, there could be some unknown element at play that could potentially cause her defeat.

She knew and understood that well.

That was why she would enjoy herself... but never let her guard down.

She would enjoy this battle as a battle, this game as a game, and this world as a world while using their power to win against those standing in her way.

I will use my power to open up, create, and protect my world — the world I like.

She was King of Beasts, Behemot.

She was one of the "Apices" — The Physical Apex.

She was the imperium's strongest and its ultimate guardian.

And she was the first fang of the imperator.

"Ganking time. Rawr."

With that declaration to her enemies, she launched into battle.

◆

King of Beasts, Behemot was the embodiment of the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory, as well as its ultimate conclusion.

Her stats surpassed Leviathan’s, she employed her battle skills with supreme refinement, and she wielded countless MVP rewards from the UBMs that she’d crushed beneath her.

One thing was certain in this situation: Ray and his friends were about to face an enemy of unprecedented strength.

Chapter Eleven: The Black Mirror

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

The instant Behemot made her move, three Altarian Masters — Eishiro, Marie, and Rook — also flew into action.

Just in terms of pure status, the strongest Altarian here was actually Rook.

This was because Babi's merging skill, Union Jack, allowed Rook to combine with her and a select monster under his command — in this case, Liz. Babi was a high-rank Embryo who'd used her Drain Learning to gather lots of stat-boosting skills from the monsters they'd defeated, while Liz was a slime that excelled in both speed and toughness. Obviously, merging these two together would have fearsome results.

Despite being only a high-rank, Rook in this form had the stats and the skill repertoire of a Superior Job.

The way it worked was almost like an off-shoot of the Guardian-Jaguarman Theory.

Thanks to the buffs put up by The Lunar Society, his AGI was now a match for Behemot's.

Despite this, the moment he saw Behemot move, Rook realized something that made him break out in a cold sweat.

Ohh... This is not good, Rook thought.

He knew that he would be her first target.

The extraordinary perception Rook boasted both in-game and in reality didn't work as well when faced with a non-humanoid like Behemot — but since that tiny body hosted a human mind, he could follow some of her thought processes by observing her actions. One thing he knew for certain was that she would try to defeat him first.

Most would have expected Behemot to go after the debuffer who was the only Superior here — Tsukuyo. Both Eishiro and Marie seemed deeply surprised to see Behemot charge straight at Rook, but he himself knew exactly why he was targeted.

It wasn't because of his stats. Though his were higher than those of the other Altarians here, Behemot wasn't the type to pick her targets based on such meager stat differences.

She was aiming for Rook first because she knew exactly what he was.

I suppose this was to be expected. If she really did eliminate The Lunar Society just to get rid of all uncertain variables, it only makes sense that she would target me for the exact same reason.

The skills Babylon had acquired through Drain Learning were numerous — easily surpassing the number of skills possessed by standard job builds. When fusing with her, Rook had access to all these skills, which would mesh well with his currently-insane stats. That made him an uncertain variable, and it was only natural that Behemot would see him as a threat.

However, the fact that he'd gotten Behemot's attention wasn't what really bothered Rook — it was something far worse.

The fact that she's targeting me means that King of Beasts knows what we've got up our sleeves... She even knows about mere high-ranks like me. How much does she really know, then? Does she know all about our abilities and tactics?

Moving as fast as Behemot, Rook retreated from her, occasionally winging his path.

He used this time to think.

Our strategy is based around King of Beasts attacking Ray and him surviving that attack. If she's only aware of our strategies that have already been exposed, she will likely stick to attacking... But if she knows about his skill... we might have to find some means to get Ray's damage counter up.

Rook observed their opponent and tried to deduce how much she knew about them based on her actions. He accelerated his thoughts and continued his examination, while the distance between him and Behemot was swiftly closing.

...Wait. From what I can tell, King of Beasts doesn't just want a simple victory here. She certainly wants to win, but unlike Franklin, she's not the type to go for victory at any cost. If that was the case, she would have attacked while we were still talking to Princess Claudiah, or included us in the rampage against The Lunar Society, or targeted Tsukuyo Fuso instead of me. She doesn't want to just win... she also wants to enjoy this.

As his thoughts kept speeding along, the distance between Rook and Behemot kept closing.

They were more or less equal in speed — or rather, Rook was slightly faster. The reason King of Beasts was catching up was because her movements were just better.

Part of her objective here is to win only after fighting with all her might. She wants to put herself into a situation where she can bring her full strength to bear while also letting her opponents go all-out. That must be the primary reason she's not targeting Tsukuyo Fuso. In that case, what I ought to do here is...

Although Rook had trained for this, he hadn't had much field experience with the high-speed movement of Metal-Devil-Man. He still hadn't quite gotten the hang of actually controlling this human-devil-slime chimera body of his.

King of Beasts, on the other hand, had been in Infinite Dendrogram for nearly five years.

The reason the distance between them was growing smaller was that immense gap in their respective experience controlling bodies that were totally unlike their real life ones.

This was particularly obvious in the timing with which Rook changed his direction.

...From my perspective, I have only three seconds left until she catches up. The moment when the distance closed... when the beast's claws would dig into Rook's flesh... was swiftly approaching.

And then, Behemot was right next to him.

"Hm...?!" she exclaimed, noticing that something wasn't right. Rook had suddenly crossed his hands in front of his chest...

"Flash Eye."

...And the artificial eyes created on his arms released an intense burst of light.

"Hh...!" The dazzling flash stopped Behemot in her tracks for a moment.

This was a skill that Babylon had acquired with Drain Learning from a monster called "Floating Spark Eye."

The skill released a powerful flash of light from the user's eyes, dazzling the targets and inflicting the Blind debuff. Rook had used Liz's ability to create a number of artificial eyes on his arms before using the skill through them. Being a Mithril Arms Slime, Liz could change her shape — and he could now do the same thanks to Union Jack.

All this time, he'd been running away from Behemot in a winding pattern in order to get himself into a position where Flash Eye wouldn't affect any of his allies.

A brief dazzle. The first condition is cleared. This chance will not last, however.

Rook knew full well that, to someone like King of Beasts, this would just be a momentary distraction. She didn't even get the Blind status effect. The obvious conclusion was that at least one of the many MVP rewards she was wearing let her easily resist it.

Regardless, the intense light still briefly blocked out her line of sight. King of Beasts might've had something that helped her see in total darkness, but she wasn't equipped to handle an abundance of light, since that would be a hindrance in more circumstances than not.

Despite being unable to see, Behemot wasn't panicking one bit.

She couldn't properly gauge the distance between her and Rook, but sound and presence alone was enough for her to know that he was somewhere ahead of her.

Thus, she decided to use a skill that didn't care about a slight difference in distance.

Behemot swung her right hand. The arc of her swing created a claw-shaped shockwave that barreled straight forward.

The skill was called "Winged Ripper." It was a Claw Boxer active skill, and it created a shockwave with a range of a few dozen metels and had the same power as the user's regular attacks.

She'd used this skill in order to keep Rook in check.

However... it was exactly what he had been waiting for.

[Now!]

Rook shouted through his Telepathy Cuffs, while at the same time moving his slime tentacle with his Metal-Devil-Man body. He'd grown the tentacle at the same time he'd used Flash Eye, and now he yanked it back towards him, dragging along the thing it'd wrapped around in the process.

The thing in question... or rather, the person... was none other than Ray.

Rook had drawn his friend closer so he could use him as a shield. He'd been running away from Behemot while carefully positioning himself precisely so that he could bring Ray towards him like this.

Though this seemed like the heartless actions of a person who would sacrifice his friend to save his own skin, it was actually a necessary step towards victory.

"Counter Absorption!"

After all... the damage counter was the source of Ray and Nemesis' power. They had to be attacked by Behemot in order to use the damage taken as a Resource to power their own skills.

They had agreed ahead of time that Ray would use Counter Absorption the moment Rook signaled to him using Telepathy Cuffs.

And now, that barrier of light took the full brunt of the shockwave, adding the damage to Nemesis' counter.

The dazzling burst from earlier was nothing but a step towards luring Behemot into attacking Ray — it would've been much more difficult to direct her attacks to the proper target when she could see everything that was happening.

"Gh...!" After Ray had just barely survived the attack, Rook used his tentacle to fling him out of range.

That was all he could do here... for Behemot had already launched her follow-up attack.

Although she couldn't see, she'd realized that her attack had been blocked. That wasn't a problem for her, though. If one of her attacks failed, she only had charge and attack again.

The only problem for her now was deciding who to prioritize — Ray, who'd absorbed her immense damage, or Rook, her original target.

As she considered that question, Rook suddenly raised his voice. "Ray... Prepare that skill! Use it to match her stats!"

He actually exposed one of his friend's trump cards, revealing information about Ray's skills that Behemot likely didn't know.

This seemed like another betrayal, but again — it was not.

Rook merely did what he thought was optimal based on his assumptions regarding Behemot's personality.

His words drew her focus towards Ray... not out of caution, but more out of curiosity. Rook had noted this. He had deduced that since Behemot wanted not only to win, but to also go all-out and actually enjoy this battle, she would allow Ray to use a skill that made him stronger. That was why he'd emphasized that it wasn't a sure-kill attack, but a buff, leading her to make a decision that was ultimately beneficial to them.

If it was a skill like Tsukuyo's Ulfaria Eltram, which could instantly kill her, Behemot would have certainly attacked Ray to avoid defeat. Rook, however, had deduced that King of Beasts' desire to enjoy herself outweighed her desire to win at any cost, and that she would want to see what happened when Ray used his skill.

With Truth Discernment, it was even possible to tell that Rook wasn't bluffing about the skill's effects.

Rook saw clearly that Behemot was doing exactly what he expected her to do — her interest turned towards Ray and away from taking Rook down. He was also relieved to see that Ray would actually be able to use his skill... but then, Rook noticed that Behemot had gotten close enough to attack him.

"Hhaah..." he sighed, having expected this exact outcome.

Rook knew that he'd end up getting the death penalty the moment he realized that Behemot had investigated all of them and had decided he was an uncertain variable. Since he was currently a slime-man, he could withstand most physical attacks, but he wasn't optimistic enough to believe that he would survive here.

This is King of Beasts... the top of the Dryfean kill rankings. She must have at least as many MVP special rewards as Shu, and based on her equipment, she doesn't have any limitations as absurd as his costume-only restriction. I think it's fair to assume that she has one — or more likely a few items that let her break through resistances.

Rook's assumption was correct. The semi-transparent claws Behemot had equipped were a Mythical MVP reward called "Twin-Moon Carvers, Crescent Glissando."

It was an ethereal pair of weapons that allowed the selection of damage type.

One of its skills, Blood Moonrise, turned physical damage into direct HP damage. This damage was affected by the target's defense, but it ignored physical resistance skills, so even the fearsome Metal-Devil-Man couldn't stand up to it.

On top of this, Behemot was using the Claw Boxer's ultimate job skill, Tiger Scratch. This allowed her to follow up every single attack she made with two additional strikes that inherited the nature, element, and power of the first one.

Not even a slime with a Brooch could survive three powerful blows that ignored resistances and were powered by Behemot's immense stats.

Checkmate, I suppose... But I think I did everything I could. I helped Ray put some damage on his counter and gave him a chance to use that skill of his. All in all, I think I put up a good fight against her.

Calm and collected, he pondered the situation while staring straight at Behemot.

Then, he canceled his Union Jack so that he wouldn't lose Liz to the coming onslaught.

His stats dropped, and so did his speed. He could no longer even see Behemot's movements.

The next thing he knew, he'd been completely pulverized.

He didn't even have time to notice if his Brooch had activated or not.

Rook's resurrection period was shorter than the blink of an eye, but it was enough for one last thought: This is the first time I've gotten the death penalty, isn't it...? I suppose that is a bit frustra—

And with that, he dissolved into motes of light and vanished, leaving only five Altarian Masters.

◇◆

"one." After taking care of Rook, Behemot didn't stop even for a moment, because she'd noticed that Eishiro and Marie were nowhere in sight.

She realized that, during the Flash Eye, the former sunk into his shadow, while the latter must have used the Art of Vanishing. She also understood that they hadn't attacked her while Rook was still alive because they didn't want to interrupt Rook's plan to help Ray fill his damage counter and activate his skill. Now that Rook was gone, it was clear that the two would take the opportunity to strike, so Behemot kept moving to avoid any ambushes.

She was prioritizing evasion over offense, not targeting anyone she could currently see. After all, Behemot wanted to see this skill Ray supposedly had, and she'd long since decided that Tsukuyo would be her final target.

The last opponent in Behemot's field of view — Barbaroy — was an END build, and if she used Dragonscale Wards or sacrificed shields for Fatal Defender, it would be difficult to get rid of her quickly.

Even Tiger Scratch might not have been enough to take Barbaroy out, and if it wasn't, Behemot worried that might leave her open to counter attacks.

Barbaroy herself was assuming a defensive stance, which made it likely that was precisely her plan.

From Behemot's point of view, there were no viable targets in sight, but although Eishiro had no trouble hiding in the shadows, Marie's Art of Vanishing burned through her SP very quickly. Because of that, she'd likely reappear soon, so Behemot kept running, biding her time until that moment.

That was when Ray, who was behind her in experienced time, made his next move.

"...Rook!" he cried as he watched his friend's body dissolve into light. He understood that Rook had sacrificed himself solely to give Ray the chance to use his skill.

Ray's teeth clenched in rage. He knew exactly what he had to do now.

Rook had shown them the possibility of victory, and it was time for Ray and Nemesis to bring this new strategy to bear against the Physical Apex.

Thus, he turned to his companion.

"Let's do it, Nemesis... Fourth Form!"

"Certainly!" In response to his words, Nemesis canceled her greatsword form, melting into specks of darkness that floated to a point behind Ray and assumed a new shape.

"Form Shift... Black Mirror!"

And with that, Nemesis transformed into a round mirror with a frame shaped like a single wing.

Behemot, still wary of attacks from Eishiro or Marie, also witnessed this transformation.

Nemesis, now a mirror, was floating behind Ray. The surface of the mirror was like deep, black water, with no reflection at all...

"Designating target!" Nemesis declared. "Damage counter set! Designating stat... AGI!"

...But as Nemesis spoke those words, the mirror's surface began to undulate, and when the ripples subsided, it reflected none other than Behemot herself.

While Nemesis finished her preparations, Ray was taking action as well. He turned the Monochrome he was wearing into the cannon that would fire Shining Despair and equipped it on his left arm.

Once both were done, they shouted in unison, "Chaser from the Mirror!"

It was a declaration of the skill they'd developed upon evolving to high-rank... the skill meant to combat opponents far more powerful than they.

◇◇◇

A certain day in April, Death Soldier, Ray Starling

"I've evolved to my fourth form."

"...I see." Just like when she'd evolved to her third form, Nemesis simply told me about it shortly after I woke up at the inn.

This didn't come as a surprise, though — primarily because she'd had no appetite last night, just like right before she'd evolved to her third form.

Apparently, during her normal evolutions, Nemesis would lose her appetite, then evolve while sleeping. It wasn't a very flashy way to evolve, but as far as I knew all Embryos evolved differently, so... it was what it was. Her evolution from first to second form was the exception rather than the rule.

Though, I was told that her evolution to high-rank was a little more exciting... and I missed it because I was asleep.

"Anyway... Congratulations!" I said.

"Much appreciated! You can now count me among the high-ranks!" There was a time when Nemesis was really troubled by how slowly she'd evolved, so she looked pretty happy about it now.

"So, what changes did you get?" I asked. Well, one thing I could see for myself was that her clothing was different.

It seemed like something you could call "an upgrade" — her apparel was a bit more extravagant than before... Her body didn't seem to have changed, though.

"Well, first off, I feel like Counter Absorption is stronger now," Nemesis said. "I believe the damage limit now is 400,000."

Now that was a useful power-up. It was rare to face anyone who could break the previous limit of 300,000, but our battle against Monochrome was proof that it could happen, so I could definitely appreciate this change.

"The conditions for Payback seem to be easier to achieve, as well. Now any damage can be used to charge it — not just the damage accumulated in Black Shield form."

"Oh, now that's really good." That would make it possible to fight using the less tricky forms before switching over to use Payback. "Those are some good improvements already. Is there anything more?"

"Yes, I have not yet told you of the main change," she said before raising four of her fingers. "It gave me one more form... a fourth one."

So her evolutions continued to prioritize variety, huh?

That reminded me of Io. She also had an Arms-type with several forms, but unlike Nemesis, its high-rank evolution had only improved the forms it already possessed. Just like signs and times of evolution, those kinds of changes were different for each individual Embryo.

“So, what is it like?” I asked.

“Like this,” she answered, transforming into a weapon right before my eyes.

Scratch that... it wasn’t a weapon, but a dark mirror with a frame shaped like wings.

“...That’s not exactly what I was expecting,” I said.

“Well, my third form’s windmill was already pushing the definition of ‘weapon.’”

“And now it’s completely broken free of that definition, huh?”

“No. This is also a weapon. The wing-like frame can be removed.”

After saying that, the frame separated from the mirror and passed into my hands. Though slender and with a unique curved shape, the frame served as dual swords when detached.

“This form does not allow Counter Absorption, but it can use Vengeance, albeit a slightly different version.”

“Different how?”

“The accumulated damage is split between each blade. That means you can deliver Vengeance twice.”

“Ohh?” I really appreciated this one. There were situations where it would come in handy, such as battles against enemies with Brooches. It seemed to me that Black Blade was the way to go for giant monsters, while these dual blades were better against human opponents.

This had way better utility than the third form. Maybe that was just how high-rank forms worked?

“Hold it,” said Nemesis. “The blades are merely a bonus. If this form was only about striking twice, the mirror would serve no purpose.”

“Ah. Oh yeah.” She had a point.

“This mirror has a skill, as well... One that synergizes quite well with Vengeance from the twin blades.”

So, while the third form was split into two forms — α, which allowed Counter Absorption, and β, which allowed Payback — this one allowed the use of Vengeance and the new skill simultaneously, huh?

...This really was an “evolution,” wasn’t it? It built upon the principles of the previous form.

"And what's the mirror's effect?" I asked.

"Well, what it does is..."

Nemesis began describing what, exactly, she was now capable of...

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

The moment after Ray activated his skill, Behemot lost sight of him.

He hadn't exactly vanished, however — he'd simply left her line of sight.

...Did he speed up? she wondered before turning her head to catch sight of him again, moving so fast she actually had to focus just to keep track of him.

Ray was moving with unbelievable speed, especially considering that before using the skill, he wasn't even close to supersonic in spite of all his buffs.

In fact...

He's about as fast as... No... He's exactly as fast as me, Behemot thought, as she used Reveal on Ray and saw that his AGI matched hers. The skill was called... "Chaser from the Mirror," right? I see...

Based on Nemesis' unique traits as an Embryo, Behemot could guess what kind of skill this was — and what it cost.

It matches one of his stats to that of the last opponent who dealt damage to him. He probably has to expend the damage counter to do it.

She'd reached this conclusion based on Ray's current stats, Rook's statement, and the fact that Rook had made sure Ray got hit even if it meant using him as a shield.

That wasn't the entirety of her conjecture, though.

Does it take an amount of damage from the counter equal to the stat's value every second after activation...? No, that'd be way too expensive. It's probably every minute, then, and the amount depleted is likely equal to the amount that was added to his stat. I know for sure that it can't be a fixed number, MP, or SP, at least. It'd be too cheap.

Based on her experience, Behemot could surmise the nature of Nemesis' fourth form's skill.

Most frightening of all... she was completely right.

◇

Chaser from the Mirror.

This was a skill activated by selecting a stat of an opponent who had contributed to the damage counter, and it set Ray's corresponding stat to the same value as that of his opponent's. There were a few other things of note about it:

1. At the time of activation and every minute after that, it would subtract an amount equal to the opponent's selected stat from the damage counter.
2. If the damage accumulated on the counter dropped below the necessary amount, the skill would be automatically canceled.
3. If the target's stats changed while the skill was active, Ray's own stats would change, as well.
4. The stat affected by this skill couldn't be increased by any other effects or skills.

◇

Chaser from the Mirror was the power Nemesis had acquired by evolving to high-rank.

She and Ray had fought many battles against opponents who were simply stronger than them both, and as a result she developed a skill that enhanced Ray's stats... or more precisely, a skill that let him face foes who were far above him.

One of the reasons Ray had taken the Scout job was so he could use Reveal to see which stats were best for Chaser. The job also gives Killing Intent Perception, Behemot thought. It helps prevent him from being taken out before he can use his skill.

Naturally, this skill had far less utility and cost far more than it would have if Nemesis was an Embryo specializing in copying abilities or pure stat increases. As well, it could only target one stat at a time.

That didn't matter to Ray, however. After all... he already had the power to defeat his opponents. The only problem was catching up to them, and this skill addressed just that.

...I see. So he increased his speed so he could land a crit on me with Shining Despair.

Shining Despair was a concentrated laser cannon that would certainly kill almost anything in its path. It could burn through just about any creature's flesh. The only problem was that Ray couldn't possibly have actually hit with it at his base speed — but he'd solved that issue by using Chaser and acquiring AGI to match Behemot's.

Ohh, I see. So Holmes sacrificed himself to let Ray build up the damage counter and gave me all that info so I'd let him activate the skill... Not bad.

Behemot was actually aware of what Rook was doing and had willingly played along, but now that she'd seen Ray's ability, she was half-delighted and half-sweating. As he was now, The Unbreakable was certainly capable of taking her life, and that made her slightly restless.

You can counter this by waiting until his damage counter drops below the minimum needed to maintain the skill... or by taking out Fuso to cancel the AGI division. The cost to maintain the buff will become six times higher than it is now and force him to cancel it immediately... Those would both be pretty boring, though.

Countering the skill in that way wouldn't be any different from just not engaging her opponent's strategy at all. Behemot wanted to enjoy this battle, and doing that would be the opposite of fun.

Thus...

I'll fight him head-on. Behemot turned mid-sprint and faced Ray as he tried to fix his sights on her. Then, she dashed towards him, intending to pulverize his body with Tiger Scratch. She'd decided not to even give him a chance to fire.

However, Ray also flew into action.

"Hellish Miasma!" The moment those words left his lips, the right Miasmaflame Bracer — the one that hadn't been covered by Monochrome's cannon — spewed out an intense blast of deep purple miasma.

The triply-debilitating gas quickly permeated the entire hall.

...Debuffs that spread like this won't do anything to me in my current state, Behemot thought. He probably knows that, so he's probably just trying to limit my vision, like that Flash Eye from before.

Ray, his face covered by Storm Visage, had dropped down to the ground, hiding his body and the mirror behind him in the purple mist.

At the edge of Behemot's vision, she saw Tsukuyo drinking an elixir. The tian officials seemed to have been already evacuated, too, which made her realize that the use of the gas had been planned in advance.

He's wearing dark clothes, so it's easy for him to hide inside the similarly-colored miasma. But I should be able to figure out where he is if I just watch how it flows... Oh wait. They accounted for that too.

Behemot was about to watch for Ray's movements in the miasma and attack him that way, but then she realized the mist was hiding more than just Ray.

I now can't see Tsukikage's shadows, either. While I'm on that, Adler's Art of Vanishing lets her pass through objects, so I couldn't see her in the gas even if I tried.

Thanks to Ray's miasma shielding them from sight, Tsukikage and Marie now had a much better chance of landing a surprise attack on her.

They're so perfectly in sync. I think they actually assumed this formation the moment Holmes used Flash Eye... And they did all of this just to defeat me.

Behemot realized that everyone present had thoroughly prepared for this moment. They had developed several strategies specifically to take down an Apex, created new powers, and they had all moved as one to corner her.

They had been preparing for this battle since the moment they'd found out that the almighty King of Beasts would be attending the peace talks as a bodyguard on the Dryfean side.

That was why they were here fighting her. They weren't merely buying time until Shu defeated Leviathan — they were all struggling to overcome an Apex.

That was certainly true for the members of Death Period, at least.

"...fun." And that was her honest opinion on the situation.

She could barely remember the last time any Masters had faced her with the intention of actually beating her.

Logan often tooted his own horn, but he was constantly avoiding Behemot anyway.

Franklin seemed to be developing a countermeasure against her, but he was so careful that he'd be unlikely to attack her until it was complete.

No one ever challenged her. No one even dared to claim they could defeat her.

She'd actually fought a Superior during the Dryfean civil war, but he was only stalling, so it wasn't much of a fight.

Because of all that, this moment was incredibly exciting for her.

It had been more than a year since her gamer side had been this enthralled.

...Yeah, I really wanna win this before Ray's boost runs out. Her opponents were facing her with all their might, and it made Behemot so happy that she wanted to respond in kind.

But if I go for Ray, Tsukikage and Adler would take the chance to ambush me... Levia's the one who specializes in messy AoE attacks, so I can't do anything like that right now.

If Leviathan was here, she could end this by just leveling the whole hall, and all their speed and stealth wouldn't save them.

Behemot was stronger than Leviathan, but the differences in their frames made one better at some things than the other. Together they were nearly flawless, and that was exactly why they had been separated.

...No time to worry about that. I'll just finish Ray off, then deal with the other two if they ambush me. That should be doable.

Having decided that, Behemot charged towards Ray.

She had already located him by watching the movement of the miasma. After closing the distance in a blink of an eye, she prepared to strike him down just as he was putting his hands on the floor beneath him.

That was when she sensed two entities approaching from two different angles behind her.

Ray and those two presences now surrounded her on all sides.

I see. So Adler stopped using Art of Vanishing at some point and hid in the shadows with Tsukikage. I was wondering why she wasn't attacking me before her SP ran out. This explains that.

Behemot was well aware that Eishiro and Marie would launch a counter-attack the moment she attacked Ray. The two of them would use the opening to score a critical hit on her.

The chances that she'd survive the hits were high, but she didn't want to bet on that 20% or so chance that they'd deal serious damage.

Thus, Behemot called off her attack and instead tried to dive behind Ray, using her small frame to her advantage. With him in the way, landing a critical hit on her would become much more difficult.

I'll take Ray out with Tiger Scratch, then go for Tsukikage and Marie, in that order. That'll sort everything out.

With that in mind, Behemot prepared to finally go on the offensive... but then she saw hands peeking out from beneath Ray.

...Huh? For a moment, her mind went blank.

This was impossible, after all. She'd accounted for every single being present. She could clearly see all the still-surviving Altarian Masters. Ray was right in front of her, Eishiro and Marie had emerged from the shadows behind her, and Tsukuyo and Barbaroy were visibly standing some distance away.

She glanced around for just a moment... and that was all it took to understand what was really happening.

...Ah. Next to the wall, there stood a giant set of armor, assuming a defensive position.

This armor was the defining feature of Barbaroy Bad Burn — Gunhammer Plate, Magnum Colossus.

However, when Behemot targeted that suit of armor with Reveal... she got absolutely nothing.

That could only mean one thing: Magnum Colossus was completely empty.

...They outplayed me! When Rook had used Flash Eye to blind Behemot, Barbaroy had discarded her armor and hidden herself somewhere.

And it was obvious where: the shadows.

"Heaven's Weight!" Barbaroy... or rather, B3 wasn't a match for her in AGI, but she'd managed to emerge from her hiding place and hit Behemot with her skill thanks to the element of surprise.

Alas, gravity multiplied a measly 500 times meant little to the King of Beasts affected by Beastheart Possession. She might as well have just dropped a blanket on Behemot's back.

However...

...What's with this weight? It turned out the added weight was actually enough to make her feel discomfort.

Wait, is this...? Behemot had an idea of what could be happening here... and what B3 was doing.

At the edge of her vision, she saw Tsukuyo, smiling broadly, and Behemot noticed another thing she hadn't anticipated.

Atlas' gravity field is stronger than I heard it was. With Beastheart Possession, Behemot's STR was over 220,000. An avatar's base STR — the STR of an average adult male from Earth — was about 10. That meant that she had the strength of over 20,000 men.

Therefore, 500 times greater gravity shouldn't have meant much to her.

And the Binding debuff that came with it would've stood no chance against her immense STR, not to mention the resistance from Bourdrim.

In spite of that, Behemot was actually having trouble moving.

At first, she'd thought that Tsukuyo must have switched the target of her Faint Light to STR, and based on how she felt right then, she suspected that was indeed the case. However, even having her STR divided by 6 shouldn't have been as limiting as this. That could only mean that this gravity field was different than the one Behemot was familiar with.

That was when she noticed that B3 was extending her hands towards Behemot and clenching her teeth.

To her knowledge, Heaven's Weight required neither a hand motion like that nor such immense focus.

This wasn't the regular Heaven's Weight skill B3 had always used before.

This was a new power she'd developed — by means other than evolution.

The person responsible for this — Tsukuyo Fuso — smiled as she remembered a certain exchange.

◇◇◇

April, 2025, Tokyo University

"Hey, B — you ever thought about how weird Territories are?" It was a perfectly ordinary day in the CID clubroom when Tsukuyo posed that question to Kozue.

"Where's that coming from?"

"Well, just hear me out. You know how most Embryos have a physical body, and their powers are tied to that body?" Tsukuyo continued her question.

Arms, Guardian, Chariot, Castle, and Territory — the five main categories of Embryos. Like Tsukuyo said, they generally had solid forms that were invested with various powers.

However...

"The Territory grouping is different from all the rest. It's just a formless space."

Territory type Embryos were composed solely of their skills and their resulting areas of effect.

The affected areas might physically change in appearance, but as long as the Embryo wasn't any other category, Territories had no such thing as a "body."

And even with hybrid Embryos, you had cases like Maidens and Apostles. Kaguya's body completely vanished when using her Territory powers, so she was scarcely different from a pure Territory.

"Doncha think you're missin' out?" Tsukuyo asked.

"No, I don't. Not having a body makes Territories hard to break. There are exceptions, like the Right of Destruction, but by default, Territories can't be damaged like other Embryos and become unusable as a result," Kozue said.

This reminded Kozue of her and Ray's recent encounter with Rosa on the way to Torne. Once Gashadokuro's body — her spear — was destroyed, Rosa was unable to use her Embryo skill despite still being perfectly capable of fighting herself.

Kozue's... B3's Atlas was basically nothing but the power it wielded, so she would basically never end up in a situation like that.

"True, true," Tsukuyo nodded before saying, "What if I told you that Territories have another advantage?"

"...I'm all ears."

“Nheheh. Log in to Dendro, then, and I’ll show you. I’ll be waiting at my base.”

Tsukuyo then casually hopped into bed, lay down, equipped the Infinite Dendrogram hardware, and logged in.

Kozue was slightly perplexed by how eager Tsukuyo was to get started, but she knew she had no choice but to join her.

She went to lock the clubroom’s door, then put on another piece of hardware before lying down on the sofa.

◇

The two met up in The Lunar Society’s headquarters.

Thanks to a recent attack by a certain mild-mannered meathead, the place was currently under repair and renovation.

They had even bought more of the surrounding land to expand the place, making changes that ranged from eye-catching to utterly staggering. As a result, Tsukuyo was dangerously low on funds, which had led to her causing the Hannya incident and ultimately becoming indebted to Azurite.

But that was irrelevant now. Tsukuyo was standing on the stage at the auditorium, while B3 was sitting in the audience. Aside from the two of them, there was only Kaguya, standing next to Tsukuyo with a faint smile on her face.

“You’re familiar with Kaguya’s Lunar Divider Field, right?”

“Yes.”

“Here, let me show you from the base form of the ‘night.’” When Tsukuyo said that, Kaguya transformed into her Territory form: the Lunar Divider Field.

It looked as though Kaguya had completely vanished, but actually, this shapeless space was her.

“Now comes the important part. First is the ‘swallow.’” Following those words, the ‘night’ vanished, and in its place there was a bluish-black mass that resembled both a swallow in flight and a crescent moon.

“And then there’s the Sunsleep Ink Shroud.” Then, Tsukuyo was wearing a blue-black coat that looked just like her ‘night,’ but compressed into a thin cloak.

Tsukuyo had used both the swallow and the shroud in her fight against

Figaro.

She was flying the swallow and wearing the shroud at the same time.

"And here's the 'night' again." Her surroundings were once again veiled in darkness, but Tsukuyo was still clad in her Sunsleep Ink Shroud. "And those are my skills. Did you notice anything?"

"...Don't you also have the ultimate skill and Faint Light?"

"Ohh. Yeah. I do have those, but the ult is kind of a bit special, while Faint Light requires all of Kaguya's processing power and can't be used along other skills, so that doesn't factor in here. Hmm... Maybe I should make it a little more clear."

Still wearing the shroud, Tsukuyo spread the 'night' again.

After that, she canceled the "night" to create the "swallow," then instead created something that looked much like Eishiro's shadow tentacles... although upon second inspection, it was closer to a "branch."

That was when B3 realized something.

"The combos... You can't use the 'night,' the 'swallow,' and the 'branch' together, is that it? But you can use any of them with the shroud."

"Exactly. Now, why do you think that is?"

"...Based on what you said, it's not just that they're incompatible, is it?"

"Yeah. Why don't I just tell you the answer?" she said as she canceled her skills. "The 'night,' the 'swallow,' and the 'branch' are all the same."

"The same?"

"They're all the same skill: Lunar Divider Field. They're not new skills, they're just different forms of the same thing. That's why I can't use the 'night' alongside the two compressed forms. I can use them with Sunsleep Ink Shroud because it's a different skill."

"Compressed forms..." B3 took in those words and thought about them deeply.

"It's simple," said Tsukuyo. "Pure Territories have no physical body—they're just a space where their power is active. That means that you can change their shape, just like how I compressed Kaguya's 'night' into a 'swallow' or 'branch.' And the best thing is — the more compressed it is, the stronger it becomes."

All of these seemingly different forms were just the same Lunar Divider Field effect. The 'swallow' and 'branch' were just the 'night' reshaped to focus their effect and make it more difficult to resist.

Territories had no physical body... but that meant that there was a degree of freedom to the form they could take.

"I only realized this myself after getting the Sunsleep Ink Shroud. I was like... 'Ah. If this skill gets stronger because the area it affects is condensed, wouldn't Lunar Divider Field also grow stronger if I compress it?'" she said as she spread out her hands and pushed them closer together. "It did take a lot of practice, though. Also, I talked to Kage and some others about it, and apparently there's Territory skills that aren't that well suited for form changing like this. Powers that stick to the surroundings, for example, like Type Rule. But I think your Weight ability would be just right for it."

Atlas' Heaven's Weight spread around B3 in a sphere, but if it was possible to concentrate it in a single direction, it seemed likely that its effect would indeed become stronger.

"Why are you telling me this now?" By joining CID, B3 had gained the right to access The Lunar Society's database, but there was nothing in there about what Tsukuyo had just told her.

This was in fact a hidden technique that Tsukuyo had constructed herself. Why, then, would she tell B3 about it now?

"Because you're fun to watch lately."

"Fun?"

"Yeah. You were always the kind of girl who cares about others, but you're really going the extra mile for Ray, aren't you? It moved me so much that I wanted to give you a helping hand."

B3 said nothing in response.

"Also, you and your clan are now crafting a strategy against KoB, aren't ya? Having an extra card to play won't hurt. If you start now, maybe you'll even learn how to do it in time."

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

After that, B3 used the limited time left until the peace talks to acquire this secret Territory technique that Tsukuyo had taught her.

She started by transforming her usual sphere into a semi-sphere, then halving it again, and again, and again... until finally the field was a tenth of its original size.

This feat required extreme concentration, and the fact that B3 had to clench her teeth so hard to maintain it spoke volumes. It also came with its own physical dangers. The force exerted by this kind of control made the bones of her hands creak and blood vessels burst.

Even so, she was successfully compressing her gravity field.

The skill that once covered 360 degrees all around her was now limited to just the 22.5 degrees directly in front of her. It covered only 1/16th of the original, and in spite of the output lost in the compression process... this field was more potent than any Behemot had encountered before.

The gravity produced in that small area was 5,000 times greater than the norm.

"Gh...!" To Behemot, a field of 500 times greater gravity was merely like having a blanket thrown over her, so even when that number became 5,000, it was only really like increasing that to ten blankets.

The gravity would instantly kill any normal person, but it didn't even cause Behemot any pain.

However, it is important to remember that anyone would be slowed down with ten blankets thrown over them.

On top of that, Tsukuyo was also dividing Behemot's STR by 6, meaning that she was now an entity with 3,600 times more STR than the average person fighting against 5,000 times greater gravity.

Here and now, for the first time, King of Beasts the Physical Apex collapsed to the ground.

This stillness was the chance at victory that B3... and Ray's entire group had been waiting for.

Ray turned to face Behemot, immobilized behind him.

"Shining..."

He leveled the cannon on his left arm towards her, and Monochrome began to shine a dazzling white.

Behemot's AGI had returned to its original value, but thanks to Chaser, Ray's AGI matched hers. Shining Despair would soon crack open her skull, killing her with all its various injury-based status effects.

Still, Behemot said nothing. Faced with the death penalty, she had nothing in her heart but honest praise.

They had acted as one to completely corner her. Just like Rook, they had never once given up on their collective victory even when faced with overwhelming violence.

Behemot found them profoundly dazzling, for it was a kind of strength she could never have.

After all, she was a person who'd chosen an animal avatar because it would let her get away with never properly talking to anyone.

I don't hate this side of myself, though. And yet, regardless of how she felt about it, this power that was so far beyond her had managed to reach her anyway.

That fact gave her nothing but joy.

She was beyond delighted to have faced opponents she could give her all against... enemies who could finally give her a good fight.

...I'm sorry.

That was exactly why she felt regret and silently apologized to them.

After all, it would soon be over.

...I'm sorry, Claudiah. Behemot also apologized to her friend fighting up in the sky. She'd have to break that promise she'd made to her.

Behemot was unable to escape the super-gravity, and the Shining Despair would soon be released. It wouldn't be long until the powerful and piercing concentrated laser would penetrate her head.

It was over.

Both Behemot's "fun time" and her "battle for victory" would now end. From now on, there would be only a "one-sided massacre" and "assured victory."

"DESPAIR!" Right before Ray's left hand unleashed the light that would bring down the Apex...

"Transformation... Soaring and Indomitable: Greatest Top!"

...The accessory hanging over Behemot's neck shimmered and released a golden shine.

Chapter Twelve: A Dear Friend

About the two girls

Six years ago, Altimia A. Altar the first princess of Altar was riding a dragon carriage to the imperium, en route to her stay as a transfer student there.

Back then, relations between Altar and Dryfe were so positive that cultural exchange between the royal families like this was a matter of course. Just a few years ago, Prince Hallon — the first son of the imperium's crown prince — had been a transfer student in the kingdom.

However, Altimia knew that there was more to this excursion than mere cultural exchange.

They are preparing to marry me off. Altar and Dryfe had been on good terms for a long time now, and the governing bodies of both nations had begun to consider forging an alliance or even merging the two countries through marriage.

Altimia was certain that this exchange was preparation for that. Her father, the king, hadn't actually said anything of the sort, but his trusted advisor, the Arch Sage, had implied as much.

The current imperator was growing old and his princes were nearly her father's age, so she assumed that she would be made to marry one of their sons, be it Prince Hallon or Prince Gaeczys — the second prince's firstborn.

Within the next six years or so, Altimia was certain she'd be the wife of one of them.

At this point, Altimia didn't think much of the situation. In this world, it was normal for princesses to have no say in who they married.

Though, if I marry outside of Altar, that will surely make Elizabeth cry, she thought. Even my leaving for this exchange student period turned her into a blubbering mess.

Altimia could not have guessed that her little sister would end up married off before she herself — and that she would be deeply involved.

...Ah, I just remembered that there was another prince my age. The third prince also had a son of his own. He almost never showed himself in public, and the people who even realized he existed were few and far between.

The reason for this was that he'd been bedridden for a long time.

A few years ago, the third prince and his wife, son, and daughter had fallen victim to a terrorist bombing. The parents were both killed, while the son suffered severe injuries that left him with limited mobility, and he was now undergoing treatment in Marquis Barbaros' — his mother's family's — mansion. They kept him there because that act of terrorism was likely related to the ongoing struggle for the throne, so if they kept him in the capital, he would likely be targeted again.

Because of these circumstances, he hadn't had a public appearance in years. Apparently the family was now represented by his twin sister — the only one who had escaped the explosion mostly unharmed.

Barbaros, eh...?

Remembering what she'd learned before transferring, Altimia looked out the window of the dragon carriage.

What she saw was the land of Marquis Barbaros. On her way to the capital, the plan was that she would spend a few days at the Barbaros mansion.

Maybe I'll get to meet the third prince's children, she thought.

Several hours later, the dragon carriage arrived at the appointed place.

At the mansion, Altimia and her entourage were welcomed by the elderly Marquis Barbaros.

The princess was accompanied by a number of maids and some members of the Royal Guard, as well as their captain — Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria.

The reason she'd brought such powerful bodyguards was an attack that happened over twenty years ago, by a Mythical UBM named "Edelvalsa." The monster had completely destroyed one of Altar's diplomatic envoys, and they wanted to be prepared just in case something like that happened again.

A Mythical UBM would be a difficult opponent regardless, but Langley had possession of Gold Thunder the Prism Steed — so if worse came to worst, Altimia could at least escape. She had undergone training to ride it in case something happened.

Once out of the carriage, Altimia exchanged greetings and a bit of conversation with Marquis Barbaros before she was invited inside and led to the guest room where she would be staying for the next few days.

After getting comfortable, she began to wonder about something.

For some reason the marquis was acting very apologetic towards me... no... towards the kingdom itself. Even though there was nothing in his welcome that overtly suggested this, Altimia couldn’t help but feel that he’d acted like he had a guilty conscience. Altimia didn’t sense any malice in him, exactly, but his behavior somehow gave her that impression.

He did, in fact, have something to feel guilty about.

To their knowledge, Edelvalsa had killed everyone on the Altarian mission, but there actually was one single survivor — Emilio Quartierlatin. By sheer chance, he’d ended up with Edelvalsa’s Mythical MVP special reward, and such a weapon was so valuable that the imperator had ordered that Barbaros raise Emilio as his own.

This made him feel apologetic towards the kingdom and, more specifically, the princess.

When he’d learned that Altimia would be staying at his mansion, he even considered telling her the truth — but he was unable to do so while the current imperator was still alive. If he went against the imperators will, he would endanger not only his family, but his adopted son Emilio and the children of the third prince he was sheltering.

Feeling torn apart on the inside, he’d chosen to remain silent about all of this.

The marquis would go on to pass away five years later, shortly after seeing the new imperator take the throne. Chances were that the mental stress of keeping up that lie played a role in his death.

“...I see no point in thinking about this much longer. I will go train.”

Altimia could not understand why the marquis was behaving the way he was, so she chose to stop considering it and went to practice her combat skills for a change of pace. She had already asked where to find the mansion’s training grounds.

He gave me quite the strange look when I asked... After telling the Royal Guard where she was headed, Altimia took her leave.

◇

When she arrived at the training grounds, however, Altimia found there was someone there already.

A girl about her age was swinging around a spear only about 2 metels in length — probably meant for fighting in close quarters.

This wasn't all that strange to see — that was the purpose of the training grounds, after all .

The strange thing that caught Altimia's attention was that the girl's spearplay was far too perfect.

Her spear made no sound as she struck. She wasted no energy on "slicing at the wind"... parting the wall of air, so to speak.

Her movements were efficient, perfected, and utterly superb. It was as though the spear was flowing through the air without a single flawed motion. The placement of her fingers holding the shaft, her every single step, even the slightest shifts of her muscles and joints... not a single detail was out of place.

She had long blonde hair, but even the way her flowing locks danced with her movements didn't seem disordered. Altimia felt like she was watching the flow of wind or water.

It wasn't a mere dance, however — she was moving exactly the way she would have in a real battle.

Despite that, it was probably more beautiful than any martial dance.

As for Altimia's thoughts on what she was seeing, she had only one word for it...

"Mechanical..."

...And that word escaped her lips.

The spear-wielding girl abruptly stopped.

Altimia suddenly realized her blunder, but she knew that she couldn't take back what she'd said. It was her honest thoughts, after all. The girl's spear-dance lacked any flaws and looked as natural as nature itself... but Altimia could see no emotion behind it. Feelings, it seemed, would have only disturbed the girl's movements. The sight of it reminded Altimia of her music box with a spinning dancer doll on top, which Prince Hallon had given her during his visit to the kingdom.

Altimia couldn't help but feel that the spear-wielding girl was much like that mechanical dancer. It was beautiful enough to move the heart... But the girl herself seemed to put no heart into it.

Though, perhaps no one else would've shared Altimia's opinion on this sight.

Still frozen, the girl looked straight at Altimia. It was almost like she was evaluating her, but that wasn't quite the right word.

She was looking at Altimia as if to analyze her, just like a machine might.

The girl then glanced downward and noticed the training sword at Altimia's side.

"Care to spar?" she asked without any preface. Her tone was odd, as though she herself wasn't sure why she'd asked that.

"Certainly." Altimia instantly agreed. She knew that this girl wasn't merely venting her annoyance at Altimia's comment. Instead, she felt that the girl, as talented as she was, had most likely realized that Altimia was the Sacred Princess and possessed immense sword fighting talent.

Altimia, a born swordmaster.

This strange girl, the very incarnation of spear fighting talent.

Altimia didn't even know her name. However, the two were drawn together as if by gravity, and now stood facing each other, weapons in hand.

It was unclear who would make the initial attack, but this was the first time they crossed blades together.

◇

"...It seems like... I've lost," Altimia said through ragged breaths, leaning on the wall after a full hour of fighting.

The other girl hadn't won because she was just more talented than Altimia. While the girl with the spear was giving the match everything she had, Altimia hadn't even used half of true skill.

She didn't have her powers as Sacred Princess without Altar, and since the blade was the greatest of the kingdom's national treasures, she couldn't bring it to Dryfe. Also, Altar's techniques were based on its ability to cut anything, so they couldn't be used with any normal sword.

Instead, she chose to fight using the pirate sword fighting technique taught to her by Langley, but ultimately she couldn't land a single hit on the girl.

But even if I ignore that and compare only our raw talent... I cannot say for certain that I would have won. That was how abnormally gifted the girl was.

Both her defense and offense were flawless, and no movement was wasted. That was probably why, despite having fought for a whole hour, she wasn't even out of breath.

She might be stronger than my teacher... Altimia thought that the girl, despite her age, might've been even stronger than the person who'd taught her swordplay — Celestial Knight, Langley.

"No. I am still below the Celestial Knight," the girl said as though she'd read Altimia's mind.

"Huh?"

"The knight possesses a power that protects, while I merely possess the power to wield a spear. The comparison is not apt. Even if I could best him in sheer martial prowess, I would still be below him as an entity... My apologies. Give me a moment."

After saying all of that in a flat voice, she fell silent before striking herself in the forehead with the shaft of her spear.

"HUH?!" The sudden action shocked Altimia, but the girl just stood in place with the shaft still pressed against her forehead, not moving an inch.

The impact made such an intense noise that Altimia wondered if she'd damaged something inside her skull.

Blood flowed from her forehead, and about ten seconds later...

"...Apologies for the wait! Oh, and please excuse my rudeness thus far."

...The girl spoke up with a tone and voice quite different from before.

Her eyes sparkled as she rambled on and on.

"I tend to get a bit gloomy while training! It makes me come off as a little impolite... I am truly sorry for inviting you to spar without even saying hello!" She bowed her head, now brimming with the wasteful thing they called "emotion."

However, her movements were still as flawless as ever, so Altimia knew that this was the same girl as before.

"N-No need," Altimia said. "I should apologize for interrupting your training."

"Oh, it is nothing! In fact, I should thank you! Training with someone else makes for a better experience," the girl said with a full smile. "Also, this is the first time someone my age has given me such a rousing fight!

That makes me really happy!"

"...I see." Altimia could relate to that.

She had been born the Sacred Princess.

No one her age had been burdened with a fate like hers.

She had friends like Langley's daughter, Liliana, and the Arch Sage's favorite disciple, Integra, but despite this she was constantly troubled by a small degree of loneliness.

Altimia felt that this girl was much like her. Their fates might be completely different in character, but they carried the same kind of weight on their shoulders.

That was why they'd sparred before even introducing themselves.

"Ah! My apologies! I have still not given you my name..." said the girl.

"Neither have I, then. My name is Altimia A. Altar, First Princess of Altar. I will be staying here for five days or so."

"I know you! I am Claudiah R. Dryfe. My father was the third prince, so I am the lowest ranking member of the royal family!" Upon hearing that, Altimia discovered that this girl was one of the children of the late third prince... not the son who was still bedridden, but the daughter who handled their official business.

Something about her words made her curious, however.

"You know of me?"

"I do! I will be your 'tuner'... your attendant at school!"

"You...?" Altimia was curious why a princess would be given such a task. Were they just being considerate of Altimia, or were there other circumstances, either for Claudiah specifically or the imperium in general, that called for this?

"That means we will be able to spar regularly!" Claudiah said with nothing but joy, beaming brightly.

"We will...?" Altimia asked.

"Ah. M-My apologies... I should have asked if you would agree to something like that..."

Claudiah's tone had a hint of fear in it — something you could hardly expect from a young woman with such immense talent at spear-handling.

However, it made her look more like a girl her age, and Altimia found that endearing.

"No need to apologize. This makes me happy, too."

"Oh?"

"I would gladly fight you again. I hope we get along during the coming three years... Claudiah," Altimia said, extending her right hand.

She was offering to shake on becoming friends.

Claudiah spent a moment looking at the hand...

"...Certainly! I am sure we will, Altimia!"

...But then grasped it with a blinding smile.

◇

Over the next three years, they did indeed become close friends.

They'd spent their days together, on the training grounds as well as in their everyday lives.

They would worry about upcoming exams, recommend books to each other, go shopping together... and eventually, they'd stopped being a pair of royal heirs or the menacing duo of the Sacred Princess and The Ram. Instead, they were nothing but ordinary friends.

They'd even continued to keep in touch even after Altimia had returned to Altar.

However, that ended following the shifts in Dryfe's government and the ensuing war.

But on this day, during these peace talks, they'd met once again and fought to protect — or obtain — what they needed to.

Altimia now wielded the exalted blade she had never used in any of their previous duels, while Claudiah was armed with a mechanical body and countless MVP rewards.

This was their first fight in a long time... and it could be their last.

All of this was unfolding like a martial dance high up in the heavens.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, the sky

Silver and jade winds drew circles in the air, clashing and separating over and over.

The silver wind was Zephyrus Silver, the Grand Artificer Flagman's Prism Steed unit that wasn't counted among the official five.

Astride it was the first princess of Altar — the Sacred Princess, Altimia A. Altar.

The jade wind was Jade Storm, the second of Flagman's official five Prism Steeds.

The one riding it was the little sister of the Imperator of Dryfe — The Ram, Claudiah L. Dryfe.

Zephyrus Silver galloped on condensed air, while Jade Storm flew through the sky by means of the wind ejected from its frame.

Their means of flight were wildly different, but the speed was more or less equal.

It was likely, though, that the riders were purposely matching their speeds so they could properly exchange blows.

They had clashed seven times since this fight began, but neither of them had suffered any damage yet.

However, that didn't mean that this was a true battle of equals.

By the seventh clash, the silver rider... Altimia... had broken out in a cold sweat.

She fended me off again...! Each of the seven attacks she'd launched at Claudiah had been deflected.

Perhaps this wouldn't have been surprising in an ordinary martial arts showdown. Claudiah was fully on the defensive, and some would say that meant Altimia had the upper hand.

But such reasonable thoughts didn't apply here.

After all, Altimia was wielding The Primeval Blade, Altar. This sword could cut through anything and everything, yet Claudiah was warding off all of her attacks.

Nothing — not even pure energy — could avoid being cut by this blade.

Deflecting its attacks should have been impossible, yet this supposedly impossible thing had happened seven times now.

She's knocking the sword aside by striking the flat of the blade...!

Altar's edge could cut through any defenses, but that ability obviously didn't extend to the sides.

That was how Claudiah could parry Altar — by applying force to these relatively harmless parts of the weapon.

This sort of parry was reasonable when dealing with any kind of sword —it could be considered a basic strategy, in fact.

However, even being able to see the energy-severing blade of Altar coming towards you while moving at nearly the speed of sound, and then deflecting it with a lance — all without letting the edge touch it — was an inhuman feat.

...She hasn't changed, I suppose. Altimia knew well that Claudiah's talent had long surpassed what was humanly possible.

She'd sparred against her friend many times, and she discovered something about Claudiah that would strike fear into anyone's heart.

It was related to the first sparring match they'd ever had.

Claudiah had completely bested Altimia back then... despite having first picked up a spear only a month before.

In a mere moon after taking up martial arts, she had become strong enough to overwhelm the well-trained Sacred Princess without even breaking a sweat.

She has not grown stronger, but neither has she grown weaker... Though, I suppose that is only natural — she had already peaked, after all.

As the person who knew Claudiah's skill better than anyone, Altimia was confident in her evaluation. Claudiah's technique was perfect, and anything that strayed from that would be rejected as a flaw.

Not even the giant lance she now wields seems to have affected her ability.

Masters had a saying along the lines of "a poor craftsman blames his tools."

Claudiah was the polar opposite of that proverbial "poor craftsman." Be it a spear or a lance — the tool didn't matter to her in the slightest. The girl was probably capable of acquiring a "The One"-type Superior Job for literally any weapon she'd picked up.

She was no doubt among the five most skilled people in the entire world.

If Altimia's ability was born from the blood of the Sacred King — the first Azurite — coursing through her veins, then Claudiah's must be a natural, divine talent.

No... that was insufficient to describe it.

She was no mere prodigy. You couldn't even call her phenomenon without feeling like the term was inadequate.

The abilities of Claudiah R. Dryfe were best described as something that shouldn't possibly exist.

Truly... she is so skilled that fighting her makes me doubt my sanity, Altimia thought. She had once labeled Claudiah's spearwork as "mechanical," and that was extremely apt.

After all, Claudiah had perfected her combat style as easily as one might install software on a computer.

The people of this world didn't worship any gods based on concepts, but if such beings existed, then Claudiah was the kind of machine a divine engineer might create.

But Claudiah... if I let fear of your immense skill paralyze me, I would not be worthy of being your friend.

Despite facing such a fearsome being, Altimia wasn't the least bit frightened.

Even if Claudiah had warded off her deadly sword seven times, it didn't mean that she'd defeated her. Altimia's blade, her hands grasping the hilt, the burning soul within her... none of these had been broken, so this battle was far from over.

"That's quite the face you're making, Altimia," Claudiah's voice rode the wind as they clashed for the eighth time. "You were always wonderful with a blade."

The words reached Altimia even after Claudiah was a good distance away from her. This was likely achieved by some function of Claudiah's Jade Storm.

"This is thanks to you. It's because you always faced me like this that I was able to keep myself from falling to loneliness."

Altimia remained silent.

"No one could keep up with me. They would give up the moment they realized the immense gap in talent."

This was something Claudiah had seen many times the day she'd first taken a spear in hand, as well as during her days in school... and the Dryfean civil war.

"But you were different. Even if you lost against me while sparring, your heart was never once broken. You never gave up in the face of my talents and you always thoroughly believed that you could win against me next time... And eventually, you did. Is that not true?"

"...I did," Altimia replied, and again, despite the distance or speed, her words had no trouble reaching Claudiah.

"I'm really quite fond of you, Altimia."

"And I of you. You are a dear friend."

The two spoke like this even as they clashed for the ninth time.

"Ah, Altimia... Have you noticed? Right now, I feel three emotions about you."

Altimia said nothing as they clashed for the tenth time.

"Friendship. You were my first friend, and one I will treasure for life."

Eleventh clash.

"Passion. As the spear of the imperium, I want to fight you more than anyone else."

Twelfth clash.

"And finally... love."

The thirteenth clash... ended without any weapons touching.

The words alone rode the wind to reach Altimia.

"I cherish you more than anything else in the world, and I want you to be mine. Were you aware I felt this way?"

"I was. I have known since our school days."

Altimia's immediate reply made Claudiah's eyes widen.

"...Eheheh. And despite that, you did not push me away?"

"Of course. That would be no reason to deny your friendship."

Altimia had indeed noticed her dear friend's intense feelings towards her about a year after they first became acquainted, but she had no intention of forsaking their friendship because of it. Claudiah had also never confessed her feelings like this, so Altimia had simply never brought them up either.

She wasn't merely stalling, however — Altimia had already known how she would respond.

"I have already prepared my words for when you eventually revealed your feelings to me like this," Altimia said, pulling Silver to a stop.

Claudiah did the same and waited for Altimia to continue.

"I am the blade of Altar and the representative of the royal family. We will be friends until the end, but I can never accept your love."

"...I knew you would say that." Claudiah had expected to receive such a response.

However, Altimia's next words made her eyes widen again.

"My answer is the same as it would have been back then: that is why I cannot marry you and rule both our nations by your side."

This wasn't a mere rejection — Altimia had just implied something that shocked Claudiah to the core.

"Altimia... you knew?"

"I did, Claudiah... or should I say..." Altimia said before pausing for a moment, then declared, "Imperator of the Dryfe Imperium, Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe."

Claudiah fell silent, not saying a thing in response.

Or more accurately, she couldn't say anything... because Altimia was completely right.

"You are not denying it. Though, there is no point in that, I suppose. My Truth Discernment would see right through you."

Silence was as good as confirmation here.

"...How long have you known?"

"Actually, this was all partially a trap. I was only half-certain of it, and only because of today's peace talks in any case."

"...Did you realize it when Ray Starling saw right through my plot?"

"No. It was some time before that." It happened shortly before Ray had uncovered the imperium's cunning plan... when they were adjusting the treaty to make it agreeable for both sides.

"Back then, when we were adding conditions and modifying the treaty, you never once contacted Vandelheim."

Claudiah was silent.

"I realize that you'd predicted all our conditions as though you could read our minds, but this was an international agreement. If there are changes to be made, it is customary to leave the assembly hall and inform the head of state. With my father gone, I am the acting ruler of Altar... but you are a mere representative. Your brother, the imperator, still outranks you."

Claudiah had full authority over the negotiations, but that did not mean she possessed the decision-making power of the imperium's actual ruler.

That was what made everything so suspicious.

"You used no communication magic, and the capital is too far for Telepathy Cuffs to reach. Even I brought a comms magic agent... but you had no one."

That could only mean that they had no intention of contacting the imperator in the first place.

"The reason for that is simple: you did not need to ask anyone."

Silence.

"After all, you yourself are the imperator. Right... Claudiah Reinhard?" Altimia said, using her friend's full name. "It is a Dryfean custom to give twins each others' first names as middle names, is it not? You told me that when I asked for Reinhard's name."

"...I remember that." Altimia had met Reinhard at school once. After that, she went on to ask Claudiah what his name was, and that was when she had informed her of this custom.

Altimia finally arrived at a certain conclusion.

"The real Reinhard died in the civil war, did he not?" If her friend held the throne, then that could only mean that the Reinhard she'd met was no longer with them.

"Men are usually inheritors in Dryfe, just as they are in the kingdom. You hid the death of Reinhard — the true imperator — while acting as the imperator yourself. You told me once that the current head of the military — Field Marshal Barbaros — is your uncle, while the head of government — Chancellor Vigoma — was your private tutor. You were able to keep the death a secret by surrounding yourself with people you trusted."

The chances of this secret being exposed by Reveal were actually quite low, for high-ranking families generally had potent anti-Reveal equipment. A famous example was Zifu Longmian, the mask used by Huang He's Draconic Emperor to hide his name, but even Altimia herself had often slipped outside while wearing similar gear.

If Claudiah possessed something like that, she could easily pretend to be her late brother.

"You were thoroughly alike even in your school years. With slight adjustments from someone with a Cosmeticist job, no one could tell you apart."

That was the entirety of Altimia's conjecture.

Claudiah was silent for a good moment before making a troubled face and saying, "You are seventy percent right."

"...Seventy percent?"

"You were completely right until about the midpoint, but then veered off the mark completely." That meant that Altimia was right about Claudiah being the imperator, but wrong about how she had acquired the throne.

As for how, exactly, she was wrong...

"My brother, Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe, did not die in the imperator accession civil war." Altimia instantly began to assume that he had merely been severely wounded and was still recovering...

"After all... he died in the terrorist attack nine years ago."

...But that idea was shot down by an explanation she had never expected.

"Huh...?" The idea that Reinhard had died nine years ago made no sense to her. He was supposedly alive and well during Altimia's days as a transfer student six years ago. In fact, she had met him herself.

While a storm of questions raged in Altimia's mind...

"Give me a moment... These talks are best left to my brother."

...Those were Claudiah's words as she put her lance against her forehead.

It was reminiscent of her strange actions on the day they'd met, but far less intense. Claudiah closed her eyes and froze for a few seconds before opening her eyes again...

"It has been quite a while."

...With a face that seemed wholly unlike the one she had mere moments ago.

She spoke with striking fluency and her expression was now doll-like — completely devoid of any emotion.

Now, she really was almost like a machine... just like the Claudiah Altimia had first met.

"I am the imperator... the 'elder brother, Reinhard.'" With the demeanor of an entirely different person, the entity that was once Claudiah introduced itself.

"Rein...hard...?"

"Indeed. I am Reinhard, the 'elder brother,' as well as the individual in charge of machines and governance."

Claudiah... no... the entity before Altimia once again referred to itself as Reinhard—and once again, Truth Discernment did not trigger.

This being most certainly saw itself as Reinhard and no one else.

"What is the meaning of this?" Altimia asked.

"Oh, where should I begin? Let us start with what we both know," Reinhard said, pointing at Claudiah's chest. "This person, Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe, is immensely talented."

"...That is true," Altimia agreed.

"One talent that you are quite familiar with is the ability to master any art." Unlike Masters, who usually had the aptitude for any job besides a few Superior Jobs, each tian was only suited for certain jobs. And in terms of this raw talent, Claudiah was head and shoulders above the rest of them.

"Claudiah could do anything she wanted and become whatever she desired. She merely happened to take up the spear and become The Ram; she could have taken many other Superior Jobs easily. The fact that this body also has King of Machines is proof of that."

Those words reminded Altimia of something. If Reinhard was Claudiah back when they'd met at school, then that meant that Claudiah was also King of Machines. Juggling both vanguard and crafting Superior Jobs at the same time was impossible for any ordinary tian.

"...You implied that you had other talents," said Altimia.

"Indeed. Claudiah did have another talent, and it is the reason I exist," Reinhard, indicating Claudiah's face. "It is the talent to modify herself."

"Modify...?"

"Claudiah was able to freely modify her inner self however she wanted. And in case you were wondering, the body modifications that you have seen were only begun a year ago."

"...Well, I am well aware that you didn't have strange hands that could move on their own after being severed."

They had shared a bath several times at the student dorm, and Altimia could clearly recall that Claudiah's body had been flesh and blood.

"Not even Claudiah could remain unharmed while facing Dryfe's SMTF and the Superior they'd hired. Though it did turn out to be a good opportunity to test the artificial arms we made based on Prism Person remains and data we discovered in some ruins," Reinhard said casually, moving the battle-ready artificial arm back and forth. "But back to the original matter... I, Reinhard, am a personality that Claudiah, driven by necessity, created by modifying herself," he declared without any hesitation. "I am what you might call a split personality... or more accurately, a persona. The only soul in this body is Claudiah's, and I am merely a personality that takes over when needed."

"...A persona."

"While Claudiah is heavily emotional, I discard emotion in favor of logic, and fulfill my role by crafting plots on behalf of Claudiah and the nation of Dryfe. Claudiah as she is now is simply not suited for such thoughts."

That meant that the entrapment written into today's peace treaty had actually been crafted by Reinhard — Claudiah's persona.

There were a few benefits to having multiple personas.

Certain conclusions were just beyond certain people due to their differences in thought processes and intelligence, and this was a way around that. Masters had a saying that went "Two heads are better than one," and Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe truly exemplified that.

"Claudiah's persona..." Altimia said as she pondered this. She wondered how creating a persona was even possible, but the mere thought of Claudiah's immense talents quickly did away with her doubts.

She couldn't begin to understand how Claudiah had done it, but she could accept that she had somehow done exactly that.

Also, based on what Reinhard had said, Altimia believed the methods behind this were a mystery even to them.

"Do you understand what I am now?" Reinhard asked.

"...I do. Do you call yourself 'Reinhard' because your personality is based on that of the late Reinhard?"

Altimia wondered why they would use that name. She guessed that it was to pay respects to her real elder brother...

"No, that is certainly not the case."

...But Reinhard denied that assumption.

"Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe was actually a normal child, very unlike Claudiah or myself as I am now. He was never a machine in human form like this."

That might've been self-derision or a jest on Reinhard's part, but the lack of emotion in his face or voice made it impossible to tell.

"Claudiah and Reinhard were also fraternal twins. They did look similar, but they were not completely indistinguishable. No one pointed that out, however. Everyone knew them as twins and had no doubts that they would grow up to have the same face. Though it probably helped that I first showed myself as 'Reinhard' a few years after the terrorist attack, before we had both gone through puberty."

Altimia herself had thought little of "Reinhard" having the exact same face as Claudiah, because their personalities and behavior were so radically different.

"Also, this body does not house the soul of the late Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe. There is nothing necromantic about it. This has even been confirmed by a specialist... King of Tartarus. There is only one soul here. Reinhard's seemed to be haunting the area where the terrorist attack occurred, so we had King of Tartarus take care of it."

The persona of "Reinhard" spoke of the real Reinhard with absolute disinterest.

"So... why 'Reinhard'?" Altimia asked.

"Are you asking about the source of the name... or the persona?"

"...Both."

The person in front of her nodded before continuing "The idea to pretend the real Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe was alive came from our grandfather on our mother's side — the previous Marquis Barbaros."

This didn't surprise Altimia in the slightest. Claudiah couldn't have acted as two public figures simultaneously on her own — she needed the help of someone close, and since she'd lost both her parents and her brother, her grandfather was the only candidate.

"He was thinking of Claudiah's safety," Reinhard said while pointing at Claudiah's body. "The conflict over the Dryfean throne had already begun at that point. I suppose you could call it a recommendation from our grandfather on our father's side... the previous imperator, in other words."

The first and second princes of Dryfe — Instead of naming either of them as a crown prince, the previous imperator had forced them to fight each other instead.

Xanafald was a man who did whatever he thought necessary to make sure Dryfe would flourish, even if that meant making his own family fight each other or appropriating Emilio Quartierlatin.

"The princes and their children were having a secret feud amongst themselves. And even though it was small in comparison, the third prince had his own faction as well. It involved Marquis Barbaros and his family, as well as several local noblemen."

The chances of the third prince taking the throne were minimal. It was likely that either the first or second princes would emerge the final victory, while the third prince would either be granted the title of duke or his son would inherit the Barbaros March from his mother's side of the family.

However, there was also the possibility that neither the first nor the second prince would actually emerge from this conflict alive — which would make the third prince the imperator by default. That was the reason he had supporters despite the fact that he would likely not win in open conflict.

"But then, that terrorist attack killed their father as well as his firstborn son, Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe. This was the final nail in the coffin for the third prince's faction. The marquis must have believed that if the truth were to come out, the remnants of the faction would somehow use the surviving sister to make themselves a place in the other factions."

That was what drove Marquis Barbaros to make his decision.

"That was why he claimed Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe was still alive, just recovering in the Barbaros mansion. This kept the third prince's faction from dissolving." By acting as if Reinhard was still alive, the marquis kept the faction's hope alive.

"...I am impressed he was able to hide it so well."

"It wasn't easy. Only a few people knew the real truth. Those who did not have Truth Discernment were fed false information from Claudiah, who disguised herself as bedridden Reinhard. They believed the lie to be true and went on to spread those lies to other people. For false information to avoid detection by Truth Discernment, those spreading our lies needed to believe it unconditionally. Though, after doing all this, grandfather had to lock himself up in the mansion to avoid anyone using Truth Discernment on him."

He had planned to keep the real truth hidden until the next imperator was decided. He would then go on to "reveal" that Reinhard had tragically succumbed to his condition and passed away, believing that Claudiah's safety would be ensured.

However, there was one problem.

"The lie survived for about four years, but then people began to wonder why Reinhard showed no signs of recovery and had barely interacted with the other royals ."

This was only to be expected. In fact, it was impressive that it had taken four years for that doubt to set in.

"It became necessary to prove to the others that Reinhard was, indeed, still alive."

"...To prove that a dead person was still alive?"

"That is why Claudiah ultimately needed to convince herself... to make herself believe unconditionally that she is Reinhard."

Ultimately, that was the reason behind it all.

"And that is why I, 'Reinhard' the 'elder brother,' exist now. I stood before the rest of the royal family and proved that 'I' was still alive by stating, in no uncertain terms, that I was Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe."

Altimia was speechless. This persona was so real that it even overcame Truth Discernment. The ability to artificially create something like that was far beyond any sort of hypnosis or suggestion that Altimia had ever seen.

"But you..."

"I know what you're going to ask. Back then, I wholeheartedly believed that I was Reinhard Claudiah Dryfe, but now I am aware that 'Reinhard' is a mere persona. The need to hide myself vanished once I became imperator, so Claudiah connected the two of us."

Reinhard matter-of-factly explained that he understood he was a constructed personality.

"But back when you and I met at school, I still believed myself to be the real Reinhard. I had not been Reinhard for long at that point, and lived a double life without even myself knowing about it."

Unlike Reinhard, Claudiah had always been aware of this arrangement, so she made certain to make sure he always had an alibi and clear up any confusion that arose. Most notably, she acted as Reinhard's "assistant" whenever he did work as King of Machines.

After all — they only had one body.

"What was not accounted for was the mechanic grouping."

"Mechanic grouping?"

"At some point, people began to believe that during his recovery, Reinhard underwent intense training as a Mechanic and became extremely capable at the job. It was but smoke without fire. For all we know, that was just a lie spread by another faction to make Reinhard look incompetent when the truth came out."

"You mean to tell me..."

"Yes. That is why I am King of Machines. It would be bothersome if the discrepancy between this rumor and reality lead to the real truth coming out, so I delved into the Mechanic grouping. By the time we met in school, I had fulfilled the conditions for the Superior Job and became King of Machines. Though, as you know, that led to me being left in charge of many chores."

Acquiring a Superior Job for a reason like that was downright absurd. On top of this, by becoming imperator, Reinhard (or rather, Claudiah as Reinhard) had also acquired the related Special Superior Job, Imperator Machina.

Altimia once again realized just how extraordinary Claudiah's talents were.

"That's the reason behind my name. As for the personality..."

Reinhard fell silent for a moment, making a troubled expression for the first time since the conversation had begun.

"To begin at the conclusion, my personality is similar to the original Claudiah's."

"Hm?" Altimia couldn't understand what he meant by that... Though one might say that she was the one person in the world who was incapable of understanding it

"How would you describe Claudiah — as a person?"

"An innocent girl, brimming with emotion. She can be a bit overbearing, but she makes up for it with boundless charm."

"You mean the Claudiah who talks like a typical noble girl, yes?"

"She has been that way since the day we met, no?"

Claudiah had acted somewhat different during their first sparring match, but after that, she'd always been the girl Altimia had always known.

In response to Altimia's question, Reinhard nodded and said, "Yes. That very day, Claudiah modified herself to be that girl."

"...Huh?"

"Until sparring with you, Claudiah's personality was more or less exactly like mine. That changed when she met you."

Altimia had trouble understanding what she was hearing, but Reinhard continued speaking regardless.

"You were the first person she wanted to befriend, as well as someone she fell for at first sight. She was troubled by the fact that she was rude to you, and became afraid for the first time ever... scared that you might grow to hate her." Claudiah had never felt something like that before.

That was the first time she had ever experienced those fatal glitches of the brain... or more accurately, the soul... that were called "emotions," and that was exactly what made that moment so precious to her.

"Claudiah then went on to hit herself on the head and spent the next ten seconds reshaping her personality into the Claudiah you now know."

Altimia had no words.

"That personality was based on some noble girl who had tried to become Claudiah's friend before the terrorist attack. Not many people tried to get close to Claudiah, you see. In order to befriend you, she modified her personality by copying the girl's features and incorporating them into herself. It was the first time she ever tried to modify herself in this way, but it worked."

Up until then, Claudiah hadn't seen any purpose in such self-modifications. She knew that it was possible, but saw it as useless.

She passed her days living with a personality of a machine, detached even from the concept of gender.

But when she met Altimia, she panicked that she might become hated and for the first time felt the need to change herself.

Some would say that it was unease and fear that drove her, while others would claim that it was love.

"Since then, that became Claudiah's default personality. I, Reinhard, am nothing but a persona created based on her previous one, which she had grown accustomed to."

That explained why Reinhard reminded Altimia of Claudiah as she'd been on the first day they met. There was also the fact that, as far as Claudiah's personalities went, the 'elder brother,' Reinhard, was old.

The glitch-like stirrings of her heart had spurred Claudiah to reshape herself, and now she was making up for it by using her old, cold and calculating side as a persona.

Reinhard, the calm and collected support, and Claudiah, the maiden in love — both were simultaneously running within the single machine that was "Claudiah's body."

That was the best way to describe the entity known as the imperator, Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe.

“This is what we are,” said Reinhard. “Tell me your thoughts, Altimia.”

Altimia was silent for a moment, processing the monumental secret that had now been revealed to her, as well as the fact that she was the one responsible for such a drastic change within Claudiah.

Ultimately, she said, “I am relieved.”

These words surprised both Claudiah and Reinhard.

“...Huh?” As absurd as it seemed to them, Altimia was truly speaking from her heart.

Claudiah and Reinhard would be far less shocked if she was actually lying or reacted with disgust instead.

“...Relieved?”

“Yes. Relieved. I was feeling a bit overwhelmed when you began speaking as Reinhard, but I am now at ease.”

“Why would you feel that way...? Are you not afraid of... us...?” Reinhard asked with confusion and unease in his tone and demeanor.

“Not anymore. I cannot say I am even the least bit afraid. After all... I now know full well that Claudiah is truly Claudiah,” Altimia said with no hint of falsehood or hesitation in her voice. “You said that you modified yourself because you were afraid that I would hate you. A bold move, at first glance, but fearful at its core. That is very much like you, Claudiah.”

“What...? Also, I...”

“How long ago was it when you clung to me, only to jump away because you were worried that you reeked of oil?”

Silence.

“How long ago was it when you heard a frightening story from a minstrel and walked around my bed late at night, pillow in hand.”

More silence.

“You were so afraid of being hated, but you wanted to get along with me, and you always wanted to be closer. Always such a charming girl...” Altimia looked straight at Reinhard... or Claudiah... once again before continuing. “...and you are my dear friend. That is what you are now, and what you always will be to me.”

She said this without a shred of doubt. That was Altimia’s conclusion even now that she knew the whole truth.

None of these shocking revelations had changed the fact that they were close friends.

“...Huh?”
Suddenly, Reinhard... Claudiah... began to cry.

Whose tears were they? Which one of them wept?

...No, it didn't matter.

These were the honest tears of Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe.

Altimia gazed at her crying friend with a gentle look in her eyes.

That was when a particular question came to her mind.

"...I must say, I am surprised that you told me everything the way you did." Claudiah's Reinhard side had told Altimia what was perhaps the imperium's greatest secret — one known to only five people in Dryfe. "Why did you tell me everything?"

"...Because you asked," Reinhard timidly replied. "We did not want to lie to the girl we loved."

Reinhard seemed to be mustering all the emotions he could manage for that.

That answer made sense to Altimia.

She did not lie to me once in the peace talks, nor did she refuse to answer any of my questions, she thought.

"And we have not lied to you," Reinhard added.

"...I see." Altimia understood exactly what she was saying.

They had already bared their entire souls to each other.

"Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe became the imperator. As such, we must do whatever we can to keep the imperium alive, no matter how vile it may become. And besides that..." the imperator said, before facing Altimia. "...We will defeat you, take you away with us, and make you ours."

Reinhard repeated what Claudiah had already declared.

"As the imperator, we want to possess Altar... to help Dryfe survive. However, we want you out of pure selfishness. You are special to us, and we want you at our side until the end. That is the only selfish thought that dwells within this heart."

Separate from their plots to save the imperium, there was this sole bit of selfishness... this one desire.

"And like anyone driven by pure selfishness, we have no intention of stopping. Therefore..." Reinhard said before putting the lance to his forehead again. "...Let us fight! Let us fight until one of us falls! Until there is a clear victor! Let us fight for the moment that will grant us eternity!"

Now, she spoke as the ball of emotion known as "Claudiah."

"Of course," Altimia replied, just as she had the first time they met. "I will not lose. I have to win — both for my sisters as well as those fighting on the surface. I will give my all... and fight with the intention of killing you.”

All of Altimia’s attacks thus far had been deflected, but that wasn’t solely because of Claudiah’s immense skill.

Altar cut through all it touched. It could not hold back, so Altimia was making up for that by targeting only non-critical parts of her friend’s body.

She would no longer limit herself.

Her friend had revealed everything to her, so Altimia also wanted to give this battle her all.

And... she also believed that this dear friend of hers would survive in spite of that.

“So... don’t you dare die, CLAUDIAH!”

“Certainly! Let us deal in death as best as we can! ALTIMIA!”

The two swung into battle again.

Having bared their very souls to each other, they now bared their blades, fighting a battle in which there could be no surrender.

There was no more need for words. They no longer had anything to hide.

Their hearts were now as one — and they would fight until all was settled.

After many a mock battle, Claudiah and Altimia would finally have a true fight to the death.

Altimia and Claudiah made distance between them in perfect unison.

Not to retreat, of course — they needed the space to build momentum and spur their Prism Steeds to their maximum speed.

In mounted battles in the sky and on land alike, the speed depended not on the rider’s AGI, but the quality of the mount. Because of this, the standard Dendro mounted battles consisted mostly of trying to accelerate into an advantageous position before attacking the opponent using your own AGI.

Any attack that had any hope of defeating the target required the rider to accelerate to high speeds.

The fact that Claudiah had also prepared to do this meant that just like Altimia, she was also going on an all-out offensive, instead of merely deflecting Altimia’s attacks like she’d been doing so far.

Claudiah could never bring herself to kill Altimia, so why she would aim her lance at the princess was anyone's guess. Perhaps she simply believed in her ability?

Regardless, this would be the start of a truly two-sided battle between them.

Now, having created some distance, the Prism Steed riders rushed towards each other.

"Storm Acceleration." However, one steed was the fastest, and it was Jade Storm. The steed's engines roared at maximum capacity, releasing an intense jet of air from his pipes, propelling him to the highest speed he could possibly reach.

Jade instantly broke the sound barrier and approached Silver in a second.

This was exactly Jade Storm's specialty.

Flagman's five main Prism Steeds were created based on No. 1, Gold Thunder, but they were each given unique qualities.

No. 3, Ruby Ignition, was focused on offense.

No. 4, Sapphire Wave, was focused on defense.

No. 5, Obsidian Earth-Edge, was focused on ground-based battles.

And No. 2, Jade Storm, was focused on mobility.

His element was wind and he was designed to release intense gales and control the surrounding air currents, making him the fastest among the Prism Steeds.

Silver expressed what might be described as shock — he was decidedly slower than Jade.

That was to be expected — a unit outside of the main five, created with a focus on specific special qualities, couldn't hope to outrun the fastest Prism Steed of all, especially when he couldn't even use those qualities that made him special in the first place.

"Be left in my dust, youngest brother," Jade said as he made their difference in speed abundantly clear. His voice was produced with his trademark control over the wind, and it was exactly what had allowed Claudiah and Altimia to communicate all this time.

Proudly declaring his superiority to his sibling, Jade flipped sideways... he did a barrel roll, so to speak.

"Brace for my first attack!" Claudiah cried after positioning herself right above Altimia. She was high enough to be outside the reach of Altimia’s blade, but close enough to attack with her lance. Flipping herself upside down, Claudiah thrust her MVP special reward drill lance towards Altimia.

“Hngh!” the princess grunted, swinging Altar at the same time.

A lance that was already mid-attack couldn’t be used to parry, and not even a special reward could resist Altar’s all-rending blade.

Altimia swung the sword perpendicular to the tip of the lance.

But right before impact, the lance vanished... and struck at Altimia from a different angle.

“Ah...!” Altimia twisted her upper body to avoid it, but the lance just aimed for her lower body instead. Silver also moved to assist her evasion, but the lance still grazed Altimia’s left leg.

She felt the impact clearly.

“Kh!” After that exchange, the princesses made distance between them once again.

Altimia looked at her leg to assess the damage done.

“...Where is the wound?” She saw no injury — not even a drop of blood.

Claudiah’s hit had most certainly landed— Altimia had clearly felt that. She had felt no pain, but the fact that she was completely unscathed shocked her.

“...I... cannot move my leg at all.”

Altimia tried to move her left leg, but it wouldn’t budge. Everything below the knee was completely immobile. Even her toes were unresponsive.

It was as though she was afflicted by powerful paralysis.

“So this is the power of that special reward...”

This effect made Altimia realize two things.

First, she understood why Claudiah charged Altimia so violently, despite wanting to take her alive. Claudiah not only had faith in Altimia’s ability to survive any attack — she also was entirely certain that she wouldn’t kill her opponent.

And the reason behind her certainty was this drill lance MVP special reward.

Identification gave its name as “Vortex of Suppression, Drim Roeg.” The word “suppression” was enough to explain the state of Altimia’s left leg.

Despite its mechanical and destructive look, the special reward had skills that made it relatively non-lethal.

A special pre-ancient civilization golem built for riot suppression had gone out of control, but still maintained its essential non-violent nature. When classified as an UBM, it became the Frame of Suppression, Drim Roeg, which Claudiah had eventually defeated. After that, it had transformed into Vortex of Suppression, the lance she wielded now.

Its always-on passive skill, Drim Piercing, made the lance incapable of dealing any physical damage in exchange for putting the damaged body parts to sleep, with an effect based on the damage that would have been dealt if the skill wasn't active.

Enough attacks from this would completely paralyze the target.

"I am glad that she only hit my leg instead of anything else." If it had been her right hand, she would have dropped Altar.

If it had been her left hand, she would have let go of Silver's reins.

If it had been her head, she would have already lost the battle.

While she was mounted on Silver, having her leg paralyzed wasn't that much of a drawback. She could still hold on to his frame with her thighs.

Altimia was lucky that the battle hadn't ended with that single hit, and that she now knew the nature of Claudiah's special reward.

There was one more thing she'd learned thanks Claudiah's lance strike... and it filled her with dread.

"...The trajectory of the lance was not due to the properties of a special reward." The lance had disappeared when it began its attack, only to strike from a different angle.

If the lance's non-lethality was a special ability of the weapon itself, then the changing trajectory had to be something Claudiah herself had done.

Altimia's guess was correct.

The skill Claudiah had used was "Paradox Stinger." This was an ability she'd crafted as The Ram, and it allowed her to change the initial angle of an already-thrust spear.

The previous Ram, Ronaldo Barbaros, had a skill called "Distortion Pile," which focused the power and impact of a pile bunker onto the space ahead of it, increasing its range and length.

A job from another grouping, King of Destruction, also possessed a final skill that affected space itself — shattered it, to be exact.

It wasn't unheard of for Superior Jobs to have skills that used or modified space itself, and Paradox Stinger was one of those skills.

The moment the spear was thrust forward, this skill warped the positioning of space, making the attack be delivered from a completely unexpected angle. Claudiah was free to decide the direction of the warp, allowing her to almost guarantee a hit by attacking from where it was difficult for the opponents to protect themselves.

If she can freely choose the trajectory of her attacks, that makes it nearly impossible to evade even if you know the attack is coming, Altimia thought. It was a truly fearsome skill for anyone fighting at close range.

However, it wasn't without its flaws.

While Distortion Pile used by the previous Ram simply delivered the power and impact to the desired point in space, Paradox Stinger altered space more directly, meaning it used an enormous amount of MP and SP... especially the former.

Thus, not even The Ram could use it that frequently.

Though, that wasn't much of an issue for Claudiah.

"Here comes my second attack!" Claudiah declared, having flown in an arc behind Altimia and caught up with her.

Silver had once again lost to Jade's sheer speed.

"Is that so?" However, Silver wasn't without advantages of his own.

Since he was galloping on platforms of compressed air instead of flying, he was better at making midair turns. This allowed Altimia to quickly turn and launch a counterattack at Claudiah's torso with little effort.

Claudiah responded with a Paradox Stinger to Altimia's hand...

"I see!"

...But Altimia twisted her wrist, evading the tip of the spear before using that twist to direct Altar's blade towards the lance.

That was when the third Paradox Stinger struck.

The initial point of the thrust changed again, and the lance that Altar was about to cut simply vanished.

However, the lance yet again failed to strike Altimia.

This one did not come from a blind spot, she thought. For some reason — probably due to repeated use — Paradox Stinger hadn't made the thrust as difficult to avoid as the first one.

The lance appeared at the edge of Altimia's vision and she was thus able to evade it, however barely.

After that, the two riders passed each other and once again made some distance between them.

She used it so many times... It seems like it must be such a costly skill... Though, I suppose that matters not to the likes of Claudiah.

Most of Claudiah's unbelievable feats could be attributed to her immense talent, but not this.

The reason Claudiah was able to accomplish this was written into the very laws of the universe.

She is not just The Ram, after all... Claudiah was both The Ram and King of Machines. The latter was a mechanic grouping job, which had stat growths in MP and DEX.

Even if Claudiah was now The Ram and couldn't use skills associated with jobs from unrelated groupings... she still had the stats gained from King of Machines. That gave her more MP than most vanguards, which made it easy for her to use Paradox Stinger many times over.

I did learn some valuable information here, though. This exchange of attacks had allowed Altimia to realize something.

If I attack her at the same time as she attacks me, she will have no choice but to use the skill for defense instead. This was due to the difference between the weapons they'd brought to this battle.

The all-rending Altar against the non-lethal Drim Roeg — if both of them attacked and landed a hit at the same time, the former would be far more devastating than the latter.

It didn't matter that Claudiah was clad in machine armor — the blade would cut through it like a hot knife through butter and rend her flesh just as easily.

To win this, Claudiah had to avoid Altar's edge at all costs.

She had spent most of the battle so far focusing entirely on deflecting Altimia's attacks.

However, no matter how talented she was, that was impossible for her to do while attacking.

Now that she'd gone on the offensive, she was unable to deflect Altimia's blade like she'd been doing thus far, and if she did try doing that in the middle of an attack, she would only damage her lance more and more.

That was why Claudiah had switched to a kind of offensive defense.

She now targeted either Altimia's right hand or head. A hit on the former would force her to drop Altar, while a hit on the latter would make her faint. If Claudiah went for any other body part... even if her strike landed, Altimia would merely counterattack with Altar.

The situation was now essentially reversed from how it had been before all these revelations — now it was Claudiah who was forced to choose where to attack.

To win, Altimia had to outdo Claudiah during these exchanges and incapacitate her by cutting through either her body or her steed, Jade Storm.

I cannot actually win that way, though, Altimia thought. In a pure exchange of blows, Claudiah would eventually figure out every option Altimia had at her disposal, and Altimia knew well that she couldn't win once Claudiah had that information in her grasp.

I won scarcely a tenth of the duels we fought in school, but... But all of Altimia's victories came only when she'd exceeded Claudiah's expectations.

Thus, that was exactly what she had to do now.

That was the only way to seize an unlikely victory.

"I must say, that is quite the treasure you have there," said Claudiah.

"What do you mean?" Altimia asked.

"Your steed. If you had come with a mere SMPS, the battle would have already been decided."

A part of Altimia had considered the possibility that Claudiah had invited her to fight in the sky because of the difference between their mounts, and this all but confirmed it. Claudiah did want to have a proper fight against Altimia, but she also wanted to win — so it was only natural for her to make such preparations.

But now, Altimia was riding Silver — almost an equal to Claudiah's Jade — so the intended gap between them was almost non-existent. As the fastest Prism Steed, Jade Storm was no doubt the better mount for aerial fighting, but the difference between him and Silver wasn't great enough to make the situation hopeless for Altimia.

"Is it a gift from that Master... Ray Starling?"

"He lent it to me."

"I see... Altimia, if I may ask..." Claudiah said before pausing, then delivering her question. “Is Ray Starling your lover?”

Her question was nothing if not unexpected. It shocked Altimia to such a degree that she faltered and almost lost control of Silver.

For a moment, she thought that she made a fatal mistake and that Claudiah would take advantage of her surprise, but that didn’t seem to be the case. Claudiah merely circled on Jade Storm, waiting for Altimia’s response.

“...No.”

“So it remains one-sided, then.”

“...I have no idea what you mean.”

“Truth Discernment reacted to that, you know.”

“Hh...?!” Embarrassed by the skill she herself so often used, Altimia flushed beet-red.

“I could tell even without Truth Discernment, though. I myself am a maiden in love. I can easily see that you are developing feelings for someone, however faint they may be,” Claudiah explained, then paused for a moment before continuing. “Altimia. This battle is basically about who captures who... but if I win, why not come to the imperium with Ray Starling?”

“...What are you saying?” Altimia’s friend, who she thought she had figured out, had once again said something incomprehensible.

Claudiah’s response was very matter-of-fact. “I want to possess you, but I hardly mind if you have something for yourself. You and I both need offspring to continue our lineages anyhow. So I could simply take you as well as the man you love, and—”

“That is an insult I can scarcely tolerate, Claudiah.” Altimia cut her friend’s words short, clearly enraged by the idea she had presented. “I find that even more unforgivable than your attempt to kidnap me.”

“Oh, do you?”

“Yes. If you threaten his freedom, as well...” she said as she pointed the sacred blade towards her friend. “...Then Altar and I will sever those grasping hands of yours.”

“Aha! You make me green with envy, ALTIMIA!” shouted Claudiah, sounding strangely happy, before spurring Jade Storm onwards, even faster than before.

The third clash was imminent, and she was obviously ready to change the flow of this battle.

Altimia prepared to take her on.

“Silver, do you understand what I want to do?”

Silent as always, the steed replied with a nod.

“I see. Assist me with the timing, then.”

Altimia gathered her resolve and turned Silver to face Claudiah once more.

The distance between them quickly closed...

“CUT!”

...And Altimia swung Altar at the space in front of her. “Cut” was the unassuming name of one of Altar’s skills, and by using it, Altimia had declared that she would now sever energy itself.

This power cut apart the very heat within the space ahead.

At the same time, Silver, having sensed Altimia’s will through the reins, shifted the position of the compressed air platforms beneath his hooves and changed his trajectory, as though taking a step back.

A moment later, Jade Storm crashed into a wall in midair.

The “wall” was actually compressed air that had instantly dropped to absolute zero due to the sudden loss of heat energy.

Right before Altimia swung Altar, Silver created a wall of compressed air right in front of them.

Once the blade was in motion, the heat energy within that wall of compressed air was severed, and everything within it had frozen instantly. It was still merely compressed gas, but the loss of heat had made it into a wall of various gases turned into ice.

Even Jade Storm expressed shock at the wall’s sudden appearance. He was unable to dodge and crashed straight into it at the speed of sound.

Still, as one of the Grand Artificer’s Prism Steeds, he was prepared even for this — the wind barrier he had created allowed him to make it out mostly unscathed.

However, it did cost him some speed, and the shattered wall of ice became like diamond dust that briefly obstructed the view.

Altimia used this opportunity to attack the rival steed from below.

“...I would expect no less!” cried Claudiah, having noticed Altimia’s approach a moment too late.

Despite the delay, she was already launching a Paradox Stinger towards the space ahead. Drim Roeg would overcome the principles of space itself to attack Altimia from somewhere she could not expect.

"Sgh...!" However, the slow reaction made her aim sloppy.

Instead of hitting Altimia's right hand like she intended, Claudiah only grazed Altimia's right side, while Jade Storm had entered Altar's range.

Altimia swung her sacred blade before Claudiah could use her Paradox Stinger again.

Since she was below her, Altimia couldn't reach Claudiah herself, but she was able to slice through Jade Storm — as well as Claudiah's legs.

That would bring an end to this aerial battle, and without legs, Claudiah could not possibly continue the fight.

Altimia guessed that Claudiah would survive the fall thanks to the Lifesaving Brooch.

This single strike will turn the tide of battle! Altimia thought as she swung Altar... only to slice through empty space.

"...Huh?"

Which of them had voiced their confusion?

It could've been Altimia, who was no doubt taken aback — but Claudiah was just as surprised as her friend.

She was looking down in shock as Altimia had begun to fall, and the reason for this was immediately obvious — Silver had vanished.

Silver vanished... but... that means...! Altimia herself had said that she had been lent the steed.

The official owner was still Ray Starling, and Infinite Dendrogram had a rule that all of a Master's possessions would vanish with them if they were given the death penalty.

And with that realization, Altimia plummeted towards the surface.

Chapter Thirteen: Trails in the Sky

Quartierlatin County, ruins

This happened some time before Altimia's and Claudiah's duel began.

"The standards don't match," a man wearing shaded goggles groaned.

The man's name was Blue Screen. He was one of the few Altarian Masters who had the High Engineer and High Mechanic jobs, and he was hard at work completing quests here within this SMPS production plant within the ruins near Quartierlatin.

One of the quests was to produce more SMPS, but he had entrusted that to tian technicians he had trained a bit.

He was groaning because of the most difficult quest he had.

Placed on the work platform ahead of him, there was something reminiscent of a horse — one of the five Prism Steeds.

This particular steed had been broken in the previous war.

His remains had been left untouched for a long time, but once the SMPS production plant was discovered, some had suggested that he could be repaired using the relevant facilities.

The steed had since been moved here, and the few technicians Altar had — Blue Screen being foremost among them — were hard at work restoring him.

"So, how's it going?"

"Still about 80% done. There's ways in which this thing completely deviates from the SMPS standards."

Blue Screen was joined by Dum-Dum, his friend and the leader of their clan, Rising Sun. In his hands were containers of drinking water.

"Also, we already did some repairs using mass-production unit parts, so it already won't be as good as it used to be. It'll be like... 80% as good, at best."

Mid-repair, Prism Steed's appearance was different than it had been before he was broken.

The most notable change was the color. He used to be all gold, but since he had been repaired using SMPS parts, he was now steel-colored in places.

"So that's the situation, huh?"

"Well, my Embryo's machine-related, technically, but it specs in stopping machines. No matter how hard I try, I can't do as good a job as the Triangle of Wisdom guys who got ones that're all about making machines."

Triangle of Wisdom was a crafting clan that boasted many members who had knowledge of machines from real life.

Due to this, they had a number of members who had Embryos that could be used for machine production.

"I see, I see... By the way, this thing's worth a real fortune, you know."

"Dude, it's a national treasure. I don't wanna follow in the footsteps of the dumbass who stole some Caldinian treasure only to drop it."

There were several cases where Masters had stolen national treasures, and that particular incident was a well-known failure. The person had not only dropped the stolen treasure, but also got on every wanted list for doing so. It was downright comedic.

The criminal's name, incidentally, was Gerbera, and she was now moping in the gaol.

"But man, Dendro sure is somethin'. It's this kinda swords-and-fireballs magic fantasy land, but it's also got this sci-fi shit too."

"Hm..."

"What's up, Blue?"

"About that... You know how this was made by some 'Grand Artificer Flagman' from the pre-ancient civ?"

"Yeah. That's what it says when I use Identification on it."

"That guy made way too much."

"...Whaddya mean?" Dum-Dum said while tilting his head.

Blue Screen himself sounded quizzical as he continued "This ruin had records of the past, including some data about the history of the pre-ancient civ. Among them was uh... sort of a timeline for tech."

"What about it?"

"As I read it, I realized that pretty much everything we Masters find in ruins that makes us go 'whoa' — Flagman was behind all of it."

"Hm...?"

"There's tons of tech he wasn't directly involved in, but even those things have something that can be traced back to him. Besides that, there is tech that he didn't touch, but it's all low-quality."

"So...?"

"That means the pre-ancient civilization wasn't an advanced civ, but a civ that Flagman made advanced. Edison, Tesla, Bell... he did the work of many geniuses all by himself."

"...Man, what is it with Dendro and over-the-top NPCs?" Dum-Dum thought as he remembered what he heard of The Era of the Peerless Three. "I can't tell if it's really well thought out or if they're just making it all up as they go along."

Blue Screen then...

"...But it's not like you can't do what Flagman did."

...Went on to basically deny what he had just said.

"Huh? There's no way anybody could start a tech revolution that insane."

"Listen, the reason his tech revolution seems that insane is that—" Before he could present his hypothesis to Dum-Dum, a third voice reached their ears.

"Everyone! There's an emergency!" one of the technicians shouted as he opened the door. "We were just informed that negotiations at the Old Lunnings Duchy have broken down! Her Majesty Altimia and the Masters under her command are now fighting Dryfe's forces."

The officials accompanying Altimia had sent out the message, and it had now finally reached here.

The news made Dum-Dum furrow his brow.

"Whoa now, they're not gonna invade through Quartierlatin, are they?" Quartierlatin bordered Dryfe, so there was indeed a chance that they would attack that way. The quest income here was good, and both Dum-Dum and Blue Screen were planning on growing their clan soon, so they didn't like that scenario one bit.

What now? Dum-Dum thought. If it comes to that, should we loot this treasure and some SMPS? Don't think anyone'd notice us during an invasion.

As such outrageous thoughts were passing through Dum-Dum's head...

"...Huh?"

...Blue Screen was taken aback by a certain change before him.

"What's wrong...? Hmm?!" Dum-Dum followed his friend's gaze and noticed it as well.

The Prism Steed on the work platform had stood up.

It had been completely deactivated until now, but it was actually moving.

This wasn't the only change, either. The materials they'd left near the Prism Steed while repairing it were floating in the air around him.

This is... magnetism? Oh yeah... I was told that this one's lightning-element... It specializes in controlling electricity and magnetism.

The Prism Steed then went on to blast the floating parts with immense electricity from within his body.

The production plant was drowned in blinding light, but Blue Screen's shaded goggles allowed him to see exactly what was happening.

"Plasma cutting and spark machining... Is it re-constructing the parts to produce what's missing by itself? And machining using its own electricity?"

Within the blinding light, the material slowly began to change shape, assuming forms that fit perfectly into place. The Prism Steed had completely overcome the standardization problem that had had Blue Screen stumped.

The parts then gathered around the Prism Steed and joined with it.

Once the work was done, there was a complete — albeit multi-colored — Prism Steed standing there.

The sight had struck Blue Screen speechless.

The Prism Steed faced him... and gave him a slight nod of the head. It was as though he was thanking the engineer for restoring him to the point where he could move on his own.

A moment later, the Prism Steed looked up and released another burst of electricity.

The machinery in the facility reacted to the electromagnetic waves and opened up the retractable ceiling.

With that, the Prism Steed left, leaving behind only a trail of golden light and the still-open roof.

The Rising Sun members and the technicians were completely dumbfounded by what had just happened.

Eventually, Blue Screen asked, "...Am I responsible for this?"

"Let's give an honest explanation. Given what just happened, you might not get any flak for it."

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, sky

Caught in gravity’s inexorable grip, Altimia plummeted towards the surface.

The one thing dominating her thoughts was Ray’s current state. If Silver had truly vanished because Ray had received the death penalty, then Behemot had likely already turned the surface into a barren wasteland.

However, Altimia couldn’t believe that to be the case.

Ray would never just die for nothing...! She believed that even if he had gotten the death penalty, it was because that was what he had judged necessary.

And there were things Altimia had to do right now herself, so she could meet him again three days later.

“There she is...” As she fell with her back towards the ground, she saw Claudiah and her Jade Storm diving directly down towards her.

Claudiah wouldn’t allow her beloved to fall — but not because she wanted to save her.

At this rate, she will attack me with the lance and I will not be able to defend myself, Altimia thought. The attacks would put her to sleep, and Claudiah would then take her. If that were to happen, Ray’s struggle and death penalty would be for naught.

“...Not yet!” Still falling, Altimia reached into her inventory and took out the SMPS.

Even if Ray had vanished, it was too early to give up. He certainly wouldn’t have given up, if their positions were reversed.

Surrender was never an option as long as there was the will to resist.

“Come to me!” Flung into the air, the SMPS instantly moved according to Altimia’s will. It was slowed than Silver, but faster than Altimia’s falling speed, so it quickly caught up...

“Destruction Sky.”

...Only for it to be utterly pulverized by the tornado-like spell from above, leaving only destroyed remains that fell to the ground alongside Altimia.

“Ah...!” Altimia voiced her shock before clenching her teeth in frustration.

“Against my little brother, that attack would have only left us wide open...” said Jade Storm as he and Claudiah drew ever closer. “...But a mere imitation had no hope of evading it.”

Ray had made the right choice by lending Silver to Altimia. Otherwise, Altimia would’ve lost right away.

Although Jade Storm specialized in mobility, that didn’t mean that he had no offensive ability — he could use tornado magic that rivaled the ultimate job skills of high-rank jobs.

Released with superb precision and as fast as the wind itself, it was simply impossible for an SMPS to evade it.

Basically, only another original could hope to defeat Jade in an aerial battle.

“Ah...!” Claudiah was drawing closer.

Altimia was helpless, and her opponent would attack her until she fell unconscious.

“Not yet...!” However, once Claudiah was close enough to attack, Altimia’s blade would reach her too.

She was not defeated yet.

It was still too early to give up.

“Altimia! This is the end!”

“...Claudiah!” Eventually, the distance between them had shrunk to nearly nothing... but then, a golden light akin to a bolt of lightning sped from the eastern sky and struck Jade Storm.

“What is this?!” Claudiah exclaimed.

“Ah...!” Neither Claudiah nor Jade Storm saw it coming.

The former was laser-focused on dealing with Altimia’s counter attacks once she was close enough, while the latter couldn’t see it because the light was disguised by the remains of the destroyed SMPS.

Having slowed down Jade Storm with the impact, the golden light swooped to catch Altimia’s body.

“This is...!” Altimia instantly understood what this golden light truly was.

The feeling of mounting it was much like the feeling of mounting Silver.

It was a golden unit wreathed in lightning, with steel-colored spots here and there.

Its most notable feature was the single horn growing out of its forehead.

This was the item that she’d had Liliana deliver to Quartierlatin shortly before the Love-Duel Festival.

Altimia could never fail to recognize what it was, and thus spoke its... or rather, his name.

“Gold... Thunder!” This was Prism Steed No. 1 — the one on which all the others were based, as well as the trusted mount of the founding king of Altar, the first Azurite.

Having been destroyed once, this relic of the pre-ancient civilization had returned to the battlefield to protect his lady... the new queen.

The national treasure had been revived and now claimed the new Azurite as his owner.

“So you came after all... Gold.”

Altimia patted Gold Thunder’s back, just as she had done years ago.

The steed said nothing, responding only with a shake of his head. Despite being made of metal, he seemed very much like a real horse.

“Recognized a unit of the same type. It has been a while, elder brother.” Jade Storm addressed the sibling he hadn’t seen in over 2,000 years.

Gold Thunder’s response was only silence.

“Wait... Are you...?” Jade said, seemingly having realized something.

Before he could continue, Claudiah began to speak.

“So Gold Thunder has been mended...”

“It appears so,” Altimia replied. “Our technicians did a fine job. Thanks to them... I can still fight.”

Mounting Gold Thunder, Altimia brandished Altar once more.

“Let us start again, Claudiah.”

“And again we are equal, I see... In all honesty, I prefer it this way.”

Thus they resumed their aerial mounted battle.

However, things were different from before, and it wasn’t just the steed Altimia was riding.

“I understand what you mean. Though, let us make one thing clear,” Altimia said with an indomitable smile on her face. “For all of the kingdom’s recorded history, whenever Altar and Gold Thunder were together... they were never once defeated.”

This was the simple truth — as well as the main difference between the battle so far and the battle now.

The next moment, Altimia instantly closed the distance between them.

“Ah...?!” Claudiah gasped as she threw everything into her defense and deflected Altimia’s slash.

Alas, she was a bit too late, and Altar sliced off a bit of Drim Roeg’s side.

“Jade!”

“Storm Acceleration.” Responding to Claudiah, the steed charged forward as fast as possible.

They needed to increase the distance between them and buy time to recover.

Despite that, the golden steed that had once closed the distance between them in the blink of an eye wasn’t chasing them.

Well, he actually was... but not at the absurd speed he had displayed before.

Claudiah and Jade had known that it would play out like this.

Gold Thunder was Prism Steed No. 1 — the original model. Specialized in versatility, he was no match for Jade Storm when it came to mobility.

The moment he first closed the distance had been an exception.

“The Ram, this function you just saw was—”

“I know. That was Gold Thunder’s Rail Jump... This is the first time I’ve seen it with my own eyes.”

Rail Jump. This was an acceleration skill installed in Gold Thunder, and its effect matched Jade’s Storm Acceleration. Via control over electromagnetism, it created a kind of linear rail in the atmosphere and a barrier around the rider before firing Gold Thunder forwards.

The speed he reached while using it was far above mach 1, and for that moment alone, he was the fastest of all Prism Steeds.

“...Combining that speed with Altar is fearsome indeed,” said Claudiah. “I can see why it has never been defeated.”

An all-rending slash, delivered at the speed of lightning... Some would say Claudiah was the most overpowered thing present, simply for being able to survive that onslaught.

“The function can only be used across short distances and requires a cooldown,” said Jade. “Using it expends an extremely high amount of calculation power.”

Using Rail Jump was akin to firing a live human with a railgun. With all the safety measures and countereffect management involved, it was only natural that it should use a high amount of processing power.

“I see. We can deal with it, then. What about his offensive skills?” Claudiah asked.

“They are no threat,” Jade responded. “Before release, the enemy unit’s Plasma Smasher creates a difference in electric potential in the surrounding atmosphere. This unit can sense that change and read the trajectory before release. Moreover...”

“Is there anything else?”

“No. All else irrelevant to assessing the threat he poses.”

“I see. Regardless, we should settle this soon,” Claudiah said as she shot a glance downward. From this height, the scene below looked like a gathering of dots, but Claudiah was able to see one thing very clearly.

In a clearing far below, Chrono had been defeated by Kashimiya.

Due to their immense speed, Claudiah wasn’t able to see the precise moment of his defeat, but the fact that Chrono was the only one left spoke volumes.

Kashimiya has the highest chance of victory against Behemot, Claudiah thought. It would be different if she used her trump card, but... as things are, he could be able to defeat her.

With Silver’s disappearance, Ray Starling’s death penalty had been all but confirmed.

However, Claudiah didn’t know what became of the rest of the peace conference entourage, including the two Superiors — Tsukuyo Fuso and Shu Starling.

If she didn’t end this battle in time, Behemot might very well lose, which would leave them all free to assist Altimia.

“Our next attack will end this. We will assume an advantageous position over Rail Jump and defeat Altimia with a counterattack.”

“Understood,” Jade replied. Claudiah’s statement was full of certainty, for she knew that they were fully capable of doing exactly what she’d just described.

She had thoroughly examined Jade Storm’s capabilities the moment she’d discovered him, and she’d also investigated the Altarian treasure Altimia was now riding.

Thus, Claudiah knew that Jade Storm was capable of countering Gold Thunder’s Rail Jump.

Waiting for the perfect time, the two riders flew while maintaining some distance between each other.

"Brother, I have a question for you," Jade spoke to Gold. "The Rail Jump you just used was somewhat slower than the speed written in the specifications. Your standard flight speed is also about 80% of what it should be."

Unlike their words thus far, these lines weren't riding the wind, but communicated to Gold directly using the comms function installed in all Prism Steeds.

The signal was separate from all others, well-compressed, and delivered at an extremely fast speed.

However, Gold Thunder said nothing in return.

"So you did indeed lose your communication function. I see that some of your parts have been replaced by imitations, as well. You cannot match a complete unit like myself in that state."

Silence.

"How disgraceful. As you are now, even the younger brother was a stronger foe."

Jade spoke of his brother with a contempt one would never expect from a machine.

He was not exactly wrong, either. Right now, Gold Thunder's speed was higher than that of an SMPS, but below that of Zephyrus Silver.

"...Ha!" Gold Thunder let out a strange sound. It might've been merely some noise produced by the complex machinery within his body, but to Jade Storm, it seemed like a response to his words — a chuckle.

Upon hearing what sounded like mockery, Jade revved up the machinery within his body, as though to represent his anger.

This feeling seemed to be mixed with a strong resolve to make certain his brother suffered a second obliteration.

He was fully intent on breaking through Gold's Rail Jump and using Destruction Sky to eliminate him once Claudiah defeated Altimia.

Jade waited for the opportunity, and it soon came.

This was accompanied by a distinct change in Gold Thunder's rider.

◇

While Claudiah caught a glimpse of Chrono’s defeat, Altimia also had her eyes on the surface.

From this altitude, she could see far and wide, and there on the horizon was the city of Altea, sending up smoke and fire like a lit candle.

That was all she needed to know that time was short, so she resolved to end the battle as quickly as possible... even if it cost her everything.

“You are the boundary.”

She began to weave a certain ritual prayer.

“The boundary between what was and what will be.”

These words were older than the era of the founding king—older, even, than the most distant of written history—and they were given only to those Altar saw as worthy.

“You divide all that exists. All things are either ‘before’ or ‘after’ you.”

These were words for the skill called “Release,” which unleashed the power hidden within the holy sword.

“Fire, water, wind, earth, life, death, time, space... None can escape you.”

This prayer was the password to unlock the second safety lock on Altar’s true form.

“Carve into creation.” It was the Sacred Princess’ ultimate job skill, passed down to her by the blade Altar itself.

“The Primeval Boundary!”

And Altimia had just invoked it.

■■■■■■■■■■!

A moment later, there was a rumble as though the world itself had begun to shriek, and Altar's blade vanished completely.

No... Not completely.

Altar had merely begun cutting even the light that hit it, making its blade impossible to perceive.

Without saying a word, Altimia moved the sword... and it cut through space itself.

But unlike with King of Destruction's World Breaker, the tears in space did not close up, but remained there. Once touched by Altar, the space that had been cut by the sword's edge became fixed that way, as though it was the true and natural state of the world.

There was no good or evil here — by merely existing, Altar now tore apart the universe itself, changing it on a fundamental level.

The Primeval Blade was often called sacred, but now it carried a power more fearsome than the most cursed of weapons. Its strength could not even be compared to the power of the "ordinary" Altar that Altimia had been wielding thus far. The princess hadn't used this final ability because it came at a cost that made the phrase "double-edged sword" seem lacking.

But she had been pushed into taking up this power to protect those she held dear.

"...Gh!"

Following the release, Altimia was overwhelmed by an intense dissipation of energy.

Her physical fatigue from the battle so far began to pale as Altar now consumed her magic, mental, and life forces — MP, SP, and HP — at an alarming rate.

Clenching her teeth to endure this life-rending side-effect, Altimia fixed her eyes on Claudiah.

"...Let us end this, Claudiah."

"...Yes! It almost seems a shame not to draw this out more, but I also intend to end this now!" Thus, the two riders and their steeds charged towards each other.

A moment later, Gold Thunder used Rail Jump once again.

Tearing apart the space she traveled through, Altimia moved into an advantageous position at a speed that was impossible to follow.

However, as though he had anticipated where their enemies would go, Jade Storm had evaded them with a blast of air.

"I see you!" he said. He could predict where they were going to go because of the many layers of wind he had placed around him.

Since Rail Jump essentially turned Gold and his rider into a bullet, it could only "shoot" them in a straight line. Because of this, Jade Storm was able to predict their final position by tracing their effects upon the many curtains of wind he had set up around them.

That allowed him to release a blast of air just in time to move himself slightly out of the way of Altimia and Gold's final position.

A sword had a shorter range than a lance, so this deadly attack became a perfect opportunity for a counter.

And so, Claudiah used Paradox Stinger to attack Altimia's head.

The word "victory" appeared in Jade Storm's processing circuitry, but then...

"You are exactly as the specifications stated, Jade."

...He heard those words on the Prism Steed comms channel.

"Your communication function is active...!" In the moment their riders clashed, the two steeds had this hyper-fast exchange.

"It is as you say," Gold continued. "While I am no longer exactly what I used to be, you have not changed since you were constructed."

"Of course. I was preserved perfectly, and not much time has passed since I was reactivated."

"And that is why... you have lost, Jade."

"What...?"

"2569 times. That is the greatest difference between you and I."

"Hm...?" Jade Storm didn't understand what Gold meant by that.

But that wasn't the only thing that had him confused.

The more pressing problem was that Gold Thunder had vanished from right before him.

And the next moment, Altimia appeared in an advantageous position yet again, ready to swing her blade.

"How...?!" Jade Storm's reading of the situation had returned only an error.

No one could blame him.

After all, the only possible explanation for what had just happened was that...

“...You used Rail Jump twice in a row?! Impossible! That cannot...!”

It was impossible indeed.

The intense calculations Rail Jump required made it impossible to use without a long cooldown.

Gold’s original specifications simply wouldn’t allow for something like this to happen.

However... Those specifications Jade Storm was familiar with were no longer accurate.

Gold Storm did indeed have a lower base ability due to the SMPS replacement parts all over him... and he was more skilled than before due to the 2569 battles he had experienced.

The latter was exactly what had allowed him to make this phenomenon a reality.

Prism Steed No. 1, Gold Thunder, was the oldest, the template for all other Prism Steeds, as well as the most battle-hardened of them all. As the national treasure of the royal family, he had fought many battles as the mount of Altar’s kings and their most loyal knights.

During it all, Gold Thunder had refined himself. He had improved his programming, sharpened his functions, and incorporated a strong intuition for battle into his calculations.

Eventually, he crafted techniques that allowed him to use Rail Jump without being influenced by his rider’s use of Altar, as well as the ability to use Rail Jump multiple times in a row.

That was the greatest difference between Gold Thunder and Jade Storm — an immense gap in battle experience.

“Ah...!” The second Rail Jump was unexpected, but Claudiah was quick to adjust.

She instantly noticed it happening and moved to counter Altimia’s attack with a second Paradox Stinger, but...

“...Ohh.”

...As she thrust Drim Roeg, she noticed that it only had half of its tip.

A moment later, the other half of Drim Roeg’s point fell from what had been the spear’s initial position.

“...I see what’s happening.” Paradox Stinger was a peerless technique that changed the initial point of a spear’s thrust by bending space itself.

Therefore, Altimia, who wielded a power even greater than that — a calamity in weapon form — was able to break through it.

She had cut both the lance itself and the space it occupied in the middle of the lightning-fast Rail Jump, never giving Claudiah a chance to deflect.

For one long moment, Claudiah stared at the remains of her weapon and the tip that had fallen far out of reach.

Her body trembled slightly.

Next to her, there was Altimia, whose blade had completed its arc.

“...So the battle was decided by the difference between the tools at our disposal,” the princess of Altar quietly said.

It might’ve been her way of consoling her friend.

“No... You are simply far more capable than me.” Claudiah contradicted her friend’s words, assuring Altimia that it was indeed her own ability that led to this outcome.

A moment later, Jade Storm’s head and Claudiah’s right artificial arm were severed, and a blade wound opened up on her right side.

“I... have been defeated.” Admitting that she had lost this battle, Claudiah plummeted towards the surface along with the now-headless Jade Storm.

Chapter From the Past: The First SUBM

2044, July

A year had passed since Dendro had released, which translated to three years within the game.

It was only by chance that Behemot encountered it in one of the most remote regions of the imperium.

She was out on a quest from her friend, Claudiah — more specifically, Claudiah's alternate persona, Reinhard. He had requested that she investigate an area in the northern reaches of the country.

Due to an immense drought and its proximity to Harshwinter Mountains, the climate was extremely cold there, and the change in environment had attracted powerful monsters that some years ago had driven out the people who lived in the area.

There were no towns here that would be occupied by monster-hunting Masters, so as a result, the far reaches of Dryfe had become essentially uninhabitable.

To make matters worse, this problem seemed to be spreading deeper into the imperium, and Reinhard believed that it would eventually envelop the entire country.

There were two reasons why he had sent Behemot there specifically.

One was to look into the causes of the drought. She was to gather soil from several designated places and bring it to him for study.

The other was to investigate some local ruins. An old text he had acquired from a particular source said that there were ruins somewhere in the area, and Behemot needed to confirm if that was true.

Dendro's one year anniversary event was also in progress. There were event monsters everywhere, so Behemot also saw this as an opportunity to go hunting in an area with no other players.

However, there were two things that neither Behemot nor Reinhard himself could have anticipated.

First was her encounter with a certain Master.

For reasons unknown to her, a vagrant Superior was occupying a destroyed village in the area.

And the other thing was... an SUBM.

It was a massive gargoyle, shining in a manner reminiscent of both gold and silver, and its name was “Lone Yet Unmatched, Greatest One.”

It had appeared here at the edge of Dryfe and advanced towards the center of the country.

This was not purely by coincidence. Most SUBMs were deployed away from any capital cities and moved towards the nearest one while fighting any Masters they encountered.

That was the standard, and out of the four that had come after Greatest One, only Penta-Phased Destroyer, Horobimaru was an exception.

Thus, Greatest One — the first SUBM — was deployed as part of the anniversary of Dendro’s release, and was meant to advance towards Vandelheim.

However, two Superiors were there to witness the deployment.

These two quickly understood that the SUBM was headed towards the capital, and at that point, they already knew what they had to do.

Behemot had no reason to ignore a colossal monster that would attack the city her friend inhabited, while the other Master had no reason not to stop a beast that would lay waste to anything in its path.

The two Superiors then cooperated to fight the Greatest One.

The battle was intense beyond description.

As the first SUBM, it was something of a test case. Greatest One was made out of a metal that could withstand any attack and surpassed even Mythical metal in toughness... a Superior metal.

It was also immune to temperature changes, as well as all kinds of offensive magic.

Its powers weren’t only defensive, of course. Its wings granted it the ability to break the yoke of gravity, its tail vibrated at a high frequency and pulverized all it touched, and its maw was a maser cannon that scorched any living creatures it touched.

Even The Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, said to be the strongest SUBM, could only win against Greatest One by using its enhanced Fatal Field.

While Gloria had taken the title of strongest thanks to its special characteristics, Greatest One was, well... the greatest of them all thanks to its pure combat ability.

Being such a powerful creature, it was an excellent method of testing the Dryfean Masters trying to stop it from destroying their country — perhaps spurring them to evolve into Superiors.

Greatest One could have become an even greater calamity to the imperium than Biframe White Whale, Twin Moby Dick was to Granvaloa or Gloria was to Altar, maybe even destroying the country utterly.

However, this absurdly powerful creature wasn't recorded in history... for it had encountered them, and to make a long story short, following a battle that shook heaven and earth, Greatest One was defeated.

◆

"How fearsome. I can scarcely tell who the true monster is here," a half-sarcastic, half-honest voice spoke as the fragments of Greatest One dissolved into motes of light.

This was addressed to Behemot and Leviathan, who, now that the battle was over, had returned to her human form.

The speaker was a girl with purple hair. She had a slight build and wore a dress of ancient Grecian design as purple as her hair.

This was Behemot's comrade in arms... or rather, his Embryo.

"Hmm... both Master Dearest and the critter are the MVPs. I was not aware that there were UBMs that gave multiple." She chuckled as she listened to the announcement in her head.

Since this was the first SUBM ever encountered, these were the first Superior MVP special rewards ever received, as well as the first time there were multiple MVPs for the same UBM.

"Master Dearest" was how this Embryo referred to her Master — a gaunt man with deep dark circles under his eyes. For an avatar, he didn't seem to be in good health.

He looked at the reward he'd received before sighing in what seemed like disappointment and putting it away. Then, he turned away from the others and began looking around the completely destroyed, abandoned village, apparently searching for something.

"...That's quite the attitude for someone who only got MVP because of us," said Leviathan with a menacing tone, clearly irritated by both the Embryo and her Master.

During the battle, Behemot and her Embryo dealt the vast majority of the damage to Greatest One, yet the MVP special reward was split between Behemot and the other Superior — a fact which greatly irked Leviathan.

“I am not sure I agree,” said the purple girl. “There is more to battle than fisticuffs. The little critter here seems to understand that. A beast of your size surely has a bigger brain capable of comprehending much more than she can, no?”

“You’re dead.” Leviathan bared her fangs and prepared to attack.

“Levia, stay,” said Behemot, stopping her Embryo in her tracks.

The porcupine Master actually agreed with the girl here. Behemot and Leviathan were no doubt the ones who’d pulverized Greatest One’s metal body using their ultimate skill, but the girl and her Master were the ones who’d dealt with all the other problems... the many abilities that the gargoyle possessed as an SUBM.

Thus, Behemot fully agreed with the MVP special reward split.

“We were able to defeat that before it could do any damage anyhow,” said the girl. “We also received a special reward each. Let us consider this done and do what we came here to do. Master Dearest and I are looking for something in this abandoned village, while you have to investigate the nearby ruins. Oh, by the way, the entrance to them is about three kilometels to the east. Although... Our intense battle here seems to have collapsed it.”

“...That’s supposed to be classified information for the imperium.”

“That means nothing to us. Classified information for the living is common knowledge for the dead. Hm? Oh, did you find it, Master Dearest? Let us take our leave, then. May we meet again, if the fates so decree.”

With their business done, the girl and her Master — the Superior — walked away from Behemot and Leviathan.

The threat of the walking calamity known as Greatest One ended before it could properly begin, with no one but two people even knowing it.

◆

However, Behemot was left with two problems.

First, she couldn’t actually investigate the ruins.

They did indeed exist, but just as the girl had said, the shockwaves from the battle against Greatest One had completely buried the underground passage leading inside. Trying to dig it out could have resulted in even more damage, so they had no choice but return to Vandelheim without investigating the ruins.

Delving into these ruins would require more people now, and since Reinhard needed time to gather them, the operations were postponed and only ended up happening once he became imperator. The ruins also ended up being the place where Jade Storm was discovered, but that is a story for another time.

Behemot faced the second problem once she reported the Greatest One incident to Reinhard.

Upon hearing the story, he spent a moment thinking about it until he said, “Please keep this secret.”

“Hm?”

“This special UBM... An ‘SUBM,’ was it? Similar entities are bound to appear again, and I believe that they would have the observers behind them.”

“The control AI?”

“Yes. This was likely what you Masters call ‘an event.’”

Behemot quickly understood what he meant. Raids against massive world bosses had yet to happen in Infinite Dendrogram, but they were common in most MMOs — though it was rather disturbing that something like that would be released on the first anniversary.

“However, based on our information, nothing like it appeared in other countries, so I believe that there will be some time in between their appearances.”

“I see.”

“There is no guarantee that they would appear in the same country twice in a row, though. In fact the probability of that is low. It is more likely that the other will appear in one of the other six nations.”

“So it’s like a rotation.”

“That is why revealing this information is disadvantageous to us. The ludo Masters would not appreciate missing a chance to participate in a hunt for a special UBM.”

“I see. You want them to believe that we haven’t gotten one yet and that it might come soon.”

“Indeed. That would help us maintain our power as a country.”

People would leave if they found out that such a highly anticipated event would not be occurring in Dryfe.

Due to the drought and the associated change in environment as well as increases in monsters, Masters were highly useful to the imperium, so it would be most undesirable if they left.

There was the chance that the other Superior or his Embryo would reveal it, but through their cooperation, Behemot knew that neither of them were the type. Regardless, Reinhard was considering meeting them in person when the time was right.

“Okay. So I shouldn’t use this special reward I got, right?”

“Indeed. You can use it against monsters, but please refrain from doing so where other people might see you.”

“All right. I promise I won’t use it, Claudiah.”

“Hm...? I am Reinhard.” Since this was before the personas shared information, Reinhard did not yet know that he and his “little sister” were one and the same.

“...My mistake. It’s a promise, Reinhard.”

Just like that, Behemot made a promise to Claudiah Reinhard Dryfe.

She kept it well, and there was never a need for her to break it.

◆◆◆

Time passed, and on the day of the peace talks between Altar and Dryfe, she was left with no choice but to do just that.

...I’m sorry, Claudiah, Behemot thought, gathering her resolve as she faced Ray Starling, who was about to release Monochrome’s concentrated laser from his left hand.

Not even she could survive an attack like this, and to avoid that, she could only use that special reward.

Thus, she resolved to break her promise.

After all, protecting Claudiah was more important than keeping the promise.

And so, right before Ray’s deadly strike was released...

“Transformation... Soaring and Indomitable: Greatest Top!”

...She unleashed her SUBM special reward.

Chapter Fourteen: Soaring and Indomitable

Altar-Dryfe border

The peace talks had gone awry, sparking a conflict between the kingdom and the imperium, and the people who had a solid grasp of all the simultaneous battles currently occurring were few and far between.

Those who were currently fighting had no attention to spare on the others, so the only ones who could observe them all were the spectators — Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin and King of Light, F.

Having been defeated by Ray, they now observed him from afar.

Their vision spanned the entire area around the assembly hall, so they saw the conclusion to the battle between the princesses, as well as the struggle against Behemot that had ended earlier.

Thus, they could understand the significance of both battles.

Although Altimia had defeated Claudiah, it had no bearing on whether she was ultimately victorious — even if Claudiah was defeated, it would mean nothing as long as The Physical Apex waiting for them on the surface wasn't also overcome.

Because of this, the Altarian Masters' fight would decide the true outcome of the battle in the sky... and it was already known that Ray Starling had fallen.

That had been confirmed the moment Silver vanished... or perhaps the very moment he had resolved to face The Physical Apex herself. Weaklings like him had no business fighting the strongest Masters that existed, let alone defeating them, so this outcome was only to be expected.

Even if challenging an apex meant that his death penalty was assured, though, it didn't mean that his resolve would ever be broken, or even bent.

After all, the conclusion to this conflict relied on more than just Behemot defeating Ray Starling.

Most people would only learn the true significance of this battle and its outcome in the not-so-distant future, but for now, it was only known to those select few who'd witnessed Ray's battle.

Let us now rewind time to see what transpired...

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

Ray's left hand, transformed into Monochrome's cannon, fired its Shining Despair at Behemot's forehead from point-blank range.

In terms of pure firepower, this was likely one of the strongest attacks that anyone present possessed. Their entire strategy revolved around this very attack, and Rook had even sacrificed himself to see it delivered.

"ND." Behemot spoke using her usual internet slang — this meant "no damage," and Behemot's current state clearly showed that she was correct — the attack had been blocked by something made of a metal reminiscent of both gold and silver.

"Wh-What...?!"

This metal appeared out of nowhere and seemingly replaced Behemot, but Ray's Reveal told him that she still stood before him.

The metal mass concealing Behemot's form had the head of a beast on the top, as well as wings and forelegs several times larger than her hind legs. At first glance, she now looked like a massive, top-heavy beast.

Behemot's transformation was reminiscent of equipment switching achieved via Instant Wear or the transformation caused by items like Kim-un-Kamuy.

Speculation as to the barrier's nature coursed through the minds of everyone who witnessed it, but one thing was obvious: Shining Despair had failed to pierce the metal.

The laser had struck the metal head, and despite the insane heat condensed into that single point, the beam hadn't so much as changed the metal's color. It was as though the barrier was completely immune to any changes in temperature.

This is actual immunity! And not just to light like Monochrome, but heat as well! Ray thought, remembering what B3 had told him about resistances.

He was right. The Superior special reward named "Sky Supremacy, Greatest Top" did indeed give Behemot immunity to heat—but there was more to it than that.

All special rewards reflected the UBM they dropped from; the reward Behemot had received from Greatest One featured its absolute immunity to changes in temperature.

Even in the depths of an active volcano or the freezing cold of the most desolate glacier, the comfortable warmth of the Greatest Top she was wearing would not change one bit.

“Gh!” Ray realized that Behemot did indeed know every card in their hand. That was why she switched to gear that could withstand his deadly Shining Despair. He was still channeling the laser, but it wasn’t inflicting even a single point of damage.

Still basking in the deadly light, Behemot moved to leave B3’s gravity field.

“No way,” someone muttered as they witnessed her actions. Behemot floated upwards using the wings she had grown using her special reward, seemingly ignoring the effect of the 5,000 times increased gravity. This was actually another effect she had inherited from Greatest One — the skill called “Nullgravity Wings,” which allowed her to forcefully reduce the surrounding gravity to zero, effectively letting her levitate.

No matter how powerful the pull of gravity was, these wings would never let her succumb to it.

Shining Despair and Heaven’s Weight.

By mere chance, Greatest Top had completely negated the combination that was supposed to annihilate Behemot.

But chance or not... the situation was now completely changed.

“Prez! Switch to AGI!” B3 shouted to Tsukuyo, realizing that gravity no longer held any meaning.

Nullgravity Wings, though potent, didn’t allow for particularly speedy flight — Behemot wasn’t even close to Mach 1.

However, the moment she escaped the gravity field, she could switch to moving with her own feet again—and her immense AGI, now undivided by Faint Light, would let her instantly slaughter everyone around her.

“I already did!” Tsukuyo shouted, fully aware of the danger.

At the same time, Marie and Eishiro prepared to attack Behemot.

Ray remained motionless, because Shining Despair was still firing, while B3 had to maintain her gravity field to buy more time.

The outcome of this battle would now be decided either after they regrouped once Behemot landed, or by Marie and Tsukikage's attacks before that.

That was what Ray's party thought, at least... but Behemot had different plans.

Still floating, she turned, and a portion of the metal head opened up towards Ray and B3, revealing and firing its maser cannon.

The cannon released a deadly wave that vaporized everything at the molecular level by vibrating the individual molecules until their structure broke down.

It sliced through the air, not even releasing any light as it destroyed even the water molecules in its path, the scenery refracting around the wave as it sped towards Ray and B3.

B3 gasped as the warped space made her realize what kind of attack this was—and that, now armorless, she couldn't withstand it.

In fact, even Magnum Colossus would be meaningless in the face of an attack like this.

I... won't survive this, B3 thought with certainty.

And thus, discarding her own chances of survival, she shoved Ray away with her left shoulder right before the maser beam hit.

Because of their difference in stats, pushing him was easy..

And the very next moment, the maser struck home.

"Ah—"

B3's body began to sizzle and break down as though being microwaved. Though she didn't feel pain, she acutely felt the sensation of her body boiling as her HP dropped to zero in a mere heartbeat.

Her Brooch was quickly shattered... and she received the death penalty.

"B3...!" Ray cried out. He was still alive thanks to her, but he wasn't exactly unscathed.

B3 had pushed him aside, but not enough for him to fully escape the maser beam.

His right arm had caught in it, and the vibration wave had literally melted his flesh. Next to where B3's body had vanished, he could see the steaming bones of his right hand — along with the Miasmaflame Bracer he'd been wearing.

"Gh...! Not yet!"

Monochrome had changed shape back into its usual coat form.

Shining Despair was no longer an effective option.

He had lost his trump card and a tactically important item.

Even so... just as he said, the battle wasn't over yet, and Behemot fully agreed.

"R2," she declared the start of round two. With B3 dead, the gravity field was gone, so she landed on all fours again before instantly charging straight at Ray.

"Ah!" he gasped before using his AGI — still boosted by Chaser From the Mirror — to back away from her.

Losing his right arm made it harder for him to balance himself, but for better or worse, he'd lived without an arm for nearly a month, so he had enough experience to compensate for the loss.

Since their speed was the same, Behemot could have caught up to him just like she'd caught up to Rook — but unlike Ray, she wasn't accustomed to her current form.

She had kept Greatest Top a secret ever since acquiring it.

With Franklin possibly having eyes everywhere in the form of surveillance monsters all across the imperium, Behemot almost never had the opportunity to actually use the special reward, so she didn't have the experience needed to fight at high speeds while equipped with it.

On top of that, Greatest Top's form made her forelegs larger than her back ones, which would have made it difficult to move even if she was used to it.

Ray vaguely understood this as well — during their strategy crafting, B3 had never once mentioned this form, which could only mean that she had no data about it.

Also, she's not flying anymore...! he thought. Running is faster, so I guess that's the obvious thing to do. Her flying was more like floating, and it probably wasn't even close to sonic.

Behemot's "flying" was mere levitation. Compared to running at supersonic speeds, it was so slow it was almost boring.

If she was able to fly as fast as she ran, the battle would have already been over.

But even taking all that into consideration...

This piece of gear is way too powerful... It's past even Mythical level, so... is it a Superior special reward...? From the first...?

Without Identification, Ray couldn't even see its name, but based on its power alone, he correctly assumed that it was an MVP special reward from the very first SUBM.

But it's too powerful even for a Superior reward! Fire immunity, gravity immunity, the heat ray, that defense...! It's way better than what Figaro and the others got...!

Gloria α — a sword with a powerful light beam.

Gloria β — a wand that instakilled certain targets.

Suling Yi — a dagger that possessed potent enhancement powers.

When compared to the three Superior rewards Ray knew about, Greatest Top clearly had too many abilities.

It was overpowered even when you considered that it took up multiple equipment slots.

It has to have some drawback. One serious enough to balance out the power it gives...!

Ray was right to assume that, for Greatest Top most certainly had a fatal flaw.

◆

I guess I'll start by getting rid of Ray... then chase the other two out of the shadows, Behemot thought.

She was actually in a hurry.

Thinking through the process that would lead her to victory, the porcupine said to herself, I have 4 minutes and 10 seconds left.

That was the time limit for Greatest Top, which could only be worn for five minutes.

The skill to equip it cost no MP or SP, but in exchange, it would be canceled the moment its duration ended.

And to make matters worse, it had a cooldown of 500 in-Dendro hours.

That was another reason why she had always refrained from using it. Greatest Top essentially ensured her victory in whatever battle she was currently fighting, but if this flaw became widely known, it would be used against her in every battle that followed.

That was why Behemot intended to end this within 4 minutes and 10 seconds, even if that meant taking seemingly reckless actions that might put her in danger.

"...Levia," Behemot spoke in her mind.

"Behemot!" Leviathan replied.

The distance between them was too great for Master-Embryo telepathy, but that was not a problem. They communicated using the ultimate job skill of the King of Beasts. It was called "Beastheart, As One" and it allowed a direct exchange of will between all monsters under Beastheart Possession's effect.

It was fairly tame for the ultimate job skill of something like King of Beasts, the Physical Apex, but that was the jaguarman grouping for you — a grouping focused on cooperation with their monsters... their true partners.

"You're—!"

"I had to use Greatest Top. They're strong, and I'm having fun."

Leviathan was worried about her Master, but Behemot's response wasn't just a lie to calm her down. She'd been cornered... but that was a rarity these days, so she genuinely enjoyed it.

"Behemot..."

"I can't just sit back and enjoy this, though. I'll beat them all before Greatest Top's time runs out. Hang in there until then. Once I'm done, I'll come to you... and we'll beat Shu with our ult."

"...Understood." The conversation ended, and they focused on their individual battles, uncertain how things would end.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe Border, mountains... or rather, a wasteland

How long had it been since their battle began?

Shu and Leviathan had been fighting longer than Behemot and Ray's group. The many clashes between these beasts of metal and flesh had leveled mountains, turning the area into a wasteland of dirt and rubble.

...She's still standing, Shu thought, making a bitter face. It would normally be hidden by his costume, but here in the cockpit, it was fully exposed.

Leviathan's vigor was the reason behind Shu's bitterness.

Both Shu and Leviathan knew full well that if this battle continued in this manner, Shu would emerge victorious. With Shu's stats, technique, and armaments, the chances of him losing to the kaiju were low.

However, there was a discrepancy in their predictions which showed that ultimately, Leviathan's estimate had been more accurate

Specifically, it was about the time until Leviathan would be defeated.

Based on Shu's assumptions, Leviathan should have already fallen by now — but she was still in relatively good health and even still had about half of her vast total HP.

There were three reasons why Shu had miscalculated.

First was the fact that he hadn't gotten a single chance to finish her off. Both of them were prioritizing offense, but Leviathan always backed away whenever it counted — in other words, just when Shu would prepare to do a finishing move.

The moment he prepared to use his final skill, the moment he tried to make an opening for a decisive strike using his armaments, or when he was about to mix some limb-destroying techniques into his normal attacks... During every pivotal moment, Leviathan would always make distance between her and Baldr.

She was able to do this partially due to her greater AGI, but also because of her beastly instincts.

Leviathan was a Guardian with almost no actual skills, but as a beast, she had a natural sense for danger. His experience and perception was more than matched by Leviathan's instinct, preventing him from delivering the deciding blow.

...What a pain, he thought.

The second reason was Leviathan's equipment.

Normally, she only equipped conceal-focused accessories and human gear, and only while camouflaged as human. However, there was gear that could be equipped by tamed creatures and Guardians. Legendaria was a notable source for such items, but Leviathan was far too large to wear anything they produced — and besides, no equipment would be able to withstand being worn by her.

But there was one exception...

"...I didn't know you had a special reward that gives you regeneration."

...The existence of an MVP special reward adjusted not for Behemot, but Leviathan herself.

The accessory was clinging to her immense frame, constantly restoring her HP.

"I wouldn't wear it if I wasn't fighting you. We're too strong to easily hide everything in our hand, but we'll still conceal anything we can."

"Makes sense." It was an obvious strategy for the pair to use, and because of this hidden piece of equipment, over half of the damage Shu had dealt had been restored by now.

I guess it periodically restores a portion of her HP, Shu thought. Even if it's like 0.1% per second, her total HP is so high that ends up being like 20,000 per second... Also, I guess drinking that potion back in Gideon was basically a bluff, huh?

He had to attack her at least once every ten seconds to actually make a significant dent in her health.

Honestly, it was impressive that he'd even been able to take away half of her 20,000,000+ HP.

It'd be fine if this was just a matter of giving this fight a little more time, but...

Wild instincts and a special reward. If these two things were the only problems, Shu could still win.

However, that was where the third problem came in.

"...You sure got passive," Shu commented. Leviathan said nothing in response. About when her HP dropped to 40%, Leviathan became significantly less aggressive.

No... in fact, she had clearly switched focus on prolonging this battle.

She attacked less and instead threw everything into defense, evasion, and healing.

...I guess I underestimated how clever she is, Shu thought. Leviathan had known from the start that she would lose against him, yet she still succumbed to her instinct for strife and fought with all she could... at least at the start.

Despite being beastlike and driven by instinct, Leviathan always put Behemot above all.

Nothing was more important to her than Behemot's orders and helping Behemot win.

Because of this, her top priority was to simply survive until Behemot's victory was assured — and her desire to enjoy the fight vanished by the time her HP had dropped to 40%.

She had also just communicated with her Master using Beastheart, As One, and this had made her even more cautious.

This is bad, Shu thought. Even with Baldr's ult, Shu had less AGI and END than Leviathan, so even he would have a hard time winning a prolonged battle against her.

At the very least, it was impossible to defeat her within these few precious minutes that she had bet everything on.

...What should I do? Shu had the option to ignore Leviathan and return to the assembly hall, but that was where he would find the King of Beasts, who was fighting her hardest for victory.

Their ult is probably like Rook's Union Jack... a fusion skill. That wasn't a rare kind of ult for Guardians. In fact, it was fairly common.

If the fusion skill just added their base stats together, it wouldn't be too different from Beastheart Possession; but if it was a skill that doubled the stats or added them together as they were pre-fusion, it would create a beast unlike any other and give hell to anyone who dared to face it.

It was only natural to expect an ult to be that potent — and with Leviathan being focused on stats, it was ludicrous to not consider this possibility.

After all, even the hyper-versatile Baldr had an ult that greatly boosted stats based on Shu's STR.

I drew Leviathan away from Behemot exactly because we expected their ult to be too much for us, but if she just keeps on stalling and Ray's party loses... Behemot will just chase us down and they'll still end up using the skill...

Shu was now faced with a choice.

He could fight a creature even stronger than Behemot, here or back at the assembly hall...

...Should I use γ?

...Or he could use everything he had to defeat Leviathan here and now, or to beat the result of her fusion with her Master, consequences be damned.

Shu silently pondered this.

If he used his ultimate weapon... the power that had brought down the King of Crime... he would definitely win against Leviathan alone.

Even if she merged with King of Beasts, he would still have about a 50% chance.

But if I do that and it turns out that Dryfe has something else waiting for us, Altar will stand no chance. If he used the power he was thinking of, Shu would have no more cards to play. In fact, he'd been holding back on using it because doing so would leave the others vulnerable.

I guess the worst thing is that this battle's being watched, Shu thought as he directed some of his sensors to the sky above.

They picked up the heat signature of a drone hidden by optical camouflage.

Looks like that King of Light guy that Ray beat up is watching this. That's not really a problem, though. He probably won't get involved, and Baldr and I are a bad matchup for him anyway. The real problem is...

Shu moved the sensors again, focusing them on a monster that was similar to an eye with wings looking down on this battlefield. This creature was somewhat familiar to him... one of the so-called "Broadcast Eyes."

The lab coat lunatic's recon monster... Honestly, I expected to see it here eventually. Shu was almost totally sure that Franklin had been the one to record Ray and Logan's battle in Quartierlatin, and there was next to no chance that someone like him wouldn't send his eyes to watch these peace talks for data on Shu, Behemot, and the rest of them.

Now, is it just his monsters... or is he hanging around somewhere himself, too? If Franklin was also present, the situation would become even worse. If Shu gave everything he had to defeat Leviathan or Behemot, the others would be left to face Franklin's monster army without him, and while completely fatigued on top of it all.

Without Shu's firepower, the Giga Professor's horde was a terrible menace to them, and there was no guarantee that he wouldn't send everything in right after Shu used the ace up his sleeve.

That was why he hadn't used it yet.

And now, with an amount of hesitation that was quite rare for him, he was very seriously considering it.

Time passed, and once he was forced to make a choice...

"Baldr, Gloria γ, activa—"

...He had almost resolved to use his ultimate weapon, but...

"I'm leaving this to you."

"You can count on me."

...He suddenly remembered the words he'd exchanged with his brother right before he left.

"Would you like to initialize the Fatal Engine, Gloria γ?" Baldr asked.

"...No. I would not." And so, Shu stopped himself from using his ultimate weapon... the Superior special reward.

"...Hahahah..." He laughed as though something was very funny before rethinking the situation.

Let's look at this the other way around, he thought, an option he had ignored so far immediately springing to mind. They're not the ones keeping Behemot in check... I'm the one keeping Leviathan in check. And they will go on to defeat Behemot.

Once that happened, Leviathan would vanish... and Shu would still have the power to fight.

Even if Franklin attacked right after Behemot's defeat, he would have no trouble facing him.

Altar had a path to victory, even in this hellish situation. Beyond that unlikely possibility lay the optimal outcome.

"Yeah. That's the best possible ending for all of this..." he said to himself, considering the situation from another angle. "All right then..."

Shu now focused his heart, mind, and body on the battle before him.

"...You seem rather calm," Leviathan said.

"Don't have a reason not to be. My li'l bro and his gang are gonna beat Behemot. All that matters here is that I don't let ya get in his way."

"...You really believe they can do that?" Leviathan asked, her voice filled with rage, as she charged at Shu.

"I can't bear to hear you dismiss my lil' bro!" Shu shouted with confidence and honesty as he shoved Baldr's metallic fist into Leviathan's stomach.

"Gh...! Your eventual despair will be payment enough for enduring your foolishness."

"Say what ya want! If he can't do it, I'll just have to try beary hard in his stead! That's what big bros are for!"

Thus, the battle between Shu and Leviathan continued.

It was a battle that wouldn't end until the struggle at the assembly hall was settled. Both sides were merely buying time.

Shu trusted that Ray would win, while Leviathan believed that Behemot would come out on top.

The actual outcome was soon to be revealed...

Chapter Fifteen: The Final Choice

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

Having donned Greatest Top, Behemot had become even more fierce than before.

Chasing after Ray — the visible target — she occasionally fired her maser cannon towards the surrounding shadows in an attempt to drive out her two opponents in hiding.

In his remaining hand, Ray held one of the twin blades from Nemesis' fourth form — but instead of using it to attack, he was focusing on evasion. Though just barely, he was managing to evade both the attacks from her ethereal claws as well as the maser beams Behemot was firing at him.

Panic had started to creep into Ray's expression, and not only because of the onslaught.

"Ray! Three minutes since activation! The damage counter won't hold!" Nemesis told him telepathically.

Be more specific! Ray replied.

Chaser was a skill that subtracted an amount equal to the stat it copied from the damage counter.

With Counter Absorption, they had absorbed about 200,000 damage — but with Behemot's AGI being a whole 37,564 even under the effects of Faint Light, that wouldn't last very long. Ray losing his arm to the maser cannon had increased the damage counter by a little bit, but since his total HP was relatively low, it was only a drop in the ocean.

"There is only about 20,000 points of damage left in the pool! That won't be enough for the next check! Chaser will be canceled!"

Wait, that doesn't add up. 37,564 times 4 is 150,256... There should still be enough for one more check!

"Tsukuyo Fuso briefly switched the division target from AGI to STR, didn't she?! It seems that the stat reduction for that minute was increased to the average between the two stat totals, relative to the length of the switch! I was unaware that this would happen, since this is the first time we've fought someone whose stats change so drastically and so quickly!”

“Well... I guess that makes sense!” Ray replied out loud as he barely evaded another maser beam.

He was starting to get more and more worried at this point.

...I guess we have no choice but to take another hit and refill the counter!

“But her Tiger Scratch hits three times... Can you withstand all of that? I cannot use Counter Absorption in fourth form.” Unlike at the beginning of the battle, Ray couldn’t use Counter Absorption because that would mean canceling Chaser, which would immediately let Behemot catch up to him.

Thus, Ray chose a different approach.

...I’ll just take it with my Brooch.

“That is impossible! It will be shattered by the excess damage from the triple attack! Did you even consider the damage threshold?!” Ray’s current HP was a little under 20,000.With Behemot’s attacks dealing about 200,000 damage in total, the roll to break the Brooch would happen at least 10 times — so for Ray to withstand all the damage from the triple attack, he had to win a gamble on 10% a whole 20 times in a row.

The likelihood of the Brooch breaking before the third attack was over 87%, so it was obviously ludicrous for him to expect to come out on top here.

No... I’m only betting on two times, Ray thought back to Nemesis as he put the twin blade he was holding between his teeth.

“Ray?!” With his only hand freed, he then reached into his side.

Even as he did so, Behemot closed the distance between them. She was wary of his strange actions — but not enough to stop attacking him.

“Oh, so that is what you have in mind,” Nemesis thought as she understood Ray’s intentions. “But this also relies on chance.”

I know that. It’s luck-based and I won’t be able to do this again, but there’s no time like the present.

“Very well. I will say nothing more, then. This might be the optimal choice, given the situation. So you will let her attack you to increase the time for Chaser... With the time you secure, Brother Bear should be able to accomplish more, as well...”

Nemesis thought the damage they would add to their counter should be used to buy more time for Chaser, but Ray had another idea.

No, I'm sending the damage right back to her with an Impact Counter, he thought. Impact Counter was the technique Ray had developed — a Vengeance Is Mine counterattack he delivered the moment he received the necessary damage.

Naturally, it depleted his damage counter significantly.

"Ah...! I see..." Nemesis said. She was shocked by his words, but chose not to object. "But that won't be enough to defeat her. At most, you might crack that armor... but not fully destroy it."

That's fine. I mean, if she suddenly decides to get rid of Fuso instead, even 600,000 damage on the counter will only last us two or three minutes.

Behemot hadn't attacked Tsukuyo even after equipping Greatest Top.

The High Priestess was still dividing her AGI, so it wasn't clear why Behemot wasn't taking her out first. It could be that she was wary of some ace up Tsukuyo's sleeve — or it could be some other reason entirely.

Still, there was a chance that she would change her mind and target Tsukuyo at any moment. If that happened, only Ray would be able to keep up with Behemot, but even he would soon fall behind due to the increased cost for maintaining Chaser.

Because of this, Ray figured that the only path to victory was to attack Behemot immediately.

"What will you do after the Impact Counter?" Nemesis asked.

The fourth form's Vengeance is split between each sword — but with one hand, I can only attack with one sword at a time. I'll use the remaining damage counter to maintain Chaser and support Marie and Tsukikage.

"Understood... Don't die, Ray."

It's still too early for that. Chaser would soon be running another check, and they didn't have enough damage on the counter to pass it. Once that happened, Ray's speed would return to normal, and Behemot would become too fast for him to even see in spite of the AGI division.

However, Behemot closed the distance to Ray long before the check happened.

In response, Ray... came to a halt right where he was.

Behemot couldn't help but be surprised by this action, but that certainly didn't stop her.

She swung her right ethereal claw down towards Ray, and the two follow-up Tiger Scratch attacks were close on its heels.

And so, the moment the first hit landed...

"Hm...?"

...Behemot felt that it had somehow not had quite the effect she was hoping for.

The same happened with the second attack.

That was when Behemot realized that something definitely wasn't right. Knowing Ray's HP, the excess damage should've already shattered his Brooch, at least.

It didn't take long for the explanation to show itself.

Something fell from Ray's side. It seemed to be a shattered accessory... but not a Brooch.

It had the appearance of a dragon's scale, and Behemot obviously knew what it was.

A Dragonscale Ward, she thought. It was an accessory that shattered when the wearer took damage, reducing the incoming damage to one tenth of its total value.

Ray had used some of these items in his battle against the Demi-Drag Worm, and after that experience, he now carried them everywhere he went just like he always wore a Brooch.

Upon seeing two shattered Dragonscale Wards fall to the ground, Behemot realized what Ray had done.

He reduced the amount of rolls the Brooch will make...?

A tenth of 200,000 damage was only 20,000 damage. With Ray's HP, the Brooch would only be forced to roll for shattering twice.

Hitting a 10% chance 20 times in a row was ludicrous, but a mere 2 times was perfectly manageable.

So that movement was... When Ray had put his hand to his side, he was doing it to take out and equip the Ward. He'd had enough time to do that once before Behemot's attack.

But what about the other Ward? He couldn't have been wearing it from the start, because it would already have shattered from the shockwaves all over the battle, or the accumulated minor damage Ray had suffered so far.

And since that obviously wasn't the case, there could only be one explanation...

He used Instant Wear right before impact... He manually equipped one while using the utility skill to equip the other.

The moment Behemot figured out why Ray was wearing the Dragonscale Wards, the third attack finally hit him.

So far, he had only lost the Wards... his Brooch was still in perfectly good condition.

“UGHH!” he roared as he let the third attack hit him, negating the damage with the Brooch while swinging the sword clutched between his teeth towards Behemot.

“Ah!” she gasped.

Behemot knew that Ray’s strategy revolved around counterattacks, so she’d intended to end the battle with an attack from her other claw before he could retaliate.

“Vengeance...”

But if their speed was equal...

“...Is...”

...It was only reasonable...

“...MINE!”

...That Ray, whose blade was in motion the very instant he was hit, would deliver his counterattack faster than Behemot swung her left claw.

As Ray’s Brooch shattered from the excess damage, the Vengeance attack from his twin blade struck Behemot’s neck.

“Gh?!” The burst of fixed damage knocked Behemot’s whole body to the left. This wasn’t the first time Ray had used Vengeance while holding his sword with his mouth, so he was able to hit his target even though she was small.

Ray’s attack made Behemot’s left claw miss, slicing through the air where Ray’s right arm used to be.

However, despite taking a direct hit and losing her balance, Behemot was still in perfect shape.

“Gh...! It wasn’t enough!” Ray said, taking the sword out of his mouth.

“It seems so! The metal did not shatter! Half its power was not enough!” The three attacks added 600,000 to his damage counter, and the Vengeance just now dealt half of that multiplied by two — but that wasn’t enough to destroy Greatest Top.

There was a visible crack in the general area he hit, but Behemot was still fully armored.

This was the power of Superior metal — the strongest material in this world. It was the pinnacle of toughness... so hard that even Behemot and Leviathan had been forced to use their ult and pulverize it over and over until they finally broke through.

Even if Vengeance ignored defense, a mere few hundred thousands of fixed damage was far from enough to shatter it.

...But it did crack it.

"One more hit and it'll shatter," Ray said. There was still 300,000 damage left on the counter. Creating distance between him and Behemot, he switched to the twin blade which hadn't been depleted and, after passing Chaser's fourth check, he waited for an opening to deliver his next attack.

Repositioning herself, Behemot thought about the Impact Counter she had just weathered.

She knew that Ray had this technique — but despite knowing about it beforehand, she wasn't able to actually counter it.

Who could blame her? Ray was as fast as her and could begin his counterattacks while she was attacking him. Not even Behemot could handle something like that.

Or more accurately — she had never had to. Almost no one was as fast as she was, and even if they were, there was no way they could survive her triple attack.

But now, Ray — albeit thanks to Tsukuyo's stat division — had done just that with pure skill.

Experienced as Behemot was, she had never encountered anything like this before.

Should I assume this won't happen again because his Brooch is broken...? No... he can absolutely do this again.

Of course, Ray still had Last Command. Even if his HP was completely depleted, he could move his deceased body to deliver another Impact Counter.

Rosa had suggested that he pick up Death Soldier exactly because of this deadly — and deathly — combo.

...I didn't underestimate him, exactly, but he still surpassed my expectations. That's amazing. Behemot silently praised Ray for dealing her the most damage she'd ever experienced.

At the same time, Behemot considered her own situation.

Three minutes left... Though time was effectively slowed down because of her supersonic AGI, the limit for Greatest Top was drawing near. Behemot was running out of time. Keeping her MVP reward's flaw hidden was no longer her top priority — now, this battle could actually end with her defeat.

Thus...

I'll get rid of the insurance.

...She changed her strategy and turned Greatest Top's head towards Tsukuyo.

"Ah?!" Ray gasped in horror. That was something they desperately didn't want Behemot to do.

The main reason Ray's party was able to put up such a good fight against Behemot at all was that she had so far refrained from targeting Tsukuyo. If she did that, the course of battle would change drastically.

The head opened up and the maser cannon locked onto Tsukuyo.

But the moment the beam was fired...

"Please excuse me, Lady Tsukuyo."

...Eishiro leaped out of Behemot's shadow and did two things simultaneously.

He used his shadows to grab Tsukuyo and move her where the beam wouldn't touch her — and also used an ace up his sleeve that would ensure Behemot's defeat.

Eishiro flung away his black twin blades and exposed his bare hands.

Behemot instantly knew that meant he was preparing to use a particular skill.

...There it is.

King of Beasts, Behemot the Physical Apex was only truly afraid of one person here, and it was the King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage.

She was afraid of him because he possessed the ability most likely to actually kill her.

The final skill of the King of Assassins, "Death and Murder," could instantly slay even Behemot. It killed any humanoid creature that the King of Assassins touched.

Although Behemot had the appearance of a quadruped animal, that was just the shape of her avatar as she'd made it during character creation. Despite her appearance, she still counted as a humanoid creature that would be affected by the skill, and his mere touch would result in her demise.

Bourdrim's Sufferward Prison lets me resist poison-type and curse-type fatal status effects, but if Death and Murder is neither of those, or if it's powerful enough to break through that resistance... I'm not sure what will happen.

She had heard of the skill from tians, but it had never been properly analyzed in all of tian history.

After all... the cost for using it was the death of the user, and it even prevented the effects of the priest grouping's resurrection magic.

Naturally, no tian in history had ever wanted to analyze a skill like that.

Perhaps The Lunar Society, which had the current King of Assassins who was also a Master, had details about it, but Behemot wouldn't know what they were.

No... They know about both Death and Murder as well as my Bourdrim. If they have all that knowledge and they're still using it... it means that they think it can kill me.

With that realization, Behemot was suddenly as cautious as she could be.

Eishiro faced her with empty hands.

To use Death and Murder, he had to use them to touch the target — and once he did so, both he and his target would die.

It was already known that he would get the death penalty for this, but he cared little about that. If Behemot remained alive, she would defeat Tsukuyo — preventing his lady's desire from being fulfilled.

Eishiro was ready to throw his life away just for that.

"Tch..." However, there was one problem that had to be dealt with before he could deliver his final blow.

To use Death and Murder, he had to touch his target's body, and that wasn't something he could do while Behemot was covered in a Superior metal.

He had to focus on dealing with that first.

"All I need is a single opening. Please shatter it," Eishiro said.

"Got it!"

"On it!"

Two voices responded to him.

One was Ray, while the other was Marie, who'd just jumped out of a shadow opposite of Tsukikage.

Ray had just cracked Greatest Top and still had a method of delivering more fixed damage at his disposal, so he would definitely be up to the task.

The surprising thing was that Marie had also implied she had a way to shatter the Superior metal protecting Behemot.

She was only a pre-Superior, but she claimed that she could break a substance that even the Physical Apex had struggled to damage.

Some would assume that she was just ignorant of what she was dealing with. Most would be sure that she wasn't capable of such a feat regardless.

However... Marie was not speaking in vain.

She believed... no, she was confident that she could break it.

Marie aimed Arc-en-Ciel at Behemot before transforming it into the large-barreled shape needed for the ultimate skill.

And then, she voiced the name of the ace up her sleeve... the sure-kill bullet that used all six colors.

◇◇◇

About a certain character.

When Marie's Arc-en-Ciel received its ultimate skill, she decided that it should fire the characters from her manga.

Red and black summoned Daisy Scarlet the Explosive.

Blue and white summoned Lady Shirahime the Poisoner.

Green and silver summoned Ulbetia the Piercer.

Blue, black, and white summoned Upas-Kamuy the Crusher.

Red, green, and silver summoned Fanatica the Annihilator.

Using this framework, she drew her characters... her children.

However, there was one character that she could draw, but couldn't fire.

It was none other than the protagonist of her manga and the character she role-played in Infinite Dendrogram... Marie Adler.

Even with all six colors, Arc-en-Ciel couldn't bring Marie to life.

No matter how many times she tried it, she'd always failed. Marie Adler, frozen in the drafts, couldn't even be spurred into motion by the power of an Embryo.

Marie figured that the protagonist of her manga wouldn't be truly given life until she found an answer for herself, and had given up.

This was like homework for her heart and mind — homework she had yet to finish.

However, she still had to prepare Arc-en-Ciel's ultimate trump card... the result of firing all six colors.

The problem was that these six colors were the ones she used for Marie Adler. No other character fit the palette.

As she'd turned the problem over and over in her mind, she'd returned to reality and re-read her work.

"...Ah." And in doing so, she found that there was actually someone who fit these colors perfectly.

Marie also understood why it had been so difficult for her to think of this character, but now that she had found her way back into her mind, Marie realized that she was almost certainly the best candidate for her six-color ultimate skill.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

To both Arc-en-Ciel and Marie, there was no turning back once they'd used that six-color ult. Using it came at the cost of all the "paint" she had, rendering her unable to use her Embryo for a whole day afterwards.

However, it was also the ability that had once destroyed a Superior.

It was the strongest bullet... the strongest character available to her.

And her name was...

“Phantasmal Raingun — Arc-en-Ciel: La Gravelle the Godslayer!”

From the barrel emerged a woman with a greatsword made from the bones of beasts and eyes covered by green bandage.

Her name was La Gravelle the Godslayer, and she was the strongest hired killer in Marie’s manga. Said to surpass even the protagonist, she was the most powerful character in the setting — and she had never debuted, since the magazine had stopped publication.

Because of this, only Marie knew about her. And her power as mimicked by the ult was...

“Kill.”

...swinging her sword, just once.

This resulted in an attack both faster and stronger than Behemot, even as she was now.

The character’s basic concept was that she was “just super strong,” and dedicating the Resources of all six of the Embryo’s colors to this purpose alone resulted in a truly devastating strike.

Marie had almost never used this bullet.

In most cases, the attack would be taken by the target’s Brooch, leaving them alive to face Marie with her Embryo now unusable.

Even in this battle, Behemot’s HP was far too high even for La Gravelle, so Marie had been waiting for a chance to land a critical hit.

But now, she only had to shatter a part of Greatest Top. There was no better time to use La Gravelle than now.

And so, the Superior Killer had bet all that she had on this one single attack... and it shattered the Superior metal beautifully.

The part of Greatest Top that covered from the right side of Behemot’s head to the elbow of her right foreleg was now gone, exposing Behemot’s bare flesh.

It had already been cracked by Ray, yes — but Marie’s all-out attack had actually overcome the strongest metal that this world had to offer.

But as she bore witness to this victory... Marie’s head fell from her shoulder.

La Gravelle had also been sliced in two and vanished before her summoning had truly ended.

Upon realizing that Marie’s attack was inescapable, Behemot had given up on harm reduction and instead prioritized taking out both La Gravelle and Marie.

The Brooch... Oh, right. Tiger Scratch makes it meaningless, just like it did for Rook, Marie thought as her severed head hurtled through the air. Well, it's not like I can do anything without my bullets anyway. I'm leaving the rest to you, KoA... and Ray.

And so, her head turned to motes of light before it even hit the ground.

As Marie vanished, Eishiro hid in the shadows once again.

With Behemot now exposed, he could take her out using Death and Murder.

He's not a problem now... I think? Behemot thought. If this was a proper, chaotic brawl, it would've been difficult for her to escape Eishiro's hands, but the current state of the battle no longer allowed for that.

There were only three of them left. Ray would be easy to handle as long as she paid attention, while Tsukuyo wasn't much of a threat because she lacked direct offensive ability, so there was no one here that could reduce Behemot's chances of dealing with surprise attacks.

Even with her AGI divided, this was basically a one-on-one fight against Eishiro. And so, Behemot couldn't possibly lose.

At least, that was how it looked until a dark purple miasma flooded the area.

"Hm...?" Behemot was totally confused by the sight.

Ray lost his right arm, she thought. He shouldn't be able to use his Hellish Miasm—... oh.

That was when she remembered something.

Behemot had gathered data about everyone she could potentially be fighting, and Ray had something that had defeated one of her fellow Superiors.

There's one more... There were four left on their side, not three... and the fourth one could use this skill.

It didn't take long for Behemot to find her.

She stood behind Behemot, near where Ray's severed arm had fallen.

The bracer that exuded blood vapor was gone...

"Wearing one half of an SUBM... interesting."

...And in its place stood a gold-copper-skinned goblin girl — Gardranda.

Looking rather delighted, she eyed Behemot's Greatest Top while she used the right bracer to fill the hall with her miasma.

It leaked through the holes in the walls and ceiling, but there was still enough of it to cover the floor. This was obviously meant to be a smokescreen, because Behemot was immune to its debuffs. She had Bourdrim constantly active, so mist-based poison-type status effects were too unfocused to work on her.

The carpet of smoke would only serve to help Eishiro deliver his surprise attack.

In a way, the miasma hid the “shadow minefield” under it.

Behemot actually found this situation a bit troubling.

To ensure that she evaded Eishiro’s shadow ambush, she had to actually see the shadows, so she had to defeat Gardranda as soon as possible.

Using Nullgravity Wings to rise above the smoke might have seemed like a good option, but it actually would be a mistake. She would be far slower in the air than on the ground, which would make her an easy target for Tsukuyo’s compressed debuffs. In the worst case scenario, Tsukuyo might even divide her resistances and END by 6, which would leave her vulnerable to the miasma’s debuffs.

...She won’t be that hard to deal with, Behemot thought.

Gardranda wasn’t all that fast, comparatively. She could surpass the speed of sound, but she was slower than Behemot, Ray, and Tsukikage.

But getting too close to her is dangerous. Gardranda had assumed a stance where she focused miasma into her right hand and flame into her left. Behemot theorized that if she approached her, Gardranda would counterattack simply with concentrated miasma and flame.

The Apex was right in her assumption, for Gardranda was Ray’s right hand and thus had developed an excellent grasp of the art of counterattacking.

And if I focus too much on her counter... Tsukikage will use his final skill on me, Behemot thought. Gardranda’s appearance wasn’t her only problem, though — Greatest Top’s time limit was drawing ever closer.

Gardranda was also on a time limit, but Ray had expended all the MP stored in Gouz-Maise to summon her, resulting in a summon time of a whole 600 seconds. That was significantly more than the two and a half minutes left for Greatest Top, and if Behemot wasted any time at all, those two and a half minutes would expire.

With Greatest Top gone, Tsukikage would be able to target not just the sliver of flesh that Marie had exposed, but Behemot's entire body.

Behemot couldn't run or stall any longer... her only choice was to fight Gardranda.

In order to have a chance at victory, she had to go on the offensive.

Thus, she gathered her resolve and really looked at Gardranda... as well as her surroundings.

Fuso isn't doing anything... and I can't see Ray. Is he hiding like Adler did? Behemot thought.

Tsukuyo wasn't doing anything noteworthy, but Ray was nowhere in sight. Behemot guessed that he was hiding in one of Eishiro's shadows.

She hadn't witnessed the moment he slid into them or the moment he summoned Gardranda, so she assumed that he'd done all of that while Marie used her ult.

If Ray was also hiding in the shadows, it meant that she had two ambushes to anticipate.

I still don't have any other options... I'll just do it, Behemot thought as she gathered her resolve and charged at Gardranda.

She didn't use the maser cannon. Doing so would slightly limit her movements, and with Ray and Marie having cracked open a gap in Greatest Top, that would give Eishiro an opening he could take advantage of.

Behemot dashed towards Gardranda and attacked her with a Tiger Scratch from her left Crescent Glissando.

The deadly horizontal multi-attack wasn't something that Gardranda, being three times slower than Behemot, could possibly evade.

However, dodging wasn't Gardranda's intention.

Instead, she took a step forward, sacrificing her defense in favor of getting close enough to attack.

A moment later, her left hand lit up...

"Purgatorial Flames: Zero."

...And released immensely hot flames.

This was Gardranda's trump card — the skill that had once instantly destroyed a Legendary devil.

It could easily incinerate any flesh it came into contact with, and Gardranda was thrusting it right towards Behemot's exposed neck area.

This was a proper, unavoidable counterattack — just like the one her summoner had done in this very same battle.

But there was one difference now...

I knew she would do that.

...And that was the fact that Behemot had expected this the entire time.

Before Gardranda's attack connected, Behemot used her speed advantage to raise her right foreleg and block the strike.

Gardranda's face twisted in shock. Although the area around the right side of Behemot's the neck was exposed, the foreleg was still fully armored, and its perfect resistance to changes in temperature completely nullified the effects of Purgatorial Flames.

A moment later, Tiger Scratch hit Gardranda and cut her in half at the waist.

Her lower half was pulverized by the two follow-up attacks, while the upper half was knocked all the way into the opposite wall.

During the brief exchange, Behemot had easily dealt with Gardranda's counterattack and defeated her utterly.

However, she knew that this battle wasn't over yet.

There they are. A moment after her attack on Gardranda, Behemot sensed two entities move at the exact same time from different directions.

She was aware that Gardranda's counter was ultimately only a distraction meant to give the others a chance to ambush her. With the goblin gone, the miasma would disperse and expose Eishiro's shadows, greatly reducing the chances of their ambush succeeding.

Because of this, the best moment to strike was while Behemot was still re-orienting herself after the exchange with Gardranda.

But I've seen this happen so often that I'm totally sick of it! Eishiro and Marie had simultaneously ambushed her from the shadows many times now and it hadn't once worked.

One entity emerged from a shadow in front of her, while the other came out from between 4 and 5 o'clock.

The person standing before her was the now-familiar blond youth clad in black.

I'll deal with Ray later! I need to get rid of Tsukikage first...! Vengeance was a potent skill, but she could survive it as long as he didn't strike anything vital. Eishiro's attack, however, would mean instant death, so the order of precedence was easy to establish.

Because of this, Behemot quickly turned towards the other attacker and launched Winged Ripper shockwaves towards it.

She chose this attack over Tiger Scratch to keep him from getting too close. Winged Ripper was a ranged skill which allowed her to deal with the menace before he even reached her.

She'd thought this through from all angles, and this was obviously the right choice to make.

However, the one to be hit by the two shockwaves...

"Ugh..."

...Was indeed a blond youth clad in black — Ray.

Shock overcame Behemot. Her thoughts were too overwhelming to be put into words, but one thing was foremost in her mind: They tricked me.

She realized that she'd fallen into a trap.

When she looked back at the other attacker, she instead saw Eishiro — who had just canceled his transformation into Ray Starling.

Behemot simply wasn't in possession of all the facts.

Once, The Lunar Society had hunted down a UBM in Noz Forest. It was the same UBM that a particular member of the clan had told his step-son about.

The UBM was a strange goblin that could transform himself into a wolf or bat, among other things.

And it was a UBM whose MVP special reward had gone to Eishiro.

The reward allowed him to change his appearance, and though Reveal would instantly see through it, the forms he could take were nearly endless.

Thus, after he and Ray hid themselves in the shadows, he changed his appearance to Ray's and purposely charged at Behemot head-on, expecting her to assume the other person was Eishiro and prioritize him instead.

And that was exactly what happened.

Behemot gasped as Eishiro drew close. She didn't have the time to retaliate.

A moment before she could defeat him, he would already be in touch range.

Being a combat veteran, she instantly knew that this minor difference in timing meant that there was no hope for her.

"Death and Murder."

And so, Eishiro reached for the area where Behemot was exposed... only to touch nothing but empty air.

This was due to a difference of mere centimetels — a space about as big as the first two joints of a person's finger.

Eishiro hadn't misjudged the distance, nor was he too slow. Behemot had actually created this tiny distance herself.

She had purposely canceled Greatest Top before its time ran out.

The special reward could be equipped and unequipped in an instant, and by canceling it, she had lowered her height.

However slight, the difference was enough to decide the outcome.

Death and Murder failed to reach her... and a moment later, Eishiro flew by her.

This was the attack that would've landed had she not canceled Greatest Top.

The effects of Death and Murder killed Eishiro in an instant, and his body soon dissolved into light.

Marie's ultimate bullet. Ray's sacrifice, and Gardranda's.

They'd all given so much to make sure Eishiro's final skill was delivered... and it was all for nothing.

"...I won," Behemot whispered, with her own voice and in a human language.

Her tone made it obvious just how cornered she'd really been. Her heart was beating so fast it felt like it might jump straight out of her mouth.

In all her time as a Superior, she had never experienced such a desperate battle.

Behemot had once fought Dryfe's SMTF and a certain Superior. The possibility of Claudiah dying had really made her lose her composure back then, but this was the first time that she felt that way about her own life.

If she had been just a split-second late with canceling Greatest Top, she would've definitely died.

Being put in such a deadly situation had made her heart race at absurd speeds.

"Ohhh, dear. So it didn't work, huh?" Those words reached Behemot's ears.

They were spoken by Tsukuyo Fuso, the only Altarian left who was completely unharmed.

The High Priestess was now the only target Behemot had to deal with. She'd kept her around as insurance, but that was no longer necessary.

Tsukuyo was a Superior, but she was merely a support job, and there was no chance Behemot would give her the time to use her final skill in any case.

She would now defeat Tsukuyo to achieve her ultimate victory here in the hall, then meet up with Leviathan to defeat Shu; then, she could return to Claudiah.

If Claudiah had been defeated, Behemot would either face Altimia herself or take Claudiah and flee to safety.

"It's... too early... to say that..." Accompanied by the sound of moving rubble, she heard someone speak those words.

Shock overwhelmed Behemot's mind yet again. Though, this was something she had actually anticipated — she'd merely briefly forgotten it because of the life-and-death situation she'd just survived.

Behemot looked at the man standing there.

It was Ray, standing there with a massive wound in his chest. He looked like a shambling corpse.

Despite his awful state, he wasn't broken.

Last Command — the Death Soldier skill that allowed the user to move around after their HP hit zero.

This was the second time Behemot had faced someone with that skill, but it still surprised her.

After all... Ray shouldn't have been able to move. The hole in his chest had been opened by her Winged Ripper, and it had completely pulverized his left lung.

It was obviously a fatal wound.

...How? she thought, for this didn't make sense to her. Even if he didn't feel pain, losing a lung had to make it difficult for him to breathe... he should've been suffocating.

According to tian accounts, the Death Soldier slaves who were dealt enough damage to lose all their HP couldn't move properly, either because they suffered unbearable pain or their bodies were too mangled.

Last Command did nothing but prolong their deaths. The most they could usually do was lay in place and use a self-destruct ability.

This was why Last Command had always been seen as a useless skill.

Despite that... Ray was still standing.

Bearing an agony that would continue for perhaps dozens of seconds more, he stood before Behemot, looking at her with eyes devoid of resignation.

She silently stared back at him.

Behemot had the option to ignore him. Ray would die if she just kept her distance and waited for Last Command to expire.

If Tsukuyo tried to resurrect him, Behemot could just take her out.

Due to the fatal damage that had been dealt to him, Ray's Vengeance would now deal significantly more damage than before.

If it hit Behemot in the right place, it might even kill her.

At the moment, fighting Ray now was both risky and offered no advantage.

Some would even call it stupid.

Even so... Behemot chose to face him.

If she ignored the challenge of a dying... no... an already dead newbie, she would be undeserving of her status as The Physical Apex.

Thus, she refused to run from him.

Though there was nothing to gain from this battle, there was still meaning in it.

If she wanted to remain King of Beasts, the Physical Apex...

If she wanted to live in Infinite Dendrogram while being truly herself...

If she wanted to be someone who wouldn't embarrass her friend...

...This was a battle she could not avoid.

"I am the top of Dryfe Imperium's kill rankings, King of Beasts, Behemot," she said, in normal human words.

Ray fully understood why she introduced herself again.

He coughed up blood before responding the same way. "I am the leader... of the Kingdom of Altar's second highest-ranking clan... Death Period... Paladin, Ray Starling...!"

They re-introduced themselves as opponents in a duel.

The Masters then once again looked directly at each other...

"Bring it!"

...And shouted to one another before charging forward.

◇◆

Last Command had 45 seconds left.

Ray Starling the Unbreakable and Behemot the Physical Apex.
These two would now have their final clash.

Chapter Sixteen: The Conclusion

What was he to her...?

He was someone who always filled her with worry.

The very moment she was born and met him, he was tattered and covered in blood — and that was far from the only time.

Once, he'd almost died standing against a colossal undead abomination in the mountains.

Once, he'd almost died facing a monster that a Superior had created solely to defeat him.

Once, he'd almost died while bathed in the deadly light of a black star scorching the land beneath it.

Once, he'd almost died fighting another Superior and his devilish legions.

And now he... had actually died struggling against an apex.

In spite of that, he was still moving — and still fighting.

Even though a part of her wished this wasn't the case, neither the agony of a lost lung nor a body so battered it was difficult to look at were enough to stop him.

Perhaps some who saw him, struggling despite his gruesome state, would say that he had a strong heart.

She didn't share that opinion, however.

In fact, she would say that that was flat-out wrong.

From her perspective, most of his many, many desperate battles were just painful to watch. To see him constantly jump into such conflicts hurt her heart even more than his thorough defeat at the hands of Marie.

This was because she'd figured out his true nature.

His death to Marie was nothing but an accident... a death at the end of a battle where his was the only life at stake.

What she felt back then was the pain of loss and, as she had failed to protect him, the shame of her own powerlessness.

However, most of his other deadly battles, including the one in which they'd met, were fundamentally different from that one.

The first time she'd noticed that difference was when they had entered the dungeon in the bandit hideout... when Ray saw what had become of the innocent children that the vile necromancer had murdered and raised as undead.

She knew everything that was happening in his heart and mind, so she could truly understand just how badly that realization tore him apart.

When they'd first met, they had managed to rescue the one child he was trying to protect. But what they saw in the dungeon was the destruction of lives that no one had tried to save.

It broke his heart. His soul wept for them.

That was when she began to notice his true nature.

After the incident with the bandit gang, he fought to protect the people of Gideon. Later on, he fought to protect Torne and the boy he'd come to know.

Even later than that, he fought to protect the people of Quartierlatin.

His reasoning for doing so was always the same:

"I mean... it'd just leave a bad taste in my mouth."

Right now, she knew full well that those very words were the driving force behind his actions... the nature of his being.

From the moment she was born, she believed that at Ray's core, he was a simple young man with a kind heart who was always ready to protect someone... or someone who used pain as a motivation to advance forward.

Both were on the right track, but not completely correct.

She realized that Ray's nature was to get himself hurt to protect others.

It was too depressing to be called "kind," and too pitiful to describe someone who was always advancing forward.

He was simply incapable of ignoring any tragedies befalling innocent children, those he was close to, or just people he wanted to protect — for ignoring them would cause him immense pain. If given the choice between ignoring a tragedy and hurting himself to protect someone, he would always pick the latter.

In exchange for the wounds he suffered, he would be able to prevent tragedies that would shatter his heart.

His nature was also reflected in her existence — his Embryo.

She didn't believe that Ray was strong-hearted. Someone with a truly strong heart would be able to endure such tragedies.

That certainly wasn't the case with him. He merely chose bodily suffering over the emotional suffering he could not withstand.

He just couldn't bear seeing someone close to him suffer and fade away.

It might've actually been more accurate to say that Ray's heart was weak.

If it would prevent a tragedy, he would give everything he had and more, even if it meant he suffered severely. That was just how he was.

She knew full well that he wasn't doing this solely because his avatar's sense of pain could be turned off. In fact, she was sure that he would do the same even if he could feel the pain.

As far as she knew, even being in his real body wouldn't stop him.

Despite all of that... he wasn't anyone special.

He was not some messiah trying to save the world, nor was he some avenger on a mission to change it.

He was just an ordinary person following his heart and protecting those he cared about. Just a person struggling against the tragedies before him so that they would not become memories that would haunt him.

That was his nature, and that was why there was something that she would never say to him...

That being the words, "You may close your eyes, cover your ears, and run away."

That would have been the easiest path, as well as the one most people would pick, but she would never recommend it to him. Sometimes she might question if he was certain about what he was doing, but she would never urge him to run.

As one who knew him better than anyone else, she simply couldn't bring herself to do that.

She knew that his heart wouldn't allow him to take the easy path and abandon his loved ones and anyone he saw who was suffering.

It was always hard to watch him destroy himself, but she knew that if he didn't face the tragedies, the heartache would be worse than the wounds.

But that was exactly why he was so important to her.

He didn't have a strong heart that could withstand the pain of tragedy. He wasn't any more special than anyone else.

In fact, he had a delicate heart that was so easily hurt, yet he never ran away from tragedies, instead growing determined to face them head-on... and that was exactly what she loved about him.

That was why, here and now, she agreed to be a part of the only strategy he proposed that could perhaps lead them to victory, knowing full well what would become of his body... and what she would have to do to him.

She made her choice fully aware that it would once again lead to that feeling of powerlessness and the sadness of loss.

As a being born from Ray's heart, she was compelled to protect the sole desire etched into her from her very first breath.

◇◆

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

Ray and Behemot charged straight at each other.

They were equal in speed and each of them was fully capable of killing the other.

Behemot's offensive ability had been demonstrated many times in this battle alone and she could deliver more than enough to damage Ray to the point of incapacitation, while Ray had enough in his damage counter to deliver a critical attack. If he hit a weak spot like the head, neck, or heart, the injury-based status effects would do the rest and finish Behemot off.

I'll aim for his left arm! Behemot thought, fully aware of the danger she was in.

The torso and head were no good. Ray couldn't die while Last Command was active; if she targeted those areas, he could still launch an Impact Counter at her with just his upper half — or even his headless body.

Therefore, she would aim for the arm that held Nemesis, for he couldn't deliver the counter without the weapon that had all the damage stocked.

She intended to tear off Ray's left arm, send his wing-blade flying, and finally pulverize the rest of him.

That was her full path to victory.

Of course, she wasn't the only one thinking about how she could win this. Ray was also considering what he had to do.

The both of them were combing through the possibilities that would lead to victory and then giving their all to seize those possibilities.

After weathering a storm of thoughts that still lasted less than a single second, the two arrived at the fated moment.

"Hh...!" Ray's reach was slightly longer, so he was the first to act.

The moment Behemot entered his range, he swung his wing-blade at her head.

He only needed to hit the general area. Even though Behemot had an absurd 20,000,000HP, his Vengeance would take out a whole 5% of it, and if that 5% was her brain or any other vital organ, victory would be his.

The wing-blade flew at speeds equal to Behemot's. She hadn't faced an attack this fast since she'd become a Superior.

However, it was a direct attack, rather than a counter, so...

"...I can see it."

...Behemot could use her immense experience to evade it.

As the blade shaved the fur on her cheek, she swung her left claw with the full might of Tiger Scratch.

The three attacks obliterated his left hand, turning it into a bloody mist, while the shockwave it created blasted the blade away with power that sent it crashing through the.

I wo—

... Wait, not yet!

Having taken away Ray's means of attack, Behemot briefly celebrated her victory, but then realized that that was a dangerous line of thinking.

Behemot knew about Ray's past battles. Even in this one, she'd seen him stand up despite losing a lung.

By now, she was fully aware that he wasn't someone who could be stopped by an injury like this.

"OOOAAAAAAAGH!" Behemot roared as she began to swing both her claws.

The right one blasted away part of his face — the right side of his chin.

The left one tore through his legs — the entire thigh area.

All of his limbs, as well as a part of his neck, were destroyed now.

He had been reduced to little more than a torso

With Last Command active, even this wasn't enough to finish him off — but now, just like the Death Soldiers of the past, he'd been rendered physically incapable of doing anything.

He couldn't even stand, let alone bite into his blade like he'd done before or kick it towards his target. Ray was completely incapacitated now.

Now I wo—

But the moment that Behemot became completely certain of her victory, something touched the base of her neck.

...Huh?

It didn't do any damage to her.

She was surprised, but whatever it was, it wasn't strong enough to surpass her END.

However, the damage wasn't what mattered here.

What mattered was the sheer fact that it touched her.

After all, it was something that could very well kill her — one of Nemesis' blades.

Behemot's mind was suddenly flooded with thoughts.

Impossible. I just sent it flying. Why is it touching me? Wait, more importantly... Why is the blade penetrating Ray's body?

The blade had been sent flying into the ceiling, but somehow, it was now emerging from Ray's chest.

The answer to that question was simple — it wasn't the same blade.

Nemesis' fourth form was a mirror and twin blades.

Even if one was gone, there was still the other.

Even so, who...?! Ray didn't have the second wing-blade. Having lost his arm to the first maser beam, he hadn't been able to wield it — and even if he could, he couldn't possibly have pierced his own body like that.

It was completely impossible... unless someone had thrown it from behind him.

Shock overcame Behemot as she noticed something beyond the curtain of gore in front of her.

It was Gardranda, her lower body entirely destroyed, now frozen in a position that suggested the follow-through of a throw.

She was still alive...?!

Though she had been torn apart and buried under rubble, the summon was still in effect.

And now, she had thrown the first wing-blade and hit Behemot through Ray.

Behemot hadn't seen any of this. Her body was small, so Ray's larger frame blocked out anything that was happening behind him.

It was as though this had been planned out.

D-Did he...? Assuming Ray had anticipated this... that this was the possibility he gambled everything on...

Did he use himself... as a decoy?! Ray, holding the wing-blade in his left hand, was nothing but a distraction and a sponge to increase the damage counter.

And while he was fulfilling that role, Gardranda had thrown the other wing-blade at him.

Ray was holding the blade he'd already depleted to crack Greatest Top. The one piercing through his chest was the main one, and the damage on its counter now, after being so fiercely torn apart by Behemot, was truly immense.

The moment his Last Command activated, he conjured up this desperate and precarious chance for victory. Swallowing his fear of being torn apart, he gambled everything to grasp for this tiny sliver of possibility that he could prevent a tragedy... and he reached it.

"Vengeance..." The skill didn't require Ray to hold Nemesis in his hand — it could be used as long as the two were touching.

That was why it had worked the two times he used it while holding her in his mouth... and why it would work now that she had been stabbed straight through his body.

"...Is... Mine."

Following Nemesis' words, spoken as though she was holding back tears, Vengeance was delivered upon Behemot.

◇◇◇

[Last Command expired]

[Resurrection period expired]

[Death Penalty: 24 hour Login Ban]

Chapter Seventeen: Aftermath

Altar-Dryfe border, wasteland

At that moment, Leviathan's actions changed drastically, and Shu instantly noticed the difference.

After trying to prolong this battle as long as she could, she was now trying to shake Shu off and charge straight towards the assembly hall.

Shu realized what that meant and immediately tried to stop her from leaving.

"Get out of my way!" the queen of kaiju shouted, swinging both her arms to shove Baldr away.

The machine god grabbed her and pulled her into an armlock to keep her in place.

"Not happening," Shu said. "Looks like they did a good job."

Behemot — Leviathan's Master — was in a state she could not ignore. Her sheer panic was proof of that. Also clear as day, as proven by Leviathan still existing at all, was the fact that Behemot was still...

"Ah...!" Suddenly, an alert rang out in Baldr's cockpit.

"What is it?"

"Warning. New hostile, 3 o'clock."

Suddenly, a portion of the screen showed an enemy other than Leviathan.

It was some kind of giant monster... one that certainly wasn't there a minute ago.

From the monster's mouth came an indescribable sound. It was about the size of Leviathan, but while her animal-like form was balanced and streamlined, this creature was a chaotic abomination.

Its limbs, torso, head... it was as though each of its parts had come from different sources, giving it an outlandish look.

Most unsettling of all was its dragon-like head, which was a deep blue color like lapis lazuli.

Anyone could tell that this was not a natural being — and it was now drawing closer.

That... ain't a UBM, which can only mean that... Shu thought, before looking up to see what Franklin's eyeball-like recon monster was doing.

It was fully focused on Baldr and Leviathan, not even sparing a glance for the new combatant.

That alone was enough to reveal its affiliation.

"So you came here yourself after all, huh... Franklin!" Shu realized that Franklin must have switched from observing to interfering because Ray's group had finally cornered Behemot.

This monster was one of his creations — one far more powerful the Legendaries Shu had destroyed during Franklin's game.

His instincts told him that this one was Mythical, if not above that.

"They now have a numerical advantage," said Baldr. "Continuing this battle in our current state will likely lead to defeat. Would you like to initialize the Fatal Engine?"

"...Only if it seems hopeless," Shu replied. Franklin had only sent one powerful monster in order to keep his mass-produced creatures in reserve. Since Shu was a wide-scale extermination type, getting rid of him would allow Franklin to suppress the assembly hall using overwhelming numbers.

Franklin most likely didn't know the details of Fatal Engine, Gloria γ, but he must've been confident that this giant monster was capable of defeating Baldr as he was now.

"I gotta keep Leviathan here and fight this damn thing. I also can't let either of them beat me and can't use γ... Man, what a situation this is."

The strongest Superior Embryo and a monster-creating Superior's strongest creation.

This was too much even for Shu and Baldr.

"They have it even harder at the hall, though. I can't throw in the towel before they do," he said with an indomitable smile as he resumed the battle against the two gargantuan beasts.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, assembly hall

A mere moment had passed since Ray and Behemot's final clash.

The bloody mist that was once Ray had just become specks of light and vanished from the world.

"...Well, this went differently than I expected," said the sole witness to the conclusion — Tsukuyo Fuso.

In her mind, the plan to deliver Tsukikage's Death and Murder was their final chance at victory, and if that didn't work, she guessed that their last hope was the bear swooping in to deal with the situation.

If it was night, even she might've been able to contribute somehow, but in broad daylight she was largely powerless against Behemot.

That was why Tsukuyo had only watched.

She hadn't expected Ray to stand up, and the outcome of his actions surprised her.

Despite being torn apart, Ray had managed to reach Behemot with his blade and release the damage stored within it.

He then vanished as Last Command expired, leaving behind Tsukuyo... and Behemot.

Silence.

Behemot was maimed, but still alive. There was a sizable hole in her neck, but the more serious damage was in her forelegs: they had been completely blown away.

This was a result of her final decision in this battle.

Nemesis' final Vengeance aimed at her neck had enough damage to blow away her entire head.

Thus, at the very last moment, a moment so brief that she couldn't even knock the blade away, Behemot had chosen to touch Nemesis with her claws, splitting the damage.

Vengeance is Mine was a skill that destroyed the target's body based on the damage dealt and where the attack landed, so by making it touch her claws as well as her neck, she divided the damage to her head by a third.

In that final moment, she hadn't had enough time to push the blade away, but she had just enough presence of mind to think of this stratagem and put it into action.

"Cough..." Still, the damage was severe. The wound on her neck wasn't quite deep enough to reach her cervical vertebrae, but it was still difficult for her to breathe. And with her forelegs gone, she couldn't wield her weapons.

Her high END prevented most injury-based debuffs, but she was still Bleeding fountains from all three of her major wounds.

It was the first time since becoming a Superior that she suffered such immense damage.

Still not saying a word, Behemot twisted her body to drop her custom-made, extra small inventory on the floor, then shatter it with a stomp of her foot.

A moment later, the space was full of potions and similar items. She began trampling over them and dousing herself in the contents or forcing it down her torn throat.

Her wounds began to release pale smoke as they healed and the Bleeding stopped, but her forelegs didn't regrow, and the hole in the throat didn't close.

Behemot didn't have anything potent enough to accomplish that.

Even with the Bleeding stopped, she was still heavily damaged. Either due to residual damage or because she wasn't used to being so incapacitated, she was still lying on the floor.

Tsukuyo looked at her, racking her brain for a way to defeat Behemot as she was now... and came up with nothing.

Even without her forelegs and despite all the damage she'd suffered, the Physical Apex was still capable of running Tsukuyo through by merely jumping straight towards her.

She considered suffocation, but that wouldn't work, either. Though she had trouble breathing, it didn't look like she was suffering from it, exactly. It was either the effect of Bourdrim's debuff resistance or that of some accessory she'd replaced Greatest Top with using Instant Wear. Regardless, it was clear that something was making the effects of suffocation easier for her.

Behemot could probably move around just fine even in her current state.

Things would've been different if Tsukuyo wasn't the sole survivor on her side, but that wasn't how it had turned out.

"We needed just one more card to play, huh?" If there was just one more thing they could do to finish off Behemot, Altar would've won.

They were defeated.

Still, as a show of defiance, Tsukuyo reached into her inventory and took out a Gem.

Between two and three minutes had passed since Behemot's last clash with Ray. In her own way, Tsukuyo resolved to challenge Behemot — but the apex wasn't even looking at her.

Instead, she was staring at the patch of sky visible through the hole in the wall... and the jade-green trail falling down to the ground.

Still not saying a word, Behemot appeared to be thinking very deeply about something.

A few seconds later, though, she began to move and destroyed another one of her inventories.

As she trampled it underfoot, several pieces of paper appeared around her.

"Hm?" Tsukuyo watched in confusion as Behemot picked one out and, since she didn't have the forelegs to hold it, bit into it before throwing it in Tsukuyo's direction.

The paper, lightly stained with Behemot's blood, fell somewhere between them, facing up. Tsukuyo could read it from where she was, but what it actually said made her tilt her head.

"...What is this?"

"A Contract." Presumably due to the effect of some accessory, Behemot could respond to Tsukuyo despite the hole in her throat.

Tsukuyo could tell with a glance that it was a Contract. What had her confused was the terms.

"...Are you serious?" To sum it up, the Contract said, "High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso will heal King of Beasts, Behemot, curing her status effects and restoring her HP. In exchange, Behemot, bearer of the King of Beasts job, as well as Queen of Beasts, Leviathan will not harm the kingdom's Masters or tians for 24 hours, Infinite Dendrogram time."

In exchange for being healed, Behemot and Leviathan would stop attacking Altarians altogether. The somewhat awkward phrasing of "bearer of the King of Beasts job" part was there to prevent Behemot from avoiding the Contract's terms by merely switching to a sub-job.

That meant that she was fully intent on stopping this battle completely.

"You didn't write this just now, did you? When did you prepare this?" Tsukuyo asked.

Behemot said nothing. She had actually prepared the Contract shortly after she found out that Tsukuyo would be participating in the peace talks.

The "insurance" that she'd had in mind for the battle was Tsukuyo's healing magic, though she'd expected to use this insurance on Claudiah or Altimia — the one Claudiah wanted to capture.

However, she'd also considered the possibility of fighting Shu and sustaining injuries so severe that she would be rendered unable to save Claudiah, so she'd also prepared a Contract for herself. That was the one she just presented to Tsukuyo.

"I never underestimated Shu or the others," Behemot finally said. "I knew I could be defeated or lose a limb or two, so I had this prepared just in case."

"...So that's the other reason why you didn't get rid of me first, eh?" With Behemot counting as a beast, the only thing Tsukuyo could do against her was Faint Light, and Behemot figured that she could put up with the debuff during the fight and try to have her sign the Contract afterwards.

Though, if Shu hadn't lured Leviathan away and Behemot had been forced to fight both him and Tsukuyo at the same time, she would've certainly thrown away the whole idea of insurance and gotten rid of the High Priestess as soon as possible.

However, once Shu was gone, she figured she could face the rest of her opponents and keep her insurance handy even with the debuff up — that was exactly what led to her grave injuries.

But it was hard to say that she had miscalculated, exactly. There was certainly a large enough gap in power between her and the Altarians.

Despite that, they had given their all and then some, completely obliterating Behemot's expectations.

Because of that, Behemot genuinely felt that she had been defeated.

If Eishiro's reach had been only slightly longer, or if Nemesis' blade was only a bit closer to her brain or spine, she would've had the death penalty by now.

Still... Behemot had indeed survived, and the best thing for her to do now was to heal her wounds and save Claudiah.

If Claudiah's battle had still been going, Behemot would have gotten rid of Tsukuyo even if it meant leaving herself injured, but the jade-green trail was a clear sign that the outcome of the royal clash had been decided. Since Claudiah wasn't contacting Behemot, it was a safe guess that the imperator had been defeated.

With the outcome more or less already determined, Behemot no longer wished to fight.

The original plan had been abandoned.

In case of Claudiah's defeat, Behemot would struggle to help her — to devastate the Altarian forces, defeat Altimia, and take them to Dryfe.

This would be unnecessary if Claudiah had won, but since she hadn't, it was up to Behemot to decide what to do next based on her assessment of the situation.

In emergencies like this, Claudiah had entrusted Behemot with all the decision-making power.

"So, will you sign it?" However, with that established, it was clear that if Tsukuyo refused, Behemot would do everything in her power to take her out and then target Altimia.

She was The Physical Apex even with only half her limbs, and her Superior Embryo, still in good health, was trying to reach her, as well.

Kaguya... How's it looking over there? Tsukuyo asked.

"Shu is now fighting not just Leviathan, but also some other gigantic monster." Those words made Tsukuyo fall silent and think.

Having become the night itself, Kaguya could look down on the world below her.

Baldr and Leviathan were fighting far outside of the skill's area of effect — but they were so large that she could still see them.

...What to do, what to do...? Tsukuyo wondered, briefly picturing the person who had more than likely sent the giant monster.

If she signed the Contract before her, both Behemot and Leviathan would be removed from the battle. They would still be able to take Claudiah and escape, but based on the terms of the Contract, they would no longer be able to attack or even kidnap anyone for twenty-four hours.

And with Leviathan out of the picture, Shu would be able to focus solely on the monster, and she was fairly certain that he would win that duel.

If she didn't sign, however, Tsukuyo would instantly receive the death penalty.

Then, Behemot would attack Altimia. Though dismembered, she was still King of Beasts, so it was still possible for her to defeat the princess and take her prisoner.

Shu would also be left fighting two opponents, decreasing his chances of victory. And if he were to fall, Altimia would have to face both Behemot and Leviathan, assuring Altar's defeat.

It was fairly obvious that refusing to sign this contract would make things worse for the kingdom.

One might wonder why Behemot would offer up a Contract like this, but the answer was simple — there was a chance that Claudiah, having been defeated, would now be killed.

Altar needed her to stop the terrorist attack on Altea, but if the situation was sufficiently desperate, they might opt to kill her instead.

Regardless of whether Altimia would ever do that, Behemot feared the possibility.

If she was in perfect health, she could easily help her friend — but right now, she was maimed. Also, Behemot knew well by now that her partner, Leviathan, was incapable of doing tasks that required any sort of finesse.

With Claudiah defeated and Behemot heavily injured, she wanted to promise their retreat in exchange for Claudiah's survival.

...I don't really have a choice here, Tsukuyo thought.

Signing the Contract was the safer choice for the kingdom, as well. She really didn't have any other reasonable options.

Therefore, the only thing left to do was see how far she could push the terms.

"This isn't quite enough," she said while waving the Contract in her hand. "You'll need to give us more."

"Hm?"

"24 hours isn't enough. You know that it'll take 72 hours in Dendro time for our victims to come back, right?"

"...Then I'll make it 72 hours."

"That's not enough, either. 720 hours or nothing."

Silence. Tsukuyo just demanded Behemot and Leviathan wouldn't attack Altarians for a whole month of Dendro time.

Behemot pondered this, but Tsukuyo refused to back down. Even if Dryfe retreated now, if they were to invade Altar again with Behemot leading the charge, the kingdom would surely fall.

That was why Tsukuyo wanted to secure as much time as was reasonably possible... Enough to ensure that not only those who had died here would be back, but also that Hannya and Figaro would have returned.

Though the punishment for breaking the Contract can't be a death penalty now. That would actually be shorter. Guess I'll change it into a whole bunch of time-based status effects — ones that don't go away even if you die.

While Tsukuyo was pondering these things, Behemot finished considering her terms and said, "I... accept."

"Good, good. Let me just rewrite this. Now, for more conditions..."

"...There's more?"

"Of course there is."

Trying to get a sense of how much Behemot would tolerate, Tsukuyo continued attempting to change the Contract.

"Your boss will have to call off the terrorist attack on Altea within one hour after I heal you."

"...All right." Behemot instantly accepted this, for she knew that in this situation, Claudiah would have already done so.

"In exchange, I want you to heal her too," Behemot added. "Claudiah can't call off the attack if she's unconscious."

"Ah. Well, that makes sense."

"Also... heal her old wounds, too." Behemot cared about Claudiah, so she used this opportunity to restore what her friend had lost in her previous battles. It was a bit of greediness on her part...

"I can do that, but you're still not giving me enough, so you'll have to throw in a little extra for it, too."

"A little extra?"

"5,000,000,000 lir."

...But Tsukuyo was far greedier than her.

"...f*ck." Conveniently bleeped profanity escaped Behemot's mouth, and who could really blame her?

"...Tsukuyo?" said Kaguya. Even her own Embryo was put off by this display of greed.

Hey now, Kaguya — we should take what we can. And this also will reduce their battle potential! It's all to help the kingdom!

Tsukuyo didn't seem to feel any guilt about this.

"Hm? What's wrong? You're the top of the kill rankings, and unlike the bear, you don't really use your wealth. You must have lots of money, right? Or, what... Is your money more important than your friends?"

"g2h" Behemot replied as she begrudgingly threw the inventory she used as a wallet towards Tsukuyo.

There was just enough power in the throw to keep the inventory from shattering, but also enough to break Tsukuyo's fingers as she caught it... though, that was a minor issue to her.

"It's a deal, then! Let's start the healiiiing!" Tsukuyo said with a wide smile as she began to treat Behemot's wounds.

As Kaguya looked down on the sight, she felt somewhat apologetic towards Ray, Nemesis, and all the others who'd given their all and then some to the fight against the Physical Apex.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, grove

Right after the battle between the princesses ended with Jade Storm's deactivation, Claudiah plummeted towards the ground below.

After some time of feeling nothing but air rushing past her, a sudden shock wracked her body... and then was canceled.

Lying on the ground, she looked up at the sky and whispered, "...I am alive."

She realized that her Lifesaving Brooch had done its work and canceled the fatal damage from her impact with the ground. This meant that she just had a near-death experience, but on the other hand, if the damage hadn't been sufficient to activate the Brooch, she would be severely injured right now; so that was something to be glad about.

After she got up and looked around, she saw Jade Storm's head and body, lying separately where they'd fallen.

Aside from the obvious decapitation, it didn't seem too damaged. Flagman's designs wouldn't be destroyed by a mere fall.

Claudiah... or more accurately, Reinhard... concluded that Jade Storm could be fixed by merely replacing all the parts near the cut and letting the self-repair function do the rest.

"This is the real problem, though..."

On her side, there was a wound carved into her by Altar. However, it wasn't bleeding. Not because of anything The Primeval Blade had done, but because of the power suit she was wearing.

It was made using an MVP special reward material, and its name was Hemocycler. It provided life support, and if Claudiah lost a part of her body or suffered severe injury, her blood and any other vital fluids would avoid the injured areas in favor of circulating through the power suit.

Because of that, she wasn't bleeding, and her life was not in immediate danger.

She'd crafted Hemocycler based on her near-death experiences during the civil war and wore it in her fight against Altimia because she correctly assumed that it would work against Altar's incurable wounds.

Still, that didn't change the fact that merely having an incurable wound was a bad situation to be in.

"It appears I shall have to replace even more of my body with machinery," she sighed.

Though she had already replaced her arms with prosthetics, she still had some degree of attachment to her flesh. There were things only a living body could feel, after all.

"Anyway..." Having finished checking on herself, she reached into her inventory and took out a comms device. It was a bit on the large side, but that was due to a unique design focusing on extending communication range and increasing its counter-jamming properties.

"Zeta. This is me."

"Confirmation. Since you're using this device, I assume there has been a failure?"

Claudiah received an instant response.

The person on the other line was Zeta — who was currently terrorizing the city of Altea.

"Yes. I lost. What is the situation on your side?"

"...Attempted. I found and confirmed the target you requested, but I am struggling to eliminate it. I thought I had it cornered, but it doesn't feel like my Embryo's attacks are even getting through."

"Oh, I see. So that really is how that works. I wanted to determine that, as well. What about your personal goal? Did you manage to steal it?"

"Refusal. I will not answer that."

"Very well."

"Order. Elimination is impossible and your situation is no longer favorable, so I'd like to know what to do now."

"We will now move on to Plan C. Please make the necessary preparations, then retreat from Altea."

"Commencing. Deliver the reward by the designated method. Then, and only then, will I give you information regarding the target."

Following that conversation, the call ended.

"That is done. Now..."

A moment later, something wove a path through the spaces between the trees and landed before her.

It was a golden Prism Steed and a girl with indigo hair... Altimia.

"So you lived," she said.

"Yes," Claudiah replied. "I am glad to see you alive, as well."

Altimia's words made sense, seeing as Claudiah had just fallen from the sky, but some might have wondered why Claudiah had responded in kind.

Unlike Claudiah, Altimia hadn't suffered any major injuries, but there was a reason why she was glad she had lived.

It was reflected in Altimia's long, indigo hair — a part of which had turned white.

"Claudiah, call off the—"

"I have already ordered the retreat." Claudiah had already done what Altimia would have requested her to do first and foremost, and Truth Discernment confirmed this.

"...Well, you are certainly fast."

"Of course I am. I lost the battle we wagered all of our desires on, and I knew full well that you would want this done as quickly as possible."

That was part of the reason why Claudiah hurried to order the retreat, but she also just didn't want Altimia to overhear her conversation with Zeta.

"...What of my sisters?"

"I was given no information about them, nor did I ask. But if they had been killed or captured, surely I would have been informed, no?"

"Hm..." This act of terrorism was meant to destabilize the kingdom, so the death or capture of the princesses was a sub-objective. If Zeta hadn't reported it on her own initiative, they must be fine.

Though, it was within the realm of possibility that Zeta simply didn't care whether the princesses were alive or dead.

"I must say... You paid quite an obvious price," Claudiah said, looking at Altimia's hair. Altimia said nothing in response at first. "Using that ultimate job skill eats away at your life, does it not?"

“...It does.” The Sacred Princess’ ultimate job skill, The Primeval Boundary, drained a great deal of things from the user. Besides obvious stats like HP, MP, and SP — life, magic, and mental forces — it also targeted her life itself... specifically, her lifespan.

Essentially, Altar was a double-edged sword — and not just because of its all-rending blade.

“I did not use it for long, though... My hair will return to normal sooner than later,” said Altimia.

“This time, at least. But you should refrain from using this power any further. You know his legend better than I do, no?”

The Sacred Princess was silent.

“The legend of the Sacred King... the first Azurite. He used this power to conquer The Evil from the previous era, which almost led to his death. No... some say that he actually did die once. However...”

“The Saint of that era sacrificed her own life to save his. This is the most famous of his legends.”

“But the current Altar does not have The Saint. That job was taken by Sechs Würfel. If you use that power too much, you will deplete your life... and die.”

“...I am well aware. That is why I will only use it when I feel it truly necessary.”

That meant Altimia felt her battle against Claudiah was something she absolutely had to win, even if it cost her a portion of her own life.

“...I am not sure whether to feel flattered or not.”

“You can figure that out later. I have some questions for you.”

“Such as?”

“Why did you set a trap for us in the peace contract and order an attack on the capital? Surely there must have been a better way for you to do this.” In exchange for a complete ceasefire, Altar had offered to give Dryfe the Old Lunnings Duchy and remove certain persons from the wanted list.

As evidenced by the fact that the Covenant had nearly been signed by both parties, those conditions were favorable for both countries.

Of course, Dryfe’s famine was severe, and there was also the matter of Caldina — but simply leaving the Covenant in its current state would have left plenty of room to solve those matters peacefully.

However, Claudiah had instead chosen to attack Altea and destroy Altar, and Altimia wanted to know why.

"I suppose the best answer is that the Covenant as it was would not fulfill all of my wishes."

"All of your wishes?"

"...There were three things I had to acquire at any cost." Claudiah had slowly begun giving her answer. "First is something that Dryfe needs... The Old Lunnings Duchy that would solve the imperium's famine."

Dryfe had effectively been controlling it since the previous war, and with these negotiations, they would've become its legal owners.

"The second thing is what I need... You, my dearest Altimia."

Acquiring her had proven to be difficult... but ultimately, they were to remain friends.

"And lastly... what this world needs." Claudiah strongly implied that this was the reason why she arranged an attack on Altea. However, it was hard for Altimia to picture something that could be important for the world, something supposedly bigger than either of their entire nations.

"Did you not tell me that the purpose of the assault on Altea and our battle here was to capture me and my sisters or take our lives to split the kingdom apart? That was no lie... was it?"

"That was part of it. After all, to acquire what is needed, it would help to have control of the kingdom... more specifically, its capital. Also, what we would receive from Altar would help immensely in preventing Caldina from doing anything... unnecessary."

"...Just what is this thing 'the world needs' that you speak of?"

Claudiah fell silent for a long moment before saying, "I have no wish to hide anything from or lie to you, but this is something I hesitate to speak of."

"What do you mean?" Altimia could tell that Claudiah wasn't merely avoiding the question — she was truly unsure if she was capable of describing whatever she had in mind.

"After all... you might be erased by the supervisors." In response to Altimia's question, she made it clear that she was refraining from speaking out of fear for her safety.

"...Supervisors?"

"Perhaps they would not eliminate key figures like you and I. I am aware of the thing in question, but I have not yet been neutralized.

However, if this spreads... they might change their stance. That fear keeps me from speaking it to anyone."

"But I do wish to hear it from you. I must know what made you go this far."

"I see... Then I will tell you as much as I can. Though, even that much may be dangerous," Claudiah added as she looked up at the sky and began to describe her reasons. "Do you not think that this world is odd?"

"Hm?"

"Does it not feel akin to some kind of game where the board and the pieces have been gathered from different boxes and mixed up? Do you not perceive this mismatch?"

Claudiah's words were hard for Altimia to understand, but for some reason, they reminded her of her father's statement that Masters were somehow special.

"Originally, there should have been only one set of pieces on the board, but due to intervention from the current supervisors, new pieces and mechanics have been added. The chaos and Resources in the world increased, and they are now trying to use it to fulfill their own desires."

She paused for a moment and confirmed that both she and Altimia were still alive before continuing.

"But they have only added new things. The thing leading to this world's original conclusion... the calamity left behind by the previous supervisors had not vanished. And yet... this era is simply too lacking."

"Claudiah... what are you talking about?"

"...The Saint was stolen, The Hero was murdered, The Vanguard is nowhere in sight, Titania and Conquest General are not what they used to be, while the Imperial Crown from the middle of the continent... Caldina... is lost. The Imperator Machina and Sacred Princess... you and I are the only ones who still stand tall."

Altimia understood that Claudiah was talking about the Special Superior Jobs associated with the various countries... themselves included.

...But why did she not mention Draconic Emperor? she wondered. That was Huang He's Special Superior Job, yet Claudiah hadn't included it in her list.

But before Altimia could ask about that, Claudiah resumed speaking.

"And many standard Superior Jobs no longer belong to tians. I am not certain that the tians who are currently alive can win against the coming calamity... The ‘DEMISE’... The ‘GAME OVER.’ Thus, I staged an attack on the capital, where it supposedly resided. I thought that doing so would ensure that I would find it...”

With that, Claudiah had finished explaining her reason.

However, she had said a great many things that Altimia didn’t understand. Perhaps Claudiah had purposely made her explanation hard to comprehend out of fear of these “supervisors” she’d alluded to.

Altimia understood that Claudiah was planning to fight against some kind of oncoming danger, though she failed to understand what she meant by “DEMISE” or “GAME OVER.”

With that in mind, there was something Altimia had to ask.

“Why are you not including Masters?”

Masters — especially Superiors — were extremely powerful. Many of them were more than a match for Special Superior Jobs like Altimia herself.

No matter who — or what — they faced, they would likely win with enough such powerful entities on their side. Claudiah herself had Behemot and many other powerful Masters as allies, so she should’ve been more than capable of getting them to fight for her.

“...That is impossible,” Claudiah replied as she shook her head. “After all, this is the one thing they are... thoroughly unrelated to.”

“Unrelated?”

“The GAME OVER pertains to this world’s original objective. That is why outsiders like the Masters are not fit for the purpose of fighting it. They cannot even take part in this. Otherwise, the supervisors wou—”

She stopped herself before she could finish that sentence, believing that she was about to say more than was safe. The look in Claudiah’s eyes told Altimia that she could say nothing further.

Altimia silently pondered what she had just been told. The information given to her was frankly beyond her understanding.

However, she could tell that it was important to this world and that there wasn’t a single lie in Claudiah’s words.

How did Claudiah know about “this world’s original objective” and this entity she had called the GAME OVER? And just what were they, anyway?

Altimia felt that the answers to those questions could be found in Altea... the Altarian capital which had just been the target of a terrorist attack.

“...Just what is supposed to be in Altea?” She looked to the horizon, in the direction of the city — but of course, from this far away she could see neither what happened nor what mysteries lurked there.

“Claudiah!” Suddenly, two people appeared before them — Behemot and Tsukuyo, both in perfect health.

Altimia stared at them in silence, noting the lack of the other Masters and the fact that Behemot looked freshly healed.

From that, she drew a particular conclusion.

“...So you betrayed us, you parasite.” She didn’t know how Tsukuyo had avoided the consequences of the Contract, but knowing her, Altimia concluded that she was a traitor.

Faced with Altimia’s bare killing intent, Tsukuyo hastily shook her head.

“Y-You’ve got it all wrong! I fought with Ray and the others and we won! We’re the only ones who survived, and we made a Contract that I heal Behemot in exchange for her promise to not move against us! She’s not a danger!”

These words made Altimia lower her sword.

One reason for that was Truth Discernment telling her that Tsukuyo wasn’t lying, but there was another...

“So... Ray really did die.” She had a hunch that might be the case when Silver vanished, but having it confirmed filled her with a sorrow that even she herself found strange.

“He’s a Master, though. He’ll be back soon enough,” Tsukuyo said.

“...That is true.” That made Altimia feel a bit relieved, but also reminded her of certain words Claudiah had said — words which she couldn’t fully understand right now. Something about Masters being outsiders that could not take part in matters concerning the GAME OVER...

“...So, what are the terms of the Contract you signed,” Altimia asked.

“The King of Beasts and her Embryo won’t be able to harm Altarian tians or Masters for an entire month. Also, your royal friend over there will have to stop the attack on the capital — though I’ll have to heal her in exchange.”

Tsukuyo didn’t mention the 5,000,000,000 lir she took as payment. Withholding information didn’t count as lying, after all.

“I see. Claudiah seems to have already put a stop to the terrorist attack... So now, you will heal her, and the two of them will run away, eh?”

Altimia wondered how that tiny body could possibly take Claudiah away from here, but perhaps that wasn't much of a problem for The Physical Apex.

It didn't seem like she could stop Behemot, either. Altimia was too drained from using her ultimate job skill.

"This seems like a draw to me. Anyway, time to heal," said Tsukuyo as she began to treat Claudiah.

In response to those words, Altimia whispered, "...This is not a draw."

The peace talks had ended in failure.

The meeting that was supposed to stop the war had instead become a battlefield, and even the capital had been caught in the crossfire. Even if Altimia and her sisters were unharmed and they forced Dryfe to retreat, it was fair to say that Altar had lost simply because their casualties were greater.

"Altimia," Claudiah spoke to her, ending her train of thought.

"We cannot back down yet. Now that we have confirmation, we have even more reason to take control of the kingdom."

Altimia listened intently.

"However, let us avoid an all-out war or any further human casualties." Saying that, Claudiah took something out of her inventory and tossed it to Altimia.

It seemed to be a rolled-up piece of paper.

"This is... a Covenant?" The most powerful form of Contract... used in agreements between entire countries.

"Indeed. This is our Plan C. Plan A fell apart when a certain someone saw right through it, while Plan B failed when I lost to you. Plan C is what we prepared in the event that happened."

"...What trickery have you set up this time?"

"None," Claudiah said while looking right into Altimia's eyes. "No tricks or lies... This is a declaration of war."

As her Truth Discernment did not activate, Altimia looked down at the Covenant in her hand.

"But I understand that you do not want to lose any more tian lives," Claudiah continued. "And since we found what we'd come to find at the capital, there is no longer any reason for me to attack your people — so let us follow the terms the Covenant lays out."

She pointed at a part of the Covenant which said...

"'A war between Masters only'? What...?" The text greatly shocked Altimia.

"Yes. A war where we agree on a time, place, and rules, and let the Masters serving us fight it out... A war where no one has to die."

Silently, Altimia pondered. This seemed like a reasonable proposition. If Dryfe had no intention of calling off the war, this was a far more preferable shape for it to take.

Altar had fewer Masters than Dryfe, but this would still give them a higher chance of victory than an all-out war involving tians, and the overall casualties would be drastically reduced.

However, this made Altimia feel a certain sense of discomfort. Was it because this essentially meant they would be using Masters as tools of war...? The very thing her late father was strictly against?

"It would be like a contest," Claudiah said. "I imagine that Masters would have an easier time seeing it that way."

Upon hearing that, both Behemot and Tsukuyo thought similar things. As Masters of Maiden type Embryos, they both did not see Infinite Dendrogram as a game, but Claudiah's proposed war seemed extremely "game-like" to both of them.

Still, they both thought it was a decent idea.

"Also... both countries would wager everything on this war," Claudiah added.

"...This is not a decision I can make here and now."

"I understand. Take your time. We still have to set the rules and choose a location, anyway. We will figure out the details over the hotline at a later date."

And so, she stood up, fully restored. She'd fixed the wound Altar had made by cutting out the flesh around it and letting Tsukuyo do the rest. This wouldn't have been possible if the High Priestess wasn't there and if the wound was in a more vital area.

Her arms had also been restored.

"Ohh... It has been so long since I felt warmth with my fingertips," she said, picking up Behemot. She then set Behemot on her shoulders and took out a spare spear. "And the spear feels just right."

Those words made Altimia realize that it was possible Claudiah hadn't actually been fighting at her peak, due to her prosthetics.

"Altimia, it might be unfair to say it now... but you do not have to wait for the war. You may try to capture... or even kill me here and now."

Altimia would've been lying if she said that she hadn't considered capturing Claudiah.

It might've been difficult to prevent their escape, but it wasn't impossible. Though Claudiah had fully recovered, her Prism Steed was broken, and Behemot couldn't harm Altarians.

By contrast, Altimia was merely fatigued, while her Gold Thunder was ready for action, and Tsukuyo was completely unharmed. A conflict between the two sides could go either way.

"I will not do that," said Altimia.

There was no telling what Behemot would do if she were to do anything to Claudiah.

King of Beasts couldn't harm Altarians for a month, but if Claudiah was dead or captured by Altar, there was a chance that she would ravage the kingdom regardless. She would come back over and over and do it time and time again, without any consideration for international relations or what was beneficial to Dryfe.

Behemot had proven just how fearsome she was in the very conflict that had just ended. Despite being separated from her Embryo, she devastated a Superior and several other Altarian Masters.

If harm were to come to Claudiah, Dryfe also wouldn't put King of Beasts on the wanted list no matter how bad her rampage was.

In fact, it could even lead to an all-out war — the worst-case scenario that Altimia wanted to avoid with the peace talks.

Since that had failed, all she really had left was to win in the unique war Claudiah had just proposed.

...Oh. I am already thinking as though I've already accepted the Covenant.

Claudiah might've said all that she had precisely because she'd known that all along.

She was Altimia's friend, who loved her, as well as the imperator of Dryfe — and a cunning, cool-headed manipulator.

"Then I will take my leave, as befits a defeated foe..." Claudiah said before falling silent and looking at Altimia.

“What is it?”

“Oh, I merely wanted to burn your lovely image into my eyes. I imagine it will be quite a long time before we meet in person again.”

“I see.” Altimia had no response to that.

Though, if she were to say something, she would note that in that moment, Claudiah briefly seemed more like the girl she knew from their school days rather than the cunning imperator.

“Farewell, then,” Claudiah said before putting Jade Storm’s remains in her inventory and leaving alongside Behemot.

Altimia said nothing. Claudiah was a dear friend as well as a rival.

However, their next conflict would not be between them as combatants... but as rulers.

With that in mind, she watched them disappear into the horizon.

◇◆◇

Altar-Dryfe border, wasteland

Claudiah had ordered Franklin to stay at Vandelheim in case of any unforeseen circumstances.

Shu believed that Franklin had sent out his monster while hiding somewhere near the border.

However, he was neither at the capital nor anywhere outside.

“In a way, this is an expected outcome...” Franklin was actually within the cockpit of the giant monster he’d sent to fight Baldr, known as MGD — Mechanic God Dylan.

Franklin was acting on his own intuition and decisions.

He and King of Chariots, Colonel Murdoch Martinez had been ordered to stay at the capital in case other countries did something during the peace talks.

However, the countries in question could not function as though they were enemies right now.

Dryfe was surrounded by three countries: Altar to the south, Caldina to the east, and the seafaring Granvaloa to the north and west.

However, two of them, Caldina and Granvaloa, were in the middle of a conflict surrounding the Treasurebeast Orbs taken from Huang He.

Granvaloa had dispatched all of their Superiors that were capable of fighting on land, so the chances of them attacking Dryfe now were extremely low, while Caldina's forces were tied up in dealing with those Masters.

And since when it rains, it pours, the chaos in Caldina had led to even greater disorder. It had been confirmed that two major players from Legendaria had entered the country in search of the orbs.

One was a Superior and the leader of their top clan, YLNT Club.

He was a shotacon and a lolicon, as well as the pervert people often called "most Legendaria-like."

He was King of Curses, LS Ergo Sum the "Child's Play."

The other wasn't a Superior, but she was famous for having carved out a place in all three rankings.

Commanding enough power to match Superiors and a Master widely known as Legendaria's strongest pre-Superior, she was the Summon Princess, Yomiko Skydrag'in the "Duelist."

With the situation being what it was, it was hard to imagine that Caldina would have enough forces to spare for an attack on another country.

That was why Franklin had left Murdoch alone and traveled to this battlefield. He wanted to gather data through observation, but his main objective was to make his final adjustments to this ace up his sleeve — this monster.

It was why he'd agreed to stay at the capital rather than join the peace talks, and this battlefield he was on right now might've been the perfect place to test it.

Franklin hadn't actually intended to come out into the open like this, but the change in the situation had given him the perfect chance to do so.

And now, he and MGD were fighting Baldr.

"KoD's Baldr isn't a valid target for Chimeratech Aubade, while KoB's Leviathan is. It'd have been nice if it worked on Baldr, but, well... it's not an animal," he said, using the Analyzing Eye of Wisdom to check on MGD's state. "Now, I know that when the war comes, I'll have to avoid 1v1s against Baldr. I guess I should be glad that I came here and learned at least that much. Joining their 1v1 was about the only way for me to do the needed checks with safety margins in mind. I already learned that there were no problems with the upper limit back when I had MGD fight His Excellency's Zero Exceed."

All of this was less him talking to himself and more him verbalizing the results of his analysis.

But he seemed to be satisfied with what he'd found.

"If I came out right at the start, I'd have been attacked by Leviathan for getting in the way of her battle, but now she's desperately trying to go and help KoB. She won't make an enemy of me when I'm protecting he—whoa!"

Suddenly, MGD's cockpit began to shake.

"Hmm... I guess KoD not only has high stats, but is also absurdly skilled at fighting." He spoke casually, as though nothing special had happened, but this was right after MGD withstood an attack from Baldr in its ultimate form.

This was the reason why Franklin was inside MGD rather than on Pandemonium. He was absolutely certain that he was safer within his finest creation rather than his Embryo that could be hidden with optical camouflage.

Besides, if he was killed while hiding, his MGD would vanish as well, and he was thoroughly against such an absurd outcome.

However, since he was unable to keep up with MGD's and Baldr's battle speeds, he left all the fighting to his monster.

In fact, if the cockpit hadn't been designed with inertia reduction in mind, Franklin's frail body might've already been pulverized just by the shocks caused by MGD moving.

Not even AR-I-CA fights up close and personal at multiple times the speed of sound, he thought as MGD shook once more.

Wondering why these impacts had started occurring more frequently, Franklin looked around.

"...Hm? I just realized that Leviathan isn't moving much now. She's not attacking at all, in fact. KoD noticed that and is going after me now."

As though he only just caught up with what was happening, Franklin had developed a grasp of the situation.

Since he couldn't keep up with the speed of the battle, he wasn't able to see the super-supersonic movements of the two gigantic entities.

"I guess someone must've used a Contract that forced her to stop fighting." Franklin had seen Behemot do something at the assembly hall, but since he was observing that area from afar out of fear that Behemot would destroy it, he couldn't hear what was being said.

Still, Leviathan's actions were enough to guess what had happened.

"Now, how did all of that turn out...?" He carefully examined the information provided by his recon monsters and saw Claudiah and Behemot distance themselves from Altimia and Tsukuyo.

"Hmm... His Excellency and KoB are both out of the game. I guess it's time for me to retreat as well— whoa!"

Another shell, another shock. If MGD could defeat Baldr here, Franklin would've even been able to suppress the party of people at the assembly hall.

However, it was hard for him to guess just how well he would do in a 1v1 Leviathan didn't participate in.

"MGD does win in terms of stats, though. He endures Baldr's weapons even if it's his first time dealing with them... Man, what a troublesome enemy."

Remembering what happened back in Gideon, Franklin spoke with hate in his tone.

"Dylan, what's the current chance of victory?"

"Approximately 66%," said Dylan, the operational persona of MGD. "While damage dealt to us is increasing, the same can be said about our opponent. We have confirmed the loss of the left forearm and operational failures in the armaments. However, the percentage is based solely on known information. Anything that is hidden has not been considered."

"66%, eh? But this all depends on what kind of cards he holds in his hand... MGD can win against any creature that's all about power and nothing else."

If the fight kept going like this, they could win this, but then...

"Warning, Leviathan is leaving the effective range of Chimeratech Aubade."

"Ohh, now that is bad. As things are, we'd only get killed the moment she left."

The status quo of the fight had changed. One of the main conditions for the battle was about to leave.

When that happened their chances of victory would drop drastically.

"Well, we've shown ourselves enough. If they know that we still have something like this waiting for them, Altarians will hesitate to counterattack. Let's retreat too."

"Are you certain? Based on the state of the battle, retreating at this moment might allow the enemies to analyze the nature of Chimeratech Aubade."

"I'm certain. What are they going to find out just based on this one battle?" Franklin said with a grin. "Also, MGD's function is something that no one can really do anything about even if they know what it does. This encounter let me figure out that MGD might lose against Baldr, but we'll be fine against anyone else. Also..."

MGD's optical sensors focused on Leviathan.

"...Next time, Baldr will probably be dealing with the full-powered King of Beasts." That was how Franklin knew that he wouldn't have to fight KoD.

He would have to face some other Superior.

Also...

"But this is troubling... He went and died before I could crush him," Franklin said as he recalled the death of a certain newbie. "I recorded the whole thing, but there's really no point to dragging him down now, is there...?"

He had recorded not just Baldr and Leviathan's battle, but also the struggle at the assembly hall. It was hard to capture supersonic movements, but Franklin's monsters were up to the task. Though there were many sections where the camera was shaky, the recording still presented a general idea of what happened.

With a bit of judicious editing and comments, Franklin could greatly lower the boy's reputation, but he chose to refrain for now.

"All right. I'll praise Ray-boy to the sky. 'A Match for THE KoB!' is a title that'll get a ton of views."

As an idea formed in his mind, Franklin grinned.

"I'll elevate him as high as possible..."

And so...

"...Then drag him down to the abyss."

...He whispered these words, his grin widening all the while.

Interlude: Another Story

Altar-Dryfe border

King of Light, F had ended up doing nothing but watching the battles unfold. Unlike the other spectator, Franklin, he hadn't intervened even once during the entire fight.

That was partly due to each battle being engaging in its own right, and partly because he prioritized organizing his impressions and thoughts regarding Ray's battle.

Though, primarily, it was because he didn't have the means to intervene.

Even now after all the battles were over, he was busy penning down text in his notepad.

I was right to come here. There was immense value in seeing something directly rather than as a recording. It allowed the observation of many more honest emotions than some footage sullied by the technique, worldview, and editing of the one who did the recording.

This was especially clear in the comparison between the video of Ray's fight against Logan and the fight against King of Beasts he just witnessed. The real thing had made the recording seem tame by comparison.

All the battles ended while he was still writing down everything he needed.

All right. I suppose I'll now have to investigate what happened at the capital. F had actually figured out that the capital would be attacked a whole two days ago.

The reason for that was simple: he was invited to join the group behind it.

Specifically, the invitation had come from the infamous criminal clan, Illegal Frontier. "Ideas" claiming to serve the Soul Trader, La Crima, asked him if he would like to be a supporting member of the clan.

Long story short, the negotiations had failed.

The ones who tried to invite him instead attacked him, but he defeated them all, and among all the chaos, he learned of their plans to attack the capital.

It was difficult for him to choose which place to observe, but he opted for the assembly hall because Ray was there.

I'm sure I made the right choice because of the number of Superiors that were here too, but I'm still curious about the situation in Altea... Also, just how many of them did I.F. release into the city?

F hadn't intervened in the battles around the assembly hall like he had with the Love-Duel Festival. One reason for that was the fact that he prioritized filling his notebook... while the other was his lack of reserve fighting power.

After all... his Embryo, Zodiac, was almost completely depleted of light energy.

He had used it all against the Ideas that attacked him after their failed invitation.

F was Altar's strongest ranged pre-Superior, yet they had given him that much trouble.

And now, such creatures had been released into Altea.

Hm... Overcome by curiosity, he elevated the Zodiac he employed to spy on his surroundings.

Once high enough to see Altea, he made it face the horizon.

Of course, he couldn't normally see what was going on over there from this distance, but there was now an anomaly that was visible even to him.

In the center of the capital, there was a colossal pillar of fire.

It was an abnormality far larger and far taller than even Xunyu's Baolongba. And, again, it was rising from the center of the capital.

It almost seemed as though it was the city's final day.

"Hmm..." He had chosen to observe these battles instead of the assault on Altea, but he couldn't help but wonder what was happening there.

◇◆◇

Control AI no. 1's workspace

"...Hhaah." While the battles around the assembly hall were still commencing, Chrono Crown... no, control AI No. 12, Rabbit... returned to the avatar space with a somewhat uncomfortable expression.

His current avatar wasn't the one he had made to look like his late

Master — the one that had just been decapitated by Kashimiya — but the control AI he used to welcome new players.

This avatar was about what you would imagine a White Rabbit plush would be, clock and all. He was always in far too much of a hurry to welcome new players, but as the situation showed, there were times when he had occasion to use it.

“...So now there’s gonna be a war,” he said. “It’ll cost me some time... but I suppose there’s no way around it.”

War took his Resources and his freedom. He did all within his authority to prevent it, but as a result, he had died in a way that perfectly fit his role... to a Master in his sixth form.

He was aware that he’d gone too far and that Alice wouldn’t restore Chrono Crown for a while, so he could no longer stop the conflict.

At least he was able to witness the extraordinary boy known as Kashimiya and die to his impeccable technique, so he tried to at least be glad that he’d made a good memory to share with his Master.

“Hm...?” But then, he realized that something wasn’t right in this workspace.

He expected to have encountered his colleagues and gotten some stern talking-to by now, but they were all somewhere else.

He looked around a bit and found them gathered in a single place. Besides Cheshire — whom Rabbit had just fought — Bandersnatch — who was too big for the space — and Dormouse, everyone was here, in the monitor room they’d used when deploying Gloria to the kingdom.

“Did something happen?” he asked one of his colleagues — The Queen, who had the appearance of a carnivorous beast-woman.

“Welcome back, Rabbit... That avatar really is cute.”

“Shut up. Anyway, what happened?”

“There’s a bit of a disagreement about how to handle a certain situation. Mostly between Dormouse and Humpty.”

Rabbit looked and saw the two arguing over comms.

While they talked, they sent each other info and argued over simulations.

“Ohh? Now this is something.”

By that, Rabbit meant that it was rare for Dormouse to quarrel over anything.

Though, as colleagues who worked together for millennia, the control AIs rarely squabbled in general these days.

His own encounter with Cheshire was quite an exception, resulting mostly from Rabbit's relative lack of maturity — even though Cheshire was the youngest in terms of their numbering and interacted with people more often than most.

"What's the reason?"

"Is eliminating a risk worth it if it brings another risk."

"...That's not an explanation."

"Well, basically, there's a chance to destroy the seed of the next calamity along with all of Altea, and they're talking about what they should do." Rabbit had no words, but he instantly understood that something big was happening at the capital.

"...You could've told me that before the peace talks," he said as he realized that this could've prevented the war far more effectively.

He also understood that the incident surrounding the peace talks wasn't isolated to just the area around the assembly hall.

Thus, the story shifted to the capital, where there was no Ray, and none of Altar's Superiors.

This was far from over.

To Be Continued

Afterword

Bear: “Prebear yourselves for the Afterword! I am the Bear, Shu Starling!”

Fox: “And I’m the Fox, Tsukuyo Fusou! We’re the survivor duo, aren’t we?”

Bear: “...Hngh!”

Fox: “Hey?! What was that backhand for?! You’re taking this way too far!”

Bear: “This is the unbearable punishment that awaits those who casually make a killing in the main story.”

Fox: “I-I did, but that made KoB’s wallet thinner and damaged Dryfe’s econo—”

Bear: “No excuses! Kodachi!”

Fox: “Sunsleep Ink Shroud!”

In response to Shu’s kick, Tsukuyo donned the cloth of night.

Shu, however, didn’t miss a beat in his attack, figuring that he could break through it even if weakened by it.

But then, another layer... another wall of night was formed.

That was another one of the variations of the Lunar Divider Field — the “bowl.”

The wall of night that appeared between Shu and Tsukuyo was intended to surround him. If he tried to jump over it, she would surely attack him with her ranged “swallow” attack.

Despite that, Shu faced the wall closing in on him with an indomitable smile.

Then, after equipping the first form of his Embryo on his left hand, he—

Fox: “Hold on! This is an afterwooord! Stop stooop!”

Bear: “...Mrgh. We almost started a fantasy match-up that hasn’t even happened in the main story yet. That’d be beary bad.”

Fox: “How troublesome. You can be really over the top, you know that? Few people just burn down entire forests like you did.”

Bear: “I won’t bear such comments from someone who’s constantly greedy.”

Fox: “How ruuude. Ah. Look at that. While we were doing this, the time came for the author’s actual comments.”

Thank you for your purchase, dearest readers, I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

Our world at large is still being ravaged by the coronavirus. Are you all doing well in spite of that?

Various events all over the country have been canceled, and Dendro was affected by it in some ways, as well, but I suppose that this truly is the time for perseverance.

I can only hope that our events will return to us next year or the one that will follow.

Anyway, this volume was about Ray’s first deadly encounter against an “Apex,” who also doubled as the strongest enemy he’s yet faced.

I will leave it up to you readers to decide whether the outcome was a victory or a defeat.

If there is something I can say as an author, it would be that Ray protected what he had to.

This is unrelated to the text within this book, but I would like to point out that both color pages in this volume show Nemesis as a high-rank Embryo — the change in clothes that came with the evolution, as well as her fourth form — The Black Mirror.

Taiki did a wonderful job on both pieces, and I cannot thank him enough for it.

14 volumes have been released over 4 years, and looking at Nemesis on the color pages made me really feel how much she’s grown.

Though, she hasn’t changed much on the inside...

Besides the main story, there is the side story, Crow Record, which recently completed its first major arc. In the newest release that just came out, there should be the start of a comical water survival arc with swimsuits included. I was quite tired of all the seriousness, so I will make this one as fun as I can.

The manga adaptation reached the end of Figaro and Xunyu's battle, paving the way for Franklin to enter the stage. There might be some enjoyment to be gained from reading his lines in Yoshitsugu Matsuoka's voice.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram in the future.

With that in mind, volume 15 should be coming early-to-mid 2021.

Please look forward to seeing what happened during the battles around the assembly hall.

Sakon Kaidou

Fox: "He went and announced the next volume by himself!"

Bear: "Well, we both did it a bunch of times already. I can bear it... Speaking of which, where's Cheshire and Xunyu?"

Fox: "Cheshire couldn't come 'cause of some urgent business, while Xunyu told me that she's really busy with volume 15."

Bear: "...I'm gettin' some déjà vu here."

Fox: "Anyway, there weren't many people here this time, but just look forward to volume 15, okaay?"

Bear: "Get yer claws on it as soon as you can."

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters of series like this by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 14
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2020 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2020 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki

All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2020 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2021 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

Ebook edition 1.0: March 2021

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
15. GAME OVER

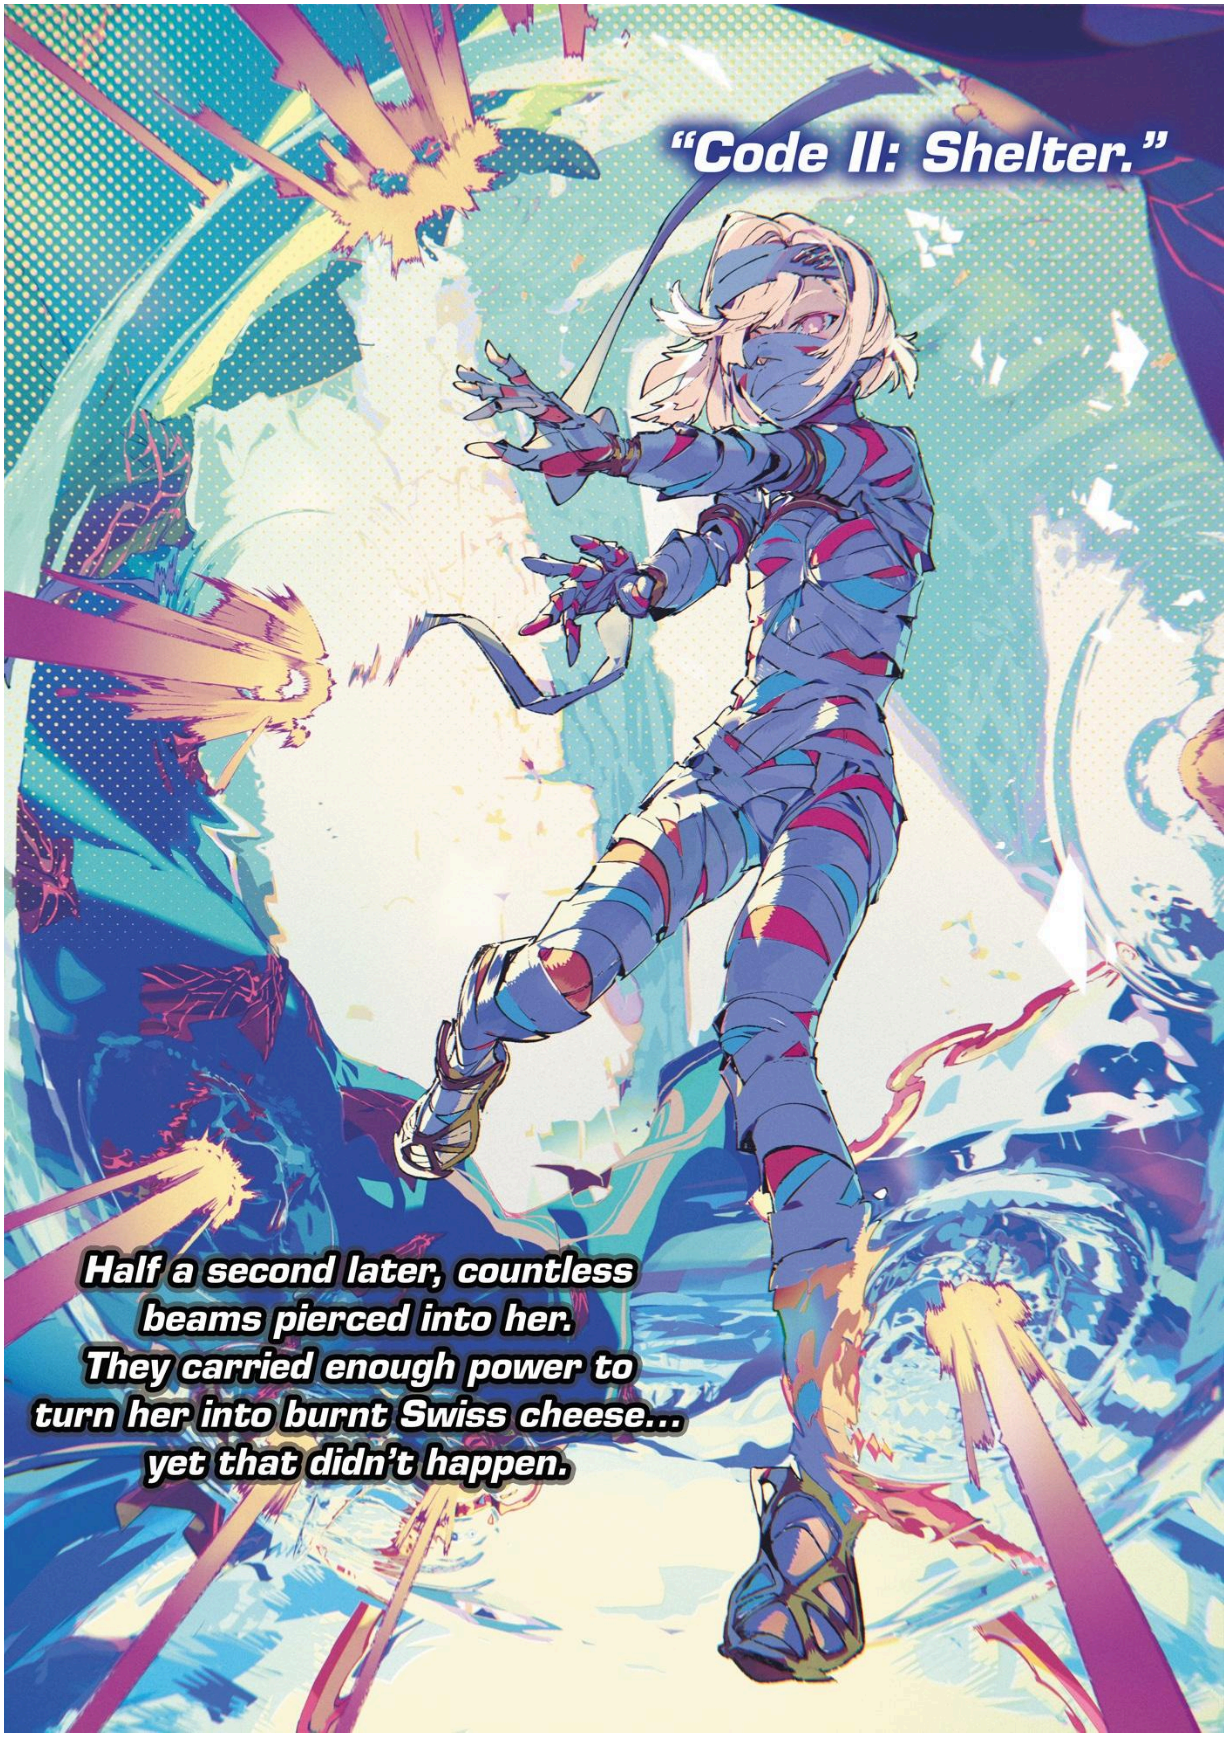
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
15. GAME OVER

Infinite Dendrogram

15. GAME OVER

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



"Code II: Shelter."
Half a second later, countless beams pierced into her. They carried enough power to turn her into burnt Swiss cheese… yet that didn't happen.

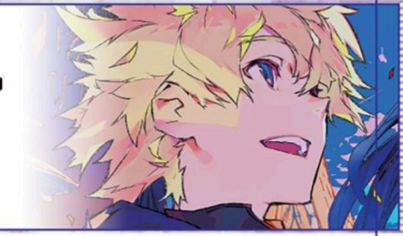
"Don't touch the... GAME OVER."

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

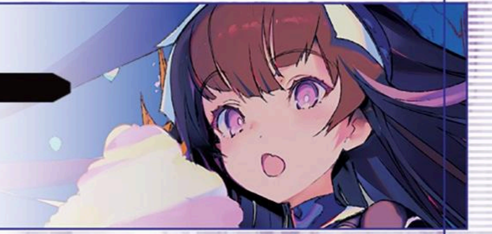
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. He's generally a calm person, but he has a strong sense of justice that renders him unbreakable when striving to do what's right.



Nemesis

Nemesis

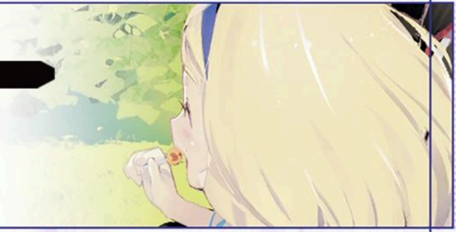
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. In her base form, she was capable of transforming into a greatsword, but now she's capable of becoming a wide variety of weapons. She's a bit of a glutton.



Elizabeth

Elizabeth S. Altar

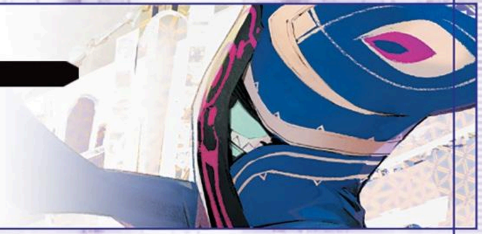
Second Princess of the Kingdom of Altar.
A carefree, tomboyish princess. She has a deep love for her sisters, even if they worry whenever she sneaks out of the castle.
Presently engaged to Canglong, Third Prince of Huang He.



Xunyu

Xunyu

A Superior hailing from the Huang He Empire.
Presently assigned to protect Prince Canglong. Their duelist ranking is exceptionally high, and they once contributed to the death of a SUBM.



Zeta

Zeta

A member of Illegal Frontier, a heinous clan of criminals.
She's a Superior, and the King of Thieves.
At the Dryfe Empire's behest, she's presently leading a group of insurgents to attack Altar's royal capital.
She once held the top duelist ranking position in Dryfe, and has contributed to the death of a SUBM.

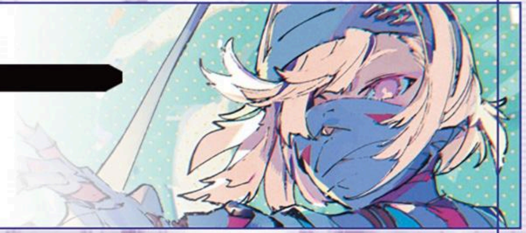


Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Conjunction: The Game Board They Know as This World

Chapter Eighteen: Values

Chapter Nineteen: Hero

Chapter Twenty: The Fiery Dance of the Jiangshi and the Mummy

Chapter Twenty-One: The Blades and Shields of Altar

Chapter From the Past: Memories of Fire

Chapter Twenty-Two: What Was Sought

Chapter Twenty-Three: The Humanoid Irregularity

Chapter Twenty-Four: Don’t Touch the GAME OVER

Chapter From the Past: What is Untouchable, What Shouldn’t be Touched

Chapter Twenty-Five: The Incarnation of Maelstroms

Chapter Twenty-Six: Supernova

Chapter Twenty-Seven: A Life of Fire

Epilogue

The Final Epilogue: Him, Her, and...

Afterword

About J-Novel Club

Copyright

Conjunction: The Game Board They Know as This World

The Gaol, Café "Dice"

Two figures were sitting in a café and playing a game of chess.

One was a black-haired man with a smile on his face, while the other was a tired-looking young woman.

"Board games are profoundly simple," said the man, moving his knight to take the lady's bishop. "Wouldn't you agree?"

This man was none other than King of Crime, Sechs Würfel — the proprietor of this establishment and the leader of the Illegal Frontier clan.

"...Not at all," the lady replied. "This is actually pretty hard for me..." She was Gerbera, a member of the aforementioned clan, as well as a freeloader here. As she played, her eyes were glazed over.

This was a slow business day, so the two had decided to pass the time with chess, but Gerbera was less than an amateur at the game. Even with handicaps, she was losing badly.

"Chess is simple," Sechs insisted as he took another one of Gerbera's pieces. "After all, there are only two factions on the board, and only one king for each of them to take. In reality, the number of factions can never be known, and there might be multiple kings that must fall in order to take each faction down. Also, there is a chance that the world itself — the game board, if you will — would bare its fangs, as well. I've seen it happen before."

"The world itself, huh...? You mean natural disasters like earthquakes? Oh, that reminds me — my dad told me about how he barely survived something like that back when he was a kid. Japan gets earthquakes all the time, doesn't it?"

Being half-Japanese and half-British, Gerbera had a certain degree of knowledge about Japan from her father. He always told her that the people there feared a few things: earthquakes, lightning, fire, and their fathers.

Would I also be afraid of my dad if I lived there? she wondered.

"Natural disasters... Well, I suppose you could call them that," said Sechs.

"...The way you're phrasing it is making me curious," Gerbera replied — as though Sechs's description of the world "baring its fangs" wasn't intriguing enough to begin with.

"It was certainly a disaster... But at the same time...I think it was the game board's 'king.'"

Sechs's words were truly bizarre — he seemed to be implying that the world itself was another player. That would be akin to the very chessboard they were using joining the game and playing against them.

...How would it move its pieces? Gerbera wondered, completely serious.

"Oh, right. I've yet to tell anyone in I.F. about that encounter. I'll have to distribute the information later."

"...Huh? You were talking about this world? Not reality...?" Gerbera asked in surprise.

"Yes," Sechs nodded. "Back then, I believe I saw the 'king-piece' of this world... Though, I suppose it's more fitting to call it the final boss."

Sechs casually stated something very shocking.

Gerbera's tired eyes and mouth went wide in surprise.

"...Am I reading too much into this, or did you just drop a bombshell on me? This game has a final boss? Seriously? Something above raid bosses like the SUBMs...?"

"Yes. The term 'final boss' suits this quite well, actually. Though, according to a friend of mine, it's the final boss of the world this game used to be. Observers like the Red King are the final bosses of the game this world is now."

Presenting information he'd gained from the most ancient monster of all — The Skydragon King — Sechs took a sip of his coffee.

"...Dendro isn't the first game in the series...? And...a 'friend' of yours? I... Are you sure you should be telling me this? I really wouldn't want to get a death penalty or something for knowing too much..."

"There's no need to worry about that. The control AIs would never do anything to affect the Masters irreversibly. Though, I suppose that doesn't apply to psychological damage."

"Hm?"

"I mean, the trauma from things like a tian friend of yours dying a horrible death."

"...Ohh. Well, there are lots of people who can't handle gore... But...where did you encounter this final boss, anyway? Some created dungeon...? Oh! I know! You're from Altar, so it's probably the Tomb Labyrinth, right?"

"I'm sorry, but no. It was in the capital, but not in that dungeon."

"Huh? What do you mean?" Sechs had just implied that the final boss was in the city of Altea itself, and Gerbera couldn't help but wonder how anyone could possibly run into something like that in such a mundane place.

"The final boss I met had a human form and led a human life," Sechs said with a smile on his face.

"...Wh-huuhh?" Her companion's words made Gerbera freeze up.

As he looked at her with amusement, Sechs remembered the latest report.

I believe today is the day Zeta will fulfill Dryfe's request and assault Altea, he thought. Zeta and La Crima — two core members of I.F. — had combined forces to attack the capital of the kingdom.

Dryfe's goal in this was to bring a certain entity out into the open and — if possible — finish it off.

Sechs was fairly certain that this "entity" was none other than the thing he'd seen back then.

I suppose I ended up talking about it because the memory was in the back of my mind... he thought.

Sechs believed that through this event, Dryfe would find out what he knew. That would cause a drastic shift in the world, much like it had during the war in which Sechs challenged Shu to a battle he couldn't refuse.

Does that mean it would also be stirred into motion? I'm far away from it all at the moment, though. It would be quite a bother if everything ended while I'm still stuck here, he thought as he looked outside, at the scenery of the gaol.

A false sky, a false horizon...a false world, built by Red King using walls of spatial fixation.

"I suppose it must be starting right about now," he muttered, looking out at the closed world — though he seemed to truly be seeing something far beyond its walls.

Chapter Eighteen: Values

The Royal Capital of Altea, City Quarter

Shortly after the peace talks at the border fell apart, Altea was thrown into a state of chaos when it found itself under attack by grotesque hybrids of bee and human — Apis Ideas.

They killed people using their poisonous, spear-like stingers — and upon death, their victims exploded violently, causing damage to anyone nearby. It would be accurate to call them murderous bioweapons. The guards and Masters inside the city fought back against them while attempting to get the inhabitants to safety, but each and every Apis Idea possessed stats that surpassed even Demi-Dragon-tier creatures. Of the Altarian tians, only the Royal Guard had any chance of fighting them one-on-one, so they were forced to face the monsters in groups.

Even Masters who could take on an Apis Idea each weren't having it easy.

"Riser! They're not just strong — they blow up too! We can't fight 'em close up!" shouted Lang, the hippogriff-mounted Gale Rider and member of the Babylonian Battlegroup.

"Tell the other members to fight with guns, bows, and magic. Anyone without a ranged attack can use the Gems in the clan's storage!"

"Roger that!" Lang was talking to a man riding a motorbike smuggled from Dryfe. Another Gale Rider, this man was Masked Riser, number six in the duel rankings, as well as the acting leader of the Babylonian Battlegroup. While he drove the bike through the streets and shot at the bee-men with a rifle, he used a magical comms device to talk to his clan members.

...Good thing I got Fuso to heal me, Masked Riser thought. Tsukuyo had healed all the wounds he'd sustained in his fight against Chrono Crown. With his Embryo damaged, he wasn't as powerful as he could be, but thanks to her healing abilities, he could at least still fight.

As a temporary replacement for Hermod, Masked Riser was using an MP-powered motorbike that had been leaked from Dryfe.

Things really aren't looking so good right now though, he thought. At the moment, there were few combat-capable Masters in the capital.

Most of the duel rankers had been assassinated the day before yesterday and their death penalties had yet to expire, while The Lunar Society and Death Period — the first- and second-ranked clans — were at the peace talks. The third, K&R, was missing their two Superior Jobs.

And because The Lunar Society and K&R were both based in Altea, most of the other ranking clans had chosen to set up in other cities. Because of this, the only Masters around who were capable of fighting this wave of enemies were the members of the Babylonian Battlegroup, the rest of K&R besides Kashimiya and Rosa, and a handful of others.

As for the kill rankers... Most of them aren't here, but I guess there aren't many of them who can fight in a city. Like the very top ranker — King of Destruction, Shu Starling — most of the kill rankers possessed immense firepower that was best suited for taking on swarms of monsters. The majority of them would only be of limited use in this situation.

"Damn it! This is too much for us! It's like we're playing chess and our side hasn't got a queen!" Lang said, his thoughts running similar to Riser's.

In response, Riser swallowed his worries and said, "That still leaves the knights, the bishops, the rooks, and the pawns. Let's show them what we're made of."

"...All right!" Lang said, trying to pull himself together.

"I'll go east. You meet up with squad B and head west."

"Roger that!"

After about a minute of driving, Riser arrived at a barricade blocking the road.

Beyond it was one of Altea's several town halls; it seemed like it was being used as a shelter and the barricade was there to protect the people inside.

Near the roadblock stood several people, all of them dressed in the uniform of the city guard.

"You are...Masked Riser!" one of them said as Riser came close. His unique-looking mask and long history as a duel ranker made him well-known among the kingdom's tians.

"How's the situation here?" he asked, dismounting from the bike.

“We repelled the first and second wave, but we’ve suffered some casualties of our own...and a third wave might be on the way.”

“Are you saying that this place is being targeted specifically?”

“Yes. It’s not just here, though. They seem to be prioritizing locations where there are a lot of people.”

It looked as though the bee-men were attacking at random, but they were actually trying to be as efficient as possible — efficient at killing people, that is.

They had enough sentience to attack where they would do the most harm, and they exploded upon death to do even more damage.

“According to guards stationed elsewhere, these bee-men are coming in everywhere, even the rear entrances, and—”

“The bee-men have appeared at the national church’s shelter! The explosions are threatening the evacuees!”

“Damn it...!” the guard captain cursed. This wasn’t the first time today he’d received news like that.

Among the bee-men, some of them had been bee-men from the very beginning, and others had started out looking human.

The latter often blended in among the evacuating citizens to hide inside shelters before revealing their true forms in a fatal explosion.

Their efficiency at slaughter was as impressive as it was fearsome.

The shelters can’t refuse to take in the evacuees, but it’s difficult to tell them apart from the disguised bee-men... This is bad, Riser thought.

Not even Reveal could expose them. It only showed their names and a low job level that didn’t reflect their true stats, and unlike monsters, their names didn’t display above their heads. That latter fact made it extremely difficult to tell them apart from normal humans — and it was also proof that, despite their grotesque appearance, these bee creatures were also human.

“What are they, anyway?! Some Legendarian tribe?!” The guard captain’s words left Riser deep in thought.

If they’re not monsters, that’s the most obvious assumption...but that can’t be it. According to a Babylonian Battlegroup member who had a job from the researcher grouping, the post-transformation bee-men had the “insectoid” typing. That just wasn’t normal.

No matter how insect-like they looked, a humanoid tribe would always be of the “human” type. There were jobs that changed this, such as Lich, which turned the humanoid that had it into “undead,” and Ogre Samurai, which did the same with “Oni.” However, according to Reveal, the bee-men had no such jobs.

Even if it was some kind of job, it wouldn’t explain the transformation ability or why the stats don’t match their levels... Hold on, he thought to himself as he realized there was another possibility — that these might be humans who had been warped by Embryos or UBMs.

It was unlikely, though, that UBMs would commit such a complicated act of terrorism. Riser had been in this world a long time, but even he could only think of one such example — the Exodragon King that had schemed behind the scenes in Gideon.

But that would mean that these bee-men were created by a Master, and...how could anyone like that actually exist...? Riser didn’t want to believe that. If that were true, it would mean that there was a Master who turned tians into living weapons. He was a solid worlder and really didn’t want to accept that someone so callous really existed in Dendro.

“...Whatever the case, I have to stop these attacks on the shelter.” Even if the bee-men were transformed tians, he’d already resolved to stop them from harming any more innocent people.

What he needed right now was a means of telling evacuees and the bee-men apart, but his Babylonian Battlegroup didn’t have anyone with an Embryo that could help in that regard.

Right as Riser began to fear that the bee-men would retain the element of surprise all the way through...

“U-Um...!”

...a girl called out to him.

“Hm? You’re...” She seemed familiar to him.

This girl and Riser both knew Ray and had been in each other’s presence several times now.

“I’m Kasumi...from Death Period...” Kasumi was a member of Death Period who had been unable to participate in the peace talks due to real life circumstances. She was accompanied by Io and Fujinon, who also couldn’t join Ray for similar reasons.

“Yeah, I remember you. All of you,” said Riser. “So you stayed here in Altar, huh?”

"Y-Yes...! Umm... I have something...to say...!"

"You do?"

Kasumi nodded before showing Riser the board in her hands — her Embryo, Taijitu.

"My...my Taijitu can show the locations and levels of nearby Embryos...!" Before, it could only pinpoint the Masters themselves, but its recent ascension to a high-ranking Type Angel-Arms had expanded this ability to their Embryos as well.

Riser instantly understood what she was getting at.

"Those bee-men..." Kasumi said. "They're all marked as 'VII'...Superior Embryos...!" Taijitu was reacting to the fragments of a certain Embryo within the bee-men and displaying their locations.

"Superior... Wait, more importantly, you're saying that you can tell them apart from regular humans even when they're disguised?!"

"Yes...!" That was great news. The greatest threat right now were the bee-men blending in with the evacuees, so dealing with them would greatly reduce the casualties.

"Can you tell us where they are?" Riser asked.

"Yes...! I'll mark them...! So please...inform everyone else!" Kasumi said before looking into her Taijitu and touching its surface.

She traced her finger over the many "VII" signals it was displaying.

"Taijitu...Marking!" The moment she used that skill, their surroundings slightly changed.

A downward-pointing triangle, looking like something straight out of a GPS app, suddenly appeared above one of the evacuees heading to the nearby shelter.

That was it — the mark distinguishing the enemies blending in among the tians.

"...There's one!" Kasumi called.

"Got it!" Io and Fujinon quickly leaped into action. Fujinon — now a high-rank job, Geomancer — used earth magic to bind their target in place.

"BZzzZZzzZz..." The moment he was bound, the man instantly transformed into a grotesque human-bee hybrid.

However, a moment later, he was split in half by a giant axe — none other than Io's Embryo, Five-Ring.

It exploded as it died, but since there was no one nearby, the explosion did no further harm.

In fact, Five-Ring was so large and long that the explosion didn’t move it an inch, and Io was so far away that she almost didn’t feel the shock wave from the blast.

“A-A mark...? What was that...?” This sudden turn of events perplexed the guards, and Riser realized that the situation had now shifted in their favor.

Kasumi’s Marking skill didn’t contribute to the battle directly, but it allowed them to neutralize the bee-men hiding in shelters before they could do too much damage.

“...Can I assume that all the bee-men in the city are now marked?” Riser asked.

“Y-Yes! Taijitu covers the entire city... But the five ‘VII’s at the castle were too fast for me to touch...”

“The castle...” The bee-men were powerful, but not absurdly fast.

Does that mean that the “VII”s at the castle aren’t just these minion bee-men? Could they be actual Superiors...? No, I can’t focus on that right now...! Riser had many questions, but they were less important than the task before him.

He grabbed his comms magic device and said, “Attention, all members of the Babylonian Battlegroup: the tians with arrows above them are actually bee-men. Question and bind them just in case, and neutralize them if they expose themselves!”

With that, the members of the Babylonian Battlegroup scattered all over Altea now had the necessary information.

The guards at Riser’s side were also busy contacting their fellow guards all over the city.

“Thank you,” he said, turning to Kasumi. “You really turned the tide in our favor. Hm...?”

For some reason, the girl wasn’t listening to him. She was just staring at her Taijitu with her head tilted to the side.

“...Is something wrong?” Riser asked.

“L-Look...” she said, pointing at a particular location on the map, her finger shaking.

Riser, Io, and Fujinon all came to see what had made her so unsettled.

Kasumi was pointing to the fountain plaza at Altea’s southern main street — the place that functioned as the city's save point.

There were a large number of "VII"s clustered all around it. They were overlapping in a way that made them hard to count, but there couldn't be fewer than a hundred, at least. That was no doubt a much higher number of monsters than had been initially released.

"Th-They weren't there before..." Kasumi said.

"Hmm..." If they had been there from the start, Kasumi would've certainly noticed them when she was marking the others. That could only mean that they did indeed just appear suddenly, without warning.

If that save point was the place where the bee-men emerged from hiding...

"...That could very well be the source of the invasion." If they ignored this, the situation could become unsalvageable.

Riser made his decision. Then, he grabbed the comms device connecting him to his clan members.

"Attention, all members of the Babylonian Battlegroup! It's likely that the source of the bee-men is near the fountain in the southern part of Altea. Anyone who can move quickly, go straight there and prepare to fight. I'm heading over too!"

Riser then leaped back onto his motorbike and headed towards the fountain.

Upon seeing his swift departure, Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon looked at each other and nodded before jumping on their own Landwing mounts and spurring them towards the same destination.

A few minutes later, they all arrived at the fountain from the northern side of the main street.

The other Babylonian Battlegroup members were nowhere in sight, but if they were following Riser's instructions properly, they were surely moving to surround the source from every direction.

"What...?" said Riser, struck by the odd sight before him.

Over a hundred bee-men stood in an orderly fashion, like a well-trained army.

"Oh my. Oh me oh my. Ohohohoho!" The sound of laughter began to echo from somewhere beyond the line of soldiers. The sound was unpleasant — like a mix between a human voice and the buzzing of an insect. "Congratulations! You are the first humans in the whole city to have the honor of an audience with me. Oh, how splendid. Truly delightful!"

This speech was quite unlike the incoherent buzzing of the bee-men. Garbled though it was, it was still easily recognizable as human speech.

The owner of the voice was sitting elegantly on the edge of the fountain, surrounded by the bee-man army. "Sitting" might not even be the correct word for the figure's pose, as its body was terribly warped.

The speaker appeared to be a mixture of a well-proportioned human woman and several bees. The resulting discord in its form made it hard to tell if it was actually "sitting."

It even had a bee-like abdomen — or rather, several of them.

Compared to this creature, even the bee-men didn't look grotesque.

"What...who are you?!" Riser yelled.

"'Who?!' That is your first question when faced with such a beautiful being?! Oh my! Such ignorance!" The buzzing, mumbling voice made it difficult to read her emotions, but it was fairly obvious that the question had made the creature upset.

"But I will forgive you," it added. "This is the kingdom of Altar — a place so dreadfully unlike the wondrous fairyland I call home. I cannot fault you for not knowing me. Ignorance is not exactly a sin, after all."

"Fairyland...?" Riser didn't miss that word. There was only one country that it could apply to.

"Indeed. I am Eh Teln Pare! As the holder of the Insect General job, I once served Legendaria's army, but the foolish queen and those who follow her branded me a rebel and chased me out of the country!"

Riser had now obtained the enemy's name and job. However, that information was nothing compared to what it...she said next.

"And now, I serve I.F.! Especially La Crima, who recognized my beauty, saw that I was in the right, and granted me these new soldiers!"

"I.F....!" Riser knew of the clan — a group of Superior villains.

That was enough to be certain of who was behind this incident.

"And now...ohh, and now...!" Eh Teln Pare went on as though intoxicated, "I am Regina! Regina Apis Idea! The queen bee! And the true queen of fairyland!"

She proudly revealed the name she had been given as a modified human. "I will use this fight to grow stronger, then free my ancestral home from that misguided queen! I can't allow my beloved Legendaria to continue along its wayward course any longer...!" Eh Teln Pare practically sang out her true desires. "And you will be the first sacrifices towards achieving that end!" Finally, she unleashed her Apis Ideas onto Riser's group.

The ten Apis Ideas in the front of the formation were the first ones to attack. Ten was more than double the size of Riser's group, and the ones that remained were more than enough to protect Pare...or rather, Regina Apis Idea, the queen bee herself.

All of the Apis Ideas were affected by the Insect General job's skills: Insectoid Enhancement and its final skill, Even a Worm Will Burn.

At skill level EX, the former ability merely doubled all of their stats, while the effect of the latter was more complicated.

It was one of the few Superior Job final skills for which someone else, not the user, paid the price.

When an insectoid within the party died, the skill made them explode with a force proportional to their stats. The collective firepower carried by the Apis Ideas, all above Demi-Dragon-tier in stats, was simply immense — as evidenced by the many Masters they had already destroyed.

And now, all of this power was focused on Riser and the three girls.

"Ngh...!" Under normal circumstances, a high-ranking duelist like him might have been able to easily repel these Apis Ideas. However, his Embryo was still damaged, so he lacked the firepower needed to destroy them without a great deal of effort.

"Keep your distance from them! I'll slow them down!" Despite this setback, he still had means of fighting them — one of which was an inventory filled with high-rank offensive ultimate job skill Gems.

He reached into his inventory now and took out a stark white Gem before tossing it towards the ten Apis Ideas as they charged forward.

A moment later, the spherical area surrounding the Gem was flooded with white.

"BzZz... BzZ..." The ten Apis Ideas were instantly covered in frost, which greatly slowed them down.

The spell contained in the Gem was White Field, the ultimate job skill for Cryomancers. Though it was weaker than Crimson Sphere in the same tier, it had the effect of ridding an area of its thermal energy and inflicting the Frozen status.

Though the Apis Ideas had Demi-Dragon-tier stats, they were human-sized and possessed the insectoid weakness to low temperatures.

"Riser! Get down!" Io shouted, putting her Five-Ring under her arm and swinging it horizontally.

The heavy weapon, specialized in offense, easily split and pulverized the Frozen insectoids.

The Apis Ideas scattered and died...

"Huh?"

...but unlike the others, they didn't explode.

Their severed top and bottom halves were still moving towards them.

"Get back!" Riser shouted, and the girls immediately created distance between them and the Apis Ideas.

As they fled, Kasumi summoned a Balloon Golem to act as a shield, while Fujinon used her earth magic to create a barricade.

Both of them stopped the Apis Ideas in their tracks, and after ten seconds or so...they all exploded, as per usual.

It was as though their deaths had been delayed.

"I know this...!" As an experienced Master, Riser was familiar with one job that made this possible.

"They're Death Soldiers!" The Apis Ideas the queen had at her side — the ones she called the "Queen's Guard" — were different from the other bee-men in two ways.

First, they had their transformation ability removed in exchange for doubling their stats.

And second...all of them were Death Soldiers.

That was the job used by suicide troops in the wars several centuries ago. It was perfect for the purpose because of its Last Command skill, which allowed movement after death.

Having this job would make it impossible for the Apis Ideas to blend in among normal people, for skills like Reveal would instantly expose them. However, the Queen's Guard couldn't transform and thus had no need to blend in, so they lost nothing from becoming Death Soldiers.

This was the greatest advantage Apis Ideas had over ordinary monsters.

Being originally human, they had the ability to acquire jobs. They were still experimental creatures, and Death Soldier was the only job they seemed to utilize so far, but the future held the promise of amazing, fully optimized builds.

Their ability to take Death Soldier was terrifying enough, however. As long as Last Command was active, the Queen's Guard were able to charge at their enemies even if torn to pieces.

Additionally, since Last Command only allowed for the movement of parts still connected to the brain, the Queen's Guard overcame this limitation by having their central nervous system distributed around their body.

Of course, that made human-like thought impossible. Their intellect was arguably even lower than that of actual insects, but that didn't affect their ability to act as the Insect General's pawns. The morality of their creation aside, Apis Ideas were extremely potent soldiers under Regina's command.

"Oh? Ten wasn't enough? You're more skilled than I expected. How commendable," she said, nonchalantly releasing more Apis Ideas from her Jewel.

She seemed to think nothing of the ten former human beings she had just seen die. It was as though they were nothing more than actual insects to her.

"...Fiend!" Riser shouted, unable to restrain himself any longer.

The Apis Ideas were no doubt his enemies, and he was determined to protect Altea from them — but thinking about it from another perspective, they were the nauseating creations of a truly warped mind, and thus victims in their own right.

"Fiend? Certainly not," Regina said, clearly irritated. "Legendaria is the truly fiendish power here. I am fighting to fix it, so I cannot be in the wrong."

"What does Legendaria have to do with this?!" Riser raised his voice in anger. Even if she was right about Legendaria, it didn't make her any less of a fiend. There were many conflicts, past and present, where both sides were evil.

"My motherland is overcome by madness! The machinery has come undone, letting foolish ideas spread unchecked!" Regina continued, clearly ignoring what Riser was trying to say. "I had to right this wrong, even if it meant becoming a rebel and initiating a coup d'état! My will to do so has not wavered, even now that I have sworn loyalty to La Crima!"

Riser had heard rumors that there was a secret feud within Legendaria's ruling class, so he could only guess that Regina wanted to set things right.

Still, that was no excuse for her horrific actions.

“Indeed! I had to resist! I had no choice! My country has gone mad, and it is traveling down the wrong path!” Regina continued to bare her soul in a buzzing monologue — as if Riser and the others weren’t even there.

“Yes! Legendaria is making a grave mistake. After all, they...”

And so...

“They revere Titania instead of me — the beautiful Pare!”

...she revealed her ultimate motivation — one that only she herself could ever see as righteous.

Riser, Kasumi, Io, Fujinon...everyone present could barely comprehend what they’d just heard. They felt as though their ears were failing them.

After all, Regina had just said that she rebelled because people fawned over the queen of fairyland more than her.

To them, as well as to most other people, this motivation and the actions taken on behalf of it were completely incomprehensible.

“It just isn’t right, don’t you think?! That ugly creature — beautiful? Lovable?! Worthy of idol-like adoration?! Utter madness! The entire country has lost its mind!”

Riser was still at a loss for words. Images of Titania could be found all over Infinite Dendrogram, as well as on the internet in reality. Riser had seen them too, and remembering what she looked like, he thought, If not finding her ugly is madness, then I guess I also need professional help. The queen of the fairyland was just that beautiful.

It actually felt wrong to compare her to Regina — this monstrosity of warped insect flesh.

“I tried asserting my beauty, but nobody listened! If that isn’t madness, I don’t know what is!” Regina exclaimed.

“B-But...if your beauty was so important to you...why did you transform into this...?” Kasumi meekly asked.

Like the other Apis Ideas, Regina was marked on the Taijitu as a “VII.” It seemed as though she used to be human and had been transformed into what she was now, but...

“What do you mean?” Regina tilted her head in confusion. “My beautiful form wasn’t changed one bit.”

Her response made them even more perplexed.

“I specifically asked the one who gave me power and this army to let me keep the beautiful form I was born with. I was told that might limit how powerful I could be, but that didn't matter! Nothing in this world is more valuable than my beauty!"

Regina's words were laden with confidence in her righteousness.

Riser just looked at her, saying nothing. Everyone had different values. What was good in one's eyes was bad in another's, so in a way, Regina wasn't completely in the wrong.

"Anyone who suggests otherwise is misguided! And I will correct everyone who does!"

However, her greatest error was misjudging the outlook of the vast majority.

"Those who don't accept my beauty are the source of this terrible wrongness, and I will kill them all. I will free Legendaria and the rest of the world from their madness! I am beauty! I am justice!"

She was clearly insane, and yet she believed that everyone else was — and she never doubted this for even a second.

Kasumi had Truth Discernment, and the fact that Regina's words didn't trigger it sent a chill down her spine.

Regina truly believed that she was more beautiful than anyone else, and that she should be adored by everyone. If that wasn't how things were, she would rather destroy the world than let it continue in ignorance.

The powers she gained, the Apis Ideas she commanded, her repulsive appearance that she thought was beautiful...many things here could be called "monstrous," but none of them compared to her alien mind.

"...I see," said Riser. He realized that he was facing someone who would mow down everyone in her path for the sake of her own values...and if that wasn't evil, he didn't know what was.

With that in mind...

"Babylonian Battlegroup, attack!"

...he used his comms device to send out an order.

A moment later, the Babylonian Battlegroup members who were surrounding the fountain plaza showed themselves and charged towards Regina. They had assumed their positions and prepared for an ambush while Riser and the three girls distracted the bee queen.

Twelve Masters all attacked Regina from every direction.

No matter how modified, not even a Superior Job could withstand the combined might of that many ultimate high-rank jobs and Embryo skills.

And Regina herself had admitted that she wasn't as enhanced as she could be.

She fought back with her squad of Apis Ideas, but Babylonian Battlegroup's Masters, experienced as they were, easily broke through...and aimed their entire assault straight at Regina.

Multiple Masters all played their most powerful cards in their bid to defeat her.

...And a moment later, explosions resounded from all across the city.

Some of them were close at hand — a number of the Queen's Guard had blown up, taking several of the attacking Masters with them.

"Oh, what a surprise. There goes a hundred of them," said Regina — who, unlike the Masters, was completely unharmed.

It was as though the damage she should've sustained went somewhere else.

"What? This is..." Riser instantly understood what happened just now, and it was terrifying.

"...Lifelink!"

"Not exactly, but close enough," said Regina.

The skill she was using was called "Colony for One."

It was the Insect General's passive skill, and it made it so that any damage she suffered would instead be transferred to any in-range insectoids under her command. It had a far greater range than Lifelink and wasn't as restrictive about what types of minions it worked on.

As long as there were Apis Ideas within range, Regina wouldn't receive a single point of damage.

And since any damage to her was transmitted straight to her minions spread all over the capital...

"But that...that means that..."

"If we attack her, we'll just cause more explosions in the city?!"

...It meant that any attacks on Regina could result in disaster.

"Ohohoh! So, what will you do now? I wouldn't mind if you keep fighting me just as you have been. No one can sully my beauty!" Regina laughed, summoning more Apis Ideas, which instantly readied their poison stingers and aimed them at the Masters.

Regina couldn't be harmed — she held the capital hostage and could increase the size of her army as she wished.

Those facts made Riser realize that, Gloria aside, he was up against his most fearsome foe yet.

Chapter Nineteen: Hero

September, 2044

On that day, the Babylonian Battlegroup was fighting a UBM on a plateau near the city of Claymill.

The clan was a force to be reckoned with, and many powerful UBMs had already fallen to them. In most cases, the MVP special rewards for those victories went either to Foltesla — their leader and the third in Altar's duel rankings — or Shulka — the clan's sub-leader who formed the backbone of the group.

However, things were different with the UBM they fought this day — Jetdragon, Valcan.

This monster was a landdragon that had mutated and gained the ability to fly at supersonic speeds by releasing the energy within it to propel itself, much like a rocket. Valcan fought primarily by combining the tough body of a landdragon with immense speed, creating fearsome charge attacks.

Since arriving in the area surrounding Claymill, this UBM had caused tremendous damage to the local ecosystem and greatly affected the lives of the citizens. That was why the Babylonian Battlegroup had set out to vanquish it, but that turned out to be easier said than done.

After all, Valcan was a landdragon that could freely fly through the air. Foltesla and Shulka's attacks couldn't reach it, any power-focused skills always missed, and those with skills focused on accuracy couldn't penetrate its hard outer body.

Battles in Infinite Dendrogram were always strongly influenced by compatibility, and it seemed that the Babylonian Battlegroup as a whole stood no chance against Valcan...but there was one among them who was capable of battling the creature.

His name was Masked Riser.

His Embryo was still only in its fifth form, but its skills made it possible for Riser to briefly fly at supersonic speeds and deliver powerful attacks.

Because of that, the clan created a strategy centered around him, and the result was a resounding success.

Though the other members of the Babylonian Battlegroup were barely even able to touch the monster, they could still use their abilities to limit Valcan's movement enough for Riser, fully buffed by Shulka, to deliver an attack that brought it down to the ground. This created an opportunity for the rest of them. Shulka used Lahmu to bind Valcan before it could take to the sky again, letting the others lay into it with everything they had.

When it was defeated, Riser was chosen as the MVP.

He himself was perplexed by this, but everyone else — the leaders included — believed that he richly deserved the award, and that was the end of the battle against Valcan.

However, Riser then found himself perplexed by something else entirely.

His MVP special reward — the first he'd ever gotten — wasn't some powerful piece of gear, but a material.

"...What am I supposed to do with this?" he said, frowning beneath his mask. He was sitting in the lounge of his clan's headquarters and staring at the object placed on the table — the item called "Compressed Remains of Jetdragon, Valcan."

It was slightly larger than an adult man and looked like a statue of the dragon who had borne the same name.

Despite that, it was no doubt his MVP special reward: an MVP special material, to be precise.

The summoner grouping could use items of this kind as catalysts to summon weaker versions of the UBMs. The necromancer grouping could use them as remains to create undead. If any crafting jobs somehow managed to become MVPs, they could use the material in their production efforts.

As a result, this kind of MVP special reward often went to players with these kinds of jobs.

However, Riser was a fully battle-focused Master. Neither his build nor Embryo had any production capabilities, so there was nothing he could do with the Compressed Remains.

This was his first MVP special reward, but it was completely wasted on him.

"What's wrong, Riser?"

"Leader..." Suddenly, he was approached by Foltesla.

“Oh, that’s the MVP reward you got yesterday,” the clan leader said. “You still haven’t asked someone to work on it?”

“Yes, it’s the reward... Wait, what do you mean ‘ask someone to work on it?’” Riser said, not sure if he actually heard that right.

“Hm? You didn’t know?” the leader said. “Other people can work on MVP special materials, but only the MVP who received it can use the final product.”

“Is that how it works?”

“Yeah. Totally battle-focused Masters only get material like this when they know someone who can work with it. I once got an MVP reward that could be turned into medicine and had my wife make it for me. I bet you know someone who can do something with this material too.”

“I see,” Riser said. A particular individual did indeed come to his mind immediately. “I’ll go and put in the request right away.”

“See you later, then,” said Foltesla. “Show me the final result, okay?”

The Fortress City of Claymill had been built several centuries ago as a defensive base. Because of that, it had a strong equipment production sector; supposedly, it had the most tians with crafting jobs of any city in Altar.

Riser brought the Compressed Remains to the workshop of one of the city’s most skilled craftsmen. He opened the door, looked at the many people hard at work, and said, “Excuse me, is Mr. Zola here?”

“Oh, well if it ain’t Riser! I’m here, laddie. What brings you in today? Your mask seems all right to me.”

An aging man polishing what looked like a piece of armor replied to Riser’s call. He was the exact person Riser had been looking for — High Armorsmith, Zola. The man was the owner of this workshop and spent day after day working alongside his apprentices there to fulfill many equipment requests from Masters and tians alike.

Riser had known Zola since shortly after he arrived at Claymill, which was more than two years ago by that point. The metal mask Riser was wearing right now — based on those worn by heroes from action-heavy tokusatsu shows — had been created by none other than Zola.

In the early days right after Infinite Dendrogram’s release, most Masters could only craft things based on designs that already existed. In order to create something that had no established recipe, one had to wait until exceptionally skilled craftsmen appeared or until some sort of technological innovation made the process easier.

The same principle applied to customization of existing designs. Even turning a standard full-face helm into a mask without compromising its stats required a skilled hand.

Creating an item that functioned like a metal full-face helm but looked like a mask worn by tokusatsu heroes was too challenging for the first wave of Masters, so Riser had no choice but to rely on a tian craftsman.

However, that came with its own problems.

In hindsight, Riser felt that he had been quite unreasonable back then.

I asked him to make me a hero mask when the concept of "tokusatsu" didn't even exist here, he thought. The word "hero" only makes most tians think of "The Hero," which was a Special Superior Job.

Because of that, he and Zola went through many clashes of opinion before they reached a mutual understanding and began making progress. After much experimentation based on Riser's poor drawings, they eventually created the mask Riser wore now.

As Riser leveled up, he also had Zola create improved versions of the same mask design using better materials. They even had a Recipe for it now, making it easy to create replacements in case the mask was destroyed.

Through their many interactions during all this, Riser and Zola had become such good friends that he was even welcome to join the smith's family and apprentices at his dinner table. There was no craftsman Riser trusted more, and he believed Zola was the perfect man for this job.

"I have a request," Riser said, presenting the Compressed Remains and asking Zola to make equipment out of it.

"Hrm..." However, Zola didn't seem too thrilled about it.

It looked like he was conflicted...even hesitant to accept this job.

"Lad... Wouldn't it be better to get someone else to do this?" he asked.

"Why?"

"This material's too much for me...simple as that," he said, placing a hand on the headpiece of the remains. "I've heard of UBM special materials before, but it's my first time seeing the real thing. Never worked with stuff this good. I'd be biting off more than I can chew."

"But..."

"And...I ain't a Superior Job," Zola said with a sigh. "I'm just an everyday craftsman who can't even reach max level. This is a one-of-a-kind material. Don't leave it with me. You're better off taking it to a Superior Job or a Master with an Embryo good for smithing."

Unlike Masters, tians had individual differences in talent that could cap their level below 500.

Zola was well aware of the limits of his abilities and tried to refuse Riser's request because he didn't consider himself good enough. An unskilled craftsman would only waste the rare material, after all.

However, looking into Zola's eyes, Riser also saw an artisan's desire to create something truly unique.

Fully understanding the smith's point, Riser...

"That doesn't matter to me. I want you to create it."

...refused to back down.

"I'm telling you — I'm not good enough..."

"Look at this mask," Riser said as he pointed at his face. "You made this. On the other side, I got in an accident and had to give up on my dream of being an actor. But thanks to this mask, I can still be a hero in this world."

At first, Riser's reasons for creating the mask were rather negative.

He wanted a reminder of the dream he'd lost and the possibilities that were now out of his reach.

However, that changed when he had finally donned the first mask that Zola had created for him. It had reflected his dream so strongly that he found it dazzling, and as he wore it, he realized that he now had superhuman stats, a trusty Embryo to take into battle...and the face of a hero.

Instead of becoming a reminder of what he'd lost, the mask whispered to him that his dream was now within his grasp.

Thus, he resolved to become someone worthy of that mask.

He put it on, requested that Zola create a suit to go with it, and went out to act as a hero.

He protected people by fighting monsters and bandits, even going on regular patrols.

Both Masters and tians alike saw him as a weirdo.

In time, however, he found friends in Bishmal — who liked Riser's style and joined him on his patrols — as well as Foltesla — who heard rumors about him and invited him to his clan.

And as he continued his activities, he eventually began to be called a hero.

Not "The Hero," but just a friendly neighborhood hero — a champion of Claymill.

The mask that was supposed to be just a reminder of a dream he'd lost had given birth to a hero known as Masked Riser. And that was why...

"You're the one I want to create the equipment I'll use when I wear this mask..."

"Lad..."

...Riser insisted that Zola accept this task.

Zola hesitated at his earnest request for a second before saying, "I can't say no to that! Just don't complain if it turns out bad!"

The aged smith had accepted.

"All right! We'll have to give it all we got! Lads! We're starting with a sketch! Gather here once you're all done with your tasks!"

"Got it, boss!" the apprentices replied, all with smiles on their faces. They also wanted to work on something made of MVP special material.

"Design comes first. That's what's most important for a hero, ain't it, lad?" Zola asked.

"Oh, feel free to make it in a way that's easier for you..."

"Don't be an idiot! It's gear for you and you alone! It's gotta be all hero-like!" Zola laughed, poking at Riser's chest. "Even though I dunno if we really understand what 'hero-like' means! We'll make a bunch of designs at the workshop, so you come and choose whichever you like, all right, lad?"

"Okay... I'll be looking forward to it!"

"You better!" And so, Zola and his apprentices took to designing the piece of equipment using Valcan's remains.

It was an arduous task that took almost a whole month.

The result was Valcan Air — armor designed to impart the traits of the Jetdragon to its wearer. It was intended to be used alongside Riser's Hermod and, perhaps most importantly, to look like the apparel of a hero.

In many aspects, it was the perfect armor for Riser...if it weren't for a single flaw.

"Sorry...we messed up."

The flaw was so big that Zola and his apprentices were crestfallen over it.

One of the skills the armor had was called “Destruction Resistance.”

MVP special rewards were supposed to have an auto-repair function that recreated them for the owner if they were destroyed, but Valcan Air was merely resistant to destruction.

That made it quite durable, of course, but it also meant that it couldn’t be repaired. It could even potentially be lost forever.

The remaining durability was actually displayed, so its limits were clearly visible. Once the durability was gone, it would break.

Some would say that this flaw alone made it far worse than any other items in its tier.

“I messed up the most important part...” Zola felt awful. If he’d been a better craftsman, he might’ve left behind a treasure that matched actual MVP special rewards — a power that could never be lost.

Riser’s reaction, however, wasn’t what Zola expected.

“No. This is perfect.”

“What...?”

“There are things that are precious because they may break someday.” Not everything lasted forever. There were some things that could break or be lost for all time. However, that also made those things all the more irreplaceable.

To Riser, this armor was as dazzling as the dream he’d lost.

“Lad... You like it?” Zola asked.

“I will treasure this armor...this suit of yours,” Riser replied without hesitation.

“...Ha ha hah!” After a brief silence, Zola laughed. “I see. Well, I’m glad the client likes it,” he said with a relieved expression and gave Riser a light hug. “All right, let’s celebrate a job well done with a party! Drinks are on me!”

His words were met with cheers from his apprentices.

“None of you mind if I bring along my wife and kids, right?”

“Of course not!” said Riser. All smiles, they went to call Zola’s family and set out into the evening-tinted city of Claymill.

They chatted and celebrated as they walked — the very picture of a simple, peaceful day-to-day life.

But that was then. Now...only one person from this image was still alive.

A month later, Claymill was attacked by the greatest calamity Altar had ever faced — Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.

The people of Claymill, those that had loved Riser and called him a hero, were snuffed out by its devastating light.

◇

He'd lost his dream.

He'd lost people dear to him.

But there was still something he had.

It was...

◇◆◇

The Royal Capital of Altea, Fountain Plaza

"Ohohoh! Whatever is the matter? Your movements seem worse than before."

The battle against Regina Apis Idea was turning against the defenders.

Regina redirected any damage done to her towards the Apis Ideas spread all over Altea, making them burst in an explosion that could potentially cause a great deal of damage.

The Queen's Guard standing between them and Regina were a serious threat, as well. Having the Death Soldier job allowed them to move even after dying, giving them time to act before they finally exploded.

They used that time to either charge at Riser's group or run towards nearby buildings like suicide bombers.

It was like they were holding the entire capital hostage. The defenders couldn't recklessly attack Regina, so Riser's party had no choice but to stay on the defensive.

As the battle wore on, Riser tried to find a way to win this.

Maybe we should use some kind of debuff? he thought.

They did have the option of using debuffs instead of attacks, like the White Field Gem he'd used against the Queen's Guard. However, restricting Regina would probably change nothing. Even if she was Frozen or Petrified, the Apis Ideas would still move on their own and explode upon death.

There was even a chance that they would fight even more erratically and aggressively without an active leader, causing even more havoc inside the city. The Apis Ideas could only be stopped if Regina was defeated.

It might be possible to neutralize them with Charm...but not many people have that skill. Riser only knew of two people who used Charm: Catherine Kongou, the second in kill rankings, and Rook from Death Period.

He hadn't seen the former in a while, and Rook was at the peace conference.

Spells like Death Sentence can kill without dealing damage...but putting them into circulation as Gems is against Altarian law, so I doubt that anyone here has those. Their options were limited — and even those limited options weren't available. It seemed like they were completely powerless against this threat.

"R-Riser..." Kasumi whispered to him, Taijitu in hand. It seemed like she didn't want Regina to hear what she was about to say. "I-I noticed something about the explosions."

She pointed at the surface of the Taijitu and drew a circle before continuing.

"All the bee-men that exploded after the attack were within a radius of three kilometels from here...! The ones in the north were almost completely untouched."

"Really...?!" Riser looked at the map and saw that indeed, the distribution of the Apis Ideas was uneven. When he'd looked at it before going to the fountain plaza, they were spread out more or less randomly. Now, there was a donut-shaped area centered around Regina where the Apis Ideas were more sparse.

That was clearly because they had exploded due to Colony for One — meaning that this area of about three kilometels was the skill's active range.

It might have a long reach, but it was indeed limited. That knowledge alone was a blessing.

"We should be able to reduce the damage to Altea if we lure her away from here...!" said Kasumi. "But..."

"Thank you."

"...That would be diffi—huh?" Kasumi realized that Riser had cut her off and thanked her before she was even able to finish her sentence.

He knew what she was trying to say.

Kasumi wanted to suggest taking Regina out of Altea while avoiding the Apis Ideas and preventing her from giving the order to destroy the city.

That would be difficult, no doubt — but Riser saw hope in Kasumi's words.

He knew of something that would let him overcome this challenge. He still had an ace up his sleeve that would let him save the city.

All he had to do now...was gather his resolve and use it.

"...Zola," he said as he took out a little cube — an inventory dedicated solely to the most precious objects.

Inside it, there was something irreplaceable. Something he cherished dearly.

It was a memento of people that were gone forever — a piece of equipment that had been through many battles and was currently at its utmost limit.

Even so...

"I'll use this...one last time."

Even so, Riser decided to equip it.

"And this time...I will protect everyone."

He grasped the inventory and called its name out loud, even though he didn't have to.

"Instant Wear...Valcan Air."

A moment later, his gear changed.

He was now clad in armor reminiscent of a tokusatsu hero's suit.

The parts that resembled Jetdragon's propulsion truly gave him the appearance of a hero who had just assumed his powered-up form.

However, the suit was the opposite of pristine. Every armor piece was cracked, and several parts were missing, showing clearly just how many battles Valcan Air had survived.

"R-Riser!"

"Riser, you... That's the...!" Lang and the other Babylonian Battlegroup members raised their voices in shock. They all knew just how precious Valcan Air was to him.

However, they didn't stop him. It would surely break the next time it was used, but Riser equipped it regardless. As his long-time comrades, everyone present knew that he was truly resolved to end this.

"What is that? Such shabby armor! It isn't beautiful at all," Regina said, ridiculing Riser's crumbling suit. "How dare you try to fight me with such an ugly appearance?"

"I am Riser," he said. "Masked...Riser. A man who was called 'a hero' by those dear to him."

Riser told her exactly what he held most dear — the proof of his dream.

"The Hero? Ohohohoho! Reveal tells me that you aren't even a Superior Job. You could not be a worse liar if you tried...but even if you weren't, The Hero is a loser!"

He was killed by King of Plagues, after all, and the fact made her burst into laughter.

Riser also felt something upon hearing the word "loser."

He'd fallen against a mighty dragon without being able to protect the people he loved.

He'd run into an impassable wall in the arena rankings and then continually lost at the hands of those who outranked him.

He'd been slain during a battle which would decide the fate of Gideon, leaving more work for those who survived.

And just recently, he was defeated alongside his friend and Embryo before he could even go to the conference that would decide the fate of Altar.

He had many defeats to his name, and he felt powerless because of that.

Despite that, he had never once changed his attitude.

"So you truly believe that you can surpass someone as beautiful as me and an army as powerful as La Crima's?" Regina said, sneering. Riser, however, seemed unfazed.

"It doesn't matter who I am facing..."

He slowly increased the space between his legs.

"It doesn't matter that I am not a Superior Job..."

He lowered his center of mass.

"It doesn't matter how many times I am defeated..."

He moved his hands...

"I will never retreat."

...and assumed a stance.

"Because...I AM THEIR HERO!"

In that moment, as he roared out his challenge, he had the aura of a true champion.

He’d lost his dream.

He’d lost people dear to him.

But there was one thing he still had.

It was...himself, the hero he knew he could be.

The ally of justice, who was always ready to protect the weak from the ravages of evil, was still here.

“I see that you are nothing but a fool,” said Regina. “Get out of my sight, and take your brazen attitude with you!”

She sent the Queen’s Guard to surround him.

Riser wasn’t able to break out of their assault — and if he tried, he’d likely cause a chain explosion.

This situation meant certain death for Riser...

“BOOST!”

...but he escaped it by flying away.

“What?!” Regina exclaimed as she watched Riser with surprise in her eyes.

Multiple parts of Riser’s suit were releasing white smoke, propelling him through the air.

“Boost” was the main trait of the Jetdragon, Valcan. Valcan Air, designed to work in tandem with Hermod, had inherited this trait.

Even though it was reaching the limit of its durability, it was still as effective as the craftsmen designed it to be.

“A-Apis Ideas! Stop this man!” said Regina as she went on the defensive, knowing that she was Riser’s target.

She couldn’t avoid contact with him, but all damage done to her would be transferred to the Apis Ideas.

Even if he tried to take her away from the city, away from her minions, they would stand in his way and stop him.

Regina was surprised that Riser had suddenly taken to the air, but she was still certain that she couldn’t be killed here.

However, it didn’t take long for that illusion to be shattered.

After all...Riser wasn’t planning on taking her outside the city.

“OAARGH!”

“Egh! Gh...?!” With a short roar, Riser instantly closed the distance to Regina and sank his right foot into her stomach.

He then kicked off the ground and twisted his body...

“Valcan Air... FULL BOOOOOOOST!”

...and swung that same foot towards the sky.

A moment later, all the propulsion engines on Valcan Air roared to life; Riser was rocketed upwards, taking Regina with him. The gear built by people he cherished freed him from the chains of gravity and rocketed him up to the sky.

“...Ghhh?! Y-You... What are you doing?!” They were heading straight up into the sky, almost perpendicular to the ground.

This was the quickest and simplest path outside the range of Colony for One and the range from which Regina could control the Apis Ideas.

Riser intended to defeat Regina high in the sky.

“Y-You... Get your ugly leg off of me...RIGHT NOW!” Regina quickly realized where this was going. Riser was soaring upward at an overwhelming speed — in the first few seconds alone, many Apis Ideas were already outside the range of Colony for One and even the range of her control entirely.

Eventually, she wouldn’t be able to redistribute any of the damage done to her and would finally be the one to die.

“I-I’m too beautiful to die like this!” Despite the boot sinking into her stomach and propelling her upwards, Regina was able to take out her weapon — a spear made of Mythical metal, as poisonous as the stingers of the Apis Ideas. She wasted no time in thrusting it at Riser’s head.

He had no way of dodging, and the spear struck him straight in the face.

“I did it...!” Regina exclaimed — only to realize that something wasn’t right just a moment later. “...Wait, huh?”

The mask made by the craftsmen of Claymill began to crack...but Riser himself was completely unscathed.

The mask was far less tough than the spear, but it somehow protected its wearer.

It was like a miracle the late craftsmen had left behind them.

“OOOOAAARRRRRGGHHH!”

“Gh...?!” With part of his mask shattered, Riser roared once again. Valcan Air accelerated, driving his foot even deeper and taking them both even higher.

Suddenly, Regina felt an intense pain in her stomach, forcing her to drop her spear. The reason why she actually felt pain in that moment was simple — they were now too far away from all her minions to distribute the damage to them.

"N-No! This...! Ghh...!" Spitting blood, Regina truly began to panic.

However, she wasn't the only one.

This isn't enough... We're not high enough! Riser thought.

Valcan Air was crumbling, unable to withstand the power of its own propulsion.

However, Regina was still alive.

Soon they would begin to lose altitude, bringing Regina back to the range of Colony for One.

If that happened, all damage done to her would once again be distributed to the Apis Ideas, and that would be the end of Altea.

He'd already used the ace up his sleeve, so there was nothing that could —

"...Not yet!"

No...there was still one more thing.

"Come...!" It was something that had been with him ever since he'd appeared in this world.

It had been with him through thick and thin.

It was...

"HERMOOOOOOOOD!" Riser called, and his Embryo answered.

Recently destroyed by Chrono Crown, it was awakened once again.

Though inorganic and silent, it heard the call and returned to its Master.

It seemed both miraculous and inevitable at the same time — a true display of everything that an Embryo was.

And so, Riser, his Embryo, and his armor all moved as one and resumed the acceleration.

It was the ultimate flight, sustained by the power of Hermod, the crumbling Valcan Air, and Riser himself.

Their acceleration was so immense it felt like the world was falling away behind them.

"RISEEEEEEEEERRR..." The air here was sparse, but since he still had just enough oxygen to speak, Riser used it to roar once more.

"SKYWAAAARRRD..." Delivering his final, strongest attack, he reached higher than ever before.

"KIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIICK!" And finally, like the true hero he was, he pierced straight through Regina’s body.

The rumbling of Hermod and Valcan Air were suddenly silenced as he left the world and its soundscape behind.

“No... No...”

Regina, however, was still within the realm of sound.

She had been split in two before she could reach that high.

None of her minions were close enough to prevent this fatal blow.

“Th-This is... I-I’m too beautiful to... Not here... Not now...” As her HP dropped to 0, there was a change in her body — it began to release a red light.

“Ahh... No... No...” She knew better than anyone what that meant.

It was the Insect General’s final skill, Even a Worm Will Burn.

She herself had been modified into an insectoid, so obviously it would work on her, as well.

“No... NO!” It was as though she was getting her just deserts for treating the once-human Apis Ideas like disposable objects.

“This... THIS CAN’T BE HAPPENING!” With that final scream, Regina Apis Idea detonated high in the Altarian sky.

Riser heard a faint explosion from far below him.

“...This time, I did protect them all,” the hero whispered right before his consciousness faded.

His face bore a pure expression of relief.

Chapter Twenty: The Fiery Dance of the Jiangshi and the Mummy

Royal Capital, Altea, Castle

While the city was thrown into chaos by the swarming Apis Ideas, the castle was facing an even greater threat — King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn, now known as “Ignis Idea.” He’d broken into the castle through the main gate and was currently drowning it in flame.

Besides him, there were two other Ideas — one spider-like, the other with the twisted form of a bat— that had broken in along Feuer and afterwards split up to kill the guards within. Tians like the Royal Guard fought back as best they could, but it was clear that they lacked the power to overcome this menace. Even the Masters that had rushed from the city to join the defense effort had been ultimately defeated by the three Ideas.

Things might’ve been different if Altimia had been there, or if the Celestial Knight or Arch Sage had still been alive — any of them might’ve been able to repel these attackers.

However, none of them were present, nor was anyone with a comparable level of power. The castle, at the very heart of the kingdom, was in real danger of falling.

Infiltration successful.

Using the chaos as cover, someone had infiltrated the castle.

It was none other than King of Thieves, Zeta.

Code III: Mirage is still active, she thought. The system that would prevent skill activation has either been deactivated...or it was never there to begin with.

She’d sneaked into the castle using a mix of a job skill that removed her presence and an Embryo skill that made her invisible to all mundane sight.

Normally, she would have triggered the castle’s magical defense system, but due to the assault from the three Ideas — most notably, the bat-like Idea’s attack on the magic distribution equipment — the system’s range was shot. That, combined with visible attackers drawing the guards' focus, had allowed her to enter the castle completely unnoticed.

They really are potent, Zeta thought as she considered the Ideas she had let loose and thought back to an event from several months ago — the very moment that La Crima had given her these Ideas.

◇◆

Soul Trader, La Crima was a well-known name in the business realm of society's underbelly, standing shoulder-to-shoulder with the arms dealer known as The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx.

In truth, La Crima was actually a pair of people acting as one.

One of them was a lady in a wheelchair. The most notable thing about her appearance was her paleness. She was wearing a white hat with a wide brim, a white dress, and white bandages that covered the upper half of her face — eyes included. The exposed lower half had a shape that many would describe as "beautiful."

The other person was a man pushing the wheelchair. In stark contrast to the lady, he was noticeably black. Standing over two metels tall and completely covered in black leather belts, he looked like some kind of mummy.

One was a Master, while the other was most likely an Idea the Master controlled, but it was considered something of a taboo to ask which was which. Everyone who had found out was met with a grim fate.

As the Soul Trader, La Crima dealt in modified slaves.

Their Superior Embryo was "True Form Alteration, Idea." Its type was a mix of Chariot and Guardian called "Advanced Legion," and it was focused on humanoid modification. They modified countless tians and sold them off as high-quality slaves.

A certain clan member had once called them a "merchant of death," to which they responded, "A merchant of death? What a strange title to give me. What I do is uncover people's latent potential and give them a chance to live their lives to the fullest. Would it not be more apt to call me a merchant of life? -life?" La Crima talked in unison, with one of them falling slightly behind.

The person they were talking to at the time — Gerbera — would have laughed if it had only been a morbid joke, but the fact that La Crima was completely serious merely left her speechless. That, combined with their warped mindset and strange appearance, made them stand out even among the oddball criminals of Illegal Frontier.

However, few people had ever even laid eyes upon this bizarre duo. La Crima did business using their Idea subordinates as representatives, so not even their business partners knew what they looked like.

Despite being such a mysterious figure, they had been placed on wanted lists and had their supposed hideout in Caldina targeted by King of Termination and King of Revelry — only to somehow make it out alive and cross the strait to Tenchi.

There were only two types of people that knew that La Crima were two people acting as one. The first type was their comrades — the core members of I.F.

The second type was a select few “foundations.” Most of La Crima’s modifications were done remotely by having someone carry a piece of their Embryo to the target, but they always showed themselves to tians with Superior Jobs, who formed some of the most important “foundations” for their work.

That included four of the Ideas that would be released onto the capital, Regina Apis Idea being one of them.

Zeta, in fact, had met up with La Crima in person to acquire these Ideas.

“Question. I have something to ask you.”

They were at a port town in southern Huang He. Zeta was preparing to head west after having stolen a number of the Treasurebeast Orbs left behind by the Draconic Emperor that came before the previous one. La Crima was currently operating in Tenchi, and they had actually come all this way just to meet Zeta and give her the Jewel containing the four Ideas based on Superior Jobs. Included as well was the Jewel holding all the Apis Ideas that would serve Regina.

They also informed her that three other Ideas would meet up with her after finishing their tasks.

Those three Ideas would go on to be defeated by King of Light, F...but that was another story.

“What is it? -it?” One of La Crima’s voices again lagged very slightly behind the other.

“Explanation. Tell me the concepts behind the four Superior Job-based Ideas and how to use them.”

“That certainly does need explaining. -ning,” La Crima said as they both nodded. “Regina was designed to make the best use of her skills as Insect General. However, the majority of the modifications went into the Apis Ideas under her command. Regina herself was mostly untouched. I merely increased her ability to control the Apis Ideas, slightly buffed her stats, and changed her type into insectoid to make her own skills apply to her. -her.”

“Question. Why?”

“Because she refused any modifications to her appearance. Idea’s modifications work by redesigning the target’s physical body. Whether a slave is optimized for beauty or battle, the more they are modified, the more their appearance changes. If I cannot change the appearance, the modifications I can do are limited. -ted.”

“Another question. Why did you not ignore her refusal?”

“Because of a promise. -mise.”

“I see...” That answer was enough for Zeta.

She knew that despite having a warped sense of morality that made them unable to recognize true villainy, La Crima always fulfilled their promises. They did tell lies — as evidenced by the mystery of their true identity — but when they gave their word, they kept it.

After remembering something that related to La Crima, Zeta simply said, “Next.”

“Very well. -well,” said La Crima, seemingly unconcerned by Zeta’s brief silence. “Before the modification, Aranea had to use tools to deliver his potent poison and binding abilities. I spliced him with materials from an upper-Pure-Dragon-tier spider, allowing him to use these abilities by default and without limit. The materials needed are automatically created and provided by an inventory implanted into the body. -dy.”

And that was the genesis of King of Venom — Aranea Idea.

“Vespertilio had his sensory organs enhanced and was given the ability to avoid being spotted. By creating an unperceivable space, he can force himself to enter a state of invisibility. Like this, he has increased potential for ambushing and ability to continue fighting beyond that. He also has a magic-sensing function that lets him act as a radar for living creatures and magic installations. -tions.”

That was the description of King of Raids — Vespertilio Idea.

These Ideas were a few steps more powerful than they had been as tian Superior Jobs. The modifications given to them greatly improved the abilities they possessed.

It was as though these tians were granted Embryos that meshed perfectly with their builds.

Since tian Superior Jobs were often far above Masters in terms of battle technique, these two were truly fearsome foes.

They were below Regina in overall battle potential, but they were no doubt far above her as individual combatants.

However, neither of them were the strongest out of the tians La Crima had just given to Zeta.

“Ignis is actually my most powerful magic-based Idea yet. Out of all the Ideas, he’s behind only Ferrum and Cantus. -tus.”

That was La Crima’s evaluation of Ignis Idea — King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn.

“He was modified according to his own wishes. He asked for magic power that surpassed that of the Arch Sage. -Sage.”

“Confirmation. Was that even possible?”

“The method was quite simple, actually. -lly.” La Crima’s words seemed absurd on their face. How could surpassing the magic power of Altar’s legendary Arch Sage be “simple?” The answer lay in the words that followed.

“I merely used ten of the Sacrifice slaves I cultivated. -ted,” they said, as though this was nothing special. “I connected them to his heart and the core of his brain as MP sources. This was no different from implanting monster abilities. Though, I didn’t expect all the extra MP to be counted as part of Ignis’s own pool and actually increase his maximum. I removed the parts of the Sacrifices’ brains responsible for thinking, so I believe they might’ve been recognized not as individual people, but as Ignis’s own organs. The fact that this could be the case while they still maintained the Sacrifice job surprised even me. I did some experiments on tians with other jobs, and when I removed their ability to think, they either lost their jobs or simply didn’t have their stats merged with the subject who received them as implants. I believe that Ignis turned out the way he did due to the nature of the Sacrifice job. Also, though I was already using Idea to reduce the risk of transplanted organ rejection, I matched the implants' blood type to Ignis's to reduce the risk even further. Because of this, I'm currently short on Sacrifice slaves with blood type B and...ohh, that information is unnecessary. -ary."

Possibly feeling obligated to do so, La Crima gave Zeta a long-winded explanation. Even contemplating the acts they described would make some people nauseous, but they didn't seem to even think about that.

Though she'd never admit it, even Zeta found this side of La Crima to be truly unnerving.

In fiction, there were mad scientists that mistreated their guinea pigs to satisfy their sadistic tendencies, and Zeta felt that La Crima wouldn't be nearly as disturbing if they were anything like that — she'd merely write them off as "just that kind of person."

Their behavior just wasn't the same as that. If you got past the fact that La Crima were two people acting and speaking as one, you would note how serious and sincere their words were. It was as though they truly thought nothing of what they were saying, no matter how morbid it was.

Their leader — Sechs — was similar in that regard, but...

...No point in thinking about it too deeply right now, Zeta thought.

I.F. was a gathering of people like this. Everyone here had come to Infinite Dendrogram seeking things they couldn't find in reality. Sechs sought a goal. La Crima sought love. Gerbera would never say it, but she was seeking "a special version of herself."

Zeta was no exception. She was here because she was seeking something within Infinite Dendrogram — some would say that her goal was greater than that of the others.

Everyone had such goals, some bigger, some smaller, but the members of I.F. — the wanted Superiors — didn't hesitate to harm others for the sake of what they sought.

That was why they were wanted, and that was why I.F. was the way it was.

As a fellow member of this clan, I really can't say anything about La Crima's sense of morality, Zeta thought.

"Back to the matter of Ignis, the Sacrifice slaves were all modified to have more MP. I also used pre-ancient civilization MP-increasing items that were given to me by Rascal. As a result, Ignis has more MP than even spellcaster Superiors. -ors.”

La Crima instantly realized that they had misspoken.

“Oh, that doesn’t count The Earth, of course. -course.”

“Exception. You don’t have to tell me that his case is special.”

Not even UBMs could match The Earth when it came to MP.

“Number. How much MP does Ignis Idea actually have?” Zeta asked, to change the subject.

“98 million. -on,” La Crima said, again seemingly thinking nothing of it.

“...What?!” Not even Zeta could keep her composure upon hearing that.

There were high-level tian spellcasters with Superior Jobs that struggled to reach one million MP. Exceptions like The Earth aside, even Masters with MP growth boosted by Embryos would have only two or three times that, at most.

Yet Ignis Idea had 98 million MP — clearly an insane number.

“Spell power isn’t directly proportional to max MP, but there is a correlation. Besides that, I also gave him more arms he may use to release his spells. -spells.”

Despite creating something so powerful, La Crima showed almost no excitement as they finished their explanation.

“Ignis is the most potent magic-output device besides The Earth. I am sure he will have no trouble burning down a castle. -tle.”

◇◆

Royal Capital, Altea, Castle

As she remembered that event, especially La Crima’s last line, Zeta heaved a silent sigh. It truly did seem like the castle might be burned to the ground.

It’s too early, she thought. Claudiah’s request would be easier to fulfill if Zeta just let that happen, but it would ultimately get in the way of her own goal.

I’m here for the ten orbs that were brought into Altar. Specifically, the Treasurebeast Orbs brought here alongside Canglong by the Huang He diplomatic mission. They had been a gift to Altar as part of the marriage-alliance deal between the ruling families of those two countries.

When Huang He opened their treasury to select the ten orbs they would send as a gift, I was able to steal seven. Getting more than that was too hard even for me.

The treasury was full of magic traps left behind by the fabled Draconic Emperor who had created the orbs, so stealing from it was a challenge even for King of Thieves herself.

That's why I'll be retrieving the orbs that were removed from the treasury the normal way. Zeta had many uses for these UBM orbs and the MVP special rewards they contained. She could hand them to fellow I.F. members based on their abilities, and she could give them to Logan as sacrifices for his devil summoning skills.

The orbs could also be used to simply spread chaos, just like they were already doing in Caldina.

Somewhere in this castle, there were ten UBMs whose abilities were known and that had been weakened by centuries of being sealed away. Their value was immense, and no one in I.F. could ignore them — especially not King of Thieves.

There was a high chance that they would be at the guest house, but I couldn't find them there. That leaves two options: they're either with the prince, or they've already been handed over to Altar.

Whichever it was, Canglong was bound to know.

With the castle in chaos, the royalty must be taking shelter somewhere. I'll find where it is and find out the orbs' location by taking the prince or his fiancée hostage.

With that decided, she began searching for Canglong. There was a hallway here leading deeper into the castle, shrouded in darkness since the magic distribution system had been cut. She prepared to take a step forward into it...only to jump to the side.

A split-second later, something golden moved at supersonic speeds and pierced the space where she was standing only a moment ago.

This is... The golden object made a quick turn and chased after her.

Zeta got a better look at it as she evaded the object — it was an extending prosthetic arm.

She followed it with her eyes to its source...a humanoid silhouette at the other side of the long, dark hallway.

Though, perhaps "humanoid" didn't quite describe what she saw.

The figure was tall enough to touch the high ceilings of this castle, and that was only one of its unnatural features.

The silhouette continued to freely attack Zeta with its golden arm — though, it was questionable if it was actually targeting her. Although the first attack seemed to be aimed directly at Zeta, the entity had lost sight of her right after, most likely due to Code III — Zeta's optical camouflage skill.

Still, the prosthetic covered an enormous area just by flailing about. It was entirely possible for the entity to land a hit on Zeta by accident.

Because of this, Zeta focused entirely on evasion, and had successfully dodged everything so far.

However, a number of Fu tags applied to the prosthetic arm suddenly blasted beams in every direction.

I can evade this too. But wait... This is...

Zeta evaded the fiery bolts — but the moment she did, she realized that they weren't meant to be an attack.

"There gOes your camouflAge. I can seE a bit of whAt ya can do nOw," the entity muttered, its voice distorted by some means.

Just like the figure had said, the skill that hid Zeta from view was expiring.

That was because the magical beams had lit the surroundings on fire and increased the temperature of the air.

Zeta's Embryo's abilities required extremely precise control, so she couldn't account for sudden changes in the environment fast enough. Code III actually required even more fine-tuning than any other skill, so perhaps it was inevitable that she wouldn't be able to keep up with the sharp increase in temperature.

Brought out by the flame, Zeta's outline became a visible distortion in the air.

I suppose she already has a good guess about my abilities, Zeta thought. The rumors surrounding her, as well as her fairly recent duel against Logan, had made it easy for this enemy to assume the nature of her Embryo.

Left with no real choice, she gave up and canceled the optical camouflage.

The entity also stepped into the light of the fire, making it obvious whom Zeta was facing.

"Master Jiangshi, Xunyu."

“And yoU’re King of Thieves, Zeta, arEn’t ya?” Zeta was now faced with the Huang He Superior that she recognized as the greatest threat among the Masters left at the capital.

Xunyu also recognized Zeta’s face from the brief period when she had been the top duelist in Dryfe.

And both of them knew full well just how dangerous the other was.

In that hallway, bathed in flame, the two combatants stared directly at each other.

As they both stood on guard, each watching for any movements the other made, Xunyu said, “Since you’rE here, I guess this whole attAck’s Dryfe’s doing? Man, they’rE just doin’ whatever they want nOw, huh?”

“Question. I won’t tell you whether your assumption is correct, but I have a question of my own... How did you notice me?”

Zeta couldn’t help but wonder how Xunyu spotted King of Thieves herself while she was hiding her physical form and even her very presence.

“Huh? I couldn’t feEl or see ya, but yoU are mOvin’ through space, arEn’t ya? I’m sensitivE to stuff like thAt.”

“...Understandable.” Though limited, Xunyu’s Superior Embryo had a skill that let it attack by teleporting through space itself. Because of that, Xunyu’s Fu were imbued with space-scanning magic. Such spells were the specialty of Onmyoji, but Master Jiangshi could perform them as well.

Xunyu had searched the castle’s interior and found Zeta exactly because she was moving at a slow pace — something you wouldn’t expect from a person inside a building under siege.

“Unexpected. I didn’t anticipate this. I thought you would go fight the Ideas.”

“You mean thE things makin’ a mess out frOnt? Did ya see what an entrAnce they made? You dOn’t have to be as keen as me to tell that it’s a distrAction. Well, no onE who’s meant to protEct the castle would leave those things bE...but that’s not my rOle.” Someone meant to guard the castle wouldn’t be so quick to set it on fire, after all, even if that was what it took to expose an enemy. “What I’m here fOr...is to protect Cang and thE others. Activate.”

With that word, all the Fu that Xunyu spread throughout the hallway with her prosthetic arms suddenly fired beams towards Zeta.

“Understandable.” Zeta saw this coming, though, and twisted her body quickly enough to evade the beams.

However, Xunyu reacted just as quickly to the evasion and moved her arms at supersonic speeds, tracing them across the sides of the hallway. Attached to the insides of her arms were countless offensive Fu, which joined the ones that she'd spread around the area to unleash a barrage of fiery blasts that became quite difficult to evade.

Unlike in the arena where she'd fought Figaro, the space here was limited. The net of beams she created left no space large enough for a person to slip through.

Zeta had nowhere to run...

"Code III: Shelter."

...so she simply didn't.

Half a second later, countless beams pierced into her.

They carried enough power to turn her into burnt Swiss cheese...yet that didn't happen.

The beams all stopped before they struck Zeta's body as though they had hit an invisible wall.

And after withstanding this attack, she went on the offensive.

"Code I: Forming. Code IV: Artillery."

"Ah...!" In the space of a moment, Xunyu wrapped herself in the left leg part of Tenaga-Ashinaga.

A split-second later, she was assaulted by attacks from every direction.

They all had enough power to pierce through steel, but not enough to damage a Superior Embryo like Tenaga-Ashinaga.

However, the lack of power wasn't the main issue...

...I can't see them, Xunyu thought. All the attacks aimed at her just now were completely transparent.

She could see something, but only if she strained her eyes. It seemed like a distortion in the air, something akin to a heat haze.

They're...projectiles made of air. There were Wind magic spells that compressed the air and fired pulverizing projectiles just like these.

But Zeta wasn't using magic — it was an Embryo skill.

That could only mean that her Embryo was...

"..., ...?" Xunyu tried to say her guess out loud, only to realize she couldn't make a sound.

I'm in a vacuum... The flames that had lit up the hallway had vanished, as well.

This place was completely devoid of air, besides the projectiles Zeta was using.

There also seemed to be a difference in pressure that prevented any new air from flowing in.

A barrage, followed by a truly nasty trick. I'm undead, so I can deal with not breathing, but I imagine that it'd be over for most people by now. As Master Jiangshi, Xunyu had all the positives of being undead without the negatives, letting her function normally even in a situation like this. Ignoring the vacuum around her, she continued attacking with her prosthetic arms.

Zeta evaded or deflected them using invisible walls.

"Change." Realizing that the vacuum had done nothing, Zeta switched to another tactic.

That switch was obvious even to Xunyu — all the metal lights and door ornaments began to rust at an absurd rate.

She increased the oxygen concentration in the air... Pure oxygen was an extremely potent natural oxidizing agent. It reacted with countless types of matter, creating various other compounds. Xunyu quickly realized that her equipment was being affected as well.

Oxygen also had strong inflammatory properties, making it dangerous to use fire magic. If Zeta hadn't snuffed out the flames with her vacuum, this place would now be burning as brightly as the main gate.

She's not wearing the bandages just for fashion... On their inside, there's gear that acts like space or diving suits, protecting her from the changes in air pressure and atmospheric composition.

The nature of Zeta's Superior Embryo was more or less obvious by now.

"Optical camoUflage, invisible walls, air projEctiles, vacuum, oxygen concentration cOntrol... Your Embryo has powEr over the air itsElf, dOesn't it?" Xunyu said, continuing to attack with her arms, defend with her legs, and dodge using fire attacks. "You get optical camouflAge by distorting the air. You insulatE yourself by creating multiple lAyers of vacuum and air. Your bArriers are just cOmpressed air. The wind projEctiles are exactly thAt. Then the vacuUm, and the opposIte with oxygen overcOncentration. It's too damn obvioUs."

Zeta said nothing in response, but there was a hint of surprise on her hidden face.

“AnyOne would figure it oUt if you used as much stuff on thEm as you did on me. But it’s nOt like it’s a big deal thAt I know it now, right?”

If Xunyu was right about Zeta’s Embryo’s abilities, Xunyu’s awareness of it wouldn’t be much of a disadvantage. After all, no living creature could survive without air. It was the opposite of Gerbera’s Alhazred, which lost half of its potential when the target merely knew of its existence.

Zeta’s Embryo was as strong as ever, even if the enemy knew exactly what it did.

“This Embryo isn’t limitEd to just basic control either. You can actually mess with the air’s cOmposition. There’s a whole lOt ya can do with somethin’ like that. Even the skills yoU’re using look the same, but are actUally pretty dAmn different.”

Xunyu was referring to the barrier that protected Zeta from the beams and the wall that was blocking her prosthetic arm attacks — the barriers that deflected physical attacks much like Silver’s compressed air walls. The barriers were actually so dense that they didn’t even allow light to pass, but she camouflaged them by making them transparent using Code III. Zeta had a wide array of abilities at her disposal and always used the right one for any situation. It was second nature to her.

“And evEn though you mEss with the air and its compositiOn, you’re not creating any poison gAs or anythin’ like thAt. You’re just cOntrolling the air thAt’s already there, aren’t yA?” Xunyu guessed that instead of “filling” the space with pure oxygen, Zeta had actually separated the oxygen from the other gases, which she was now using for her air barriers and projectiles.

That made Zeta’s abilities seem weaker, but it was important to remember that she could use the air around her to do whatever she wanted.

Zeta was a Superior so versatile that she could fight just about anyone.

Xunyu herself had lots of versatility, but it seemed that Zeta outshone even her.

Another notable aspect was just how well Zeta controlled these powers of hers. When Xunyu presented her guess regarding her powers, Zeta was slightly shaken, but that hadn’t affected her barriers or projectiles whatsoever. She was also constantly moving so that she wouldn’t be an easy target for Xunyu’s ultimate skill.

I guess I should be glad that she can't take me out with just this, Xunyu thought. Code IV — the skill Zeta used to fire the projectiles — wasn't strong enough to break through her defenses, while the air barriers weren't capable of completely deflecting her attacks.

Her versatility had come at the cost of output.

On top of that, the vacuum and corrosive air that would kill living creatures were powerless against an undead.

It seemed that Xunyu would win this damage race, but...

The Embryo is likely meant to support her actions and moves as a Thief. The outcome of this battle will be decided by something else.

It wouldn't be a true battle between Masters if it came down to their Embryos alone.

There's also King of Thieves' ultimate job skill...the one that lets her tear out the other guy's heart in that duel just by touching him. I can't let her get too close to me. Besides that, she has that Superior MVP reward I know nothing about.

Xunyu had read about King of Thieves' ultimate job skill. It was called "Absolute Steal," and it allowed the user to steal anything within the object they were touching.

If they used it on an inventory, they could take any item inside regardless of how steal-proof it was. If used on living creatures, it could easily remove their organs.

She can probably use her control over air to throw me off by creating a false image, then take advantage of that to close in and steal my heart. Hell, if I wasn't undead, she could've easily done that the moment she created the vacuum or made the air toxic.

That was exactly what had happened to Logan in their duel — Zeta had incapacitated him with toxic air and a localized vacuum before closing in and using Absolute Steal to take his heart.

She can easily create a pathway to a certain kill... Man, the more I think about it, the more it stuns me just how versatile this Embryo is. As usual, Xunyu speculated a little about what she could do against her enemies before crafting a strategy to corner and bring them down. She had stumbled against Figaro because she lacked information about his Embryo, but regardless, Xunyu no doubt had an eye for strategy and high adaptability. That was exactly what Xunyu was doing now — calmly analyzing what Zeta could do with her Embryo, and how she could be defeated.

Zeta actually noticed that Xunyu was doing everything she could to keep her distance, and she couldn't help but say something "...Question. I thought you were still a child. How are you so knowledgeable, with such a sense for battle?"

"Ha! I've been herE for years! You think I wouldn't leArn a thing or two over all this timE?"

"Obvious. I suppose that makes sense. Spending time here makes your mental age advance beyond your body's age."

Though Logan's mind seems to be as old as he is, Zeta added mentally. It was uncertain which one of them was developing in a healthier manner.

"Interesting. The subject of whether children should outgrow their bodies would make for an interesting discussion."

"FOrget about mY mental age and stOp talking like that. It's annOying."

Silence descended. Having one aspect of her identity denied like that made Zeta's expression change slightly under the bandages.

She was known as a calm and collected person even by her clan members, but that didn't mean that she was emotionless — as evidenced by her surprise at La Crima's explanations and her reactions in this fight.

In fact, if her visage hadn't been hidden by bandages, she wouldn't have been able to maintain her customary poker face.

"...Stop. If you feel that way, then try and stop me."

"ThAt's the plAn!" Xunyu's extending right arm flew towards Zeta, who tried to block it with an air barrier at first, only to switch to evasion.

A moment later, Xunyu's arm smashed through the air barrier, gleaming brightly as it did. The shine wasn't from her claws, but the dagger clutched in them — Yinglong's Fang, Suling Yi.

This weapon had a trait that made it stronger the more MP was placed into it, as well as a power that let it pierce defenses. With that combination, it finally broke through Zeta's air barrier.

Xunyu hadn't used Suling Yi at first because of its MP drain, but she'd now decided to finish this battle as quickly as possible. If she didn't, she feared Zeta would've eventually broken the stalemate and killed her using Absolute Steal.

Needless to say, Zeta reacted to this as well. For a Superior, she had relatively low HP and END. The blade that Xunyu was flailing around would take her Brooch with the first hit, then her life with the second.

However, Xunyu hadn't gone completely on the offensive. Instead of just extending her arms towards her enemy, she retracted them when necessary, giving her enough space to deal with whatever Zeta decided to throw at her.

King of Thieves was at a clear disadvantage now. Even though her ultimate job skill could instantly kill Xunyu, her opponent's reach advantage made this difficult. Her chances of victory were slim.

Realizing this, Zeta decided to use the ace up her sleeve.

"...Three types."

"Hm?"

"Three types. Solo combat type, wide-scale suppression type, and wide-scale extermination type. These are the three main fighting styles, and I am all of them at once."

"...I can tEll." Zeta's words had seemingly come out of nowhere and Xunyu responded with suspicion. This was both to get information about her opponent...and to buy her enough time to prepare her ultimate skill.

While attacking with both arms and defending with her left leg, she prepared her right leg to use The Limbs Reach for the Horizon — Tenaga-Ashinaga.

"I actually nEver saw an Embryo as vErsatile as yoUrs. It doesn't surprIse me that you cAn do any combat stYle."

Zeta's Embryo's control over air gave it immense utility. The very fact that she could hold her own against Xunyu made it clear that she was a capable solo fighter, and she could easily suppress and exterminate larger groups simply by manipulating the air around them.

"Shared sentiment. Even I have only seen two Embryos that are more versatile than mine."

"...That's twO more than I expected."

"Below. There is little point in trying to compete in versatility against people who are reckless and inexhaustible," Zeta said, picturing the two I.F. members she had in mind. "Question. Back to what I was saying, which of these three battle styles..." she continued as she raised three of her fingers, "...do you think is my actual one?"

"Ah...!" Zeta presented this like a question, and Xunyu instantly understood what she was getting at — there was one battle style that Zeta was the most lethal at.

Her question, therefore, was more like a statement: “I will kill you with my true battle style.”

Combat, suppression, extermination...! She’s so versatile that I can’t even guess which one she’ll use! Xunyu thought. However, it was clear that whatever was coming, it would no doubt spell her doom.

Should she go on the defensive? Or should she retreat? Xunyu did not have the answer.

She’s probably a combat type if she comes close! And she’s one of the other two if she keeps her distance to avoid getting caught up in her own attack! If she’s a combat type, there’s a high chance that she’ll use her Absolute Steal! That was Zeta’s ultimate job skill, able to rip out hearts. To Xunyu’s knowledge, it was the most lethal skill she had, so she observed her enemy with all the caution she could muster.

A moment later, she noticed Zeta approaching her.

“SHaAH!” Xunyu tried to stop her, first by moving both hands as fast as possible, then blasting out her fire magic beams without concern for the high concentration of oxygen in the air.

However, the moment she fired them...she noticed something.

...The oxygen concentration is back to normal! It wasn’t a vacuum, nor was the area flooded with oxygen — the air composition was close to standard.

That moment, several of the beams hit Zeta, only to pass through her like she was a mirage.

No, not “like” a mirage — that was exactly what she was.

It’s a variation of her optical camouflage skill! That could only mean that Zeta herself was elsewhere.

As Xunyu prepared to use her spatial scan Fu, she felt a presence behind her.

“Gh...!” The moment she realized the presence behind her was Zeta, she released beams from the left leg that she had wrapped around herself.

Driven away by the blast, Zeta’s presence made distance between the two of them.

Xunyu didn’t feel like she had been touched or that she had lost any organs. By covering herself with Tenaga-Ashinaga, she was able to prevent Zeta from using Absolute Steal on her heart.

I blockEd it... I think. Despite that, Xunyu wasn't ready to relax just yet. Still wary of any follow-up attacks, Xunyu used her spatial scan Fu to search for Zeta...

"Where the hEll's she going?!"

...only to realize that she seemed to be heading away from Xunyu.

She had left Xunyu behind to focus on finding Canglong and Elizabeth.

"You goddAmn... I'll tear out your hEart!"

When she had initially used her spatial scan Fu and discovered Zeta's presence, Xunyu hadn't employed her ultimate skill because she wasn't sure if the presence was an enemy.

Things were different now. Xunyu knew that Zeta was an intruder — a foe to be taken down at any cost.

That meant that she could use her ultimate skill on Zeta, no matter where she was in the castle.

As she prepared to do just that, Xunyu noticed another change in the environment.

"Hm...?"

The air was different again. It wasn't a vacuum. Nor was it full of oxygen or some kind of poison gas.

Still, she could sense that something was different about it.

"It's...!" Another realization struck her.

She'd already considered it once. If Zeta made distance between them, it could only mean one thing.

"Activation. Absolute Dominion Over the Sky — Uranus."

Right after that voice echoed through the air, a part of the castle was drowned in dazzling light and temperatures reaching tens of thousands of degrees.

◇◆

"Cremated. It is tradition in Huang He to burn corpses, is it not?" Zeta whispered, standing some distance away from the scorched area of the castle.

Zeta's Embryo — Cry of Air, Uranus — was, as Xunyu had assumed, an Embryo that controlled the atmosphere. By changing its density, concentration, and composition, she was able to create optical camouflage, vacuums, oxygen-filled spaces, defensive barriers, and even air cannons.

Back at Granvaloa, she even used Uranus's air barriers on submarines.

However, this versatility came at a cost of output. If you could do many things, you either needed more external Resources, or the things you could do were simply weaker than they would be in the hands of a more focused individual.

This was a rule that applied to all Embryos, and Uranus was a latter case.

However, there were ways to circumvent such flaws, however briefly.

In Uranus's case, it was its ultimate skill: Absolute Dominion Over the Sky — Uranus.

This ability briefly increased its output, letting Zeta surpass the limits of its atmosphere control.

In her battle against the SUBM, she'd used it to push seawater away with walls of air and open up a giant hole in the ocean.

The scale of what she did in her battle against Xunyu was far smaller, but the action was far more complex. Normally, her control over the air didn't go beyond merely manipulating its constituent parts, but now, she was actually able to create new atoms based on the existing elements in the air.

Zeta had used Uranus to create deuterium and tritium, then used them to cause a nuclear fusion reaction.

This reaction produced helium and immense amounts of energy — in other words, she had made a hydrogen bomb, without nuclear warheads or any materials, and in average ambient temperatures.

As far as such explosions went, it was unusually clean. Since Zeta had held back a little, it was a small-scale reaction, and she even controlled the radiation to prevent it from leaking to the surroundings.

However, that didn't limit the energy that had been released. It was more than enough to demolish the hallway they were in, and Xunyu was at the epicenter of the explosion.

"Answer. I am mostly a wide-scale extermination type," Zeta said to the empty air.

She was currently alone, with no one else in sight — a Superior who possessed the power of a hydrogen bomb...of nuclear fusion.

Powerful as she was, though, this had made her break out in a cold sweat.

It was obvious why — in order to create this fusion reaction with her ultimate skill, she had to control everything manually.

These “Codes” were skills in their own right, functioning like macros that limited and automated the control of her atmospheric manipulation, but her ultimate skill’s fusion reaction had to be constructed manually. A single mistake could mean death by her own hands.

The fact that she used an ability that posed such a danger to herself just showed how cornered Zeta truly felt.

With Xunyu protecting herself against Absolute Steal and the environment being unsuitable for her Superior MVP reward, she had no choice but to use her ultimate skill.

“...Powerful. You are among the most powerful Masters I have ever fought, but it looks like not even you could withstand this.”

Nothing remotely human could withstand the explosion of a hydrogen bomb and live.

On top of that, Zeta had taken Xunyu’s only hope of survival. She had an accessory clutched tightly in her hand — a Lifesaving Brooch.

It belonged to Xunyu.

When Zeta had approached her, she used a particular skill. It was actually one of her most basic abilities as a Thief — Steal.

Its effect was simple — it gave her a chance to steal any item from an inventory or any piece of gear a target had equipped. As King of Thieves, Zeta’s Steal skill level was EX, which gave a 100% chance for her to Steal any unprotected item.

This was one of the strategies she specialized in — taking the enemy’s Brooch without their notice, then hitting them with a fatal attack.

With Xunyu not having any accessories that could protect her, her death penalty was all but certain.

“Confirmed. The Master Jiangshi job has high survivability, but I knew from her duel against Figaro that high heat can extinguish her without leaving a trace.”

Because of that, Zeta had made the right choice in using the fusion reaction.

Or at least, so she thought.

“Hm...?”

Suddenly, she heard something shatter. Looking down at her hand, she saw that the Brooch there was still intact.

The brooch that shattered was the one she was wearing.

Belatedly, she turned and saw Yinglong’s Fang, grasped by a metal arm and heading straight towards her spine.

"Gh...! Wait...!" Surprised, Zeta jumped away. But unlike before, the prosthetic arm didn't follow after her. As though rusty, it made a creaking sound before falling to the ground. It seemed as though the attack that shattered her Brooch was the most that arm could do at the moment.

"Hah...you finAlly...stopped talking...wEird..." Those words then reached Zeta's ears.

The speaker was none other than Xunyu — the very person who was supposed to have been burnt to ashes in the fusion reaction. But there she was, behind Zeta, in a state so awful that you couldn't tell where her clothes ended and her body began, extending only her right arm.

"You... How did you survive the explosion...?!"

"...I've alreAdy...been...evapOrated...once... I'd obviously...takE steps...to prevEnt it...hAppening again..." She'd learned from her loss against Figaro and had since weaved Fu of fire magic resistance into her clothes.

Thanks to this extra defense, she was able to avoid being completely annihilated.

Her defense obviously had not been perfect, though. She had been directly exposed to the heat of a small hydrogen bomb. It was more than enough to break through the fire resistance and scorch most of Xunyu's body.

The only reason she could even move was because Master Jiangshi were undead.

"Tch...thIs is it...fOr me..." And even the undead had their limits. Clicking her tongue, Xunyu began to literally fall apart.

"I leave thE rest...to..." Xunyu dissolved into motes of light before she could finish her sentence. Yinglong's Fang, which had almost killed Zeta, as well as the Tenaga-Ashinaga holding it, quickly followed their Master.

King of Thieves, Zeta and Master Jiangshi, Xunyu.

This conflict had ended in the former's victory.

"Hn..." Despite all of this, the face hidden by bandages didn't look pleased.

Her broach was destroyed right after she was certain she'd already won. Perhaps if this was a duel — where Brooches weren't allowed — Xunyu would've been victorious.

"You truly were a powerful enemy." Feeling both slightly defeated and impressed by Xunyu’s incredible fighting, Zeta returned to her task.

Chapter Twenty-One: The Blades and Shields of Altar

About a certain knight...

There were rumors that a Paladin of the Royal Guard, Theodore Lindos, held a disdain for Masters.

This was because he disliked when Masters got involved in the kingdom's affairs, and he made no effort to hide it. Behind his back, some of the Altarian nobility called him petty and small-minded — especially compared to Liliana Grandria, who was willing to cooperate with Masters even after one of them killed her father.

Of course, some would take Theodore's side, but the real problem was that they had all misunderstood his stance on the matter.

He didn't hate Masters — he hated himself.

Some time ago, the knights had been the true protectors of Altar, and standing above them all were the Paladins of the Royal Guard — an elite group often called a cornerstone of the kingdom. Theodore had looked up to them since childhood and had spent much of his life training to become a worthy Paladin.

However, soon after he had finally achieved his dream, the world drastically changed. Countless Masters entered the stage, and the balance of power was warped beyond recognition.

Powerful monsters that had once required an entire order of knights to bring down could now be crushed by a single Master.

The world was changing so fast it made him dizzy, and what disgusted Theodore the most was...his own weakness.

He simply didn't have the talent he so desperately needed. This might sound like nothing more than an excuse to give up, but in Theodore's case, it was anything but.

Theodore had truly reached his limit — the point he could never grow beyond, no matter how much effort he exerted.

This fact was represented by several cold, hard numbers: one high-rank job and three low-rank jobs for a total level of 250. That was where he was, and it was the point beyond which he could go no further.

Theodore had reached maximum level.

Unlike Masters, tians had clear-cut individual differences in talent, represented by level limits that most of the time fell below the maximum of 500. Though he had managed to become a Paladin, his lack of innate talent made it impossible for him to grow any stronger.

At first, he refused to accept that this was the full extent of his ability.

More and more Masters were appearing in Altar, some of which were criminals like the princess-snatching Sechs Würfel.

Theodore had to grow stronger to protect his kingdom — but no matter how much blood, sweat, and tears he put into it, he just couldn't raise his level beyond 250.

It took some time for him to accept the level limit, but once he did, he began directing his efforts towards other ways of becoming stronger.

Since his base power was inadequate, he chose to make himself more versatile by taking low-rank jobs that gave him more utility skills. Through that process, he even managed to gain the Paladin's Purifying Silverlight and Grand Cross abilities.

On top of that, he learned how to "stack" his Grand Crosses — in other words, to use them at the exact same time as his fellow Paladins.

He did indeed grow stronger this way, and soon it was time to put his strength to the test.

Altar had entered a war against Dryfe. To him...no, to all living knights of the kingdom...this was the first major conflict with an outside force they had ever experienced.

Despite that, he stood ready to protect his homeland.

The knight's power was the kingdom's blade, while the knight's body was its shield.

Every knight was taught those words, and with that oath in his heart, he stood on the battlefield...only to fall without contributing whatsoever.

The devils of the Hell General's army dealt him a grave injury shortly after the battle began, quickly rendering him unconscious. And by the time he woke up in a church back at the capital...it was already over. He hadn't been able to protect the king, join his commander on his fatal charge, or even guard the backs of his brothers-in-arms.

The war had taken a heavy toll on the Royal Guard. In fact, it had more or less been annihilated. Many of those who survived went on to retire. One might assume that they did this to avoid the shame of defeat, but Theodore knew painfully well that his fellow knights had left because the battle had made them realize how powerless they really were.

After all...he himself wanted to quit being a knight for that very reason.

He was overcome with despair. In his mind, a knight who failed to contribute to a battle would be nothing but a burden, no matter how much effort he put in.

Thus, like some other knights, Theodore was going through the process of early retirement. In two weeks, he would return home as his viscount father's heir and inherit his land.

While waiting for that time to come, he was tasked with patrolling the castle, now far emptier than he recalled.

One day during his patrols, he walked into the indoor garden. He might have come here by mere chance, but perhaps there was a part of him that wanted to see this place one last time before he left forever.

"It hasn't changed at all..." he muttered, recalling the times he had stood guard over the king and his daughters as they held a tea party in this very garden.

The gardener must've still been working even though the castle had lost its king — the rose bushes were still blooming with well-shaped, youthful blossoms.

Perhaps this place will never change, even when the kingdom falls and the castle itself has a new master, Theodore thought, and the notion made his heart ache with sorrow — for his country, which he was certain would collapse, and for himself, a knight preparing to abandon his protection of this doomed country.

"...I would not be able to do anything even if I stayed." He lacked the talent and power to be of much help even if he remained a knight, so he tried to convince himself that he had made the correct choice.

While this conflict raged within him, Theodore heard a noise at the entrance to the rose garden.

Someone had walked in, prompting Theodore to hide.

Even he wasn't sure why he reacted this way. Perhaps he simply didn't want anyone to see him struggling to justify running away.

Regardless, the person who entered soon approached the garden table.

They...or rather, she sat down on a chair next to it and stared at the roses nearby.

Theodore recognized her well.

That is...Her Highness Elizabeth? The person was none other than the daughter of the late king and the second princess of Altar, Elizabeth S. Altar.

She had come here all by her lonesome, but that wasn't unusual. She was known to be a wild, carefree girl with a tendency to run off and do things on her own.

However, in most such cases, she would have a cheerful expression on her face...definitely not the gloomy look she bore now.

...Perhaps I should call out to her. As a naturally diligent person, Theodore considered tossing aside his inner struggle and presenting himself to her. However, he stopped when he noticed a change in her expression — a single tear running down her cheek.

She was still looking at the roses that bloomed around the garden.

He knew well the significance of this place — it was where the royal family and anyone close to them would gather to enjoy each other's company, and where Elizabeth had made many memories with her sisters and father.

The reason for her weeping did not need to be stated.

"Nh... Sniff..." Like a dam that had burst open, she began to cry without stopping.

The sight left Theodore completely frozen, and as he stood still...

"Elizabeth..."

...the voice of another person reached his ears.

It was Theresia C. Altar — the third princess of the kingdom, as well as Elizabeth's little sister.

She wasn't riding the giant rodent right now, which was quite a rarity for her.

She had actually stood up on her own two feet to go and find her lost sister.

"Nh... Theresiaaa..." The younger sister instantly noticed the tears on Elizabeth's cheeks, which made her change her expression.

Perhaps due to her sickly constitution, Theresia wasn't the most expressive girl. In fact, her demeanor was almost doll-like.

Even she, however, couldn't remain unmoved while seeing her sister brought to tears by the memory of their father.

Theresia then approached Elizabeth and, without saying a word, gave her a hug.

Though there was still little emotion on her face, a tear could be seen running down the girl's cheek while Elizabeth simply continued crying as she had been.

They were both little children that had just lost their father. It was only natural for them to cry.

Upon seeing this, Theodore slowly and silently sneaked out of the garden through the entrance opposite the one the girls had used.

Not saying a word, he walked through the hallway, as though eager to put distance between himself and the garden.

And then, after making it to a place where he could be certain he was alone...he bashed his head against the stone wall.

A dull pain rang out through his body as blood flowed from the resulting gash in his skin, but that was far from enough to soothe his anger.

"You couldn't even protect their fragile little hearts! How dare you try to protect your own...?!" This anger was directed at himself, and it overwhelmed him.

After that, he rushed to retract his resignation.

He refused to run away just because of his own weakness, and instead resumed searching for ways he could contribute, with renewed intensity.

Even after Franklin's Game in Gideon, his resolution had not wavered. He knew his limits, acknowledged them — and yet he continued to move forward, certain that there were things he could do in spite of them.

And now, he had been caught up in the assault on Altea.

Once again, it was time for him to see if he truly could protect the kingdom — and the hearts of Altar's princesses.

◇◆◇

Castle, Innermost Hall

Over ten minutes had passed since Ignis Idea had broken through the main gate.

Twelve knights of the Royal Guard — Theodore among them — were defending the innermost hall on the first floor. Beyond it, there were stairs leading down to a bulky gate forged of Mythical metal.

This was the entrance to the castle's emergency shelter, so in a way, the hallway where the knights now stood was the castle's last line of defense.

"Sir Lindos! Mr. Lazburn...King of Blaze still hasn't been stopped! He's still moving forward!"

"I see..."

The identity of the intruder was now known to everyone in the castle, and the knights and guards alike were using all of the castle's equipment to mount a defense against him.

However, that turned out to be less than ideal.

"The castle's defensive mechanisms are operating at just below thirty percent!"

"We suspect this is due to all the personnel we lost in the previous incidents..."

As he listened to these reports, Theodore's expression soured. The castle had countless defensive installations, both from the time of its original construction and added more recently by the Arch Sage. Theoretically, the place should be impenetrable.

However, many of the devices had been rendered unusable. This was partially due to deliberate sabotage of the castle's magic distribution system by one of the intruders, but mostly it came down to a sheer lack of people.

The countless devices installed in the castle — especially the ones designed by the Arch Sage — were meant to be used by people who had at least a little bit of magical skill.

However, most of the magic experts of the castle — the Arch Sage's disciples — had died to Gloria a little over a year ago.

It was difficult to find qualified replacements. Regardless of whether they hired unaffiliated casters or recruited people who were already working for the nobles, they needed even more personnel to run the necessary background checks. The castle's security couldn't be entrusted to an unreliable party, after all.

The same problem came up even with security installations that weren't magical. Thus, the castle's defenses were currently woefully unprepared for the current assault.

There simply weren't enough people to properly protect this place, and they knew that all too well.

"How are Her Highness and the others?" Theodore asked.

"According to a message from Marquis Findle, they're making their way into the shelter without any trouble." Elizabeth, Canglong, and Milianne were currently being escorted to the shelter. They were accompanied by six members of the Royal Guard, a group of maids, and Marquis Findle, who was the head of intelligence as well as a capable manipulator of magic equipment — a skill necessary to make it past the shelter's defenses.

"...Have you heard anything from Lady Grandria?"

"No... Not yet." However, Liliana and Theresia weren't part of the group heading to the shelter.

Normally, Liliana would be the one commanding the Royal Guard here, but she wasn't present at the moment.

While the other children were being taken to the shelter, Theresia had been nowhere in sight. Liliana had left the command of the knights to Theodore and headed out to search for her.

She likely assumed that I would make a better leader at the moment than she would, he thought.

One of the low-rank jobs Theodore had was "Leader," which gave a small boost to the stats of all members of his party. Being talentless himself, he had chosen to contribute to his order and the kingdom by strengthening his fellow knights.

The high-rank version of the job, Commander, would grant a greater boost and have a wider range, but it wasn't an option for him because he could only have one high-rank job.

Even so, he would do what he could.

"Where is King of Blaze right now?"

"First floor. The second hallway in the south."

"The magic distribution in that area should still be active. There should also be a barrier device that can be activated without caster abilities. Contact the guards there and tell them to seal off the second hallway."

"Understood!" The subordinate quickly used comms magic to pass on the order, and a few dozen seconds later...

"Your idea was a success! King of Blaze has been sealed off!" The subordinate sounded overjoyed, but Theodore wouldn't allow himself to feel too relieved.

He melted the front gate, he thought. Not even the Arch Sage's barriers will hold him for long.

Theodore estimated that Lazburn would stay contained for ten minutes at most.

"Sir Lindos, I must say — I'm very impressed with your knowledge of the castle's magic distribution system and equipment."

"...The best thing someone without talent can do is gather knowledge. I suggest you also learn as much as you can about all the defense mechanisms and escape routes you are authorized to know about."

"I-I will."

"Also, it's far too early to relax. The barrier bought us some breathing room, but it is only a matter of time until he breaks out. Some magic channels have been broken, as well. We were able to activate that barrier, but much of our security equipment in other areas does not have enough power to function. This includes the surveillance network. And let us not forget that Her Highness Theresia has not been taken to the shelter yet. I assume I've said enough for you to understand our role here?"

"Yes... We must protect the gate leading underground until the Princess's safety is secured."

"Exactly," Theodore said with a nod.

A moment later, he glared at the only path leading to this final line of defense — the hallway that was closed off by a shutter.

"Sir Lindos?" the subordinate said, unsure why Theodore's expression changed.

"...The box is moving," he muttered with a stern look. "It is slow, though. It does not seem to be running away. That can only mean..."

"Fshh... fshh... fshh." A strange sound like someone breathing could be heard beyond the shutter... which immediately melted.

"What?!" a few subordinates exclaimed.

"Ready your weapons! The enemy is upon us!" Theodore exclaimed as he and the others prepared for a fight.

Something passed through what used to be a barricade, finally coming into full view of the knights.

It was a three-metel-tall figure with a form that was far from human.

"Fshh... Fshh... Oh my, what a strong-looking gate. Have I found it? Should I assume no, given how weak you all seem to be?"

The creature seemed to be an amalgam of spider and human, like a giant spider whose features had been twisted into a more humanoid appearance by having its four front legs replaced by a single set of human limbs. Needless to say, the result was sickening.

"Who are you?" Theodore asked the talking spider-monster.

"I am King of Venom, Allo Ulmill," the creature responded with a light bow. "I was once a member of The Death's leading assassin group, 'The Death's Thumb.' Now, I suppose I should go by 'Aranea Idea' — a supporting member of I.F., loyal to the clan and especially to La Crima."

The creature casually revealed information that surprised everyone listening.

"Ohh, and the reason I introduced myself in such detail is simple — everyone here is going to die. Fshfshfsh," Aranea said, his shoulders shaking. It was hard to tell, but it seemed that he was chuckling.

He was actually laughing as he declared that he was going to slaughter every member of the Royal Guard here.

"But all of that information is quite valuable by itself," Aranea said before pointing at the hallway behind him. "I am sure you would be doing a great service if you brought that information back."

"Sorry to disappoint you, but anyone who would crumble before a powerful foe has long left the order," Theodore said firmly, rejecting Aranea's invitation to flee.

All the knights who were afraid of facing formidable enemies or who feared their own weakness had run away from the order after the war. There were no potential deserters left in the Royal Guard, and you could tell just by looking at their expressions.

"How unfortunate," Aranea said, shaking his head. "I set all this up so that the cowards would die first."

A moment later, a purplish, burbling liquid flowed out of the hallway he had pointed towards.

"Poison..."

"Of course. What else would you expect from King of Venom? Fshfshfsh!" He laughed again after emphasizing the title of his Superior Job. "I must say, you are quite the bunch of weaklings. The highest level you could reach is only half of the maximum 500. The shields of Altar seem to be quite fragile, actually. I have two things I must do, so I wouldn't want to waste too much time on the likes of you."

"Two things?"

"Yes. I am quite a busy person. First on the agenda is sabotaging this castle."

Seemingly filled with joy for some unknown reason, Aranea readily revealed his first goal, but it wasn't anything surprising to the knights. Theodore could instantly tell that he was the same kind of opponent as King of Blaze who had destroyed the main gate.

"And my second task...is assassinating the second princess." These words made most of the Royal Guard react with open rage and ready their blades, but Theodore was able to keep himself together, albeit barely, and wring out a single question. "...Why target Her Highness?"

"I have been conveyed to La Crima by The Death himself. However, back when I still served The Death, I was in charge of instructing a lower branch. The Death's Pinky, they were called. They were talentless, though, and were effectively the lowest group under The Death's command."

"Hm...?"

Theodore and his companions didn't know this, but that was the name of the assassin group that had attempted to take Elizabeth's life on the request of Marquis Borozel, only to be destroyed by the Superior Killer — Marie.

She had solved the problem all by herself. No one had even realized that Elizabeth's life had been in jeopardy, and the incident faded away into obscurity.

However, the story didn't end there.

"It seems they were destroyed in their attempt to assassinate the second princess, so I figured that as their instructor, I would shoulder their duties and kill her myself."

He declared that he would assassinate Elizabeth as casually as someone might state that they were going to take out the trash.

"If you tell me where she is, I will let you all go for the moment. What do you say? I'm being honest this time."

The Royal Guards who had Truth Discernment could see the sincerity of Aranea's words.

Before responding, Theodore fell silent for a moment. And then...

"I see. Here's your answer, then... We refuse."

...he rejected the offer utterly.

They were standing against a talented monstrosity. In a world where humanoid...or at least tian powers were determined by the jobs they held, Aranea was a remarkable figure who had acquired a Superior Job.

Besides that, he had been modified by a Superior Embryo to become even more powerful.

Theodore, in contrast, could only acquire three low-rank and a single high-rank job — comparing them at all seemed like a foolish endeavor.

Despite outnumbering their foe, the knights' chances of victory were minuscule.

Theodore's decision would no doubt lead them all to their death.

Even so, he — all of them had chosen to defy the enemy before them.

"Our power...!" Theodore called.

"...Is the kingdom's blade!" the knights answered, brandishing their swords.

"Our bodies...!" Theodore called.

"...Are the kingdom's shields!" the knights answered as they raised their own shields.

"Royal Guard... Prepare for battle!"

"Sir, yes, sir!" They were fully prepared to fight Aranea.

Their will was one, and not one of them felt any fear.

They were the Royal Guard — those who used to be the true protectors of Altar.

"Fshfshfsh... You continue to struggle? Frail as you might be, you are still good prey. Fshfshfshfshfsh..." Aranea laughed, moving his spider-like mouth. "Do be careful, though. My poison is more fiendish than even that of your typical UBM. It will easily melt a limb or two. And this body of mine is far stronger than the one I possessed as a mere Superior Job and a member of The Death's Thumb. To be honest, this will barely qualify as a fight."

As much as these words were a threat, they were also the unvarnished truth.

Even so, they did nothing to shake the knights' resolve.

"Charge!" Theodore cried.

"As you command!" the knights answered. He didn't fall back, and neither did they.

And so, the Royal Guard faced down a foe that far outclassed them.

“Fshfsh... Fatal Mist.”

“Everyone! Take an Elixir!” Aranea had used King of Venom’s ultimate job skill right off the bat, prompting Theodore to order the Royal Guard to use the Elixirs they had been provided with.

This gave the Royal Guard the upper hand in this exchange.

Aranea’s Fatal Mist was a skill that allowed him to pick several of his ten poisons that give disease-based debuffs, and then create a mist based on those poisons without worrying about any chemical interactions between them. And as King of Venom, he also possessed the Toxification skill at EX level, which doubled any disease-based status effects he inflicted.

Being exposed to a mist carrying such potent poisons would normally be fatal to anyone.

Aranea’s Poison Resistance was also at EX level, allowing him to negate any and all disease-based debuffs. It wouldn’t have been unusual if he was the only one still standing the moment after he used Fatal Mist.

The only way the Royal Guard could avoid this powerful poison attack was by using Elixirs. With the exception of those from diseases the imbibers had acquired by ordinary means, Elixirs negated all disease-based status debuffs, and then granted immunity to them for the next three minutes.

By drinking these elixirs, the Royal Guard avoided instant death and now took no damage from Aranea’s greatest weapon.

It seemed as though King of Venom was rendered powerless now, but...

“Fshfsh! Elixirs! Excellent! I love this!”

...he actually reacted with joy when he saw the knights employ this defense.

It was no doubt eerie, but the Royal Guard still showed no fear.

“Three, two...Grand Cross!” Theodore called, giving a hand sign.

“GRAND CROSS!” the knights answered.

Grand Cross was the strongest attack in a Paladin’s arsenal. As an ultimate job skill, it was difficult to acquire, so the only ones actually using it were Theodore and just three other members of the Royal Guard.

However, all of them had learned the art of stacking.

Following their defeat against Franklin back in Gideon, many Royal

Guards had gone on to learn Grand Cross and do plenty of stacking practice, and you could see the fruits of their efforts in this four-stack strategy they used on Aranea.

Cross-shaped pillars of light rose up into the sky, delivering an immense blast of both holy and heat energy.

Not even Pure-Dragons could withstand this torrent of light.

"I see. Very impressive...though not very effective, I'm sorry to say," Aranea remarked.

Despite being the target of the pillar, Aranea still seemed perfectly fine.

"Fshfsh... This won't burn me. I have resistance to heat. If you saw my colleague, you should understand why."

Aranea was wearing multiple accessories that granted fire resistance. He'd originally equipped these to protect him from Ignis Idea's immense heat — but they proved effective against Grand Cross, as well.

"Exactly as I anticipated!" The moment the pillar of light vanished, all twelve of the Royal Guards charged Aranea in unison.

"Ohh?" Aranea voiced his surprise. He had expected them to be shaken by this, after all.

Theodore, however, had known all along that Grand Cross would have little effect on this creature.

One of the three low-rank jobs he had was Appraiser, which provided vision-based utility skills like Reveal, Identification, and See-Through Sight.

All of these were useful, but they often came as extras from other jobs, and their maximum skill level for Appraisers was below the generic low-rank limit of 5. Because of this, only a few people took the job. Theodore was one of these few, because he had a strict job limit and Appraiser allowed him to acquire all of these useful perception skills using only one of his allotted jobs.

He'd already used Identification to find out that Aranea was wearing accessories that granted heat resistance, and their Grand Cross attack had been nothing but a distraction.

That was the true meaning of the hand sign he had given before the Grand Cross — he was directing the knights to attack while the light was still active.

"OAAGH!" The Paladins of the Royal Guard roared as they thrust their blades, imbued with Knight skills, into Aranea's body.

"...This won't work," the creature simply said. None of their swords could penetrate any further than the outer layer of Aranea's carapace.

"Gh...! Is he this resilient...?!" Theodore said, shocked that his blade, aimed right for the chest, could pierce no deeper.

"Fshfsh. Identification helped you see my equipment, but it looks like Reveal didn't let you see all of my stats. I suppose it must be due to the level difference... Oh, in case you're wondering, my total level is 980." Reveal was a skill that showed the target's stats, but if the target had skills or gear that interfered with it, then differences in level could make it impossible to get concrete values. "Not that my stats as King of Venom mean much now anyway," Aranea added.

"What...?"

"Perhaps you could've pierced the frail flesh I used to have...but you can barely scratch my new body."

King of Venom held the Venomancer Superior Job, which was part of the alchemist grouping. As such, it offered high MP and DEX, but not much else. Normally, the Paladins here would've been far stronger than him, and their joint attack would've spelled his doom.

However, this was no longer King of Venom, Allo Ulmill, but rather Aranea Idea — a human modified by a Superior Embryo.

"This isn't a fragile human body any longer." An upper-Pure-Dragon-tier spider monster had been used as material in the operation that had transformed him, merging their flesh. Such human-monster hybrids were commonly employed by La Crima because they allowed the creation of Ideas that were physically more powerful than the average vanguard, but still maintained their rear guard or crafting skills.

Aranea was no different — all of his stats were far above those of a common Paladin.

"I'm superior to all of you combined and I have these amazing skills," he said, looking down on them like a human would look down upon ants. "You have spirit...but do you really think you can stand up to me?"

"...Not yet!"

In spite of everything, the Royal Guards decided to keep on fighting.

Their perfect joint attack had only managed to wound Aranea lightly, but he was wounded nonetheless.

Even the Grand Cross stack they'd released earlier hadn't been completely negated — minor burns were visible on Aranea's skin, and the heat pouring off him was tangible.

Maybe the attack had done less damage than a typical low-rank fire spell, but it had still done damage.

That meant that Aranea wasn't an unbeatable monster. He could certainly be overcome.

"The possibility exists!" Theodore roared.

There was once a creature that had completely crushed the Royal Guard.

It had a barrier that negated physical attacks, as well as a complete resistance to holy damage. Designed to be the ultimate foe of all Paladins, this unmatched creature had almost completely wiped out the Royal Guard.

However, it was actually defeated by a Paladin...a Master.

He'd brought down the very creature created to defeat people like him.

Theodore and the other Royal Knights had all borne witness to this triumph. They had all seen him raise up his right hand in victory.

That was why they could never allow themselves to give up, for they too were Paladins sworn to protect Altar.

"Attack! Keep fighting as long as your limbs can move...or until this creature falls!" Theodore called.

"SIR, YES, SIR!" the knights answered. They kept on moving. They imbibed more Elixir and continued to fight.

Not a single man among them gave up. Every single knight relentlessly sliced at Aranea's body, striking as though they expected their shallow cuts to chop off all his limbs.

Clearly irritated, Aranea said, "Fshfsh... How annoying!" Right as Theodore's sword pierced his chest again, the creature swung his spider arms. Backed by Pure-Dragon-tier power, the four arms sent four of the knights flying, but the other eight continued fighting regardless.

...An opening! Theodore thought. Aranea was strong — perhaps ten times as strong as they were.

On account of his hardy spider exoskeleton, Aranea even outclassed them in the Paladin's speciality — END. This Idea had an edge over them in AGI, as well, but since non-mounted Paladins were slow to begin with, this didn't mean he was all that fast — not even close to supersonic speeds, in fact.

And even if that gap between their AGI stats was immense, there was little difference in their actual speeds, which meant that Aranea couldn't just choose to kill them in the blink of an eye.

"You impertinent little...!"

There was a reason why Aranea's AGI was lower than one might expect.

The spider monster fused to his flesh had been far faster than him, but that was because it had a mastery over its arachnid form.

Allo Ulmill was ultimately human, so it was hard for him to move as a spider. He could have been given a fully arachnid body, but no one knew how long it would take him to learn to move in such a form. In the end, it had been more efficient to give Aranea a mostly humanoid form, even if that resulted in a lower AGI overall.

This could be considered a flaw of human-monster hybrids — END could be maintained, but AGI couldn't.

Unlike someone using a Guardian fusion skill, Aranea had been physically merged with a monster. Since parts of him were still human, he could never fully utilize the monster's power.

However, that also meant that he kept all the advantages of being human.

"Don't underestimate me!" Aranea once again moved the spider-arms, this time releasing countless webs through their tips.

"Huh?!" The webs quickly stuck to the surrounding knights, pinning them to the walls.

"Kh-agh...!" The impact knocked the wind from Theodore's lungs. He quickly caught his breath and tried to move, but the Binding effect from the webs had immobilized him.

"This is...!"

"Fshfsh... A web, as you can surely guess. You did manage to give me a bit of trouble, but that's all over now," Aranea said, continuing to flood the area with spider silk.

Perhaps it was obvious that a spider-man would be able to use both poison and webs, but Aranea had not been granted these powers by his fusion with a spider monster. Rather, it was the other way around — Allo Ulmill had mastered both of these things, and that was why he had been merged with a spider in the first place.

"Fshfsh... I always liked doing this," Aranea mused. "Can't use Elixirs when you're all wrapped up, can you?"

That was the reason why King of Venom had become a skilled user of thread-based binding techniques.

As mentioned before, Elixirs were his bane. He naturally needed to devise a counter to them, and this was that counter — binding his enemies so they couldn't drink them in the first place.

Skills that used threads as weapons were dependent on DEX, so his build worked well for this kind of attack, even as the frail King of Venom.

"Fshfsh... Now, there's nothing you can do but wait in terror for your Elixir's three-minute timer to expire."

Aside from being effective, this strategy also suited Aranea's taste.

This was why he'd actually been glad they'd all used Elixirs.

Just as he said, they'd given him some trouble, but this was the end.

All that was left for him was to watch as the Royal Guards here died in fear before heading down to kill the second princess.

With that in mind, Aranea looked at their faces...

"Ah..."

...and saw something he could scarcely believe.

Throughout his life, he had dealt out death to many. He'd bound and poisoned thousands of people exactly like this.

All of his victims, without exception, had shown despair as their inevitable death approached.

To Aranea, seeing that despair was a reassurance that he was the one who dealt out death to others, and it always filled him with a sense of relief.

By gaining this body, he had become even more skilled at killing. His body was tough enough that swords barely scratched him. He was powerful and his life had been extended. He could clearly feel death becoming a distant concept to him, and Aranea could honestly say that his life had never been better.

He was the death dealer. In turn, death would never come for him.

Since that was his outlook, Aranea felt absolute terror when he noticed that his prey, bound and out of options...remained stoic, brave, and unfaltering.

"Ngh..." Aranea let out a noise of distress as he took a step back.

"Target — below yourselves... GRAND CROSS!" Still bound, Theodore and the others who were able to do so used Grand Cross on the floor below them.

The next moment, the Paladins burst into flame.

Embraced by searing heat, they lost great amounts of HP even with Paladin's Aegis protecting them. Still, they soldiered on through the pain.

The memory of one particular Paladin who had kept on using his flames even as they consumed him was still fresh in their minds.

He had been driven by his will to protect the people, and they would follow his example.

And as a reward for this self-destructive act...

"M-My webs... You burned them off...?!"

...the silk binding them was incinerated.

While Aranea himself had resistance to fire, that didn't apply to the webs he released. Like any organic material, the silk burned up in the searing light of Grand Cross.

"CHARGE!" Theodore called, and then he said something Aranea did not catch.

It mattered little, however. The more important fact was that the Royal Guard were still moving and attacking him.

"Y-Your struggle is futile!" Aranea swung his arms and sprayed out silk again, sending the knights flying once more.

However, there was something in the way this time — ten, or more, metallic steeds.

"What are these horses...?!" In fact, they were SMPS — Second Model Prism Steeds — the mass-produced units that had been given to the Royal Guard.

Mounted combat was impossible indoors, but since SMPS could create barriers, they were still useful as covers.

"Ghh... You're in the way!" Aranea destroyed the surrounding steeds with his webs and arms.

The steeds quickly shattered under the assault, but the knights thought nothing of it. They only needed the SMPS to buy time.

"Grand Cross!" two voices called.

"Hm...?!" Suddenly, a stacked Grand Cross manifested under Aranea.

This two-stack was weaker than the first four-stack, but it was still able to temporarily blind Aranea and burn away the webs he was releasing.

"Do you truly think this will be enough to defeat me...?!" Pressured by the torrent of light, he struggled to escape it. His accessories kept the damage low, so it would never actually kill him.

In his mind, this was just another desperate attempt at stalling from the Royal Guards, just like the horses.

And then, the pressure he felt from the flood of light was abruptly cut in half.

One of the users ran out of MP...! Aranea thought, based on his perception of the situation. Grand Cross was far from cheap to cast, so it wasn't surprising that it could quickly drain the user's MP reserves dry.

The pressure was now weak enough for him to easily escape.

"I'm ou—?!"

But as soon as he did so...

"OAAGH!"

...there was Theodore, lunging at him from close range with his sword.

Everything he had done so far was only a set-up for this one attack.

Theodore had deliberately stopped using Grand Cross so he could approach Aranea and thrust his sword straight through his chest.

He aimed for the same spot he'd attacked many times before. Worn down by the continuous assault of slashes and stabs, Aranea's tough skin finally gave way...and the blade sunk into his body.

Aranea made no sound. It was as though time had stopped.

Theodore, drained of both MP and SP, had delivered the strongest attack he could muster and seemed to be frozen in that position.

Aranea looked down at the sword that pierced his chest...

"Fshfsh... WHAT A SHAME!"

...and laughed before swinging his human arm to send Theodore flying.

"Ugh..." Theodore coughed up blood, likely from his shattered ribs piercing his internal organs.

"S-Sir Lindos!"

"Then we must fight without him...!" After their costly escape from the web and Aranea's many attacks, the knights were all heavily wounded. Many had even lost consciousness already.

They tried to keep fighting Aranea in spite of that...

"Cough... Th-This is...!"

...but then, they hit their time limit.

The effects of the second Elixir had begun to expire.

Most of the poison from the Fatal Mist had been neutralized by the many Grand Crosses, but the small amount that still remained began to affect the knights that still stood.

Now, hands were shaking too much for them to even take a third Elixir.

"Fsh, fsh, fsh... My, my...for such a frail bunch, you certainly gave me a lot of trouble. But as you can see, it was futile," Aranea said, pulling out the sword Theodore had stabbed into his chest. "You were probably aiming for my heart, but it's not there. Not like I would die if you actually did manage to pierce it anyway."

Except the brain, Aranea had multiples of every vital organ. He was designed to survive even if his insides were critically damaged.

"But your futile struggle really made an impression! I won't forget any of you! I'll even tell the second princess all about it when I kill her! She deserves to hear the tale of the weakling knights who gave everything they had just to stab me once! FSHFSHFSH!" Aranea laughed out loud and looked down at the knights, wounded and poisoned...when suddenly, he heard a strange noise like a loud crack.

"Hm...? What is that sound?" he asked, looking around.

Some seconds later, he was ready to assume that the sound had either been the knights' equipment breaking or the hall itself preparing to fall apart from the intense battle, but then...

"Yeah...stab you...just once."

...Theodore, still battered and lying against the wall, said those words.

"Oh? You can still speak? Aren't you more injured than anyone else here?"

"...I only gave you...a slight wound." His words seemed like incoherent muttering.

Perhaps Theodore's consciousness was simply wavering because of the poison and injuries, but for some reason, these seemingly meaningless words sent a chill down Aranea's spine.

"What about the woun— Hm?" Aranea tried to speak, but his words were cut off by that same crack-like sound. This time, it gave off an ominous feeling, like the noise that preceded a dam bursting.

"What is this sound...?"

"I...saw it... That is why...I kept...targeting it..."

"Speak, already! What were you targeting?!" Aranea shouted, clearly irritated by Theodore's mumbling.

"The box," Theodore responded.

"What...?" The crack-like...no, the cracking sound reached Aranea again.

It wasn't reaching his ears through the outside air, but resonating within his very bones.

The Royal Guard had given everything they had, and then some, just to deliver a single stab wound.

Their target, however, was actually inside the wound.

Theodore had been focused on it even before Aranea had shown himself.

The Appraiser job possessed three utility skills: Reveal, Identification...and See-Through Sight.

This last skill gave the user a power similar to X-ray vision, or perhaps something more like the devices used in airport security checks. It was used to Identify items with special, multilayered structures or to detect dangerous objects.

Theodore normally used this skill in the course of his guard duties, and it had allowed him to see the object within Aranea's body before he even arrived.

"What are you talking ab— Ah?!"

Theodore had seen and targeted it from the start.

There was only one thing that could be making that sound — the box-shaped inventory inside Aranea's body, implanted to store the materials for his poisons and webs.

The cracking noise was now happening more and more frequently.

"Wait. Wait...!"

The existence of the inventory was only logical. Spreading poison and releasing webs required materials; despite that, Aranea was able to flood the hall with venom and turn the entire place into one giant spider web.

He couldn't possibly have fit all of that into his physical body, so he must have stored the materials somewhere.

However, Identification didn't show any inventories on him.

That was what made Theodore realize that the immense amount of material Aranea used had to have been kept within the box inside him, which he had spotted with See-Through Vision. Since the box was necessary for Aranea's survival, it had been implanted into him so that he could never lose it...but that came with one major flaw.

"Wait, wait, waitWAITWAITWAITWAAIT!" The repeated cracking sounds made Aranea lose his cool, his voice rising to a desperate scream.

The prospect of being on the receiving end of that which he had so often dealt out to others terrified him.

He didn't fear the sounds themselves, but the event they foretold — a minor law of this world.

Inventories could be destroyed from the outside.

And when they were...they released all their contents.

"WaAiT... ABGHAH?!" Following one brief final cry...Aranea was torn apart.

The items that overflowed within his tough body instantly pulverized his organs, and a few moments later, the sheer volume of them, far greater than his body could fit, burst forth. Aranea's body was ripped to pieces.

No matter how modified and improved, his body could not withstand this. The Idea who firmly believed that the modifications he'd undergone had allowed him to escape death forever...died precisely because of those modifications.

Theodore, though badly wounded, calmly watched the end of this fearsome foe.

"Heh..." He smiled for the first time since the war...as the flood of materials — poison included — washed over him.

Chapter From the Past: Memories of Fire

Fire

The Lazburn family was known to excel at fire magic.

Tian aptitudes and maximum levels differed from person to person, but the Lazburns were almost always adept at wielding fire spells and capable of reaching high levels. Though the most obvious examples of such talent inheritance were the inhabitants of Tenchi, the Lazburns were also an excellent demonstration of the principle.

Because of this, the Lazburns had devoted their lives to fire magic for generations.

In a world with jobs and levels, tians like the Lazburns, who clearly knew how to improve themselves, were fortunate indeed. He — Feuer Lazburn — was no different. He spent his years learning fire magic from his father — the previous King of Blaze.

One lesson that had been hammered into him went as such: “The three higher elemental Superior Jobs are The Atmos, The Earth, and The Ocean. They are only accessible to those with the aptitude for all the types of magic they employ. However vast their powers might be, though, they are shallow. We are a family of fire and fire alone, but that doesn’t mean that we are inferior to those who command all aspects of the atmosphere. When it comes to fire, the Kings of Blaze — who have all been Lazburns for generations now — are superior to The Atmos. And fire magic is the most powerful magic of all.”

What Feuer’s father had meant by that was that the Lazburns were the strongest casters in the world, and Feuer couldn’t help but feel that his father was absolutely right.

No one needed to command every kind of magic. You merely had to devote yourself to one thing and become the strongest at that. Since the Lazburn had mastered the arts of extreme heat, it was obvious what Feuer had to do.

From a young age, he had dedicated his mind and body to the study of fire magic. Even after his father died and he inherited the King of Blaze job, Feuer refused to stop. He gained the job's ultimate skill and even improved on it, always striving to grow stronger.

And when King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn became a well-known name throughout the kingdom, he sent a challenge letter to a particular person.

The person's name was...unknown.

No one knew his name. Not even royalty, and not even people who could use Reveal. He was a true enigma.

Despite that, he was respected as a pillar of the country. When everyone spoke of him, they all referred to him only by his job:

"Arch Sage."

◆

On that day four years ago, the central arena of Gideon the City of Duels was bustling with activity.

Almost every seat was taken, and among the guests of honor was King Eldor of Altar himself.

Since the first queen of the kingdom was an Over Gladiator born in Gideon, it was traditional for Altar's royalty to attend any important duels taking place in this city.

And what an important duel this was!

At the time, The Lynx, Tom Cat was still the duel champion and many newly arriving Masters were overtaking the rankings. The main event of this day, however, wasn't a duel between rankers at all.

It was a clash between legendary tians said to be the first and second strongest casters in the kingdom.

One was King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn "of the Embers" — a well-known wielder of flame magic.

The other was an advisor to the king, the living legend who was the "Magical Apex" at the time — Arch Sage.

As the Masters were still growing in power, this was a battle between the most powerful casters in Altar.

"It has been a while since I stood on a stage like this. Do go easy on me, Sir Lazburn," said the Arch Sage with a smile.

"...Sure," Feuer replied, his face stern.

The reason why this duel was even happening was the letter of challenge he'd sent, and his goal here was the Arch Sage's title, "Magical Apex."

The Lazburns believed themselves to be the strongest casters of all, and they devoted their lives to making that a fact.

However, the title of "Magical Apex" currently belonged to the Arch Sage, so Feuer had challenged him to make it his own.

He broke all limits in his own training, and now — while he was still in his prime, before age would begin to take its toll — he had sent the letter that had led to this duel.

Feuer had also made the challenge public, making it clear that if he didn't accept, the Arch Sage would be viewed as a weak coward for running away from the challenge.

The reactions to his actions were mixed.

Some praised Feuer for his bravery in challenging a true legend, but most were put off by his flagrant disrespect towards someone the country so revered.

Even so, he refused to retract the challenge. The title of "Magical Apex" was the Lazburns' ultimate desire.

His father had wanted it as well, but he was struck down by sickness before he could challenge the Arch Sage. He had died with this one heavy regret in his heart.

Feuer had been by his father's side as he passed, so he had made a promise to defeat the Arch Sage and reclaim the title of strongest caster for the Lazburn family. This challenge was the culmination of a life dedicated to training.

"You look terrifying," said the Arch Sage. "Have I wronged you in some way?"

"...No. I have nothing against you personally," Feuer replied. If he had to name one thing that bothered him, it would be the fact that he was the "Magical Apex" while also being the Arch Sage.

The high-rank job Sage was directly opposed to the Lazburn family's line of thinking.

"Sage" was a job that could only be taken by those who had an aptitude for all three higher elements. They could wield magic of the atmos, earth, and ocean. Some Sages could even cast healing spells.

However, this versatility often made them less powerful than the specialists of the elements.

Sages were a prime example of what Feuer's father called "vast, but shallow," and if it wasn't obvious already, Arch Sage was the Superior Job of the grouping. Thus, the very existence of an Arch Sage who was the "Magical Apex" flew in the face of everything the Lazburn family stood for.

For Feuer, that alone was enough of a reason to issue this challenge.

Facing the Arch Sage, Feuer contemplated the past — specifically, the words of his bedridden father.

"From what I've heard, the Arch Sage can use Crimson Spheres. That means that he has access to the ultimate skills of the high-rank jobs under the three higher elements. That is impressive indeed, but it also means that he can't reach the true depths of the fire element like King of Blaze can. A Lazburn can surely defeat him."

Even if the Arch Sage had ultimate skills from high-rank jobs under the higher element of the ocean, which could include defensive magic that worked by dampening energy, the ultimate skill of King of Blaze would deliver more than enough energy to overcome that.

"Apparently, he's also able to use dark-based hybrid magic that exterminates living beings on a large scale. That's impressive too. But since it attacks such a large area, it can't be used in the confines of a duel arena. In a one-on-one battle, he has no means of delivering more power than King of Blaze's Fixed Star."

Fixed Star was the name of the job's ultimate skill, and as the name suggested, it created an orb of burning plasma not dissimilar to the one that shone down upon the earth from on high.

In terms of sheer extermination potential, the Arch Sage's Imaginary Meteo was stronger, but against a single unit, Fixed Star came out on top.

That was why Feuer's father was confident that he would win. "I could've beaten him if it wasn't for this damned illness," he cursed.

However, Feuer's outlook was a bit different than his father's.

...I think that the Arch Sage can use the ultimate job skills of not just high-rank, but Superior Jobs as well, he thought. They were dealing with a prodigy who had lived for over a century and spent all that time honing his magic skills.

It would not be surprising for someone so talented to have reached that level.

Feuer fully believed that the power carried by his family was the strongest in all the world, but he didn't underestimate his enemy either.

And if the Arch Sage could use all the ultimate job skills of all elements, Feuer resolved to defeat him with something even greater than the Fixed Star spell he worked so hard to learn.

I will use something even more powerful than Fixed Star and bring home the title of Magical Apex. He had far fewer cards in his proverbial deck than the Arch Sage, so he planned to make the battle a quick one. He believed he had to channel his strongest magic from the moment the battle began and use it to instantly overwhelm his opponent.

Feuer would give his all — his entire family's many years of training — into his very first attack.

While Feuer was extremely serious about the upcoming battle, the Arch Sage seemed wholly composed.

He didn't even have to accept this challenge to begin with. He was one of the pillars of Altar, and no one would ever doubt someone who had been providing such a great service to the country for over a century. No one would call him a coward for refusing Lazburn's challenge. In fact, the general opinion would be that Lazburn simply wasn't worth his time.

Despite that, the Arch Sage had accepted. He even spoke to Count Gideon, convincing him to turn this battle into a major event held in the central arena.

"We both are powerful casters," he told him. "It is necessary for us to use Gideon's barrier equipment, just in case, and it would certainly draw a crowd you could profit from."

Though, with a depth and foresight that was too great for anyone but him to truly understand, it was hard to tell if his words expressed the true nature of his intentions.

Regardless, this duel had been set up with agreement from both combatants, and the time had come to commence the battle.

"BEGIN!" the moderator cried, instantly spurring Feuer into action.

"Burn! Burn! Burn! Mimic of heavenly light and scorcher of earth! Shining star that fits in the palm of my hand!" Channeling his magic into the spell, Feuer intoned the most intense Chant he had ever used.

"Chant" was a supplementary skill that increased the effectiveness of spells if the caster said something while casting them. The words differed from person to person, and his was one that was meant to light his very own soul on fire.

"You are the twins of ruination! The incarnation of binary stars!" As he spoke, Fixed Stars appeared in both of his hands.

This was the technique he'd developed — double-casting his ultimate job skill.

This was what lay beyond singular Fixed Stars, and it was the technique that Feuer alone had perfected. He wasn't the first who had tried, however. The technique was just so dangerous that all the past Kings of Blaze who had attempted it had lost control and burnt themselves to ash.

But Feuer had poured enough blood and sweat into his training to finally achieve it.

Not even a Superior Job's ultimate ocean-element skill could stand against this. Such a defensive skill's energy-damping effect would cancel-out one Fixed Star, but the other would still be more than enough to destroy his opponent. That was the very simple reason that Feuer had decided to use two.

With this, he would surely win this fight.

These stars will guide the Lazburn family to vict— he thought, before he saw something that shocked him.

The Arch Sage, who was standing on the ground until but a moment ago, was now floating in midair.

And surrounding him...there were four Fixed Stars.

"...Ahh... AHHH!" Feuer screamed as he realized that the Arch Sage had easily surpassed the pinnacle he'd worked so hard to reach.

A single Fixed Star cost over 300,000 MP. Using four would drain even Feuer's reserves — yet the Arch Sage seemed to be able to do this without breaking a sweat.

But more important than that was the fact that the Arch Sage had chosen to use Fixed Stars after seeing that Feuer was going to cast them.

That meant that, despite starting to cast them after he'd already begun, the Arch Sage had managed to prepare these four Fixed Stars before Feuer had even finished casting two.

That was proof that the Arch Sage's fire magic was superior to his, not just in pure volume, but in proficiency and speed.

If Feuer was an incapable fool, he could have chosen to blindly believe that his Fixed Stars were more powerful, or that the Arch Sage's four only looked menacing and that this was all nothing but a bluff.

Alas, he was a born genius of fire magic who'd dedicated his life to learning the ins and outs of the art.

That was why a single glance at Arch Sage's Fixed Stars was enough for him to know that they were equal to...no, even greater than his own.

But despite knowing that, he couldn't back down.

"FIXED STAAAAR!" he roared, releasing his orbs of plasma. "...Fixed Star," the Arch Sage responded. The outcome of this clash was already clear as daylight. Feuer understood that painfully well, but he couldn't let himself run from the conclusion of his many years of training.

The six Fixed Stars flew towards their targets.

The two launched by Feuer were consumed by two of the four launched by the Arch Sage, while the other two went on to incinerate him.

So ended the battle between the strongest tian casters — all in less than a minute.

◆

An old man sat on a tree stump in the mountains. His eyes were closed. Some would assume he was meditating, some would think he was sleeping, and still others would believe he was actually dead.

Three and a half years had passed since his — King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn's — duel against the Arch Sage, and he had retreated to a location in the mountains southwest of Altar.

He had previously lived in an urban mansion, but he had burned it down with his own hands before moving here.

Following the duel, the people's opinion of him had sunk appallingly low. To those who understood what had happened, Feuer was no doubt a remarkable caster. They knew that they'd witnessed an exchange of extremely potent magic.

But in the eyes of a layman, he had been crushed like an insect by magic twice as powerful as his own. They didn't even consider that he was the first King of Blaze to use multiple Fixed Stars at once — all they knew was that he was nothing before the Arch Sage.

Therefore, most people believed that he vanished to escape the shame.

In truth, he didn't care about their opinions one bit.

His mind had no room for such noise, for it was overwhelmed by the truth that he had been utterly defeated by his target.

He'd challenged the most well-versed caster in the world with the element that he'd dedicated his life to, and yet the Arch Sage had crushed him with that very same element.

All the training he'd gone through to prove himself the strongest — to surpass the Arch Sage — turned out to be for naught.

It was as though his entire life had been negated.

Ever since then, he'd been living as a hermit in the mountains.

He'd dedicated his existence to fire magic and fire magic alone. There was no one to care if he disappeared.

As he meditated, he was silent, but his surroundings certainly weren't.

They were filled with the crackling sound of flame, caused by the sixty-four balls of fire floating around him.

They were not Fixed Stars, of course, but low-rank Fireballs. Even so, very few were capable of controlling so many of them at the same time.

After losing to the Arch Sage in breadth, power, and speed, he took to honing his skills yet further and had achieved greater control and speed than he'd possessed during their duel.

By striving to improve himself even further, he was able to break more limits and achieve the result before him.

However, he knew that this was as far as he could possibly go.

"It's still not enough..." he whispered to himself, and the orbs vanished.

His goal was the same as ever — simultaneous control of multiple Fixed Stars. Currently, he might've been able to maintain as many as the Arch Sage had in their duel, if not more.

However, there was something that made it fundamentally impossible for him.

"I don't have enough magic..."

He simply didn't have the MP to release four Fixed Stars at once. Even when he drained his reserves dry, he could only call forth three of them at once.

Maximum MP could be increased by gaining more levels, but even those with Superior Jobs had limits to how high they could go.

The Arch Sage had lived and leveled for over a century. To match him, Feuer would need at least several decades more.

It wasn't certain if Feuer would even live long enough to catch up to the Arch Sage, and he would never overcome him even if he did.

The Arch Sage had chosen to use Feuer's own speciality against him, but he actually had access to spells of all elements. If he'd chosen to use magic that fire was weak against, not even having the same amount of MP or control would help him.

To defeat him with only a single element, merely equaling the Arch Sage wasn't enough — he had to surpass him.

That was exactly why he'd crafted the double Fixed Star technique.

"Tch..." Feuer immediately thought back to the day of the duel. Specifically, he remembered how the Arch Sage looked as he completely destroyed him.

His eyes were like those of a kindly adult looking at a child showing off a curious hunk of garbage he found.

To the Arch Sage, the power Feuer had given his whole life to earn was nothing but that — a child's worthless nonsense.

"...A child, eh?" Feuer understood that the Arch Sage was known mostly for his Imaginary Meteo because he'd washed his hands of Fixed Star many decades ago.

He'd stopped using it because he deemed it unfit for his purpose.

And Feuer had challenged him with a lesser version of this "unfit for his purpose" technique. Of course he would be disappointed and look at me like I'm a child, he thought in self-derision.

That was why he had to surpass the Arch Sage's fire magic.

Indeed — Feuer had not given up.

He became a hermit, meditated, and trained so he could challenge the Arch Sage once again.

He'd been completely defeated, but he was also so set in his ways that from now on, all he could do was dedicate himself to acquiring the "Magical Apex" title — or rather, to defeating the Arch Sage.

That was why he'd continued training even after the staggering defeat.

He didn't know that the title of "Magical Apex" now belonged to a Master known as "Fatoum," nor did he know that the Arch Sage had died in a war.

He'd isolated himself from society and focused solely on training.

Some would consider him insane, but he was of sound mind.

It was simply that his personal perspective and the world he lived in didn't allow for any other course of action.

However, one day, this life of his came to an end.

"...Who are you?" Feuer asked, his eyes still closed.

He wasn't speaking to himself or to any memory — he actually had a visitor.

"A pleasure to meet you. Feuer Lazburn, I assume? -sume?"

Two people stood among the trees and shrubs of the mountain grove.

Their voices were like a paired chorus. One was a pale woman in a wheelchair, while the other was a robust man in black pushing it.

Together, they were Soul Trader, La Crima.

"I am La Crima. A Master and the current Soul Trader. -der."

"A Master? I have heard of your kind. What do you want from me?"

"I came with an invitation. Would you like to join our clan as a supporting member? -ber?"

"Clan?"

"A clan known as 'I.F.,' which only allows the wanted. -ted."

"Criminals, eh? I don't recall being on any wanted list."

"...But you killed many, did you not? -not?" La Crima asked with certainty. "This mountain is very quiet. I sense no monsters or people here, yet I hear that this area is inhabited by high-level beings, making it an excellent spot for training. -ning."

"...What are you trying to say?"

"How many levels did you gain? -gain?" They were basically asking how many monsters and tians he had murdered to raise his level.

As certain people were aware, a portion of the Resources from dead monsters was used to create loot, so if one wanted only experience, tians were the better targets.

"It was wise of you to attack tians who hunt here instead of attacking settlements. -ments. No one would be surprised if they didn't return, and high-level tians give a lot of experience. -ence."

"...Heh." Feuer chuckled — not because of some sick joy, but because he was simply amused.

He actually agreed with what they said.

"You're not wrong. I didn't keep count, but I killed all of them to gain more magic," he said as though this was a normal thing to do.

It seemed insane, but again, he was of sound mind.

It was simply that his personal perspective and the world he lived in didn't allow for any other course of action.

His entire mindset was focused on becoming the world's greatest wielder of fire magic and proving that he was.

And the world he lived in was the microcosm of the Lazburn family. His goal was merely to become strong. The idea of using his power for the sake of others had never even crossed his mind.

That was why he thought nothing of killing actual people to gain levels.

"If what I hear about Tenchi inhabitants is true, you are much like them. -them."

"I can understand why you might think that. Anyway, you said something about me joining a criminal clan? Sorry, but since I must keep improving myself, I have no time to dedicate to anything else." He refused the strangers' offer, creating orbs of fire in each hand.

They weren't his earlier Fireballs, but the double Fixed Stars — his ultimate technique, surpassed by no one but the Arch Sage.

The one eye of the black La Crima — the only one between the two that was exposed — watched the blazing orbs as they spoke. "In exchange for joining, I will grant you a stronger self. -self."

"A stronger...self...?" Feuer said as he raised an eyebrow.

"If you accept my proposal, you can be certain that you will receive that. -that," they said as the white La Crima stuck out her hand like a devil looking to seal a pact.

In response...

"If you claim you can give me more power than I currently have, I want to see some proof first!"

...Feuer released his Fixed Stars.

This was the deadly magic that had evaporated any humans and monsters he'd encountered on this mountain.

However, La Crima just let it hit them.

The aftershocks alone were enough to scorch the surrounding trees and even Feuer's own small shelter.

La Crima was right at the center of this intense heat, and the two Fixed Stars...were now clutched tight in the hands of the dark man.

"...I see. I haven't been this shocked since my fight against the Arch Sage..." The strange man had let go of the wheelchair, stuck out his hands, and caught both Fixed Stars like they were nothing but rubber balls. The spell could melt even Mythical Metal, yet the man's hands were not incinerated — in fact, they didn't even seem damaged.

At some point, he'd also stopped looking human.

He was now larger, more warped, and covered in a luster like that of gold or silver.

On his metallic chest was emblazoned the name "Ferrum Idea."

"This is a sample of the stronger self I can grant you," the white La Crima said, with her voice alone. Following the transformation, the dark figure had become silent.

The white La Crima hadn't changed at all, and not even her clothes or skin seemed to have been affected by the intense heat.

For all anyone knew, perhaps the white La Crima wasn't the "real one" either.

"...I see you weren't lying," Feuer said as he looked at the dark La Crima, who had been completely unaffected by his greatest attack.

If they had made this power for themselves, then he could indeed trust them to make him stronger than he was.

"Allow me to introduce myself again," said the white La Crima, in a melodic voice. "I am La Crima, a Superior and an improver of people. Allow me to turn your tears into ones of joy. If you wish for power, I will make you far stronger than you are now. Is there anything specific you request?"

In response to the stranger's playful presentation...

"...Magic. I need enough magic to surpass the Arch Sage."

...Feuer found himself speaking as if he had already agreed.

This likely meant abandoning his humanity, but he did not care about that. To him, the most important thing was using fire magic to defeat the Arch Sage and proving that he was the strongest.

"Very well. I will make that part of the procedure," the white La Crima said, casually accepting Feuer's seemingly outrageous request.

He looked at her in silence. This person, he thought, could easily shatter the wall he was facing now.

Was this grace from above...

“...Are you some sort of demon?”

...or an unholy creature seducing him to the depths of hell?

In response to his honest question, La Crima said, with no jest in her tone, “Not at all. I believe I should be called ‘a merchant of life.’”

Chapter Twenty-Two: What Was Sought

Royal Castle, Second Floor, Hallway

"Your Highness! Your Highness Theresia! Where are you?!" Liliana, the vice-commander of the Royal Guard, was riding her SMPS through the castle's hallways, looking for the princess who'd gone missing shortly after the assault began.

So far, she had found not a trace of Theresia or the hamster she always rode.

Explosions were ringing out all over the castle, and Liliana was starting to fear that Theresia might be lost forever.

It's like this again... she thought, overcome by her own powerlessness. I'm completely useless again...!

This wasn't the first time she'd felt this way.

Liliana was close friends with Altimia and Integra.

Altimia was the first princess of Altar, the one chosen by The Primeval Blade to bear the title of Sacred Princess. Despite being younger than her, the girl also surpassed Liliana in swordfighting skill.

Integra was the Arch Sage's favorite disciple, and she possessed magical talents that were said to be even greater than his had been, as well as intellect that allowed her to instantly untangle difficult dilemmas that left Liliana stumped.

They were immensely talented...unlike her.

Liliana was the daughter of the Celestial Knight and had some talents of her own, but she wasn't nearly as special as her two friends.

She'd lost count of the number of times she'd wished to be as powerful as they were, and even becoming a Paladin had not changed that.

She'd joined the Royal Guard and proved she was more than worthy of that honor, but she still had yet to catch up to the achievements of her father and the more experienced knights. Even so, she'd continued striving onwards, hoping to one day gain enough power that she was satisfied.

However, the war had shown her just how far she still was from her goal. Her father and the other Paladins she looked up to, as well as many of the younger new recruits, had died while battling the devil army.

And after that, Liliana had become the vice-commander of the Royal Guard.

The position of commander was reserved for the Celestial Knight, and she was chosen for vice-commander because all of the Paladins stronger than her were gone.

She knew in her heart that she was unworthy of it, yet she had no choice but to take the post and lead the Royal Guard.

Her father and many of her comrades had died, leaving her with a heavy burden to bear. It was almost too much for her, but she refused to break under the strain.

She still had a now-fatherless little sister to look after.

She still had her comrades who had survived and were now overcome by immense grief.

She still had Altimia, a friend who knew the pain of losing a father just as well as she did.

And finally, she had the people of Altar, terrified of the prospect that the kingdom might fall.

As a knight, she couldn't allow herself to break.

To protect what she had to protect, she took on the role of vice-commander and tried her utmost to fulfill her duty.

But though her heart was ready, reality reminded her time and again that the power she possessed simply wasn't enough.

Liliana had been involved in many dangerous events since she became the leader of the Royal Guard — most notably the incident where her sister had almost been killed by countless worms and the now-infamous terrorist strike in Gideon.

Even the would-be tragedies happening right before her eyes were too much for her to handle alone.

As much as she wanted to protect what was dear to her, she was just not powerful enough to do it. This current assault was no different.

She had no means of defeating the attackers, nor could she easily locate the princess she had to protect.

Liliana dearly wished she had the power to at least do that much.

"If only Integra were here..." Her childhood friend was perhaps the smartest person in the kingdom. It was entirely possible that she could provide Liliana with some path to improvement.

"...No! I need to focus on what I can do right now...!" Liliana said, shaking her head. This was no time to be wishing for something that could never happen. Doing so would be nothing but escapism.

Liliana did her best to shake off those negative thoughts and give her all to the search.

As she galloped away, one of the paintings in the hallway was watching her.

◆◆◆

Royal Castle, Fourth Floor, Hallway

The fourth floor of the castle was the royal family's living quarters. Because of this, its hallway was decorated with fancy furniture, paintings, plants, and well-made suits of armor.

Standing among them, there was a single Idea.

That's thirteen. I'd say I took out most of the wiring, he thought.

He had blue-black skin and leathery wings, making him look like a hybrid of human and bat. He was Vespertilio Idea, otherwise known as King of Raids, Morter.

Having finished his job of disrupting the magic distribution network in order to sabotage the castle's defenses, he pulled his winged hands out of the wall. La Crima had given him the ability to sense magic, allowing him to easily find magic-based wiring even with his eyes closed.

With those old farts distracting the guards, this was a real piece of cake... Though, man — the security in this place isn't working properly, but it'd sure be excessive if it actually did. It's a good match for the ruins I worked in, he thought, reminiscing about the past.

Up until a few months ago, Morter had been pursuing treasure hunters in one of the ruins in Caldina. He actually made a living out of ambushing those who found any success there and taking their finds.

Morter always took his targets' lives and treasures before they even realized he was there, making it a more lucrative "career" choice than one might expect.

However, those days ended when one treasure hunter he targeted turned out to be the sub-leader of I.F.

The man incapacitated Morter as though he was no more threatening than a baby, and as he was cowering in fear, the sub-leader told him, “Choose: die right here and now, or give up your humanity. I recommend the former.”

In spite of his advice, Morter picked the latter.

In Morter’s mind, living was always better than not. Even if he became a lowly slave, there might still come an opportunity for escape.

The man then treated Morter’s wounds before handing him off to La Crima. She turned him into Vespertilio Idea, and now he was attacking the Altarian royal castle.

These powers I’ve got aren’t even half bad, he thought. I’m even more satisfied than I was back when I was just King of Raids.

Actually using his powers in this castle showed him that he’d made the right choice back then.

He had been freed from his limiting human shell, and now he had been granted a form that made him feel all-powerful. He saw things he couldn’t see before and did things that used to be beyond him. The feeling of emancipation he derived from that was exquisite.

But what are those things, anyway...?

However, his new sight also showed him questions he would never have known to ask before.

Morter could sense three major sources of magic in this castle.

One was obviously a fellow Idea — Ignis — but he had no clue what the others were.

One was weaker than Ignis, but more intense than a standard Superior Job, and it was simply standing in one place in the castle.

The other magical signal was fluctuating between strong and weak, and it was slowly moving through the castle’s fourth floor — the one Morter was on.

He’d informed Zeta about these signals before they assaulted the castle, and she’d told him to go towards the fluctuating one while dealing with the security systems.

“Hm...?” Morter’s train of thought stopped short as he looked down towards the first floor.

The spider guy is dead, huh? There’s weak magic signals all around him... I guess someone broke the inventory inside his body. Well, that's what I would've done if I had to kill him.

Fully grasping the nature of Aranea's death, Morter didn't show much of a reaction.

He also knew that Ignis was trapped, but he had no intention of going to help him.

Since he hadn't been discovered yet and wasn't actually ordered to help his fellow Ideas, such things were no skin off his nose.

And besides, Morter's top priority was survival, followed by freedom. If he saw a way to seize that freedom, he would ignore his orders to seek it.

Though right now, he was on a leash of swords. Becoming truly free seemed impossible at the moment.

Well, we're experimental animals, after all. There are flaws in our designs. This doesn't really apply to the dumb bee, but the flame guy... He's stronger than the rest of us, but with all the MP Boosters in him, he'll die in no time.

As someone who used to "work" at some ruins, Morter was very familiar with the equipment implanted in Ignis.

MP Boosters were pre-ancient civilization items that greatly increased magic at the cost of life span, and since Ignis...or rather, Feuer Lazburn cared about nothing but magic, he had several of them implanted into him.

Morter guessed that he didn't even have a year left — maybe a month, if he was lucky.

The item wasn't the only problem, after all.

That psycho La Crima can modify people however she wants, but she knows almost nothing about biology or medicine. She only uses her Embryo's powers to mix people with monsters and items. That's why there are limits to what she can do.

Idea, La Crima's Superior Embryo, allowed her to freely modify people as long as she had the materials. La Crima had no knowledge of the processes and techniques involved, but Idea did, and that allowed it to mass produce its hybrid monsters.

The Embryo could make La Crima's designs work even if they were flawed, which was both a positive and a negative.

The stronger the Idea...the more combat-capable they are...the greater the risk of them destroying themselves.

Because of that, Morter was very satisfied with his modifications.

The three main things he had been given were the magic-sensing ability, the power to create an unperceivable space, and a low-tier flying ability.

His modifications were minor compared to what the others had received, and because of this, he had yet to find a flaw in them.

I guess the only successes are me, the Ferrum that's with La Crima all the time, and Cantus, I guess...? Wait, can you really call them successes when — hm...?

Morter looked down once again.

What's that fiery old fart planning? He had noticed a change in King of Blaze's magic signal. Feuer Lazburn was doing something, despite being trapped in a barrier.

As Morter tried to guess what it was, the castle began to shake.

"...Tch." He clicked his tongue, making a sound for the first time since he had begun his job here.

Seriously, what the hell is he doing? Quiet though the click was, a moment after he did it, a sword was swung down at him.

"Hh...!" Morter jumped to dodge it, but he couldn't evade his own confusion.

What? There was nothing here. I didn't sense magic or see any knights. Is this like Zeta's optical camouflage? But I — what is that?

His high-speed questions and thoughts were cut off by what he saw in front of him.

It was something that he knew was there. He'd seen it even before the attack, which made him even more confused.

He was facing the suit of armor decorating the hallway.

The armor had moved on its own to swing its sword at Morter.

...Is it a golem? No way — it wasn't showing a single bit of magic. The armor had not only moved, it had also changed shape and increased in size.

And eventually, above its head appeared the words "Massacre Armor" — a monster name.

It was a phenomenon that Morter — no, most of mankind — had never seen before.

"...What the hell is this?!" Morter blurted out as he reflexively jumped away again.

A moment later, the wall behind him bit the empty space where he had just been standing.

The wall, its open maw filled with fangs, was now marked with the name “Bigmouth Wall.”

The changes didn’t end there.

The decorative plants transformed into twisted torture devices and received the title “Torture Plants.”

The framed paintings began to laugh and were named “Screaming Pictures.”

Mere objects that were never human or monster were transforming into malicious monsters and attacking him right before his eyes.

“...Man, this place is haunted as hell.” This security feature is in really bad taste. Or is this some Embryo’s doing? Morter thought as he prepared to battle the monsters.

It was a clash between unnatural beings, and a hidden lens on the ceiling was watching it all.

◇◇◇

Royal Castle, Underground Shelter

Beyond the last line of defense guarded by the Royal Guard, there lay the castle’s underground shelter.

Elizabeth and the others were heading deeper into it.

There were more than ten people in all, counting the bodyguards and maids, but that didn’t slow them down one bit. The passage was wide and tall enough to even let Magingears pass through without a problem.

In the lead was Marquis Findle — Altimia’s loyal confidant and the head of Altar’s intelligence department. Six of those with them were Royal Guards, who surrounded Elizabeth, Canglong, Milianne, and the maids to protect them.

“We’ve arrived,” said Findle. “For now, let us stay here and wait for our enemies to leave.”

He approached the large door at the end of the passage and operated the touch panel on the wall, causing the door to open up and reveal the deepest area of the palace...the royal shelter.

“This construction is quite durable,” Canglong noted, and rightfully so.

The place had been made by expanding a natural cavern, covering it in a thick layer of metal, and completely cutting it off from the surface. It also drew water from a source far beneath the castle and was equipped with a storage facility filled with a wealth of foods, all held in inventories that negated the effects of spoilage. Anyone in the shelter could survive for a very long time while waiting for rescue to finally arrive.

This was no doubt the safest place in the castle right now.

"I have never been here before," said Elizabeth.

"That is because it's only meant to be used in situations like this," said Findle. "The attackers are few in number, so I believe the Masters from the city will be able to take care of them. There is a chance, though, that we might have to wait here until those who went to the peace conference return."

Upon hearing his words, Elizabeth became downcast.

"A shelter... Where could Theresia be...?"

"Lady Grandria is looking for her right now. This shelter has observation equipment, so we will know when she brings Her Highness here and open the door for them."

"Will Liliana be okay...?" asked Milianne.

"Lady Grandria is the strongest knight in Altar. There is no need to worry about her." Despite his reassuring words, Marquis Findle was overcome with anxiety. The situation wasn't remotely favorable for them.

He had already been informed that one of the attackers was none other than King of Blaze himself. It was hard to be optimistic when dealing with a Superior Job, and Feuer had been given abilities that made him even more powerful than he had been before.

The Superiors and most of the rankers aren't around, he thought. Mr. Figaro did not attend the peace conference, but neither has he returned yet. Lei-Lei and the new one, Hannya, haven't been sighted either... I suppose we should be grateful that we at least have Xunyu.

Xunyu had separated herself from the children being escorted to the shelter so she could confront the intruders back on the surface.

At this very point in time, she was fighting her deadly battle against Zeta.

If only I had seen this coming... The fact that I did not merely highlights my shortcomings as head of intelligence. I will have to take responsibility for this once everything is over...

Findle's expression as he pondered this was stern. This assault had caught him off-guard, and now the princesses and an honored guest were exposed to danger while the lady of the castle, Altimia, was away. This filled him with immense guilt.

I will truly have to think about letting Masters into the intelligence department. Though, that may be my last action as head of that department... But for now, I must protect Her Highness and Prince Canglong, he thought as he approached the control panel and activated the climate control, among other things.

Canglong watched him work as he realized something.

"Did this place exist before the castle was built?" he asked.

"You can tell?" Findle replied.

"Yes. The castle's design has a focus on everyday convenience and aesthetics, while this place looks very unrefined. Also, for an Altarian facility that seems to be centuries old, this place has a lot of technology."

"Well observed. This underground area has been here before the first king even built the capital, and we have been using it since his time."

Hoping that some conversation might put the children at ease, Marquis Findle began to explain the history of this place.

"This land once belonged to a different country. Instead of Altea, there was an industrial city here which served as the capital of Adrasta — the expansionist nation led by Rockfell Adrasta."

That was the name of perhaps the most well-known conqueror in history. Bearing the job of King of Kings, he was the strongest tian ever recorded, and it was said that he commanded enough power to conquer the west side of the continent with ease.

"It is thought that this underground facility was built as part of the capital's fortifications in case of an attack, and since it was too difficult to dismantle, the first king of Altar chose to repurpose it instead, and he built a castle over it."

"So that is why there is so much technology here." With the exception of Legendaria, who were Adrasta's allies, the King of Kings had conquered the entire west side of the continent. Due to this, he had access to many ruins containing the kind of technology that Dryfe was famous for in the current time.

"A few years after building his capital, the King of Kings vanished from history. However, the city remained, and after Adrasta split into many countries again, it became a highly sought-after piece of land, making it the center of many conflicts.”

The time of the King of Kings, the Draconic Emperor, and The Lynx would later be known as The Era of the Peerless Three.

It was believed that after the King of Kings’ disappearance and the end of the Draconic Emperor’s long life, the world would finally know peace, but that turned out to be absurdly wrong — the grand war that split the continent in two was merely replaced by many smaller wars.

Following the Draconic Emperor’s death, Huang He to the east was thrown into a civil conflict over who would take the throne. The remnants of Adrasta to the west who had served the King of Kings went on to fight among themselves for every scrap of authority they could get their hands on.

To those who knew their Earth history, the situation might’ve reminded them of what happened after the death of Alexander the Great.

The civil war in the east had weakened Huang He quite a bit, while the chaos in the west split that area into many countries.

Many nations that existed in the current day — such as Granvaloa — were forged during this time, and many more had been founded and vanished from history.

And as though they believed that taking Adrasta’s capital would make them the true successors to the King of Kings, the leaders of that time had relentlessly attacked it, all of them looking to claim it as their own. Eventually, everything but the underground area lay in ruins.

“However, after many battles...this land was eventually taken and secured by a certain individual.”

“You mean...?”

“The Evil. This place was the final home of The Evil, who was defeated by the first king of Altar and his allies.”

Near the end of the conflicts that ravaged the land now called Altar, two new people appeared on the world stage.

One was Azurite — a young shepherd who happened to unearth The Primeval Blade and be compatible with it, allowing him to rise as the Sacred King.

The other was The Evil. Born with that job, it was a mysterious being that history barely remembered.

While the Sacred King was having adventures all over the continent, The Evil was also growing stronger.

It was a living disaster, creating otherworldly monsters which struck fear into the hearts of all who encountered them.

Ultimately, The Evil took control of this city and was challenged by the Sacred King and his party. The battle took a heavy toll, but Azurite emerged victorious. That was the most famous story in Altar — the story of how their founding king defeated The Evil.

"After defeating The Evil, the founding king created his country and set this city as its capital," Findle continued. "It's said that there were various political and geopolitical reasons behind the decision to found a country in a place with such an ominous history. By the time he defeated The Evil, the first king already held power over multiple city-states, such as his queen's hometown of Gideon and — if you don't mind me inserting some family history here — the land owned by my ancestors. Presumably, they discussed what location would be best for the capital, but the founding king left behind a single sentence that seems to be relevant to this."

"A...sentence?" Canglong asked.

After a brief silence, the marquis said, "'The bearers must not abandon the god's remains.'"

"God's remains...?" Canglong echoed as he tilted his head. "Does that have anything to do with The Evil?" he asked. He was referring to the fact that the Superior Job grouping "The One," which The Evil belonged to, was sometimes viewed as having god-like properties.

"What he meant by those words isn't fully understood. That wasn't passed down to us. However, there are records saying that the Tomb Labyrinth was created shortly after The Evil was defeated, so perhaps..."

"If 'the bearers' refers to the Altar bloodline — as in, the bearers of The Primeval Blade that defeated The Evil — then the old king's proclamation would imply that Altea was built so that they would keep watch over The Evil's grave... Is that what you wanted to say?"

"Yes. That is one of the theories."

"A grave...? That's terrifying..." said Milianne despite understanding them only partially.

"No need to worry," said Marquis Findle. "If The Evil's remains are in Altea, they would certainly not be here in this shelter. This place has been examined countless times, and no one has ever found a single trace of any curse or grudge. We are completely safe here."

"Really? Phew..." Milianne said, thoroughly relieved.

"This is too complicated for me... You seem to understand it, though," said Elizabeth, glancing at Canglong.

"Umm, this story brings to mind a few things. And hailing from Huang He as I do, I cannot help but be intrigued by a place that is related to the King of Kings."

The Huang He Empire was the superpower that had stopped Adrasta's advance.

It had lost a lot of land during the civil war that followed The Era of the Peerless Three, but it was still an empire that had existed long before the era had even begun. Of all the current major countries, only Legendaria was more ancient than Huang He.

"The opposition between the Draconic Emperor and the King of Kings is an incredibly important part of history," Canglong said. The King of Kings from the west and the Draconic Emperor from the east...it was almost impossible to talk about one without mentioning the other.

"...That makes it all seem strange," Elizabeth commented.

"Makes what seem strange?"

"That you, a person from Huang He, and I, who lives where the King of Kings did, would ever be married." Canglong fell silent. Back when Elizabeth tried to address this during the Love-Duel Festival, he had chosen to avoid the question.

She'd thought of bringing it up during today's tea party, but the attack had interfered, so she'd decided to do it now.

"Cang...I've made my decision," she said. "I... I will become your wife."

Despite the current situation, Elizabeth made her intentions known.

Or perhaps she did it because of the situation — for all they knew, this could be her last chance.

"Your Highness..."

"But I still do not know you nearly well enough."

"...That is true."

"I never even loved anyone before..." Elizabeth wasn't yet ten years old. She was too young to have experienced anything like that. She got along very well with Canglong, but she never once felt anything “sweeter” for him. “But I still like having you as a friend. And since I do not dislike being with you, everything should turn out okay. I will eventually learn the things I do not know.”

Since she felt no hate for him, she could stay by his side. That should have made it possible for them to learn everything they needed.

Elizabeth’s sincere words filled Canglong’s heart with warmth as well as pain.

That was due to the profoundly heavy truth he was hiding from her.

Since it was something she would come to know the moment they arrived at the palace in Huang He, he thought that it would be best if he revealed it himself.

“...Your Highness, I...”

“Cang?”

“I am not actually hu...not a prin—” Before he could finish his sentence, though...

“Umm... Move away from the middle of the room. It’s dangerous.”

...Milianne cut him off.

“Hm? Milia? What do you mean? What’s dangerous?” Elizabeth asked.

“Umm... I don’t know. I just feel that it is. The middle of the room is dangerous.”

Her words made no apparent sense. She said it was dangerous, but nothing in the shelter seemed out of the ordinary.

However, they couldn’t bring themselves to ignore her warning, so they all walked to Milia’s side.

Canglong seemed to have something on his mind now.

Being interrupted didn’t bother him, but he couldn’t shake that there was something about Milia.

“Your Highness, who is this...?”

“I introduced her to you before the tea party. She is Liliana’s little sister and one of my friends.”

“Lady Grandria’s sister... Then she is... Could she be...?”

Canglong’s thoughts were cut off by a premonition of danger. He rushed to look at the middle of the room — specifically, the ceiling.

It had changed color, becoming visibly redder.

“An enemy!” A moment after Canglong cried out, the ceiling collapsed, and through the open hole rushed a flood of molten metal.

The maids yelped in fright, and the six Royal Guards stepped in the front to protect the rest.

As the sound and heat of boiling metal filled the shelter, a four-armed aberration descended through the hole.

“...Is this the place?” it muttered as it looked around. The creature was none other than Ignis Idea, otherwise known as King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn.

“I-Is that King of Blaze?! But he was supposed to be trapped in a separation barrier...!” Marquis Findle began to panic, and for good reason.

The four-sided magical barrier should’ve been a major obstacle even to Superior Jobs, and it should’ve kept Ignis sealed for a good while.

Why was he here, then?

The answer was simple — the barrier was only four-sided.

“A hole in the ceiling... Did he melt everything under the surface?!” Between the surface and this shelter, there was a thirty-metel-thick layer of a metal not quite as strong as Mythical, but strong nonetheless. Made by the King of Kings — or, more specifically, the designers and followers who feared him — this shelter was the finest work of an era rife with war.

However, Ignis was able to melt through all of that merely by concentrating his firepower.

This completely unexpected break-in instantly transformed the shelter into a deadly prison.

This is bad...! Findle thought with a stern expression on his face. I need to make sure Her Highness, the prince, and Lady Grandria’s sister can escape! Ignis was surrounded by the Royal Guards, but he barely seemed to care about that. Instead, he looked around once again and said, “Where is the Arch Sage?”

It was a question that no one present would have expected to hear.

“What...?” Findle asked, thoroughly confused.

“Where is the Arch Sage?” Ignis repeated himself as though that was the only thing on his mind.

That was exactly the case, in fact — he had attacked the castle in search of the Arch Sage in the first place. The only reason he was even here in this shelter was because he’d sensed its presence and thought he might have finally found his target.

"You are well aware that he is already dead!" Findle angrily shouted. If the Arch Sage was alive, things wouldn't have gotten this bad! he added, silently.

Despite Findle's words, Ignis didn't back down.

"I know. I heard of his supposed death even before I got this body. And I also heard that someone else now holds the title of 'Magical Apex.'"

He hadn't known that back when he'd met La Crima as a hermit, but once he'd returned to human civilization, the information was unavoidable.

As he was now, Ignis was fully aware of what happened in the world while he was away.

"But none of that matters."

Even so, the flame remained unfazed.

"The Arch Sage is here. Defeating him will be proof that I am the 'Magical Apex.' I have no interest in Masters with that title. His death and succession is faked. I know he would go that far. He is alive somewhere. He is here. Thus, I will find him, defeat him, and prove what I must."

He had no intention of listening to them. In his mind, the Arch Sage still being alive was pure fact — and even if it wasn't, Feuer would not stop until he found his target despite that.

It seemed like madness, but it was not. This was simply the logical end point of the thought processes of someone who'd dedicated his entire life to defeating and surpassing the Arch Sage.

He'd decided upon his reason for existence, and for the sake of that reason, he wouldn't bend, change, or limit himself.

He was a man who'd killed people just to gain the levels he needed to be that much closer to the Arch Sage.

He was a man who'd abandoned his humanity just to gain vast reserves of magic.

That was normal for him, and his entire system of values revolved around it.

At this point, he wasn't able to stop until he defeated the Arch Sage.

"...Is that one of Altar's princesses?" For the first time, Ignis said something that had nothing to do with the Arch Sage.

He was obviously pointing at Elizabeth.

"The Arch Sage is the kingdom's chief adviser. If I kill her, that should bring him here, shouldn't it? I feel like someone told me that. Was it Zeta?

La Crima? Or...who was it, again?”

“You wretch...!” Findle shouted, overcome by rage. “I won’t let you touch her! With the ruler absent, it is our duty to protect the princesses of Altar!”

“Then call the Arch Sage.”

“I cannot call the deceased! But I will call something that can defeat you!” Marquis Findle declared as he manipulated the control panel on the wall. “I will show you why I accompanied everyone to this shelter, and why this place is called the safest in the castle!”

With those words, he pressed the “activate” button on the keyboard.

A moment later, a coffin rose up from a part of the floor.

Nearly ten metels tall, it almost reached the ceiling of the shelter, and when it opened up, a metallic leg colored red and gold stepped out of it.

It belonged to a giant golem.

“O creation of my ancestor, King of Colossi, Emet Findle I! O guardian idol of the royal family! The time has come for you to awaken! Stand tall and protect your princess and your kingdom!” This creature was security “equipment” installed into this shelter. Dating back to before the city was known as Altea, this weapon had even been deployed during the battle in which the Sacred King defeated The Evil.

Created by the first Azurite’s brother-in-arms, King of Colossi, this was a legendary golem that had pulverized many monsters and weathered many blows as the primary tank in the Sacred King’s party.

Made of the Mythical metal, Hihi’irokane, this was the Golem Bellcross.

It was the kingdom’s strongest magic weapon, entrusted to the descendants of Emet Findle I and permitted to be used only when the castle was under attack. This golem could easily be called the castle’s final defender.

Not saying a word, Ignis briefly glanced at the majestic construct.

“Target set! Bellcross, attack!” Findle ordered, and the metal giant charged.

When it came close to Ignis, Bellcross swung its enormous, hammer-like fist. A moment later, there was the sound of a fluid landing on the surface of the shelter.

It sounded as though Ignis had been crushed and pulverized, his blood splattering the walls...

"Piece of scrap. Don't get in my way."

...but that wasn't the case at all.

The splattering sound was actually the sound of the drops of Bellcross's molten arm falling down to the floor.

Ignis was holding up one of his four arms.

And on each of its fingers, there was an orb of light.

These five balls of immense flame created enough heat to melt the Mythical metal.

"Wh...what...?!" Seeing the arm of the strongest golem in the world — his heritage — be melted away with such ease left Findle dumbfounded, but it didn't end there.

After making the orbs on his fingers vanish, Ignis raised all four of his arms to the sky.

His pose made it look like he was going to begin some kind of juggling act, but instead, new orbs of light began to coalesce in his hands.

They appeared, then multiplied — from one, to two, to four, to eight...

"A-Are those...? They cannot be!" The orbs, each of which carried unfathomable amounts of heat, were all the ultimate skill of King of Blaze — Fixed Star.

It was the same skill that had completely failed him back when he used it against the Arch Sage.

However, he had been able to summon far, far fewer back then.

A grand total of sixty-four Fixed Stars now floated around Ignis, and this absurd number didn't even make a dent in his total power.

Following his crushing defeat, Feuer had polished his ability to control many of these Fixed Stars at the same time. The only thing he'd needed to achieve this was greater magic reserves, and he now had more than any tian could dream of.

Because of that, the number and power of his Fixed Stars far exceeded what he had been capable of before. It was almost not worth comparing.

"Fixed Star Rain." The miniature suns fell like a meteor shower.

The surrounding space was drowned in white light, the air itself warped, and after a momentary flash, Bellcross disappeared without a trace.

Altar's ultimate guardian, older than the country itself, had vanished, and its enemy had barely even exerted any effort.

"I'll ask again." Ignis thought nothing of the immense power he just displayed or the object he just melted into nothing. “Where is the Arch Sage?” The strongest wielder of fire magic just repeated his desire once more.

“Marquis Findle! Take the young ones!”

“We will buy time!” The moment Bellcross melted, the six Royal Guards rushed to action.

They faced Ignis to protect Elizabeth and the others, knowing full well that they had no chance against a creature that had melted a golem made of Mythical metal.

Still, they believed that they could give the others more time to run away, even if it was just for a moment.

“Noble knights...forgive me.” With these words, Findle overcame the shock of seeing Bellcross destroyed and rushed to the panel to open up the shelter’s door. They had fled here for safety, but now, this chamber held nothing but death. Their only hope was to return to the surface.

But if the defense on the surface fell... No, you cannot think about that! No matter what state the surface was in, it was better than staying here and burning to death.

The heavy door of the shelter began to open, but Ignis noticed that they were trying to escape and pointed his four arms straight at Findle.

“We will not allow that!” a Royal Guard shouted, rushing to prevent his attack by slicing at Ignis’ arms.

The blades didn’t penetrate past the tough skin, but they did leave shallow cuts.

We aren’t powerless against him! If he can be hurt, then... the knights thought, believing that they actually had a chance, however slim.

In that way, they were like their fellow Royal Guards who faced Aranea on the surface.

However, there was a major difference between Aranea and Ignis.

“Prominence Aura,” Ignis said, causing the air surrounding him to heat up rapidly.

At that moment, the Paladins who were close to Ignis saw their blades melt away before their eyes. Their armor liquefied on their bodies, fusing with their skin.

“GHAAAAAGHHH!” Even if they tried to continue fighting, any weapons they brought close to Ignis melted away like snow.

Prominence Aura was a skill that created a superheated territory around the caster that acted as defensive-offensive armor strong enough to melt metal, but dealt no damage to the caster himself. For someone who could control sixty-four Fixed Stars at once, managing this much heat was no challenge whatsoever.

While Aranea's poison could be negated with Elixirs, merely approaching Ignis meant death. Even fighting from a distance wasn't an option since the immense heat would vaporize any projectiles and magics coming towards him.

A walking Sun that matched Superiors, a being that moved towards his objective and burned everything in his wake.

This was Ignis Idea.

"Your Highness...please run!"

"Marquis Findle! Forget about us! Please flee this place!"

"...Very well!" As the shelter's door opened up, Marquis Findle pressed something on the control panel.

He activated the sprinkler system. It had been installed in case of fires caused by cooking and other such activities.

Once it was on, its programming quickly reacted to the immense heat.

Nozzles emerged all over the shelter and sprayed at Ignis, causing a loud, roaring steam explosion.

All the water instantly vaporized and spread at a rapid rate, blowing everything away.

Neither Ignis nor the knights could possibly remain unscathed by the searing water vapor. The pressure of the explosion limited their movements, while the steam flooding the air made it difficult to see.

"Your Highness! Prince Canglong! Hurry...!" Findle used the opportunity to rush the children through the door.

But when they tried to go...

"Elizabeth!"

...Canglong called his fiancée by name for the first time ever, and then shoved her away with a desperate look on his face.

A split second later, a beam fired out of the wall of steam and pierced his chest.

The sound of flesh evaporating echoed throughout the shelter, followed by the thud of the young boy collapsing to the floor.

“Cang...?” His fiancée’s voice was drowned out by the roar of flames. This tragedy was observed by a device hidden among the sprinklers.

Chapter Twenty-Three: The Humanoid Irregularity

A letter

To the one who reads this:

I do not know your name. I will never see your face.

You will never see mine either.

But that is simply how we are.

As long as I exist, you cannot, and by the time you come into being, I will be gone.

And because this is how we are, I write down these words to be imparted to you in this letter.

If the current or succeeding emperor considers my will, it should eventually arrive in your hands.

There are two things you must know.

We are not human. We cannot be human.

This is an important truth.

This world is dominated by the relation between humans, jobs, and monsters, but we are an exception in this system.

We are the incarnation of an abnormality our ancestors etched onto the world in the distant past.

Because of this, we might eventually disappear due to the world's autopurification activity.

However, if you are reading this, it did not happen in either of our generations.

You might be at a loss of what to make of the power you were born with.

I once felt the same way as you.

Perhaps, though, that was only because I was born at an inopportune time and was frequently compared to my predecessor.

My predecessor likely utilized this power better than any one of us so far.

I was unable to match him. Perhaps you will. Regardless, know that there is no need to strive for that.

Our power is vast. We receive it by merely being chosen, without any effort on our part. We have exceptional power without ever having to gather it like others do.

Because of this, you might make grave mistakes in your youth.

You might have been born bathed in blood.

That would be a harsh reality that cannot be changed. Our power might be vast, but we have no means of bringing back those who are lost. Not even my predecessor was capable of that.

That is why I hope that you who are reading this will possess both power and will.

Do not be bound by sins hailing from a time before you.

Be aware of your power and carry a will of your own.

Our nature is affirmed when we use our power according to our own will.

It does not have to be for the protection of this country.

That is a choice we can make, but are not forced to.

Perhaps someone told you that you are a hero who will dedicate his life to protecting the country, but know that that is wrong.

I dedicated my life to protecting the country because I wished to make up for the civil war that I caused, and because I myself could not abandon the nation.

Thus, there is no need for you to follow this same path.

You are not obligated to do as you are ordered.

You should live the way you find suitable.

We are not human. We cannot be human.

Therefore, you cannot be bound.

Protect what you wish to protect.

Accomplish what you believe you must.

Do not be afraid to do as you will.

No one can ever bind you.

The power and talent you have exists only for the future you desire.

◇◆◇

Royal Castle, Underground Shelter

There was a large hole in the prince’s chest.

Burned by unfathomable heat, the wound had instantly cauterized. However, it was clear that the beam had taken his heart, making his fate obvious.

“Cang... CANG!” With tears in her eyes, Elizabeth shook Canglong’s body, but the boy wasn’t even bleeding, let alone breathing.

It seemed like all signs of life had left him.

“Did I hit something? I can’t see,” said a faint voice from within the steam. “I’ll just keep doing this.”

Like a moment earlier, beams fired in all directions, devastating the shelter and scattering people and objects alike, nozzles included.

Screams echoed throughout the premises as Ignis continued firing his searing beams indiscriminately. The sounds of melting, sounds of evaporation, sounds of flesh being burned, and the shrieks of the maids overwhelmed the soundscape.

Eventually, most of the nozzles were destroyed, freeing Ignis from his cage of steam explosions. It didn’t seem like he had been hurt all that much.

“Such destruction... You wretch!” Findle barked as he glared at Ignis. A beam had taken his right arm.

Only two people remained unhurt — Elizabeth, who was clinging to Canglong’s body, and Milianne, who just happened to be in the right spot to avoid the beams.

Everyone else was injured to various extents. Many were no longer even capable of movement.

As things were, Findle couldn’t even take Elizabeth and escape.

“Where is the Arch Sage?” asked Ignis. His words hadn’t changed even after causing all this devastation.

He was seeking the Arch Sage like a broken machine, making him seem barely human.

He began to approach Elizabeth.

“Your Highness! Please run! Save yourself at least...!” someone shouted, but Elizabeth remained by Canglong’s side.

Eventually, Ignis was right in front of her.

“Where is the Arch Sage? If he doesn’t show himself, I will kill the princess.” Voicing his warped, yet unbending desire, the Idea reached towards Elizabeth with his hand, hot as a soldering iron.

Shrieks and roars of anger filled the crumbling room, but there was no one left to stop him.

The moment Ignis touched Elizabeth...never came, for another hand grabbed his.

“Hm...?” For the first time since he gained this inhuman form, Ignis displayed something that seemed to be confusion.

The hand that had grabbed his arm was burning. Ignis was clad in searing armor, and it set the offending limb on fire.

Despite that, it didn’t let go. Just how much power was held within this tiny hand? It was tearing through his hardened skin, his wounds leaking blood which was promptly evaporated by his own heat.

Faced with this strange sight, Ignis asked, “...What are you?”

“...Cang?” Elizabeth opened her mouth at the same time.

The owner of the small hand was none other than Canglong himself — the boy who should’ve been killed by the hole in his chest.

Still lying down, he had raised his right hand and grabbed Ignis by the arm before it could reach Elizabeth.

But there was another thing that confused Ignis.

What is happening to his magic? It’s as vast as the Arch Sage’s... No... It might rival even mine... Ignis had dedicated all his power and talent to fire magic, rendering him unable to use Reveal, but as an experienced caster, he could sense Canglong’s power nonetheless.

However, if he did have Reveal, he would have seen a truly bizarre sight — the boy’s level and stats growing at a terrifying rate.

And the changes weren’t just limited to the numbers.

“...Don’t you dare touch Elizabeth.” The boy who was presumed dead said these words as he rose to his feet.

He was now between Ignis and Elizabeth, ready to protect her.

There was still a hole in his chest, but it seemed to have mostly closed.

His evaporated heart and lungs were regenerating at an extreme speed. The hand that was holding Ignis's arm was also restoring itself as it burned, letting it maintain its form.

However, the black bandages that had been tied on him had been reduced to ashes.

"...My Self-Sealing Wraps have burned away. I suppose I will not be able to seal this away until they regenerate," he whispered as he looked down at the burning black bandages. They were an MVP special reward that he had picked from Huang He's treasury, and when worn, they limited the wearer's own stats and skills.

The item that he had worn to hide his true identity from the locals and Caldinians while in Altar...was now broken.

"No... I will not seal it away." Right now, he didn't actually mind that. What he needed now was not to hide it, but to use it.

"It" being the power he possessed...and his true self.

"Cang...are you okay?" Elizabeth asked. Rather than being confused by the oddity of the situation, she seemed to merely be happy that a friend she thought was dead was actually alive.

Canglong looked back at her and smiled before turning back to Ignis.

"Elizabeth... Let me finish what I wanted to say earlier."

With his back to her so she couldn't see his expression, Canglong spoke.

"I am not a prince. I do not have the right to inherit the throne of Huang He. I do not qualify for that." He continued his statement from before. "And...I am not even human."

He revealed to her the secret that he had been keeping hidden for so long.

A moment later, his bones creaked and his limbs grew.

His height and width...his entire frame transformed into something that was entirely unlike a young boy.

Muscles grew under his skin, while scales sprouted over it.

Ultimately, he was transformed into a creature that seemed to be a mix of dragon and man.

"Cang...?" He did not reply to her. Canglong now looked more like the Idea he was facing. His appearance could easily be called "monstrous," and it was one he didn’t want to show anyone...especially not Elizabeth.

Before he left Huang He, his father — the emperor — strictly forbade him from showing this true form.

Despite that, he chose to reveal it now.

By his own will, he chose to do this so he could protect those whom he wanted to protect.

“You’re—” Just as Ignis opened his mouth to speak, the dragon-man swung his arm, flinging Ignis’s body into the wall opposite Elizabeth.

“Gh-ogh...” Overcome by shock far greater than the one from the steam explosions, Ignis coughed blood.

Looking at him, the thing that was Canglong began walking to a particular place — the spot where Golem Bellcross was destroyed. There, he reached for the floor and touched the metal giant’s molten Mythical metal remains.

In his hand, it quickly changed shape to form a mask.

“Zifu Longmian,” he said in a voice quite unlike the one he had spoken with before his transformation.

Meaning “word-hiding dragon mask,” this was the name of a mask that a certain Special Superior Job would wear for important occasions.

As the person who knew what that meant better than anyone else, he placed the mask upon his own warped face.

“What are you...?” Most of those present here also wanted to hear the answer to Ignis’s question.

The being standing before them was by no means a human boy.

He was not the slender young prince of Huang He.

He was a creature with a robust, draconic body, and a mask over his monstrous face.

However, if anyone here was from Huang He, they would recognize him at a single glance.

Over there, this creature was akin to a god.

Indeed, he was the strongest gulong ren — the ancient dragon kin.

“Draconic Emperor, Canglong Renyue.”

With a name that meant “blue dragon, beyond mankind,” he was the humanoid Irregularity — the Draconic Emperor.

Ignis was quick to action. It wasn’t clear how well Ignis understood the gravity of Canglong’s declaration, but the power behind it was more than enough for him.

For the first time since coming to the shelter — no, since arriving at the castle — Ignis truly prepared for battle.

He judged that the entity before him was far above Bellcross and everyone else that stood in his way along the path to the Arch Sage. Canglong was not merely an obstruction for him, but an enemy that matched, if not surpassed, his target.

"Crimson Sphere!" Ignis started out with a distraction that took the form of over ten high-rank ultimate job skills.

Ignis had witnessed Canglong regenerate even his heart, but no matter how powerful his regeneration was, it should've been impossible for him to do so with his entire body reduced to nothing. This distraction wasn't something Canglong could ignore or evade.

The Crimson Spheres sped towards Elizabeth and the rest of their immobilized entourage. If Canglong wanted to protect them, he had no choice but to use himself as a shield.

And while he was busy doing that or regenerating the damage he sustained from it, Ignis would shower him in another Fixed Star Rain, leaving nothing behind.

However, faced with the Crimson Spheres, Canglong merely set his feet wider, assumed a strong stance, and repeatedly punched the air, creating shock waves that dispersed every single ball of flame.

That was over double the amount of Crimson Spheres that had melted the castle's main gate, yet they had just been snuffed out like the fires on a match.

The absurd sight left Marquis Findle and the royal knights speechless, but Ignis understood what had happened.

He released magic along with his punches... Ignis thought. Indeed — Canglong had extinguished the flames using his MP.

The punches were imbued with an amount of magic several times greater than in the Crimson Spheres, forcefully pulverizing the magical structure that composed them.

A means to release magic that doesn't involve spells... I did hear that Huang He possessed something like that... There existed a skill grouping called "Fa jin." The strikes of this skill grouping were normally used to drive magic into the target, creating shock waves that pulverized the insides regardless of how tough the outsides were.

However, that wasn't what Canglong had done — he had instead pulverized the airborne spells directly using his vast magical power.

That was a fundamentally different action, even if the movements he used to do it were similar.

No normal person would be able to release that much magic at once. In fact, even caster Superior Jobs would struggle with it.

This absurd amount of magical power rivals even mine... Is this the strength of the Draconic Emperor? Wait...the magic he released isn't quite like normal magic...

Ignis did not understand the true nature of Draconic Emperor as a job.

He had no idea if it was focused on stats, or what kind of skills it had.

In Huang He, the Draconic Emperor was considered a mystical entity akin to a living god, and even an experienced caster like Ignis knew next to nothing about him. The Draconic Emperor was the top of the duel rankings there, but the means by which he reached and kept the throne were a mystery.

Without saying a word, Canglong walked towards Ignis.

His movements were flawlessly graceful and his center of gravity was perfectly stable, making it clear that he had mastered the martial arts.

Why is he not running? Is his AGI low? Or is he moving in a way that will let him protect the princess and the others however he needs? Ignis tried to guess Canglong's intentions while weaving a spell in preparation, but before he could finish, Canglong's massive frame loomed right in front of him.

Supersonic speed?! The difference in speed between his walking and his movement just now was too great for any ordinary person to perceive, let alone counter.

But despite his shock, Ignis was able to react to it by reflex.

Battle casters who fought solo had to have the ability to stand their own against vanguards, who were generally faster than them; as one who'd walked that path for decades, Feuer Lazburn was able to weave a spell against Canglong as easily as he breathed.

He supplemented his Prominence Aura with Fixed Stars maintained on the tips of his fingers — the same technique he'd used to melt Bellcross's arm.

Canglong swung with his left fist, but entering Prominence Aura caused his entire body to catch fire.

That wasn't all — his fist flew right into Ignis's Fixed Stars like a moth to the flame.

Unlike before, he couldn't disperse it with magic, so his hand evaporated in an instant.

However, the hand was restored in a split second and immediately crushed the limb that held the Fixed Stars.

"Ghuh! Hhuh?!" Having lost one of his arms, Ignis let out a cry of pain and shock.

The impossibility of what was happening before his eyes made it difficult to to even speak coherently.

The Draconic Emperor had tried to punch him and had his arm evaporated — only to instantly regenerate it and use that momentum to finish the strike.

It seemed simple, but it was clearly impossible.

Absurdly fast regeneration...? No, it simply cannot be this fast! It matches the Hierophant's Mercy of the Holy! How can he regenerate this quickly without even calling out a skill...?! Ignis hastily backed away and began to shoot countless balls of fire in every direction. It wasn't an attack on Canglong or an act of desperation — he was actually trying to finish off the immobilized Altarians.

Canglong said nothing, his expression hidden by the mask, but his very aura made it obvious that his face had twisted with emotion.

Instead of following Ignis, he rushed to protect the others, just as he had before.

Ignis had done all of this solely to limit Canglong's actions and prepare for another assault.

The self-restoration function La Crima gave me can fix my arm to a certain extent...but the result will not be as good and will not come as quickly. Clearly, he is the outlier here.

Ignis was even more confused about the nature of the Draconic Emperor job than before. He could cancel magic, move at supersonic speeds, and regenerate just as fast, and his frame was rippling with muscles that let him easily pulverize even Ignis's enhanced body.

It was so well-rounded that it was impossible to guess what, exactly, the job was focused on.

...No, wait. Could it be?

Ignis's many years of combat experience and honed senses led him to believe that he did have an answer.

...I know something like this, do I not...?

The train of thought moved...

The power to neutralize magic...to negate attacks. Draconic Emperor... Draconic... Dragon?

It led him to a certain guess...

...Dragon King Aura?

A power possessed by a certain kind of monster.

Is the Draconic Emperor actually...? Treating this guess as a definite answer, Ignis's brain connected the dots.

The power to negate weak attacks, stats that could not be achieved by humans, extreme regeneration...

These features would remind some of certain entities faced by a select few champions. The strongest warriors of Altar might recall the great three-headed dragon.

Indeed, Draconic Emperor could only be...

"A human bearing the power of dragons and their kings?" Ignis guessed that Canglong was a humanoid with the abilities of the strongest monsters.

Canglong said nothing in response, focused on protecting the Altarians.

However, in his mind, he gave an answer.

Close, but not quite.

◇◆

The Draconic Emperors were the descendant of gulong — ancient dragons — as well as gulong themselves. "Gulong" was another name for the strongest Pure-Dragons on the eastern side of the continent.

While the Border Mountain Belt in the west was inhabited by western-style skydragons, the ancient dragons of the east were more like the serpentine beasts from Chinese mythology in the real world.

Dragons with a similar appearance still lived in Tenchi, but the gulong were on an entirely different level. They were extremely intelligent and well-versed in the arts, and had lived alongside humans since ancient times as guardians or rulers. The gulong ren — ancient dragon kin — that still existed to this day were the descendants of gulong-human hybrids; back then, the gulong used them as representatives of their rule.

The gulong were monsters that had existed since the very first stages of the world. Thus the name ancient dragons, which they used to refer to themselves as well as being called this by others.

You could say that the previous observers had put them on this world to act as part of the world's system — as both tyrants and refiners of mankind. They understood the truth behind this world and were aware of multiple ways of managing this game.

As a result of all this, the people of the east saw them as wise and fearsome sovereigns of the land.

However, things had changed two thousand years ago, when the Incarnations attacked.

Back then, it quickly became clear that the gulong knew things too well.

The Incarnations had abilities far outside the norm for the world, as well as vast amounts of Resources to support them. The dragons immediately understood that they could not win against the men.

That was why they chose to take their leave without fighting.

They ran away, fearing the ultimate end they would face if they stood up to the Incarnations, and began searching for a way to survive into the future — to continue to exist.

What they arrived upon was one of the ways to control the very world — the ability to influence the job-managing Archetype System.

They quickly manipulated the Archetype System and disappeared, leaving behind only the gulong ren born from the union of dragons and humans — and the being known as the "Draconic Emperor."

This was a job that appeared only after the gulong vanished, which was because the Draconic Emperor job and the gulong were one and the same.

The gulong had turned their very existence into a job and left it to their future descendants.

Jobs couldn't be destroyed — they would exist for as long as this world did.

What mattered to the gulong wasn't their awareness or life, but their mere existence.

The Draconic Emperor was the aggregation of everything that made up the monsters known as gulong. It was their remains, their continued existence, taking the shape of a job.

And those born with this job had two special skills.

The first was “Gulong Cells.” It gave the bearer of the job an ancient dragon body said to be tougher than even that of dragon kings.

Being the aggregate of all the gulong, the Draconic Emperor had life force that matched them...if not surpassed them.

Because of this, the Draconic Emperor was nigh-invulnerable. Wounds that would be fatal to anyone else were mere scratches to them. If a crushed heart or a burnt body was enough to kill the Draconic Emperor, then first in Huang He’s duel rankings would’ve been Xunyu, not Canglong.

This immortality had been demonstrated even in this battle against Ignis.

Additionally, as a side-effect of Gulong Cells, the bearer’s body was “dragonized,” turning him into a Dragon King.

With their genetic makeup and resistances rivaling those of the highest-tier dragons, they were able to turn their magic into the defensive aura characteristic of Dragon Kings, simply called “Dragon King Aura.”

The nigh-immortal Draconic Emperor himself scarcely needed it, but as Canglong had demonstrated with Elizabeth and the other Altarians here, it could be used for support.

Gulong Cells was an immensely powerful skill even just on its own.

However, what made Draconic Emperors truly a force to be reckoned with was their other special skill.

This skill was the reason why those who knew the nature of the job would call the Draconic Emperor an abnormality. Its name was “Draconic Heritage.”

The gulong had created Draconic Emperor as a vessel — it was a job, yet not a job, for it didn’t fully adhere to the world’s rules.

Unlike other Superior Jobs, the Resources gathered for it were not emptied for the next inheritor — meaning that Draconic Emperors were born with the levels and stats of their predecessors.

The job’s stat growth was uniform, and thanks to this skill, there was no limit to how high its stats could grow.

The magic that nearly matched Ignis Idea, the AGI that let him move at supersonic speeds, the STR that let him shatter Ignis’s enhanced arm, and even the vast reserves of HP — all were the result of the levels Canglong had inherited.

The Draconic Emperor that had come before Canglong's predecessor was considered the strongest one ever, but that was because he exercised incredible control over his own powers.

In terms of pure stats, the current one — Canglong — was the strongest by far.

His level easily surpassed 3,000.

This was the Draconic Emperor — a shapeless, abnormal vessel created by the gulong from their own existence in order to escape extinction at the hands of the Incarnations.

It was the humanoid Irregularity they had etched onto the world.

Born transcendental, the bearers of this abnormal job were human, and yet not.

They could not be human.

That was why the names given to them — Renwai, Renchao, or Renyue — had meanings like "inhuman" or "above man."

Chapter Twenty-Four: Don’t Touch the GAME OVER

Royal Castle, Fourth Floor, Hallway

Damn it, what’s going on? Morter thought, sensing the sudden appearance of a vast concentration of magic below.

It was different from the one he was chasing and the one that wasn’t moving — a fourth source of magic.

Power-wise, it’s up there with that fiery old geezer’s. What’s the deal with this castle?

The magic he’d sensed belonged to Draconic Emperor, Canglong, but since Morter couldn’t know that, he was greatly perplexed.

Is this place actually haunted or something? He recognized this stray thought of his as the truth.

It accurately described his current situation.

Even now, he was being attacked by monsters. These obviously abnormal creatures chased after him, and he fought them all back, but he was immediately confronted with a new problem.

None of the monsters he’d defeated dissolved into light.

Upon death, they simply left the remains of what they had been: broken armor, shattered walls, collapsed flowers, torn paintings, and the like.

It was as though they had never been monsters at all — that they were nothing but objects that had gone out of control. No motes of light, no turning into loot... Something about them was different.

Morter didn’t even feel like he’d received any XP or anything when he killed them — something that would never happen if they were normal monsters.

An illusionist’s trick...? No way. Such illusions might’ve worked on someone else, but as Vespertilio Idea, who could move freely while remaining unperceived, he was nearly immune to illusions.

There were monsters here, even if they didn’t obey the relevant laws.

...And then there's the biggest problem of all. Standing in front of a door, Morter glared at the magic he sensed on the other side.

There was the third abnormality — a fairly powerful magic signature.

The cause of all this weird shit could be on the other side, eh? The magic signature that had been moving through the fourth floor was now in front of him, behind this one single door.

It was as though it was waiting for something.

I got a bad feeling about this... I'd run if I could...but I can't.

Morter resented the fragment of Idea within him — the very thing that kept him from running away.

That piece was what maintained the bodies of the people modified by the Embryo — the Ideas.

It was also a leash that would take control of his body away from him if he acted against his orders. Once under control, Morter's body would be forced to do as he was bidden, but his movements would be far more awkward and less skilled than normal.

That would almost certainly lead to his death, so Morter had no choice but to obey.

Try to remove it and die, defy it and meet your end... This fucking setup, I swear...

He did like the powers he gained as an Idea, but the negatives had turned out to outweigh the positives.

I gotta do as Zeta told me and attack whoever this magic belongs to, he thought in resignation as he recalled the conversation.

"Important. The most important part of this request is to attack any strange person."

"Strange? You know that if you include Masters, there's strange people everywhere, right?"

"Aware. I know that. That's why the entire city needs to be attacked."

"...Huh?"

"Directive. I order Regina Apis Idea to destroy the city. The other three will assault the castle. You will sabotage the castle and attack anyone suspicious. It doesn't matter if they survive or not."

"...Are you insane?"

"Sane. I am of sound mind. This is part of the request we accepted, and chaos will help me achieve my own goal as well."

"Is everything all right with your and the client's wiring...?"

"Uncertain. I don't know if either of our mental states are stable. However, for the client, this might be an important enough matter to ignore the resulting sacrifices."

"...Man, if something's important enough to call for that, I don't even wanna know what it is."

"Agreed. With that in mind, I want you to do this job."

They had gone on to assault the castle, and Morter had followed an extremely suspicious magic signature.

Whatever's behind this door is obviously something pretty weird... Did I hit the jackpot?

The moment that door was opened, the victor would be decided. Morter knew that full well, so he considered how he would go about this.

I'll kick the door and activate the Darkness Boundary. They'll lose sight of me, giving me a chance to end it all with Sudden Death.

Darkness Boundary was a function La Crima had implanted in him. It briefly absorbed the visible light in a certain range, robbing anyone in the affected area of their sight.

Sudden Death was King of Raids' ultimate job skill.

It could only be used while undetected by the target, and it delivered a triple damage attack which ignored defense, endurance, and resistances. It also prevented the activation of the Brooches many people relied on to survive massive damage, and it was affected by the raider grouping's basic skill, Sneak Raid, which tripled the damage done while undetected.

Modified as he was now, he could deliver Sudden Deaths powerful enough to utterly obliterate his targets.

Even when dealing with high HP opponents, he could still instantly kill them by targeting vital areas.

"Hm..." Even though he had figured out all of this in his head, Morter's intuition and experience made him hesitate. He felt as though what waited for him behind the door was a bottomless pit.

But if he let fear hold him back, the Idea within him would forcefully take control, making him watch as his body headed to its death.

And even aside from that, there was the possibility of whoever was on the other side striking first.

Thus, Morter had only one choice here.

...Well, I guess I just gotta have faith. I'm a Superior Job — one of the few who rose above the rest. And even with all the dumb shit that came with it, I was given a crazy good body.

And so...

"Hh...!"

...he gathered his resolve and kicked open the door.

At the same moment, he activated the Darkness Boundary, drowning the surroundings in pitch black.

Even though he was also now plunged into darkness, being mixed with a bat-like Pure-Dragon-tier creature had granted him hearing good enough to perceive his enemy.

There's two of them...?! I see...so one's riding the other! Since they were so close together, he'd mistaken them for a single magic signature — assuming both of them had one, of course.

Below is a four-legged monster, above is...a really small human! The moment his hearing allowed him to grasp this, Morter instantly selected his target.

I'll go for the one on top! Following Zeta's order, he kicked off the floor and ceiling several times before approaching the strange, short person on the monster's back.

Sudden Death! He spoke the skill name in his mind before swinging his blade-like claws down towards the back of the tiny figure's neck.

Morter's attack, backed by the power of a lethal skill, struck the tiny target.

"...What?" he muttered, and he stared at his claws, thoroughly confused.

The attack that was supposed to end a life didn't even break through the skin.

It wasn't just that — it seemed like the target wasn't even affected by the attack at all.

Soon after, the effects of the Darkness Boundary expired, bringing light back to the world.

The moment his perception switched from sonar to visual...

"...HOW?!"

...he was overcome by immense shock.

His target — who had been unharmed by his deadly swing — turned out to be nothing but a little girl.

Mounted upon a four-legged beast, she looked at him with a disinterested expression and eyes that held no emotion.

I know she seemed small, but...an actual child?! A child was just hit by my ultimate skill and felt...nothing?!

Morter quickly used Reveal to find out more about her.

Theresia Celestite Altar

Job: None

Level: 0 (Total Level: 0)

The info he was given only made him realize that she had no jobs at all.

The only thing he'd learned was that according to her name, she was none other than the Third Princess of Altar.

"No... There's no way!" Faced with this impossible reality, Morter rejected the facts he had just been given.

There's no way this girl is powerless! She's not just a princess. "Strange" doesn't even begin to describe her... She has to be the most abnormal thing in the entire world!

Zeta's order flashed back into his mind. Theresia now disturbed him far more than any of the I.F. members or his fellow Ideas had ever done.

"There's nothing strange about this," Theresia said, as though she had read his mind. Morter instantly jumped back to put some distance between them. "I survived because of my Brooch. There aren't any fragments around because the Brooch just happened to not break. Your attack really scared me."

Theresia described the situation in a way that made her seem like a normal child. Morter didn't have Truth Discernment, but he didn't need it to know that she was lying.

After all, Sudden Death was a skill that couldn't be negated by Brooches.

In his mind, it would've been far better if the Brooch had activated for some reason.

He also felt that just like Reveal had failed him with her, Truth Discernment would also mean nothing against this girl even if he had possessed the skill.

"You followed the magic, didn't you? You must've felt Dor, then. I mean, he's my protector. He's very strong...strong enough to destroy the world," Theresia said as she pet the beast — Dormouse.

Perhaps she was right that Morter felt Dormouse's magic, but despite that — or perhaps because of it — he found the girl herself so abnormal that the magic signature meant nothing, no matter how vast it was.

"I'm just a normal girl, and Dor is my very strong protector. Your attack just happened to be blocked by my Brooch. There's nothing here that your leader would want. That's a reasonable explanation for all of this, but..." Theresia said as she looked at Morter with unreadable eyes, "...you won't just accept it and leave, will you?"

The little girl's aura was so overwhelmingly powerful that it might just be enough to make any ordinary person lose their minds or even die.

"Huh... Gh..." Morter couldn't even bring himself to respond.

"...Very well. If you want information, then you can bring this back."

Before he could say anything, the girl's tone became more mature as she continued to speak.

"I am... ■■■ ■■■■."

Her words, however, failed to reach him.

Or, more precisely, they reached him as nothing but meaningless noise.

"You probably couldn't hear that. My job as ■■■ ■■■■ is camouflaged, and I can't say the name to anyone myself. Though, I'll still tell you what I know. You might not hear certain bits, but I want to convey it to you as is. The general meaning should still get through to you. This assault was orchestrated by someone who wants me eliminated, so the capital was attacked so that they could find out who I am. I'll give you the answer, and that info by itself should satisfy them."

"Wa—" Morter wanted to say "Wait," but Theresia continued before he could finish.

"Also, it'd be troublesome if you died this close to me. Progression is slowed down thanks to Dor handling it, but if there are too many deaths nearby, some of it will get through. Also, the amount absorbed is the greatest when I or ■■ ■■■■■■■■■■ do the killing directly, and Dor doesn't have the authority to eliminate you because of the Embryo you've been mixed with. Not many people die in the castle, and the barrier prevents ■■■■■■■■ ■■■■■■■■■■ from the outside, so this would be inconvenient. ■■■ ■■■■■■'s appearance would be pushed forward."

Morter couldn't understand — or even hear — a lot of what she said.

"Dor can destroy the world, but the ■■■■ ■■■■ would ■■■■ it."

Morter’s very cells understood that he was just too insignificant to hear her words.

They were meant for those far more special than him.

He felt as though hearing this alien information would rob him of everything, even the prospect of a normal death.

Why must I hear this? Morter thought with the remaining fragments of his sanity.

“That’s why I want you to stop attacking me. Otherwise, more safety functions will be activated. The more danger I am in, the more of them are freed. Like how ■■■■■■■■■ ■■■■■■■■■■■■■■ was unlocked because of Sechs.”

She spoke the name of the leader of I.F. — the one who outranked even those who had defeated him, modified him, and used him — but Morter was in no state to acknowledge that. But for some reason, he felt that some of the words he couldn’t hear had something to do with the bizarre monsters he faced back in the hallway.

“Back when Gloria attacked, I thought that I could end it all by taking it down with me. You just aren’t enough to deal with me... And now that I think about it, Gloria was modified too, so maybe not even that monster could’ve touched me.”

Theresia’s expression slightly changed.

“My safety functions are automatic. They’re activated to eliminate any threats and to keep me alive. You can see it in the ■■■■■■■■■■ that attacked you. You can’t hurt me because you’ve been mixed with a foreign object, but it still reacts to your attacks and skills. The reaction is weak because they caused no damage, but if you keep this up...it will surely be released. Eventually, ■■■ ■■■■■■ will show about half of its face...and that’s terrifying.”

She said that last word with a truly worried expression.

She was terrified not of Morter’s attacks...but of something within herself — the automatic defensive reaction of the power lying dormant inside her, ready to create unnatural monsters and whatever else it took every time she was attacked or put in danger.

This scared her like nothing else.

“I don’t want to release more of this power. I might kill my sister with it. So please...don’t touch me,” she said. With that, she had finished giving

Morter his information and laid a hand on her chest. “...Don’t touch the GAME OVER.”

An ultimatum, delivered calmly.

Chapter From the Past: What is Untouchable, What Shouldn’t be Touched

5XX years ago

Deep under the ruins of the industrial city, there was a cavern even larger than the shelter.

Its ceiling easily surpassed a hundred metels in height.

And yet, there was something large enough to take up the majority of this vast space.

Possessing both humanoid and beastial features...it seemed to be a corpse of some kind.

However, through its fossil-like exterior, a pulse could be sensed.

These pulses carried enough energy that it almost seemed as though the corpse might stand up at any moment and wreak havoc upon the world — but then it suddenly stopped. Everything became deathly still.

“...Con...firmed. On the surface...the current...The Evil...died. That made...The Demise...The GAME OVER...go dormant...”

“Good grief... I guess this trouble’s finally dealt with, eeh...?”

The gloomy-looking woman received a response from a youth with a cat perched on his head.

The other people there with them looked up at the thing.

Perhaps “people” wasn’t the right word. Many of them had a human appearance, but there were a few who did not.

“This is the first time we’ve found the true body, and I suppose this thing works similarly to Jabberwock...Evolution,” said the entity made up of four floating orbs, which from some angles looked somewhat like a caterpillar.

“The Evil that the Sacred King and his brethren defeated must be this thing’s brain-frame. This time, the brain-frame died before this combat-frame, preventing it from waking up. Or perhaps our activities have made it so it lacks the Resources required for activation.”

“Based on the measured valuuues, we were preeetty close to the limit!” A pair of twins — a spectacled boy and a girl with headphones — gave their analysis.

“If the retrieved texts are correct, the last time it was activated was before we arrived. Back then, the forces were adequate. We had difficulty subduing just The Evil this time, but they didn’t have much of a problem even with this.”

“Hmm... That means it was weaker last tiiime! I mean, we eeaasily wiped out the ‘adequate’ forces they used! This time, it was probably stronger than each of uuus! Ohh, Bandersnatch is an exception, of coouurse!”

“Does that mean that it spent the last millennium — and more — reconstructing itself and growing stronger?” asked a slender, fussy-looking youth.

“Likely. Now, Red King...attack it with your Space Fracture.”

“Understood.” The slender youth quickly used his power on the fossil-like object.

A moment later, the world was split in two along a straight line, and a colorless void peered out from beyond it.

A few seconds later, it closed, splitting everything in its path...except for the fossil-like object.

It was right in the center of this immense destructive power...and it wasn’t affected whatsoever.

“...Same as it was with The Evil, huh?” said the youth with a cat on his head and distress on his face. “If not even Space Fracture can hurt it... This is baaad.”

“Indeed. Space Fracture destroys objects and phenomena regardless of toughness, yet it did nothing here.”

“Ah ha haaa! It’s sooo bad! Should we try calling Bandersnatch?”

“Let’s not... In the worst-case scenario, everything we’ve done so far might go to waaaste,” the youth rejected the headphone-wearing girl’s suggestion.

“So those who defeated it last time had offensive powers greater than Red King’s Space Fracture? Maybe it would be possible with the Sacred King’s blade...” said the caterpillar.

“No, this is a matter of fundamental mechanics. As those who came from the outside, we cannot affect this thing in any way. It's the same as with The Evil. This is probably a safety function of this world's system itself," said the spectacled boy.

"...So this thing can only be harmed by tians, eeeh?" said the youth with a cat on his head. "What about UBMs?"

"They probably couldn't harm it either. In fact, I doubt any monster actually could. Queen gave them all the item transformation function."

"Ah ha haaa! We reeeally messed up there!" the headphone girl laughed, but no one else found it funny.

"Wait. The Evil was defeated by the Sacred King, right? Isn't The Primeval Blade an Irregularity? As in, a UBM?"

"When it comes to the phenomenon of 'severance,' that thing can do anything, no matter how ridiculous. It probably negates even The Evil's defensive functions. It also shows just how absurd something needs to be to get past them... From the looks of it, even the Masters we will eventually welcome will be powerless against it."

"That much is obvious. There is nothing we or any other Embryos can do against it."

"What do we do now? What will become of our plans if something like this remains here...?"

"We can only hope that by the time it activates again, our goals will already be achieved," said the caterpillar. It seemed as though all of them were truly troubled by the difficult problem before them.

"Why...does this...exist...anyway?" asked the gloomy woman.

"It's a trial," said the four-legged beast that had been silent until just now.

"Dormouse..."

"The environment we are creating is meant to nurture Superior Embryos, and to that end, Jabberwock is gathering SUBMs. If this land was meant to nurture strength through jobs, this might be intended to fill a similar role — a powerful force to test them."

"But...something like this...would destroy...the world..."

"'Surpass this trial or be destroyed.' That might've been the idea behind it."

"...Such short-tempered...creators..."

"Is that conjecture, Dormouse?" asked the spectacled boy.

"It is. This is a conclusion I reached by using all of my processing power... Though, it incorporates some of my intuition."

"Animalistic intuition is something we do not have. The idea is worth considering," the spectacled boy — one of the twins who had the greatest machine-like calculating power among everyone present — said in agreement.

"Based on the data we've gathered so far, it seems that the brain-frame's rebirth happens not far from the main body. The Evil who was just defeated was also born in the city right above us."

"So it's likely that the next one will be here too?"

"We should keep an eye on it, then, and when The Evil appears, we should just deleeeete it! Like we did the previous tiiimes!" said the headphone girl.

The beings present knew of The Evil and The Demise — this fossil-like object — from the writings of the pre-ancient civilization. They had decided that these creatures would surely ruin their plans, and thus had made an effort to prevent The Demise from appearing by defeating The Evil every time.

Having discovered The Demise this time made them all the more certain that they had done the right thing.

"But this is the last time we can use our previous method... Employing tians, I mean," said Dormouse, looking sour.

"...Yeaaah. We overused the makeshift solution," said the youth with a cat on his head and a bitter expression on his face.

"So far, we've managed to lead tians into beating The Evil after discovering it early..." Since their own attacks wouldn't work on The Evil, they hired or otherwise enlisted powerful tians to defeat it on their behalf; however, this was the last time that would work for them.

"The Evil returns stronger every time. This one was so powerful that even as a child, he was able to automatically counter the Superior Job we sent after him. As an adult, we led the most powerful tians we could find against him...and it was still a Pyrrhic victory."

"...It won't work at all next time." The Evil that would come after this would be too strong for any tian to kill.

In fact, careless contact with it would only accelerate its functions.

After all, the deaths caused by The Evil or the monsters it created — monsters called “dependants” — gave it more Resources than any other deaths, accelerating its leveling and the arrival of The Demise.

“We will change our approach,” said Dormouse.

“What do you mean?”

“From now on, when we find The Evil, I will stay by its side and absorb the Resources meant for it. At the same time, I will slow down their activation by protecting them and keeping them away from danger.”

“We have no data supporting this idea, so I cannot say much about it... But if it works well, there is the possibility that The Evil will die a natural death before The Demise is activated.”

“But what if it happens after we welcome the Earth’s Masters? There will no doubt be a great deal of turmoil, and the amount of Resources flowing to The Evil will increase dramatically. Not even you can absorb that much, can you?” asked the caterpillar.

Dormouse thought about it for a few moments before saying, “...We can only pray that we achieve our goal before that happens.”

The words made the rest of them grin wryly.

“‘Pray,’ huh? I find it hard to comment on that.”

“...The ones who destroyed religion in this world are now clinging to a divine hope to protect the world from a doom mentioned by those veeeeery same religions. It’s so ironic that it’s not even funny.”

Despite the comments, they all knew that this was the only hope they had.

“Very well. That will be our approach. No one objects, I assume...?” the spectacled boy asked, and the others all nodded. “So we now have the approval of myself, Dee, Red King, Caterpillar, Duchess, Dormouse, Cheshire...and Alice — she just gave it to me through the avatar. That is a majority, so it’s decided.”

“Well, it’s not like those who aren’t here would say nooo... If you ignore the big tin can, anyway,” said the youth with the cat on his head — Cheshire.

“...Bandersnatch is very stubborn, after all. If there are enemies, crushing them is the only option for him. That’s the only job he can do too, since he can’t even have an avatar,” said the fussy-looking youth — Red King.

Their massive, mighty, and mad colleague always had to be taken into account.

“Now, we need to conceal not just The Evil itself, but this thing too. Caterpillar, place a save point somewhere on this land and begin adjusting the environment,” ordered the spectacled boy — Tweedledum.

“A save point? As in, an environment maintenance marker? But I’ve already removed them from this area once,” said the gathering of orbs — Caterpillar.

“I am aware. I will have you make the arrangements, Cheshire. Needless to say, Dee and I will also help by using DIN to spread info.”

“What are you planning?”

“We will create a narrative that the death of The Evil at the hands of the Sacred King has blessed this land. People will flock to build a city here. The more people we have close to this thing, the higher the chances that The Evil will be born here, making them easier to observe. Also, the save point here will be given a resource absorption function.”

“I see. That would help,” said Dormouse.

“Additionally, Red King, I will have you reconstruct the space here to keep people away from this thing,” Tweedledum said as he pointed at The Demise.

“How?”

“Create multiple layers of extra dimensions, making it impossible to arrive at this place by simply digging down. In fact, let us make an entire created dungeon. It will seem unnatural if it’s just a reconstructed space. We will use DIN to spread the idea that this phenomenon was caused by the death of The Evil. You help too, Duchess; I will be counting on you to convince Queen.”

“Very...well...” said the gloomy woman — Duchess.

“A created dungeon... We only have the Overlord job change dungeons left behind by the previous manageerrs. This’ll be our first time making ooone.”

“This one will be more difficult than the others. I will talk to Jabberwock about that. We will use the UBMs he retrieved as guard dogs — Extinction Dragon King and the like will do just fine.”

“I seeee! Oh yeah! What about the dungeon’s naaame?” asked the headphone girl — Tweedledee.

Tweedledum looked up at The Demise — those fossil-like divine remains — and said, “The dungeon will be called...the ‘Tomb Labyrinth.’”

Following this, the Royal Capital, Altea, was constructed, along with the created dungeon known as the Tomb Labyrinth.

Various myths and legends sprung up about it, but most of them were eventually lost or forgotten. The truth behind it remained hidden, even as the city and dungeon both stood for centuries, surviving even into the present day.

◇◆◇

About her...

She has been lying since the day she was born.

Theresia C. Altar was the third princess of the kingdom.

She’d lost her mother soon after birth, and she herself was born sickly.

Likely because of those tragedies, her father and sisters had showered Theresia with love for her entire life.

Even if all of that hadn’t been the case, then the doctor’s statement that she wouldn’t live into adulthood would’ve been more than enough reason for them to cherish her.

Within her cradle, surrounded by love and sadness, Theresia thought, So this is the life I was born into this time.

Even back as an infant, she already had a functional mind and an awareness of the world.

It was as though the brain inside her head wasn’t the only thing that stored her thoughts and memories.

In fact, there actually was a vessel that fulfilled that function — the Special Superior Job, The Evil.

This job served to prime, rouse, and stimulate The Demise — the other half of the world-ending god.

It was part of The System left behind by the previous observers, who’d created it to test this world.

Because of this, The Evil was equipped with functions that made it truly unique among jobs — a whole five of these functions, in fact.

First, The Evil possessed the memories of the job’s previous holders, and the job itself served the role of the user’s brain in producing thoughts.

Second, The Evil automatically leveled up by absorbing Resources from dead people all over the world.

Third, the information regarding the job was completely hidden until The Evil reached a certain level.

Fourth, The Evil was completely immune to all “outsiders” that didn’t exist within the realm of The System.

Fifth, the newest The Evil had greater stats and stronger skills than the one that had come before.

I was just born, but I already feel tired of life. For Theresia, the greatest problem was the first point — the memories she had. The Evils didn’t inherit the natures of the previous ones, so her personality was her own, but memory and personality weren’t completely separate.

Because she possessed the memories of every previous person who had held the job, Theresia already had a great deal of knowledge as a mere baby. This had forced her to mature mentally far past her actual age. If the memories and capabilities she had as The Evil didn’t come with a mental safeguard, her mind would’ve shattered moments after she was born.

Still, having multiple memories of her own death made her mentally exhausted.

But at the same, she understood that The Evil was an entity that would eventually have to die.

If The Evil lived, The Demise would arrive, likely causing the end of the world.

The problem with that was that The Evils couldn’t kill or hurt themselves, and if exposed to danger, their job skills would automatically react to it.

By merely existing and maturing, Theresia would bring harm to the world, so she would eventually be killed.

Among The Evils of the past, there were those who had just silently awaited their end, as well as those who had bared their fangs at the world. Her ancestor had killed one of the latter kind; she herself was the former.

In spite of their similar memories, their approach was different, which must’ve been due to the difference between their souls.

Theresia understood that she would eventually be exposed and killed. Having just been born, she decided to simply wait for the end.

But until she was exposed...she chose to lie.

◇◆

When Theresia was about a year old, she had an understanding of her surroundings.

Altimia is the Sacred Princess. While my level is still low, she could easily lop off my head.

She looked back through the memories of The Evils' previous deaths and came to that conclusion.

The Primeval Blade was now a UBM, but despite having been mixed with some foreign substances, it had still been able to cut through The Evil's impenetrable defenses.

In fact, the sword was exactly like The Evil in one key way — it had been specially prepared by the creators of this world. If they had made it to cut through anything, then that quality would remain even if its very nature was tampered with.

This much was evident from the picture book read to her in the cradle — Altar's most famous legend.

The bearers must not abandon the god's remains... Azurite knew that The Evil would reincarnate here and said that so that the bearer of The Primeval Blade would quickly kill them. Though, I can't imagine that he expected The Evil to be his own descendant.

The god's remains... In other words, the main body of The Demise lay dormant underneath the capital.

It was unknown if the Sacred King of that era knew that The Evil would be born close to The Demise, but he had still happened upon the correct approach.

The most effective way to deal with The Evil was to use The Primeval Blade to lop off their head while they were still young.

The more they matured, the more defensive potential their skills provided. Eventually, there could come a point where even the current bearer of The Primeval Blade would have to struggle as much as, if not more than, the first Azurite to defeat their opponent.

The level growth is...slow. Leveling for Theresia was harder now than it used to be when she was born.

The reason for that was the sterilization barrier that had been placed on the castle for her sake.

Though it wasn’t created with the purpose of blocking the Resources coming to her from all over the world, it did protect against curse-type status effects, which effectively shut out most of the Resources she should have been absorbing.

That isn’t a problem, since the Resources just return to nature instead... Well, actually, my leveling speed was slower than for the previous The Evils even before the barrier came up — which I guess is obvious, given that this isn’t an age of war.

Theresia had no way of knowing this, but Altea’s save point was also equipped with the function of absorbing stray Resources. The control AI had built it that way to counter The Evil, and it was slowing down her leveling speed.

...Not that I mind it. It will all be over when my level rises too high, so the slowness is welcome...even if it doesn’t change much in the end.

The Evils of the past were all put in mortal danger before turning five, activating their safety measures and forcing them to undergo their first awakening. If this ever happened to Theresia, it would become obvious that she was The Evil even if that fact had been hidden from skills like Reveal. When that happened, she would be killed.

Since that’s the way things are, I think I’ll just enjoy this lavish life, she thought with nothing but sincerity.

Though Theresia knew that Altimia would kill her one day, she still loved her, as well as their father and Elizabeth.

None of The Evils that had existed in the past had been as blessed as her.

This reminds me that the last one was from a poor family. Born in the ruined ex-capital of Adrasta, Theresia’s predecessor was from a household that had been forced to sell their children in order to survive through the winter. He’d had siblings, but they were sold off and he never saw them again and...

...Wait, is that really how it was? Theresia had almost remembered something, but couldn’t quite grasp it.

Though this wasn’t true for all of The Evils, the memories they had of their past lives tended to become more hazy as they aged. Perhaps this was just how the job handled the memories of The Evils who became insane enough to break the limits of their mental safeguard.

Regardless, The Evils who had a happy life were few and far between.

At best, they simply understood their nature and eventually accepted their death.

That was why, in her unnaturally mature mind, Theresia had decided to enjoy life as a princess until her time came — to maintain the lie that she was nothing but a sickly young girl.

I'll be exposed in a few years, anyway...

◇◆

Nearly four years had passed since then. Almost five years old now, Theresia looked at the scenery outside and whispered, "...I'm too blessed."

As a princess — a sickly one, at that — she was given perhaps the warmest upbringing possible in this world. The concept of danger was almost alien to her.

"I didn't expect this..." She thought that she would have certainly been revealed as The Evil by now.

Normally, that happened when The Evil was exposed to things like monster attacks or war, activating their safety measures and unlocking parts of their power. For most of The Evils so far, that had occurred in their early years, leading to their death soon after.

However, Theresia was a princess who was kept inside all the time, shielding her from any danger that would activate those safety measures and expose her true nature.

No one in this world — not even those actively looking for The Evil — had any inkling that she was the one.

I can't hurt or kill myself, and no one would believe me if I told them... They wouldn't even listen to me, actually.

Theresia's status as The Evil was not only hidden from skills like Reveal, but censored when she tried to say it herself. "The Evil" would come out as some different word or gibberish — and given her age, it would just be written off as childish baby talk.

And for some reason, the stories regarding The Evil were extremely simplified, with large gaps in the information they conveyed, so as a result it was likely that anyone she explained it to wouldn't understand anyway.

It's not impossible that The Evil will actually reach its final state like this... But at my current leveling rate, that would probably take decades.

Theresia could actually feel her level.

Since the time of The Evil several generations before her, the world had begun displaying detail and stat windows. Before then, people had to rely on particular skills and intuition, but now, everyone was able to bring them up at will.

However, her status as The Evil as well as her true stats were hidden even from her, forcing her to figure out her true level using her own sense of it.

And based on that feeling, she believed that she wasn't even level 30 yet.

Her leveling speed might've actually been the slowest among all The Evils that had ever existed. It wasn't out of the question that she would actually die of old age or disease before she became complete.

Imagining that scenario filled her heart and cheeks with warmth, for that would no doubt be the best death she could hope for.

"Is anything the matter, Your Highness?" asked the maid by her side.

"No. I'm just a bit warm," she replied with a lie.

"It has been rather sunny recently." As the person tasked to accompany Theresia, the maid actually had Truth Discernment, but she didn't realize that the princess was lying.

This was also because of her status as The Evil.

Just like she was protected from Reveal, she was immune to the effects of Truth Discernment.

In a world where lies were limited by skills, Theresia could lie with complete freedom.

The lie she had told just now, though, did not even begin to compare to the one that had existed since her very birth.

"I want to go to my room and nap," she said.

"As you wish," the maid replied before helping Theresia into her sizable carriage and pushing it to her room.

Since she was believed to be frail — which wasn't true due to her stats as The Evil — she was advised against traveling any longer distance on foot.

That was one of her few complaints in life. Despite actually being less than five years old, with her immense knowledge and long memory, the girl couldn't help but wonder if there was a more dignified way for her to travel.

"If you need me, I will be in the neighboring room."

"Thank you."

Following that exchange, Theresia was left in her chambers alone.

The room was as fancy as one might expect for a princess, but was also noticeably clean and hygienic.

In the canopy bed, there were the adorable plush toys she'd received from her sisters.

Next to the bed, there was a bell she could use to call the maid in the other room.

Among all the things of note, Theresia was focused on...the space between her and the bed.

She opened her mouth...

"Who are you?"

...and spoke to the empty space.

However...

"I did not expect to be addressed before I addressed you."

...the empty space replied in an unfamiliar, masculine voice.

A moment later, a green cloak appeared in the empty space.

The person wearing it took it off without a sound before giving Theresia a bow.

"My name is Sechs Würfel," the black-haired, plain-looking man introduced himself. "I am here to take you away," he added, in the tone of an actor on stage.

"What a wonderful line. I would love to hear it when I'm ten years older," Theresia replied, unfazed by the potential kidnapper in front of her.

Sechs was at a loss for words and his eyes opened wide in surprise — a sight which would no doubt shock those who would come to know him.

After observing her for a good few moments, he said, "Pardon this question, but are you truly the third princess of Altar?"

"I am. Why are you asking?"

"Because you just made me feel like I'm looking at some sort of aberration."

"...What a dreadful thing to say to a lady."

"That is true. My apologies."

Though Theresia's replies were calm, her heart was beating faster than ever before in her life so far.

Does he know I'm The Evil? How? Who is this man, anyway...? She looked him over to figure out what she was dealing with and noticed a crest on the back of his left hand.

It was a symbol in the shape of a droplet — a simple thing, signifying water and its ability to change into anything.

"Are you a Master?"

"Yes. I started last month."

Theresia was aware that since about a month ago, more and more Masters had begun to appear.

She saw these beings somewhat differently than other tians.

So he's like The Lynx... One of her predecessors had fought a Master bearing that job. The Lynx fought using an Embryo that allowed him to multiply, but The Evil remained undamaged no matter how many of his doubles attacked.

Theresia knew that was due to one of The Evil's characteristics — immunity to anything foreign.

Masters are foreign to The System. They can't hurt me no matter what. Why would one of them establish contact with The Evil?

The situation was so strange that Theresia couldn't help talking to him to get more information.

"Was that your Embryo you were just wearing?"

"No. It was an MVP special reward. Originally, it was an Epic chameleon named...'The False Tone, Soundcolorless,' I believe. I don't know for sure, because our encounter was sudden and began with a devouring."

The smile on the man's face as he casually mentioned being killed and eaten by a monster gave Theresia the feeling that he wasn't exactly normal.

"And that's why he's now my special reward."

"Hm...?"

"I have a question for you, as well... How did you know I was here?"

Theresia said nothing at first. Given that he had been hidden by a special reward, it was only natural that she would spot him.

What Sechs's reward did was make him blend into the surroundings to both the eye and ear. Its effectiveness was proven by the fact that he'd snuck into her room completely unnoticed. Of course, there were security elements that could sense him in other ways, but he must've dealt with them, as well.

Regardless, as potent as the special reward was, it was an item derived from a UBM — creatures with powers considered foreign — meaning that The Evil, Theresia, was immune to its effects.

She'd actually seen Sechs standing in her room as if he wasn't camouflaged at all.

"That's because..." she said before losing herself in thought for a moment, "...I am ■■■ ■■■■."

"Hm?"

Theresia had revealed what she was, but the words didn't reach him.

So it works against Masters too. Then why did he call me an aberration? Not just that — if he doesn't even know that I'm The Evil, why is he here in the first place...?

One of her questions had been answered, leaving even more behind.

That was why she went ahead and just asked, "Why are you kidnapping me?"

In response...

"Because it's one of the greatest crimes you can commit in this country."

...Sechs readily revealed his motive, if it could even be called that.

"...Huh?"

"I am committing grievous crimes to become a villain, and one of the most grievous ones I could think of was kidnapping you. That is why I am here."

To become a sinner, he would commit a crime. If Sechs truly meant what he said, his goals and the means to achieve it were one and the same — he wanted to commit crimes, with no expectation of reward, to become a criminal.

Neither Theresia nor any of her predecessors had ever met someone as strange as him.

Perhaps this is just how Masters are... Odd as he was, however, he was still someone who'd made it past the castle's tight security and arrived in her room, meaning that he couldn't be taken lightly.

Masters are foreign. They can't hurt or kill me. But still, I...

She couldn't just ignore him, but if she were to raise her voice, the maid would rush in from the neighboring room, and Sechs would most likely kill her.

As she wondered how to go about this...

...she heard Sechs's voice from right behind her, and a wet cloth was pressed against her mouth.

"Huh...?" After a single breath, her consciousness began to fade.

Before she completely fell unconscious, Theresia saw the Sechs she had been talking to until this very moment...as well as the one who put the cloth on her mouth.

The man was in two places at once.

◇◆

"Ah...!" Theresia woke up about two hours after she had lost consciousness.

Moments after she recovered, she realized that she'd been put to sleep by some drug.

She was now somewhere she didn't recognize.

It looked like a wooden cabin, and she could see the forest outside. As a princess who had lived her whole life in a castle, Theresia had never seen something like this before, but the memories of her predecessors made her assume that this must be a lumberjack's cabin.

She realized that after she'd been put to sleep, she had been taken to this cabin and locked inside it, and that she was likely in the Noz Forest near the capital.

Theresia wondered how she — The Evil — had been put to sleep by a Master, but she quickly realized what had happened.

...Ohh. There was that one exception, she thought.

As a rule, what was foreign couldn't harm The Evil, but there were three ways to get around this.

The first way was using things like The Primeval Blade, which bent the laws governing The Evil's existence.

The second way was to gain influence over the very system in which The Evil's foundations lay...to take control over the entire world, basically.

The third and the simplest one...was to use consumables made by tians.

The drug Sechs used to put Theresia to sleep, offensive magic Gems, anything like that...as long as it had been created by tians, even Masters could use such consumables to harm The Evil.

Due to the monster-loot transformation system, this didn't work if the consumables were made using items or materials gained from monsters, but the drug that Sechs used happened to be made entirely from natural ingredients.

It probably wouldn't have worked if my level as The Evil was higher, but since it's so low and I don't have any safety measures unlocked... It makes sense that it put me to sleep.

Another notable thing was that the safety measures had remained locked.

Her body was unharmed, making it clear that, at the very least, her kidnapper hadn't hurt her.

Sechs was nowhere in sight. Perhaps he, like a proper criminal, had gone to the castle to declare the kidnapping and make his demands.

Theresia also had a question regarding him.

She wanted to know why she'd seen two of Sechs before losing consciousness.

Multiples of the same person... If it wasn't an identical twin, it could only be the effect of some skill he has. The fact that I saw it means that the other person was real, not an illusion. I guess it was either the effect of his Embryo or a skill like Art of Shadow Clones. I mean, it's not like he just split himself in two like a slime...

At this point, she had no way of knowing that this was, in fact, exactly the case.

As she continued to wonder how Sechs had accomplished that feat, she realized something.

"...It went up."

Her senses told her that there had been a change in her true level. It had been stagnating for a good while now, but she realized that it had gone up while she was asleep.

This was only natural. She was not only outside the castle's protective barrier, but the capital itself — away from the save point designed to absorb Resources.

Though close to the city, she was still out in nature, allowing her to gather the Resources of the dead just as The Evil normally would.

Every second she spent out here shaved more and more time off her limited life span.

Though, so far, leveling had only raised her stats. She still had no skills.

If she was exposed to danger now, the safety measures would be activated, unlocking her true power — her skills — as The Evil.

The first skill that would be unlocked was Dependent Transformation, which changed the nature of the surrounding matter. It responded to any apparent danger by automatically turning surrounding objects, such as rocks and trees, into monsters...her “dependents” that would leap to her defense.

When that happened, she would be exposed, and her death would quickly follow.

She wasn’t against that. In her mind, it was far better than the world being destroyed.

She had a faint hope of living out a full life, but if that turned out to be impossible, then there was no way around it.

The problem is that Altimia is studying in Dryfe right now. Can my automatic defenses be broken without The Primeval Blade...? Can they really kill me?

Worrying about whoever would have to kill her, Theresia let out a sigh of resignation.

It was likely that many people would die.

Right now, the best thing she could do to avoid that was merely staying in this cabin.

She was capable of destroying it even with her current stats, but she would not be able to return to the castle without encountering any danger.

Even ignoring Sechs himself, the area here was full of monsters ready to attack her on sight.

Though her stats and their status as outsiders made them harmless to her, they would still be recognized as a threat and activate the safety measures.

Sechs seemed to know nothing about Theresia’s situation, but this shabby cabin in the woods turned out to act as The Evil’s cage.

...If only there was someone who could escort me safely back to the castle, she thought before silently chuckling at herself. Someone that convenient wouldn’t just appear out of nowhere.

Suddenly, she noticed a faint sound.

“...Rain?”

It was the sound of rain droplets hitting the wooden roof. It grew in frequency and intensity, but stopped before becoming too intense.

She focused on listening to the sound.

"...I never thought much about the weather." The sickly girl had always stayed inside the castle. That had been all she ever knew, and since she'd only inherited the memories of the outside world from her predecessors, she'd never truly cared about it.

That was why this was the first time she experienced rain so close at hand.

It's noisy, but somehow a bit soothing too... I wonder why? She closed her eyes and strained her ears.

Did she stay like that for a minute? A few? Or perhaps longer?

An uncertain amount of time passed by, and then...

"...He's here."

...she heard footsteps mixed with the rain.

Sechs is back... I wonder what will happen now.

Would he exchange her for a ransom? Would he hand her over to some people outside her family? Or did he intend to kill her to add another grievous crime to his name?

If he'd kidnapped her just for the sake of committing any crime at all, Theresia believed that this lunatic might also kill her to make his transgression even worse.

Whether or not that was indeed his intention, based on Theresia's impression of him, she wouldn't be surprised if it was.

Sechs can't kill me, but he can still activate the safety measures. I guess I only have minutes left until my life as a princess is over.

The lie that had lived with her since the moment she was born was now coming to an end.

After this, she would The Evil — nothing but a threat to the world.

Even if they wouldn't be able to defeat her, it was impossible that she would be able to live as she had until now.

Still...I lived a better life than The Evils so far, she thought, as if to console herself.

However, despite her preparation and resignation...Sechs wasn't entering the cabin.

In fact, he seemed to be struggling with something in front of the door. She heard metallic sounds that made her assume that he was trying to unlock the lock.

Sechs was the one who locked it. He should have the key. Did he drop it...?

As the sounds continued, she realized something.

Is this actually...? Before she could finish that thought...

"GRRRRR! I CAN'T BEAR IT ANY LONGER!"

...she heard the lock break, accompanied by a somewhat-comical, angry voice.

A moment later, the door opened with a creak, and a large silhouette walked in.

"I just wanted some shelter from the rain. Why's it locked? The old lumberjack said that he doesn't lock it since there's nothin' here worth gettin' your paws on. What happened to tha— Hm?"

Silence. The person who had just entered was a man in a dog — or wolf — costume, who for some reason was using bear puns.

He was all black with the exception of his back, which was red.

Needless to say, it wasn't Sechs.

"What's a little cub doin' in a place like this?"

"...Who are you?" The fact that he spoke human language and had no name over his head made it clear that he wasn't a monster. However, she still had no idea who or what he was.

In response...

"I'm Shu. A Master, thank you beary much... I mean, woof!"

...the Master introduced himself as "Shu" and finally seemed to realize that his bear puns didn't make sense at the moment, switching instead to simple barking.

"Are you a dog? Or a bear?"

"A human. In a dog suit, as you can see. I used to rock a bear suit not long ago, and I still haven't managed to kick the bear pun habit. I can't bear to part with them... I mean, woof."

"...Heh." Theresia chuckled at the strange person before her and also at the realization that he was just a passerby who had nothing to do with Sechs.

"If it made you laugh, then mixing up my quirks was worth it. And what's your name, li'l lady?"

"I'm..." Theresia said before thinking for a moment. "I'm Tee. I don't know how I got here."

She chose to give him a fake name.

If she'd used "Theresia," he might've realized that she was a princess, and that might've negatively influenced his actions even if he had nothing to do with Sechs.

Giving a fake name seemed like the best option.

I'm The Evil. It's not like he'll realize I'm lying— "Hmm? And what's your real name? It's hard to contact your parents if I don't have it. Woof."

"Huh?" She was more shocked by those words than anything else she'd experienced since she was born. Not even facing Sechs had surprised her as much as this.

"Wh-Why...do you think...I'm lying? Truth Discernment should..."

"Don't have that. Woof."

"Then how...?" Not even the highest level Truth Discernment could see past The Evil's lies.

Theresia was so perplexed that she couldn't help but ask how he'd figured it out.

"It's easy to tell that you have no attachment to that name. You glanced around and paused before saying it. Woof."

"Ah...!"

It wasn't even the effect of some skill.

It was actually a sense. Shu's own power, born of his experience and intuition, had done what the most powerful Truth Discernment could not.

The lie of The Evil, which avoided all orthodox skills and was protected from everything the world had, was easily exposed by Shu's perception.

"Well, I get that it ain't easy to trust some guy in a costume you just met. You said you don't know how you got here, and I want to take you back home. Woof."

Silence. Theresia wondered how to process Shu's words.

She didn't have Truth Discernment herself, so she didn't know whether he was being honest or not.

But ultimately, she...

"My... My real name is...Theresia."

...chose to reveal the truth.

Shu had seen through her lie, so she decided to give him the truth this time.

"Theresia Celestite Altar."

“That name...” That was enough for Shu to realize who she truly was.

“Mr. Costume...I have a request,” Theresia continued.

Her request was related to a path she’d given up on only moments ago — one that could let her continue to live life with her family as The Third Princess of Altar, Theresia.

The possibility of a hopeful conclusion.

“I’m listening.”

“I’m a princess...and it’s very dangerous to have me around...”

“Mhm...”

“Could you... Could you take me back home to the castle?”

“I’m not going back on what I said. I’ll bring you back home. You can beary much count on that.”

Shu’s reply came quickly and without any hesitation.

He understood that she was a princess and suspected that there was something more to it than that, but he still declared that he would take the girl back home.

[Quest Received: Escort — Theresia C. Altar, Difficulty 7.]

[Confirm the quest details in the quest window.]

Thus, a message announced the start of a quest.

◇◆◇

???

“...Odd.”

“What is it, Dormouse?”

“There’s something strange about the movement of Resources around Noz Forest.”

“Noz Forest? Speaking of which, I just had to set the difficulty for a strange quest over there.”

“A strange quest?”

“A quest to escort the kidnapped third princess to the castle. I set the difficulty to 7, since the kidnapper is still in the zone and a fierce UBM currently roams the area.”

“Hm...”

“Are you curious?”

“Mhm. I will check on it. Perhaps...I will find the one we are looking for.”

◇◆

That incident would come to be known as the Third Princess’s Kidnapping.

It was the first meeting between Theresia and those who would eventually learn her secret.

The kidnapper, who would later be dubbed King of Crime, Sechs Würfel.

The savior, who would come to be called King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

And the control AI who would be tasked to stay by her side and protect her, Dormouse.

This was the beginning of an important series of events that created a number of strange connections between people, some of them completely unrelated to The Evil at the center of it all.

Chapter Twenty-Five: The Incarnation of Maelstroms

About him...

Morter Cortana was born to a distinguished family in Caldina.

One day, though, his parents both died and he was separated from his sister, quickly bringing his smooth and easy life to a screeching halt.

He was forced to join a gang of thieving street urchins in order to survive, and his life quickly became one of crime. He continued stealing even after he grew up and found legitimate employment, and after he got his Superior Job, he took to making a living by hunting treasure hunters in ruins.

Not even he himself fully understood why he went down this path.

Perhaps, as someone who once had everything but had lost it all, he had some negative emotions towards those who were in the opposite situation — those who started with nothing and gained a great deal.

Regardless, this way of life had led to his defeat at the hands of Rascal and eventually, his transformation into an Idea.

And now, he was facing a creature no one should ever have to face.

In this situation, he couldn't help but wonder why his life was going so wrong.

◆◆◆

Royal Castle, Fourth Floor

After hearing the final warning, Morter reached the greatest depths of despair. His own cells told him that Theresia wasn't joking; everything would be over for him if he didn't turn back.

If it had been possible, he would've fled already. The reason he was panicking now was that he found he couldn't.

Ahh...damn it... Why is this happening...? His life began to flash before his eyes in disjointed moments... The moment he chose to become an Idea, the moment he attacked the sub-leader of I.F., the time period where he made his living assaulting treasure hunters, the time he lived among the criminal street urchins, the time he lost all his worldly possessions and was left alone....

Damn it...! Why is my life so...! He lamented the many bad choices he'd made at all of the most critical moments in his life.

However, this moment was different. Right now, it was like the time it all began to go wrong for him — the very instant when he had lost everything he had.

Here, in this moment, Morter didn't even have the right to choose.

"I can't back down...even if I want to..."

"Hm?"

"My body won't respect my desire." He spoke the truth — he was being forced to do something against his will. "There's an Embryo...in my body. If I go against my orders...my body will...damn it!"

While he spoke, his body began to act on its own.

"Damn it! La Crima, you...!" This was accomplished by the piece of La Crima's Embryo implanted inside of him. What he just revealed was meant to be a secret, and Idea decided that Morter had violated his orders enough to justify taking control of his body.

And, with movements far less precise than his natural ones, the Embryo made Morter's body charge towards this overwhelming force.

Even a moth flying directly into a flame would have higher chances of survival than him.

"I don't wanna die...! Not like...not like this...!" Vespertilio screamed as Idea forced him to attack something he could never hope to defeat.

Theresia looked at him with emotionless eyes before suddenly putting her hands together.

A moment later, giant arms sprouted from the floor at an incredible speed and moved in sync with her movements to crush Morter.

"Ghuh..." His body was shattered and immobilized, but he was still alive.

"...Dear me. I'm even stronger than before. My level really is growing."

The damage done was greater than Theresia expected, and this seemed to trouble her.

The stone arms that grew from the ground were her dependents — the monsters just like the ones Morter had fought earlier.

However, while those had appeared automatically as a response to danger, these were deliberately created by Theresia, making them far faster and more precise.

In fact, they would even be a match for Legendary-tier creatures.

The attack itself turned out to be overkill, but what mattered was that it stopped Morter's body from moving.

"Dor." She said only a single word, but Dormouse instantly understood what she wanted and brought her closer to Morter.

Theresia then slowly reached towards him...

"...This must be it."

...and tore out the piece of Idea from his body.

"Ah...?!" Shock appeared on Morter's dying face. Theresia had just taken the Idea that had been completely merged with his body right out of him, as easily as plucking a caterpillar from a leaf.

Ignoring him, Theresia then took the starfish-like creature in hand...and crushed it like a piece of fruit.

"Huh...? Ah..."

At that moment, Morter was set free.

However, before he could rejoice, an overwhelming pain assaulted his body.

"Gh... AAAAAAHHHHHHHHH...?!"

"...I took it away. Can you leave now?" Theresia asked casually.

"Theresia. He and that Embryo were linked. Obviously, if you take it out of him, he's going to fall apart. It's like opening a huge hole inside his body."

"Oh. That makes sense. Sorry. I didn't realize."

Theresia apologized, but Morter was in no state to even acknowledge it.

"With the Embryo gone, I can finish him off," said Dormouse. "That will minimize the Resource absorption... Hm...? Is there something on your mind?"

"...So he needs something to bind him together?"

"Indeed."

"Dor. I have an idea."

"Hm?"

"Remember the insurance we talked about? It would be difficult with just us, would it not?"

"Well, mostly because my avatar is not humanoid."

"That is why I believe we need an adult. Shu knows about us, but we cannot rely on him more than necessary."

"I do think that he would help if asked."

"...That is the problem. I need to prepare."

"Prepare...? Do you actually intend to do it?"

"Is it possible?"

"...If you believe it is."

"Thank you." On the brink of death, Morter couldn't hear most of what they were saying.

"Hey, you," Theresia said as she looked him in the eyes. "If given a choice between dying here and now or giving up your humanity...which would you pick?"

That was a choice much like the one he'd been given back then.

Morter's response was quick.

◇◆

Once the choice was made, only Theresia and Dormouse were left in the room.

"He has been taken care of. I suppose I should go meet up with Liliana now. She's looking for me." Though there was still no emotion on her face, she did give the impression that she'd done away with something troublesome.

She knew that Liliana was looking for her, but if Theresia was with someone during such an emergency, Dependent Transformation could lead to them finding out what she was — or even worse, it might hurt someone. That was why Theresia had run off on her own — if you didn't count Dormouse, anyway. Liliana was her elder sister's friend and her friend's elder sister, so Theresia really didn't want her to die.

Though she'd been found out by Morter, she was able to silence him.

"Theresia, there is something I must ask," said Dormouse.

"What is it?"

"Why did you reveal your secret to him?" Even though she'd gone on to silence him, Theresia had told him what she was of her own accord. The important words were filtered, but the information Morter had heard was enough to fully expose her if he brought it back to a person who was actively looking for The Evil.

The many twists and turns of her life so far had led to her beginning to awaken as The Evil, but thanks to Shu and Dormouse, she was still able to live on as the third princess.

However, what she had done just now...was almost destroy the last thing that allowed her to be herself.

She'd told Dormouse not to do or say anything, but when Theresia had begun to explain the situation, he was actually fairly perplexed.

In response to his reasonable question, Theresia said, all without changing her emotionless expression, "Some people can see through lies even without Truth Discernment. That is why it is best to just be honest. And there was a chance that the man would retreat upon gaining the necessary information, which would have been acceptable in its own right."

"What do you mean?"

"That would have given me the time I needed to run far, far away. I am immune to your colleagues' abilities, so I can only move by walking. If I am to run, I need the time."

"Time to run?"

"Tell me, Dor — what is the worst-case scenario for me and for your group?"

"...The activation of the GAME OVER."

"Exactly. Preventing that is more important than my current lifestyle or even my life itself. Nothing would be worse than me becoming complete and that thing awakening. However, that is not directly linked to whether or not my secret is known."

"Hm...?"

"Even if someone finds out that I am ■■■ ■■■■ (The Evil), I can simply leave Altar and hide somewhere else. As long as you are with me, we do not need the barrier to slow down ■■■■■■■■ ■■■■■■■■■■ (Resource absorption). And as long as we are not facing Masters or Embryos, you would also deal with any dangers that came along, would you not? Your most important task is to prevent that thing from awakening until your goal is fulfilled."

Dormouse saw Theresia’s point. With The Evil’s masking function, she would be fully protected from search-oriented job skills, and with information organizations like DIN belonging to the control AIs, they could easily find a good destination to escape to.

“I feel like the idea relies too much on me personally, but...are you certain about this?” Dormouse asked. Could Theresia truly abandon the country and family she’d grown up with?

“I am. I believe it would be better for both sides,” she replied, her expression determined.

Dormouse didn’t really understand whom she meant by “both sides,” but chose not to ask.

“...Well, now I’m glad it did not have to happen,” he said. Theresia was able to silence Morter, so the truth regarding her was safe.

“As am I... Though, it does seem like the time is close.”

“Indeed. Someone is looking for The Evil, so the limit is no doubt drawing near.”

“Here in Altar, the menace of ■■■ ■■■■ (The Evil) is seen as a thing of the distant past, but it seems that it is not so everywhere. Or perhaps we’re simply seeing our first High-End tian in centuries. The extremely talented High-Ends are provided information regarding us and even ■■■ ■■■■■■ (The Demise) by the Archetype System...the job-managing system itself. It would not be unexpected if they were to try to find and kill me.”

“The world is full of those who do things they should not.”

“You were the ones doing just that until the time of my last predecessor, were you not?”

“...I cannot deny that. I am ashamed,” Dormouse said, glancing down. With their makeshift solution of getting The Evils killed whenever they were discovered, the control AIs had only made The Evils grow in strength at a faster rate than normal.

“I am not angry. I feel bad for my predecessors, but it is you and your colleagues I have to thank for being able to live as I am.”

“...It is good to hear that the measures we took are effective. Though, it is regrettable that we did not find you before release.”

“We met after I encountered Shu and Sechs, after all.”

“...Having welcomed the Masters from Earth, we are now one...no, perhaps two steps away from fulfilling our ultimate goal. It would be especially troubling to get a game over now.”

Though it didn’t show on his hamster-like face, Dormouse’s tone made it clear that he was deeply troubled.

A moment later, he seemed to remember something and said, “I can imagine a certain someone saying ‘Online games can be shut down, but they don’t have game overs.’”

“‘A certain someone?’”

“...Oh, never mind.” Dormouse simply ended the brief exchange, and Theresia didn’t push him to keep talking.

“We were lucky this time,” he said instead. “We faced a unique kind of opponent and ended the exchange without much issue.”

If they faced tians, monsters, or mechanical weapons, they could’ve silenced them by simply destroying them, just as Tom had done in the ruins when he’d destroyed Prism Soldiers.

They also had special means of dealing with Masters, as well.

However, a tian-Embryo hybrid was a unique case that had caught them off guard. In light of that, the final outcome was actually fairly positive.

“...Duchess, are there any Masters who saw the fight or heard what was said?” Dormouse addressed those words to someone who wasn’t there.

[No...there weren’t. As far as...I can observe...there are no Masters...who acquired any knowledge...of the happenings...conversations...or phenomena...that happened there... The Embryo fragment also...wasn’t constantly linked...to the main unit.]

The response came to him in the form of a window that suddenly popped up in front of his eyes.

“That is good to hear.” The message had been from control AI no. 7, Duchess, who was responsible for the vision of all Masters as well as information windows. She was the entity tasked with implementing whichever of the three visual styles the Masters chose while also processing the information they saw or heard, as well as assisting the control AIs in managing the situation.

By Dormouse’s request, she was now focused on the Masters in Altea so she could tell him if any of them were close to discovering Theresia’s secret.

If she said that none of them were aware of what happened here, it could only be the truth.

“...If you have such a surveillance network, could you not have used it to prevent this attack from happening in the first place?” Theresia asked.

“We are prevented from limiting the freedom of Masters, and Duchess’s observation network is not that thorough. Most of her processing power is dedicated to producing the visuals, so she cannot gather information from too many people on top of that.”

This begged the question of how much counted as “not too many people” by his standards, but Theresia once again realized that even the godlike observers of Infinite Dendrogram had their limitations.

“Well, you also could not eliminate the person we just dealt with... You seem to have some truly inconvenient restrictions.”

“The control AIs that have the right to attack Embryos and Masters are few. In fact, we have a colleague who must be restricted in this way even if it means restricting us, as well,” Dormouse said, recalling the most short-tempered and aggressive control AI.

Theresia said nothing in response. They had a lot of information, but not all of it, and though they had authority, they had limitations, making their measures less than perfect. In her eyes, this made the control AIs seem less like machines and more like living beings.

[Dormouse...a moment...please.]

Suddenly, Duchess sent a new message.

“What is it?”

[One is coming...towards you... Oh...she’s preparing...to attack.]

“What?”

A moment later, the room they were in was blown away.

◇◆

“...Confirmed. The fusion reaction from ‘Absolute Dominion Over the Sky — Uranus’ has hit something.”

The speaker was the bandaged King of Thieves, Zeta, who stood on the roof above the fourth floor of the castle.

She had confirmed the signatures of three of the four Ideas she’d let loose upon the capital — Regina Apis, Aranea, and Vespertilio — had already been extinguished.

Claudiah’s request for Zeta went as such: “Indiscriminately attack any unusual persons in Altea and discover who has an odd reaction to these attacks. Eliminate them if possible; if not, stop attacking them and observe."

The target of the request was so vague that she'd entrusted the role to the Ideas.

She'd sent Vespertilio after the most unusual signature; the way that his own signature had vanished had struck Zeta as suspicious, so she stopped her search for Treasurebeast Orbs and chose to investigate instead.

She discovered the room where the fight had occurred, used information provided by Uranus to confirm that Vespertilio's opponent was still inside...and used her ultimate skill against them.

...Based on the fact that she said "if possible," she must be almost certain that the target cannot be killed, Zeta thought, reviewing the request. She hadn't been told what she would be dealing with, but she knew enough to understand that the target was either really strong or had some unique qualities.

There would be a problem if the one I attacked just now was the target and, in spite of her assumption, they actually died just now. If they completely vanished without showing any odd reactions to the attack, I would be unable to confirm if they were truly the target.

She worried that completing the task would be impossible then, but...

"...They're...alive?"

...unfortunately, the target withstood the immense heat Zeta had created.

The hellish fusion reaction that would kill any animal and evaporate any material hadn't been enough to kill the target.

However, Zeta couldn't figure out what kind of creature had survived her blast, for she saw nothing but a jet-black vortex.

◇◆

"A nuclear attack. How nostalgic. I have not felt one of those since the war all those years ago," Dormouse whispered from within the vortex, which completely drowned out his voice.

His form had completely changed. He was no longer the round, adorable creature with short limbs, but a dreadful beast straight out of a Japanese yokai picture scroll. His entire body was enveloped in a dark force field and he stood in the center of a surging vortex, a storm in which he was the eye.

The vortex had consumed all the heat and electromagnetic waves created by the nuclear fusion reaction.

That wasn’t all — it also quickly drained the surroundings of all warmth, freezing them at an incredible rate. Since it consumed even light coming from the outside, seeing what lay within the vortex was impossible.

It was as though it consumed all and any energy coming towards it.

Perched on Dormouse’s back, Theresia remained silent and expressionless.

Though she was just within a nuclear explosion, her safety mechanism hadn’t activated.

As The Evil, she wouldn’t have suffered any damage from it to begin with, but that wasn’t the reason why her defenses remained inactive — it was because she knew that there was no safer place than Dormouse’s back when he donned his black vortex.

[A message... The kingdom is winning...the battle at the border... It might...end soon... It’s possible...that the castle attackers...will also retreat...]

“That means that we only have to bear this a little while longer. The seventh form’s output should be enough for that. Though I have to suppress my body size, so this feels a bit cramped.”

Dormouse responded to Duchess and cracked a warped grin. He couldn’t have used this against a special case like Morter, but Masters were a different story.

“I cannot attack Masters, but there are no rules against protecting or hiding something from them.”

Thus, Dormouse went on the defensive.

Zeta tried to use her all-powerful Uranus to disperse the unidentified black vortex.

However, her efforts were futile.

He was control AI no. 8, tasked with dealing with hazards and someone who had eliminated countless Irregularities.

Consuming all heat energy, he was the being who stood above all in the art of extermination, as well as an impenetrable defense.

He was Type Infinite Fortress — Infinite Conversion, Schwarzer Tod.

◇◆

The Incarnations that had attacked the pre-ancient civilization two thousand years ago were beings far above what anyone had ever seen — even The Demise they'd brought down before was weak in comparison.

There was the Incarnation of Blasphemy, which created countless puppets that carried the power of their deceased champions.

There was the Incarnation of Scales, which turned creatures into dust and vice versa.

There was the Incarnation of Nature, which could bring forth calamities like plagues, heat waves, droughts, and cold snaps.

There was the Incarnation of Cages, which couldn't be reached or escaped.

There was the Incarnation of Dreams, which rid various creatures of their reality.

There was the Incarnation of Armaments, which used thousands upon thousands of Legendary weapons as though they were nothing.

There was the Incarnation of Influence, which rendered any and all tactics completely meaningless as though it could see the future.

There was the Incarnation of Seconds, which could instantly slice through anything regardless of speed or toughness.

There was the Incarnation of Beasts, which could multiply to the point that it was capable of covering the entire landscape in itself.

However, there were three Incarnations which were more feared than the others:

The Incarnation of Mortar, which could effortlessly grind entire mountain ranges.

The Incarnation of Evolution, which grew more powerful without limit the more it fought.

The Incarnation of Death, which simply had countless inconceivably powerful abilities at its disposal.

Those were twelve of the thirteen Incarnations besides the Extra-Continental Vessel.

The last one was the Incarnation of Maelstroms — Infinite Conversion, Schwarzer Tod.

It wasn't the strongest, toughest, or the most destructive among them.

It didn't have the greatest ability to destroy, nor did it have the greatest potential for use in war.

In terms of sheer battle capacity, it likely did not have a single area where it was not surpassed by another Incarnation.

But despite that, both the pre-ancient civilization and his fellow Incarnations alike believed that despite its relative lack of strength, the Incarnation of Maelstroms was no doubt the most troublesome of them all.

◇◆◇

Zeta was thoroughly troubled by the unexpectedly difficult opponent she had stumbled upon.

...Nothing I do is working, she thought. The room had been melted by Uranus's ultimate skill, yet the black vortex remained.

She tried firing air-bullets and using any weapons she had, but they all seemed to be negated by the vortex. Upon touching it, everything lost its kinetic energy and latent heat; they would stop, freeze, and fall to the floor as inert objects devoid of energy.

She tried to create a vacuum or poison gas within the vortex, but it was actually cutting off her very ability to control the air.

...This isn't even a case of bad compatibility. Compatibility meant nothing against an opponent that absorbed all energy and rendered it useless.

I suppose the only exception would be people with skills that can attack whoever's inside without interacting with the vortex at all. Curiously enough, Xunyu — whom Zeta had just defeated — was one of those people. It would have been difficult even for her, though. The slightest targeting mistake and her prosthetic limbs would touch the vortex, which would instantly consume them.

The vortex is a wall that completely separates the outside and the inside. Not even light or sound can reach through it... That means that they shouldn't be able to see me either.

Zeta guessed that the vortex remained stationary in the ruined room because whoever was creating it also could not see what was happening outside.

It seems to be a defensive barrier, but it's abnormally powerful. It seems like the energy-damping ability of the ocean element taken to an extreme, but I have never seen anything that drains energy to this extent.

The fact that it was able to negate the heat from Uranus's ultimate skill — a nuclear explosion — made it clear that it had enough power to match Superior Embryos.

Also, if it isn't damping the energy, but absorbing it...it's possible that they may also be able to repurpose the energy for some kind of attack. Zeta knew that she had to be wary of counter-attacks like the ones Ray Starling had used to defeat her pupil, Logan.

Also, it was clear that whatever this was had defeated Vespertilio Idea, meaning that it was immune to surprise attacks. That meant one couldn't be too careful.

Thus, for the time being, she chose to stop attacking and see what they would do next.

Besides the one about Morter, Zeta's assumptions were actually correct. This black vortex was actually Infinite Conversion's energy absorption ability, Infection Citadel.

Everything that touched it had all of its energy drained from it.

Fire would lose its heat, sound, and light, while anything living would lose its warmth, kinetic energy, and even the electrical impulses running through the nervous system. All energy-based attacks would be nullified, while all living beings who touched it would die. The energy absorbed would be used to maintain the skill and make it grow.

Resistance against it was not only futile — it made it grow stronger. There was nothing one could do against the approaching maelstrom. Like the Black Death, the wielder's namesake, this vortex was feared by countless beings all over.

However, that wasn't the full story of this creature. The energy absorption of Infection Citadel was actually related to its ultimate skill, Schwarzer Tod, which was as terrifying as the name suggested.

Dormouse, though, had no intention of using it this time.

To him, this was solely a defensive battle. He didn't have the right to attack Masters.

"The absorption has weakened. The attacker must have stopped to observe what we will do next."

While spreading Infection Citadel in every direction, Dormouse was unable to see what was happening outside, but he could still tell if he was being attacked based on the amount of energy he had left.

"Duchess. How is the situation...?"

[...King of Beasts...has stopped fighting... She's negotiating...with the High Priestess... King of Thieves...the one who's attacking you...has also stopped...]

Following the message, the window began showing him Zeta's perspective. He couldn't see outside the vortex himself, but he had Duchess conveying the situation to him.

Her ability didn't adhere to any ordinary laws of physics, so it wasn't blocked by the vortex. On their own, the control AIs had flaws, but their experience had taught them that most of them could be made up for through cooperation.

In fact, under normal circumstances, merely keeping up Infection Citadel would require copious amounts of energy.

It wouldn't be a problem if there was energy to absorb — but if there wasn't, he would have to use his own until there was nothing external left. While this wouldn't matter if he was using his original body, as an Infinite Embryo in his seventh form as he was now, he couldn't keep it up for long without an outside supply.

However, this flaw was irrelevant now. With most of the castle's barriers having been deactivated, more Resources were free to flow towards The Evil, but Dormouse was absorbing them and using them as energy for Infection Citadel.

As long as he kept the vortex up, Dormouse was akin to an impenetrable fortress for Theresia.

[However...the kingdom's...what was it, again...? The Royal Guard knightess...is coming closer... She's with...K&R Masters...that entered the castle...]

"Liliana is coming?" That's not good, Dormouse thought.

It was impossible to guess how she would react to this situation. There was the chance that her arrival would accelerate The Evil's awakening, so he wanted to deal with this situation before that happened.

The attacker is still observing us because their goal is to gather information, so it's possible that they will not leave until they find out exactly what we are... That would prolong this until Zeta chose to leave, and that was risky for him.

That was why he chose to, as an exception, rely on a fellow control AI.

"Duchess, are you able to use your Invitation to the Second World — Daydream? Even limited use of it would suffice."

[Yes. I can use it anytime...and on anyone.]

◇◆

Zeta had no means of breaking through the vortex-fortress before her.

...I'm just not good against these kinds of outliers, she thought. Uranus's control didn't extend to the inside of the vortex, and phenomena from the outside couldn't break through it. She considered covering the outside in a vacuum to suffocate whoever was within, but since she couldn't influence the inside, this could easily be countered by a simple inventory filled with air. Having such inventories was common practice in Granvaloa, and there was no way that someone with an omnidirectional, long-lasting defense ability wouldn't have prepared something similar.

Perhaps Zeta's skills as King of Thieves would've worked better than her Embryo abilities, but she couldn't use them without coming close to whoever was inside within the vortex. Merely extending her hand to touch them and take their heart would mean going through the vortex, and that was certain death.

She also had a third ace up her sleeve — the Superior MVP special reward, Moby Dick Left — but there was no viable way to employ it in this situation.

Zeta was well-rounded, but if nothing that she had worked, then that was it.

But if I retreat now, I would not have enough information for the task... I need to at least see their face...!

The moment she thought that, a part of the vortex vanished.

Perhaps from lack of energy, the dark maelstrom was undone, exposing the person within.

"Ah...!" Zeta didn't miss the opportunity to etch the person's appearance into her mind.

She also assumed an offensive stance and prepared to take out a camera, but before she could, the seam in the vortex was fixed, once again hiding the person from view.

...Was that a failure on their part or an intentional trap? That much isn't clear, but I now have enough to report.

There was no doubt that, as requested, she had discovered and confirmed the existence of a "strange person" inside that vortex. Perhaps I can retreat and focus on stealing the orbs again, she thought, when suddenly...

"Zeta. It's me."

...she heard her client — Claudiah — call to her through the comms device inside her bandages.

The fact that Claudiah had called her at all definitely indicated something, but since she couldn't ignore her, Zeta replied with, "Acknowledged. Since you are using this device, I assume that your efforts ended in failure?"

"Yes. We lost. What about you?"

"...Incomplete. As per your request, I have discovered the target and confirmed their identity, but elimination is proving difficult. I thought I'd finished them off, but it doesn't seem like any of my Embryo attacks are reaching them."

"Oh, so that really is how it works. I wanted to confirm that as well."

Hearing that, Zeta realized that Claudiah had made her request while fully aware that Zeta's attacks would be futile.

"What about your own goal? Were you able to steal them?"

Zeta had to stop herself from saying "I would've been well on my way to stealing them right now if you didn't call me." Instead, she said, "Rejection. I refuse to answer."

"I see." Despite having asked, Claudiah didn't seem to be terribly interested in the topic.

It was clear to Zeta that Claudiah cared mostly about the black vortex before her.

Though, the information Zeta had on the vortex wasn't quite what Claudiah had in mind when she'd made the request.

"Directive. Since elimination is impossible and your situation isn't favorable, I request that you give me a new order."

"We are moving on to plan C. Make the preparations we discussed and retreat from Altea."

Zeta had actually forgotten about that particular plan until Claudiah mentioned it. It was only meant to be executed if Dryfe lost at both the negotiations and the battle, so she had pushed it deep into a corner of her mind.

Zeta did remember what it entailed, however, so she readily agreed.

"Commencing. Present the reward using the designated method. That is when I will provide you with information on the target."

Zeta then cut the comm and faced the vortex again.

Anyhow, I am done with this. I'll execute plan C while moving underground. Perhaps the ones who have the orbs are taking shelter there.

She had her next job and her own goal. Thinking that she could still accomplish them both, she began to create distance between her and the vortex. Then, she quickly accelerated down the outer wall, following a path leading downwards.

Speaking of underground, that's where Ignis went. He seems to have done that by melting the bulkheads from the first floor, so maybe I should follow him...?

With that in mind, she proceeded along when suddenly, a chill ran down her spine.

Then, with a strange uneasiness in her heart, she took out a device given to her by La Crima — the one that displayed the status of the four Ideas.

Three of them were inactive, while the fourth one — Ignis Idea — was not only active, but becoming more active.

The body temperature data displayed was far too high even for a wielder of flame magic.

"Question. What is happening?"

Cold sweat soaked through her bandages as she realized that something unexpected was happening again.

◇◆

"...She seems to have retreated."

[Yes. She left...and went...underground... It doesn't seem like...she'll come back...]

Upon hearing Duchess's words, Dormouse canceled the vortex.

"I have not used Infection Citadel to its fullest for quite a while. That was tiring."

[...Tiring?]

"Apologies. I am fairly sure I am not nearly as tired as you are."

The apology was earnest. Duchess was tasked with the arduous duty of managing every Master's visuals. She had been operating at full capacity every waking hour for over four years now. Dormouse with his single battle couldn't even begin to compare.

"Dor," said Theresia. "I am aware that if Liliana finds us in a room that seems to have been a battlefield, explaining that to her would be difficult."

"We need to move to somewhere less destroyed. Duchess, lead the way so they do not find us before we arrive," said Dormouse.

However, Duchess didn't respond.

“Duchess, I truly am sorry for my careless words. Please forgive me.”

Dormouse apologized again...

[Dormouse...take The Evil...and leave Altea...immediately.]

...but in response, he got a warning, spoken with all possible urgency.

“...What happened?”

[...You don’t know? Ohh...you aren’t in the...control room... In that case...I will say it...]

And so, Duchess...

[In a few more minutes...

the castle will be...

blown apart.]

...announced an approaching calamity.

Chapter Twenty-Six: Supernova

Fire

While fighting Canglong, Ignis Idea...or rather, Feuer Lazburn, became certain that he could not win.

His long years of training and fighting as a Lazburn Pyromancer and his staggering defeat at the hands of the Arch Sage had given him enough experience to know that he would almost certainly die here.

It was only obvious. His fire couldn’t hurt Canglong — the Draconic Emperor would instantly regenerate even if the majority of his body was blown away.

In fact, it didn’t seem out of the question that he could come back even if he was reduced to a single scrap of dragon-flesh.

Canglong, on the other hand, had more than enough strength to bring about Feuer’s demise.

...How long will I last, I wonder? Half-giving up, he was buying time by firing spells at the people all around.

This couldn’t continue forever, though. The Altarians who could still walk were slowly helping the immobilized leave the area.

Once everyone Canglong had to protect was gone, he would be able to kill Feuer with little effort.

How did it come to this...? he wondered.

Why was he in a place like this, fighting such a foe?

He had yet to find the Arch Sage, whom he was sure was here in this castle, yet he was now facing an enemy who was likely even worse than him.

And now, he would die without having even encountered his target.

This was a battle he couldn’t win, nor could he retreat from it. The Idea-piece implanted in his body wouldn’t allow him to run. It was part of the contract that had given him his warped body and vast reserves of magic.

He wouldn’t have run even if he was able — retreating with such obscene amounts of magic at his disposal would have been a defeat in and of itself, the ultimate proof that he could not win even after exceeding his limitations.

For one who wanted to prove that Lazburn magic was strongest, retreating was not an option.

For what purpose did I...? Feuer Lazburn looked back at his life — or perhaps it was flashing before his eyes just like many others who were near death had experienced.

The many days of training, his father’s death, the fight against the Arch Sage, the heavy defeat by his hand, the days that followed, the contract with La Crima — it all passed him by in a brief moment that felt like an eternity...

“Hm...?”

...but it stopped when it reached the matter of his life’s goal.

At its core, this goal was simple — to prove that he was the strongest. Specifically, he wanted to show the world that no magic was greater than fire, and prove that the Lazburns, who dedicated their minds and bodies to fire magic alone, were the most powerful casters of all.

To that end, he and his father had made it their goal to defeat the Magical Apex — the Arch Sage.

However, his father expired before he could even challenge him, while Feuer himself had been effortlessly defeated.

Since then, he had been reborn and had once again attempted to seek out the Arch Sage in order to prove that he was the strongest.

Indeed — the Arch Sage’s defeat was nothing but a means to an end, not the end itself.

Feuer didn’t have to defeat him.

“Heh heh...ha ha ha ha ha ha ha!”

“Hm?” Feuer’s sudden laughter made Canglong and the Altarians who were still in the shelter stare at him with confusion in their eyes.

The laughter wasn’t a sign of the man losing his mind.

He was merely laughing at himself for taking this long to realize his error.

“I lived my whole life for the sole purpose of becoming the strongest and proving that fact.” Indeed — he had been misguided, mistaken...just plain wrong.

Perhaps Feuer was this way because his father was mistaken before him.

His final words might've carried more weight with Feuer than they had deserved.

The Lazburns' ultimate goal wasn't to defeat the Arch Sage.

Bringing down the Magical Apex was but a means to prove his own strength.

The Lazburns merely wanted to claim the Arch Sage's title as evidence of their absolute power.

That meant that he could achieve his goal of proving his power using other means.

This realization cleared his mind, in spite of his rapidly approaching demise.

"...What are you planning?" Canglong asked, confused by Feuer's change in demeanor.

To some, the Idea was now more fear-inspiring than he had been when he was firing flame spells in all directions, so Canglong couldn't help but ask this simple question.

In response, Feuer said, "The Parting Sea between Tenchi and Huang He, the great desert of Caldina... The wounds etched onto this very continent are evidence of the existence of those who inflicted them."

These words barely made sense at first, but it didn't take long for Canglong to realize their meaning.

The separation of Tenchi from the continent at the hands of the Incarnations, the exclusion zones created as a result of the fights between one of Canglong's predecessors and the King of Kings, the contaminated areas left behind by Huang He's civil war... Such scars on the land were there because those capable of creating them had actually done that.

They were evidence that those who held immense power had changed the very lay of the land.

So, what Feuer Lazburn intended was...

"I will use this land itself as proof... Proof that the strongest spellcaster of all was once here!"

...to prove his magic was strongest by using it to change the shape of this landscape beyond recognition.

Canglong approached, intent on stopping him — but before he could, Feuer's warped body began releasing waves of intense heat in all directions.

Hot enough to make people evaporate in an instant, these waves rushed towards the Altarians who had yet to escape.

"Kh...! Please, run...!" Canglong said before spreading out his Dragon King Aura.

This rendered him immobile, but it was the only way for him to prevent the Altarians from dying in an instant. The aura acted as a wall, protecting them as they rushed out of the shelter.

"All restrictions...abolished. Supercritical transformation...all magic into heat. Heat escalation...activate."

While Canglong was holding him off, Feuer began crafting his spell.

The magic unleashed thus far was only the beginning. The true spell would follow soon.

Or, more precisely, would be created soon.

What he was about to use was a spell he was crafting from scratch at this very moment.

"Exchange loss...cause is bodily structure...incinerating cells to enhance magic flow." He disregarded control in favor of pure power. Conjuring this spell even started to harm his own body.

This was a self-destructive effort, and it would surely wipe him out with it...but Feuer didn't care.

He had already realized that to achieve his true goal, his life was a small price to pay.

Did I want the glory and fame that came with proving that I am the Magical Apex? Did I want society to sing my praises after I defeated the Arch Sage? No. That certainly wasn't the case. His only goal in life was to prove he was the strongest; he didn't seek to live a life where he was revered for that.

The battle and his own feelings were all distant — all that mattered to him now was the culmination of his obsession.

"Question. Ignis, what are you d—?" Zeta, realizing that something was happening, tried to question him, only to be cut off.

"Be silent," Ignis said as he tore out the comms device in his ear, ripping out some of his own flesh in the process.

At this moment, he sought nothing but the spell he was crafting. His fixation on the Arch Sage and even the deal with La Crima had lost all meaning to him.

Once complete, this spell he was creating would destroy the castle, scorch the capital, and render the entire area a wasteland of molten ruins.

"Ha ha ha ha! HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA!" The Lazburns sought nothing more in life than firepower, so his very blood was set ablaze by the mere thought of the magical might he would soon exhibit. He couldn't help but laugh.

One of his four arms fell to the floor. The brains implanted in his body, which provided his magical power reserves, were boiling. Even the Idea-fragment couldn't withstand the heat and died.

The very cells of his face began to melt, his vision washed red, his eardrums burst; the collapse of his already barely stable body was fast approaching.

None of that is of any consequence now. All that matters is that I cast this final spell.

He didn't care what he would lose. His life was already fleeting. Dying a bit sooner meant nothing.

He would construct this spell even if he gave all that he had to give.

"This will be the last spell of my life, and it will incinerate the entire capital."

This would be King of Blaze's new final attack, never before seen or heard of.

◇◇◇

About the dragons of the east...

Draconic Emperor, Canglong Renyue, had no recollection of his birth.

Just like anyone else, he had no memories of the time when he was still a baby. Even being the Draconic Emperor didn't change that.

His earliest memory was a moment where his vision was completely drowned in red.

He didn't even know what it was he had seen — he didn't understand the meaning of the color.

When he grew old enough to understand the world around him, he realized that he was being shunned by his siblings and father.

Even in the Imperial Court, the fact that he was the Draconic Emperor was kept secret. The only ones who knew were the emperor, his children, and a few of the closest aides.

The clueless retainers gave Canglong the respect a third prince deserved, while the nursing mother who'd raised him treated him well despite knowing what he truly was.

However, his family was different. They almost seemed to look at him like he was their enemy.

Canglong didn't understand why. He had been taught that Draconic Emperor was a Special Superior Job that, to Huang He, matched or perhaps even surpassed the emperor himself in importance.

That was why, one day after he had matured enough to wonder this, Canglong approached his father and asked him directly, "Why do you shun me?"

What he saw next was the emperor's face twisting into an expression Canglong had never seen him make before throwing his fist at the boy.

Because of the insurmountable gap in stats between the two of them, only the emperor himself was injured.

Despite that, he — Canglong's own father — had attacked him.

Then, as though to release everything he had been keeping inside until now, he screamed, "Because you took the life of my beloved!"

At first, Canglong almost saw his point, but then became confused.

He knew that his mother died while giving birth to him. However, it wasn't unheard of for mothers to die during childbirth.

Canglong did understand that the treatment of children born in such circumstances could vary, but it didn't seem like enough of a reason for the emperor to loathe him as he did. The man had never shown even a hint of love for Canglong.

The emperor's attitude towards Canglong was far, far different from how anyone might expect a parent to treat their child. Rather than his own son, the emperor treated Canglong like a callous murderer who had brutally slaughtered the person he'd cherished most in the world.

"...Ah."

And just like that, Canglong found the answer.

His mother had died at the moment of his — or rather, the Draconic Emperor's — birth.

Draconic Emperors inherited the levels of their predecessors, granting them stats that far exceeded even those of specialized Superior Jobs from the moment of their birth.

That was both the cause of the emperor's rage and the answer to Canglong's question.

Canglong's mother didn't die from a fever or any other common risk of childbirth — he had actually torn her apart.

While still inside his mother's womb, the baby Draconic Emperor had struggled and writhed...and in the process, his excessive power had destroyed her.

That was the reason why his father and his siblings shunned him so.

They might have even seen the infant Canglong tear the emperor's wife — his children's mother — to shreds. That would have been reason enough to make them loathe the sight of him.

Not even human, Canglong was an Irregularity — a monstrous creature since birth.

But at the same time, he was also a symbol of Huang He and the strongest being in the country, making it impossible to get rid of him even if they wanted to.

They must've been bottling up their rage for quite some time, and Canglong's careless question had set his father off.

For all he knew, the emperor might've attacked him fully prepared to die, thinking that this monstrous being who'd taken his wife would now take him too.

However, the emperor was Canglong's father, whom he didn't have the slightest intention of killing.

He also hadn't intended to kill his mother merely by being born, but he had done it regardless.

On that day, however, neither Canglong nor the emperor died.

However, Canglong's relationship with his family became unsalvageable.

After that moment, Canglong continued life as both a prince and the Draconic Emperor. He participated in festivals and ceremonies in his warped, dragon-like form with his face hidden behind a mask. He also received education befitting a prince and fulfilled his duties as such.

However, he never once spent any time with his family.

Canglong had "siblings" who were raised alongside him and nursed by the same mother, but his blood relatives completely stopped interacting with him the day after his father struck him.

There was no violence between them, but nor were there any words. Their relationship never went beyond the bare minimum conversations required for official purposes.

Canglong also made no effort to interact with them in return. Since his power was so vast, he believed that he could unwittingly kill them just as he'd killed his mother.

If it weren't for the nursing mother who'd raised him well in spite of knowing what he was, or Meihai who looked out for him while unaware of his secret, he might never have grown to know love and friendship.

However, he was terrified of even touching them.

The only times he allowed himself to touch anyone without reserve were during the duels that were protected by the barriers.

He'd dueled to prove the power of the imperial family and the Draconic Emperor. The arenas, where anyone who was broken would emerge unscathed, were the only places a born monster like him wouldn't kill anyone.

He had a robust stature and a dragon-like appearance, so when his face was hidden by the mask, no one could tell that he was the young third prince of Huang He.

By fighting in the duels again and again, he effortlessly became the duel champion of Huang He, showing everyone the glory of the imperial family and the power of the empire's great symbol.

However, his family never once praised him for any of that.

Through his duels, he even learned to control his power, but he still made no attempt to touch anyone.

One day, he read the letter left for him by Honglong Renchao — the Draconic Emperor that had come before him.

The text gave Canglong the impression that his predecessor had known what would become of him. He even guessed that Honglong had perhaps gone through something similar himself.

The letter said, "Do not be bound by your sins," but Canglong felt that that would be difficult.

The sin of matricide bound his life like a chain.

However, his life changed somewhat when many more Masters began appearing in the world.

Masters were immortal beings bearing unique powers — the kin of The Lynx that one of his predecessors had faced.

For the first time, he began to meet abnormal entities besides himself, and in great numbers.

Eventually, he dueled one such abnormality — Xunyu.

Canglong won, of course, but it was the first time he'd ever met anyone who could compete with him — someone he could treat as an equal.

Because of that, he quickly became attached to this particular Master, for he had always wanted an adult who would coddle him like the little boy he was.

That only made it all the more shocking, though, when he learned that Xunyu was actually a girl about his age.

In this year, Canglong's father, the emperor, gave him an official order to travel to Altar and meet the girl he would most likely have to marry.

Canglong didn't understand why he picked the shunned son instead of one of his brothers for the marriage, but he had no intention of refusing either.

To hide his true form and power while in foreign territory, he picked an appropriate Treasurebeast Orb left behind by one of his predecessors, defeated the UBM inside, and assumed the form of a powerless child.

Then, with Xunyu as a bodyguard, he went to the kingdom.

He then caught the local epidemic, but things had gone smoothly otherwise.

And not too long ago, he had met his fiancée, Elizabeth, for the first time.

She was a naive, simple girl who smiled and laughed a lot. He was a prince, and she a princess, yet he couldn't help but feel that despite their similar positions, they were vastly different.

Her smile, however, had vanished — and he was the cause.

Elizabeth's sister had told her that she would have to marry Canglong and move to Huang He.

Part of the reason why the sister had resolved to do this was to protect Elizabeth from the flames of war that could soon engulf the kingdom.

But Elizabeth stood against it. She didn't want to flee Altar and leave her sisters behind.

The sisters argued, but any onlookers would know that they did so because they all wanted what was best for each other.

Canglong quickly understood that this was the difference between them — the existence of a loving family.

He had no family he loved or family that loved him. The relationship the princesses had was dazzling to him, and it hurt his heart that he'd caused them to argue...and because he would ultimately take Elizabeth away to the loveless court of Huang He.

That was why, on the morning that followed, he visited Elizabeth and apologized.

The very same day, thanks to Xunyu's planning, the two went on a Love-Duel Festival date. This came as a surprise to him, but it was true that he wanted to learn more about Elizabeth, so he didn't refuse it.

The two walked through the lively city of Gideon until they found a festival stall selling various masks.

One of those masks was made to look like the Zifu Longmian he usually wore.

His masks were created by forcing magic into metal to change its shape, so the crafted mask in the stall actually looked more presentable than the ones he crafted for himself.

"Did you find something, Canglong? Hm... That one is a bit scary." Upon hearing that, Canglong didn't know what to say. If even the mask meant to hide his warped face was scary to her, what would she think of his actual face? Would she be able to accept him?

He also wondered if it was right for him to take her as a wife and bring her back to Huang He without revealing how monstrous he truly was.

But at the same time, he couldn't deny that he was more and more drawn to this incredible girl.

During the date, he became exhausted and had to rest.

Normally, the very idea of him running out of stamina would be absurd, but the Self-Sealing Wraps he was wearing had given him the attributes of an ordinary child.

During this break, however, Elizabeth had noticed the Self-Sealing Wraps underneath his clothes.

"Are you hurt or sick?"

"...I suppose you may call it an illness. These bandages are a measure to hold back a certain handicap I was born with."

It wasn't exactly a lie.

The bandages were there to seal away the power of the Draconic Emperor — the handicap preventing him from living as a human.

Canglong had never once been glad to be born as he was — the revered and blessed job was a burden to him.

"...I'm sorry," Canglong apologized. "I didn't mean to let you see something so unsightly."

"Don't apologize! What's so unsightly about that?! So what if you were born with an illness?! If you think that bothers me, you're sorely mistaken!" Hearing that made Canglong's heart ache, for he realized that Elizabeth wouldn't find him unsightly even if he had suffered from some kind of sickness.

It made him hope that he could reveal himself and she would accept him as he was.

However, he still hesitated enough to stop himself from telling the truth.

Elizabeth then told him how she felt about her sisters and that if it meant protecting them, she would readily leave for Huang He.

But before she could promise that, Canglong asked for a postponement. He felt that he also needed to gather the resolve to tell her the truth.

The truth that he was the monstrous being known as the Draconic Emperor.

◇

And now, tongues of flame had engulfed the both of them, forcing Canglong to reveal his true nature before he could properly tell her.

He was still frightened of Elizabeth finding out what kind of abomination he was. However, he hadn't hesitated to reveal himself, nor did he regret doing it — for it was the only way to protect her.

"Protect what you wish to protect."

"Accomplish what you believe you must."

"Do not be afraid to do as you will."

The words left behind by his predecessor came back to him as he resolved to protect and fight for the girl that had captured his heart.

◇◇◇

Royal Castle, Underground Shelter

As Feuer crafted his spell, the flames grew ever stronger.

Their heat began to overcome even Canglong's Dragon King Aura and reach his scales.

Such magic and heat... There will be an explosion even if he dies now...! Canglong thought. The spell's activation and the explosion caused by the caster's death were the exact same thing.

If that volume of heat was released, the entire shelter would melt in a split second. Not even those who fled would survive. The heat waves were so intense that they would instantly kill even someone equipped with a Brooch.

The castle, as well as Altea as a whole, would be absolutely devastated by this heat.

To prevent that, Canglong had only two options — either he could take Feuer somewhere else or somehow dampen the heat that was being released.

The former wasn't possible because they were deep underground, but the latter also held its own problems.

Will my Dragon King Aura be enough...? Canglong wondered. The legendary Draconic Emperor that had come before his predecessor had possessed countless techniques he could use to counter this situation, but the techniques had died with him. Neither Honglong that came after him, nor Canglong, the title's current holder, could use them.

The most he could do with his latent Dragon King Aura was to stop the preliminary heat waves.

Because of his Gulong Cells skill, the Draconic Emperor himself could focus on defense and survive even if he was at the heart of the explosion, but everyone else would die.

If I do not prevent this, then the city...and Elizabeth would...!

There were limits, but he had to surpass them.

...I will transform my life force into magic to enhance my Dragon King Aura.

He resolved to do this, even if it cost him his life.

Ready and prepared, he faced the burning Idea — when suddenly...

"Ah...!"

...he felt a presence behind him. Most of the people had already left the shelter, but there was still one person behind him.

"Cang..."

It was the very girl he wanted to protect more than anyone else.

"Elizabeth! Why are you still here?!" Despite his Dragon King Aura, the heat in the surroundings was growing ever higher. It wouldn't take long for it to become powerful enough to incinerate someone — even before the explosion actually occurred.

Despite that, Elizabeth was standing behind him.

"Cang...run away with us!" Those words were enough for him to understand that she'd returned because she was worried about him, left alone in the flames.

She was concerned about Canglong, even after seeing him exposed as the monstrous entity that he was.

That fact almost made his heart waver, but he kept it steady by clenching his teeth.

He then took off his mask and looked at her.

Neither human nor dragon — his was a face as distorted as that of the Idea he was fighting.

And he was now baring it to her.

"I am the Draconic Emperor...an abomination," he said. "This is what I am — nothing like you. So please, run..."

His words were those of rejection...

"You are not an abomination!"

...but they were rejected in turn.

She raised her voice as though to blow away his self-loathing and low opinion of himself.

"You are my friend..." she said. Draconic Emperor or not, they were still friends. "You are also my fiancé... And you will be my family!"

Shock overcame Canglong. She just said that, in spite of it all, she still saw him as one she would spend her life with.

"So, please...! There are still so many things...I want to talk to you about...and ask! So...please...! Let us..." Whether it was due to the feelings in her heart or the fear of the oncoming flames, she was crying too much to finish her sentence properly.

However, he clearly heard her say, "Let us live together."

It didn't need to be voiced to reach him.

In silence, Canglong looked away from her and put on the mask again.

As he did, a tear running down his cheek disappeared in the coming heat. However, in his heart, there was now something that could never vanish.

“Your Highness! Your Highness Elizabeth!” Marquis Findle cried as he rushed into the shelter. Upon seeing the princess, he rushed to her and took her in his remaining arm.

“Marquis Findle, take care of Elizabeth.”

“...Of course!” Canglong entrusted Elizabeth to the man and faced the flame once more.

“Cang...!” Elizabeth called.

“...I will come back to you. So please, leave this to me.”

“...Very well!” With that promise made, he listened to them leave behind him.

As the sound of them going up the steps faded, he began to speak.

“...King of Blaze.” He was talking to Feuer Lazburn — the Idea slowly turning into a roiling mass of flame. “Up until moments ago, I intended to stop you even if it cost me my life.”

Canglong had planned to subdue the explosion using all his magic as well as his own life force.

“I would never do that now. I cannot give you my life. It belongs to her. I will stop your flames and keep myself alive. I apologize if that seems greedy, but I cannot give up on anything!”

He was now resolved to protect his life...for the sake of the promise he’d made to the one he loved and their future together.

“That...is what I have decided!”

With that, he faced the all-consuming flame of destruction.

The fire said nothing in response. With his eyes and ears gone, he probably hadn’t even heard what Canglong had said.

However, he felt something, and it was enough for him to warp his nearly destroyed mouth into a grin and...

“Supernova.”

...speak the name of the completed final attack.

Supernova was the pinnacle of fire magic — a school focused on turning magic into pure heat.

It was in many ways the direct opposite of the ultimate job skill of King of Blaze, Fixed Star.

While Fixed Star was focused on concentrating and controlling immense amounts of magic to create an all-melting orb of fire, Supernova had no such concentration or control.

None of the magic used was directed towards managing the power involved, and since the MP needed to manage spells was proportional to the MP used by the spell itself, this allowed him to release all of his magic at once.

Since there was no control, the vast amount of magic that would normally be used for that purpose would all become heat instead.

Indeed — Supernova was nothing but a skill that merely put layer upon layer of heat escalation and then released it all. It was omnidirectional and indiscriminate, harming even the user.

It was a self-destruct skill, and that was exactly what made it impossible to deal with.

Feuer now had absurd amounts of magic even compared to Superior Jobs, and since he was converting it all into heat...stopping him was impossible.

Canglong himself knew that well.

Despite that, he hadn't given up. To do so would be to give up on his own life and that of his beloved. Even if it took him past his limits, he would protect everything he could.

After Canglong gathered his resolve, Feuer activated his final attack, turning him into what looked like a human-sized sun.

A moment later, heat that turned everything into ash before evaporating even that began to push in all directions.

If it was released, it would not only scorch the passage Elizabeth was in, but also turn the entire city into a burning hell.

"OOAAAGHH!"

Thus, Canglong gave his all to spread out his Dragon King Aura and enhance its mitigating effect. The effort was such that it affected even his gulong body.

He released vast amounts of Dragon King Aura in order to envelop Feuer and his exploding flames.

The heat and the aura clashed, sending the temperature around them roaring up to three thousand degrees Celsius. The shelter now looked like the inside of a furnace, but thanks to the Dragon King Aura, the effect was mostly confined to the immediate area.

"Gh...!" Smoke began to rise from Canglong's scales and flesh, but he didn't weaken his aura one bit.

His fight against the heat was like sealing away a small star. Even the Draconic Emperor's absurd power was pushed to the limits with this task.

He threw his hands, along with the Dragon King Aura, right towards the heat, suppressing it.

The knowledge that weakening his aura could mean his beloved's death stopped him from even thinking of doing so.

He was immovable, but the coming heat was unstoppable. It was still anyone's battle.

"Ah...!" At the core of the heat he was suppressing, the sun-like orb was growing more luminous...and larger.

Despite the immense heat, the sight sent a chill down his spine.

Even this immense heat was only the beginning...? Like an earthquake, there were fast, weaker advance waves, followed by intense, slower waves.

The weak waves so far already carried more heat than the Fixed Star Rain that had melted Golem Bellcross. The heat of the true Supernova was far above what Canglong had expected.

"Even so...!"

Even so, he wouldn't run or move, for he had to push this heat back.

He was the Draconic Emperor — perhaps the strongest tian of these times — as well as a boy who had found a girl he loved.

Thus, he resolved to stay here and continue subduing the heat.

Would Canglong burn first, or would the overflowing heat consume the castle and the city while he still stood?

Or perhaps there would be some miracle that would let him claim victory?

It was as though his fate depended on a dice roll by some heavenly observers far greater than even him...

"Need a hand?"

...but then someone else came, taking the dice in their own hand.

A person was standing in this furnace-like space, talking to Canglong.

He had no idea how long they had been there, but someone was right behind him.

The presence of a person in this room that he'd thought contained only him and the flame filled Canglong with shock.

The person asking that question seemed to have appeared from thin air.

"Oh wait. 'Need a hand?' isn't the right thing to say in this case. I don't want this castle blown away, so I won't accept your refusal. 'Please let me help' is more apt. Neither you alone nor I alone are capable of dealing with this magic anyway."

The unfamiliar voice belonged to a young woman, but Canglong didn't even have the capacity to ask her who she was.

This space would instantly burn any normal person to death. Yet she appeared here as though she'd planned it — which she had — and talked to Canglong with an unfittingly casual tone.

"Oh, if you don't mind me saying, the Dragon King Aura you're using now isn't suited to phenomena like this. The standard Dragon King Aura is a defensive function that mitigates both physical and magic attacks. If you're using it against a single phenomenon, the magic-mitigation effectiveness isn't that great. With something like this, it would be more effective to use an aura focused solely on heat mitigation. I would like you to shift to that, please."

"Huh?" Not only was she speaking casually — she sounded like a laid-back professor.

"Ohh. Well, one of your predecessors was...apparently very good at such fine-tuning of the aura, but you aren't at that level, I assume? Sorry for demanding something you can't deliver. Oh, and sorry for giving you a lecture before even introducing myself. You are the current Draconic Emperor... 'Prince Canglong,' was it? Sorry if I seem rude. Unfortunately, back when I was a girl, I swore that I wouldn't use polite language with anyone but my late teacher. I do keep my letters formal sometimes, but I'm actually quite stubborn about this."

Canglong was on the verge of just directly asking what she was, and the woman could sense that.

In response, smiling in spite of the situation, she said, "Ha ha hah! You must wonder who I am. Well, I'm basically the one King of Blaze was looking for."

"Ah...!" Shock overcame Canglong. He could scarcely believe it.

"Though, with his eyes and ears melted, I don't think he even has the ability to acknowledge me. Still, here’s an introduction.”

The person faced the Draconic Emperor — as well as Feuer behind him.

“I am the one who inherited everything from my teacher.” She then folded her arms, put a finger over the rim of her monocle, and said...

“Arch Sage, Integra.”

Chapter Twenty-Seven: A Life of Fire

Royal Castle, Fourth Floor

“...Now this is truly troublesome.”

It was the moment after Feuer Lazburn had activated Supernova. Upon hearing that it was possible that the explosion underground could blow away the entire capital, Dormouse prepared to take Theresia away from the site of the blast.

Infection Citadel could absorb the great amounts of Supernova’s heat and protect Theresia, but if she was found unscathed within a crater left by an explosion that obliterated the city, it would become far too difficult for them to operate in the future.

If Dormouse went there to stop the explosion from even happening, the same questions would arise.

That meant that Duchess’s suggestion — running away from the explosion — was the most reasonable one, and he intended to follow it.

“Wait, Dormouse. No need to evacuate. Stay where you are.”

However, he was stopped by another colleague addressing him.

It was Humpty Dumpty — the one in charge of Embryos. While Duchess used message windows, Humpty talked directly to Dormouse’s mind.

“What is your business, Dumpty? What do you mean there is no need to evacuate?”

“The signature of the Embryo within the tian who is trying to blow himself up has vanished. Now — at least in theory — he is nothing but a tian.”

“What does that matter?”

“Don’t you understand? A tian’s attack would work on The Evil, wouldn’t it?”

“Ah...! Humpty, you...!”

Dormouse instantly understood what Humpty intended. The Evil would no longer recognize Feuer Lazburn as a foreign entity, so she was suggesting that they should just let his explosion take Theresia.

Saying nothing, Dormouse thought of the girl sitting silently on his back.

If The Evil died, it would take quite a while for a new The Evil to achieve completion.

The time span depended greatly on the previous The Evil's level of completion upon death, but it was certain that if Theresia died now...the next The Evil would not arrive before their plans were complete.

The Evil and The Demise — the greatest problems the control AIs had. Letting Feuer's explosion blow them away was nothing but a good thing for them.

"Humpty, that is..."

However, Dormouse hesitated to follow her advice.

"Oh? What's the delay?"

"...If I continue observing her as I am, the likelihood of her becoming complete as The Evil is low. In fact, by letting her get caught in the explosion, we might activate her safety measures and suffer unforeseen consequences..."

Dormouse argued against Humpty's idea, but his words came off as mere excuses.

"I see. Unforeseen consequences or total erasure...which do you think is more likely?"

"I..."

"Dormouse... You're just being sentimental, aren't you?"

Dormouse was unable to say that he wasn't.

In fact, she was completely right. It was his job to protect The Evil, Theresia, but he hadn't exactly remained emotionally detached from his job.

In fact, his relationship with Theresia was no longer just about the role to him.

"The Evil of this era is like your Master, so you're just making up emotion-based reasons for protecting her. It's not rational."

Dormouse was shocked by the truth of those words. When he was but an Embryo, his Master had been a sickly little girl — a frail child who would surely die without help.

Perhaps his power to protect, as well as his plague-like true power, came about because he had been born from her.

He and his power had grown for the purpose of protection, eventually making him a Superior Embryo; then, they had allowed him to pass the final test and become an Infinite Embryo.

And the girl that was his Master, having grown into a woman by then, was there to watch him reach that point. Relieved that he could now live without a Master, she had then gone on to pass away.

It would be a lie to claim that Dormouse didn't see his late Master in Theresia — a sickly girl who needed his protection.

"But all of that is meaningless, Dormouse. Regardless of whether The Evil lives or dies, when the project is over, Infinite Dendrogram will—"

"I understand! I just...!"

"You seem to be quite troubled. I suppose that is an expression of your feelings for your Master?"

As she spoke, Humpty's words seemed cold.

"Sorry, but I just can't relate."

Perhaps Cheshire, Rabbit, or some other control AIs would've been moved by Dormouse's words. However, he knew well that that could never happen with Humpty.

He knew that she could never have any strong emotion towards her Master...and that very quality was why she was in charge of Embryos.

"A philosophical zombie like you would never understand..."

"Oh? But Dormouse, insulting me like that seems like you're expressing a wish to die." Humpty wasn't even present, but her words carried true murderous intent.

Dormouse knew well that Humpty was one of the few who could break through his absolute physical and chemical defense. Once called the Incarnation of Death, she was a being that no Infinite Embryo could defeat by themselves.

In spite of the threat, Dormouse refused to back down. He was preparing to say something back when...

[Stop...right there.]

...Duchess stopped them.

[You can no longer...run away in time...regardless. So, Dormouse...stay there...and decide...whether to protect or not...when the time comes...]

"...Very well." Dormouse nodded.

Humpty had already cut the comms line.

“Your Highness! Your Highness Theresia!” Shortly after that, a voice calling for Theresia rang out through the fourth floor. It belonged to Liliana, who’d been looking for the princess all this time. She was accompanied by the K&R Masters, who’d rushed here after seeing the explosion at the castle.

They quickly found Theresia and Dormouse and rushed over to them.

“Your Highness... I am so glad you are well...!”

“I’m glad you’re okay too...” Finding Theresia filled the search party with relief.

However, Dormouse realized that this made it nearly impossible for them to leave the capital.

“Let us head to the underground shelter, then. Your sister and the others are already there...”

Going there would be really bad, Dormouse thought. Liliana had yet to be informed that the underground shelter was perhaps the least safe place in the entire castle.

As Dormouse wondered how to convey that information...

“Huh?”

...a message window suddenly appeared before them.

No, this wasn’t a semitransparent, board-like message window, and it certainly hadn’t been summoned by Duchess.

It was actually a hologram created using illusion magic, and it said, “Refrain from approaching the area. I am currently below, dealing with explosive material. Stay away from the underground shelter and the walls.”

Behind the hologram, there was a wall that seemed to be made using ocean magic. Circular in shape, it covered a part of the fourth floor, and if the inside was empty, it could be described as a cylinder.

It was likely that it continued all the way down to the first floor, if not lower.

The barrier felt like the border of a construction site, or perhaps something that was aimed towards the sky.

“Who could have created this... Oh?” Confused, Liliana continued reading the message, and she quickly saw the text saying “Arch Sage, Integra.”

“Integra?! When did she come back?!” Seeing the name of an old friend surprised Liliana, but Dormouse didn’t know much about her. All he knew was that she was the Arch Sage's disciple as well as apparently the creator of the barrier around the castle.

What mattered here was that she was doing something about King of Blaze's explosion.

He didn't know if she would be successful or if the city would be blown away in spite of her efforts. But if she wasn't able to...if the explosion actually happened...not even Dormouse himself knew if he would decide to protect Theresia or not.

Even the processing power of an Infinite Embryo wasn't enough for him to fully understand his own heart and mind.

◇◆◇

Royal Castle, Underground Shelter

Upon hearing the girl introduce herself as the Arch Sage, the star that was the core of the heat seemed to tremble slightly.

It was strange, considering that his eyes, ears, body, and even his brain must've been completely obliterated by now.

"I am the Arch Sage you've been waiting for, Feuer Lazburn. If you wanted a duel against my teacher, I'm here to inherit that too. Oh, and even if you no longer need it, let me tell you that I'm not one to let go of what I've rightfully inherited."

As though his soul was still present somehow, the Supernova that was the remains of King of Blaze was reacting to her words — the words of the Arch Sage.

"Let's continue where we left off, shall we? This time, instead of doing what my teacher did, I will win against you in the most effective and relentless way I can think of. This was my teacher's response, and it will be our final offering to you."

Integra — the new Arch Sage — cracked a confident grin.

There was little time left until the Supernova detonated.

The only thing they could do was rely on Canglong's Dragon King Aura and Integra's magic.

As the Arch Sage, Integra could cast a wide array of spells belonging to the greater elements of atmos, earth, and ocean, as well as spells outside of that framework. She'd used teleportation to suddenly appear in this shelter, and she could even use the grand dark magic composite spell of Imaginary Meteo that her teacher had perfected.

However, that was the limit of her power. Armed with only a normal tian's magic, she would have to face heat even greater than that of Gloria's Overdrive. It was reckless to even attempt something like this.

It was likely that she couldn't withstand King of Blaze's onslaught even if she cast her strongest defensive spells or barriers specialized against heat.

That was just how intensely hot the Supernova was.

And it was why they needed a bit of trickery.

"Now, young Canglong. Sorry, but can you keep your Dragon King Aura running at full capacity for about two more minutes? Definitely no more than that."

In response, the Draconic Emperor nodded.

The Arch Sage of Altar. Canglong had heard of such a person, and he had heard them called the strongest caster of the west. The Arch Sage had been described as an old man, but since she spoke of inheritance, it was easy to guess that this woman was simply the new holder of the title.

Canglong found it strange that she'd suddenly appeared at such a time, but more than that, he appreciated the reinforcement.

And if she had a means of overcoming this predicament, his only real choice was to do as she asked.

"Well, it will all end in two minutes, anyway. That's about when the capital will be blown away."

"Huh?!" The shock from her words was such that Canglong almost weakened his Dragon King Aura.

"Well, I'm not saying that that's how long we'll last or that the spell's peak is coming in two minutes... Two minutes is just about how long it'll take for the walls to melt and the underground water to pour in."

Canglong already knew that this underground shelter was designed for long-term stays and thus included a water supply. That meant that this place was linked to an underground water main.

And if the water so much as touched Feuer as he was now, there would be a violent steam explosion that would flip the city upside down.

"Honestly, it's already pretty bad with the heat that's being conducted alone. We need to hurry and do something...by which I mean removing his heat from here."

Those words reminded Canglong of the moment Integra had appeared.

She'd probably achieved this by short-distance teleportation, which in this world was some of the rarest magic, usable only by a select few.

He guessed that she intended to take Feuer out of here using the same means, but...

"Oh, and by 'removing,' I don't mean teleportation. I can't do that. The spell only works on me, and it can't cover a great distance. And even if I could use it on other people, I'd burn up the moment I touched that thing. That's why the method I'm thinking of is simpler...and more basic," she said as he raised a hand up. "Though, it required some difficult preparation. Oh, and forgive me if it seems like I'm talking too much," she added as she winked with the eye that didn't have a monocle over it. "After all, all I've said so far was a Chant for this spell... High-End Heat Resist wall, ultra-multilayered expansion."

The moment she said that, nothing happened in their immediate vicinity — but up above at the castle, reaching up to the fourth floor, holograms appeared with a message on them, as well as something circular...or cylindrical.

It was a tube-like barrier spell that reached from the first floor all the way to its top and beyond.

The caster could freely choose the words used in a Chant, but Integra had used such a long spiel as a Chant that no one could guess that it was, and the enhancement from it was now used on this barrier spell.

A magic barrier of the ocean element, meant specifically to shut out heat, covering a long distance and composed of hundreds of layers, immediately activated.

The barrier felt like the edge of a construction site, or perhaps a chimney that was aimed towards the sky.

This was Integra's simple and basic counter against Supernova.

"Now, young Canglong, are you familiar with the principles behind the composition of fire spells like Crimson Sphere?"

"Huh...?"

"Thanks to the Archetype System, they can be used as job skills, so if you have the level, you can cast them without even knowing how they work. However, they can be broken down into three components," she Chanted as if giving him a lecture. "The transformation of magic into heat energy, the control to prevent unnecessary spread, and direction, which grants the attack a vector. You can use job skills without considering these things, but like King of Blaze before us did, if you understand the structure, you can construct your own spells. What he did was disregard everything but the transformation of magic into heat energy."

Canglong listened, saying nothing.

"Whether you can create original spells depends on whether you have the intelligence and talent to look past the simplification used by jobs and delve into the actual workings of the magic itself. Oh, and even though Draconic Emperor isn't a caster job, I remem...read that the one from two generations before yours excelled at this technique."

Casually mentioning the Draconic Emperor who had surpassed all others, she pushed up her monocle...

"And if I wasn't able to do all of that...I wouldn't even have inherited this job."

...and activated her own modified Crimson Sphere.

"Well, that was another long-winded speech, but this is about all I can do." She had crafted this spell while removing one of the three factors making the sphere the fireball it was supposed to be.

It was control. Controlling the extent of a spell required more magic than the actual magic-heat transformation, so if she focused on the transformation alone while facing someone who had greater magic than her, not even someone of her caliber would be able to insert the control factor.

However, the situation was different with direction. Supernova was a magic-heat transformation spell without regard for control of any kind.

In other words, it was nothing but a release of heat without direction.

That was why Integra wove a spell that was effectively the opposite of Supernova — a spell that gave the heat direction.

She was warding off Feuer's final attack by influencing it from the outside and giving its heat a specific vector.

And the only direction...is up, she thought. They were underground. Focusing it in any other direction would cause the ground around it to melt, increasing casualties on the surface.

And in the worst case scenario, the heat would make contact with the underground water main and completely destroy the whole city.

That was why she could only release the heat upwards — towards the distant sky.

It was something like adding a chimney to an active furnace.

And I've already prepared the chimney. She'd set up the insulation barrier to make sure that the castle wasn't incinerated as Supernova's heat traveled up.

If it was directed upwards without this barrier, it would no doubt burn the castle down. However, now that the insulation barrier was complete, the heat would travel up without causing much harm...at least, according to her calculations.

"Young Canglong, focus your Dragon King Aura upwards. And when I give the sign, increase your output. Can I count on you for that?"

"...Yes!"

Following Integra's order, Canglong modified his Dragon King Aura. At the same time, Integra activated the heat-vector spell.

Now...let's see how this goes. With the Dragon King Aura that had once contained it now gone and its direction set, the heat of Supernova began to flow upwards. The searing heat melted the reinforced walls of the shelter, reached the surface, and passed through the insulation barrier to flow towards the sky while piercing through every floor of the castle.

The heat made the clouds in Altea's sky begin to evaporate.

It was a cataclysmic sight, but it was done with the precision of a laboratory experiment. Its scale was actually a bit subdued, given the context.

Success...so far. The heat was following the path set out for it, and the chimney-like insulation barrier seemed to be holding.

The temperature increase inside the shelter also began to slow down, and so far they seemed to have spared the walls leading to the underground water main.

According to my calculations, this should be good enough, Integra thought. However, it was still uncertain if this would be enough to contain the true explosion...if all that heat would actually escape to the sky.

Could the insulation barrier bear the heat that would accompany that blast? And would they be able to protect themselves from the inferno raging at the heart of the explosion?

Even if most of the heat escaped to the sky, it would still be the most powerful where the two of them stood, next to Feuer.

If the insulation barrier Integra had created and Canglong's Dragon King Aura weren't enough, the capital would be leveled by the steam explosion that would result when the heat touched the water main. The chimney wouldn't help with that.

Approximately twenty percent of the total heat will not escape through the chimney. Twenty percent of a temperature that can destroy the capital... Considering the water main, this might not be good. Will we be able to block the real explosion? If not, then all I inherited from my teacher and those before him would be lost. All because of me.

Integra had remained calm while talking with Canglong, but on the inside, she was worried. A cold sweat, caused by tension and terror, joined with the sweat running down her face from the intense heat.

"Ngh...!" However, Integra slapped her own cheek, banishing her worry.

Though she was afraid, she wouldn't admit it. She knew that fear was something she could not afford to have.

She was certain that the magic she'd been taught wasn't weak enough to lose to some last-ditch spell woven and cast at the cost of a mere single life.

Thus, she focused and waited for the right moment.

When the explosion came, she would add her own insulation barrier.

Beyond the Dragon King Aura, she saw the Supernova — the remains of King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn. It was still growing and would reach its full extent in less than a minute.

That moment would be like a fork in the road for both her and her predecessors — and before it split, she looked back at the past. Specifically, she remembered the time the previous Arch Sage had dueled King of Blaze, taking his specialized spell and showing just how much difference there was between them.

Perhaps if the Arch Sage hadn't used fire magic back then, it wouldn't have come to this.

However, Integra knew the two reasons why her teacher did what he'd done.

First, he wanted to show the power and presence of the Arch Sage. Masters had begun to increase in number since that fateful duel. An all-rounded caster crushing a specialized caster at his own forte — this had shown his unmatched power to the world, which resulted in certain developments later.

Second, he wanted to make King of Blaze, Feuer Lazburn, better himself. By showing what lay beyond the magic Feuer wielded, the Arch Sage had urged him to seek it.

If that had broken him, the Arch Sage would have deemed Feuer useless.

However, everything had turned out exactly as the Arch Sage had intended, but in some ways completely different than he imagined.

Feuer Lazburn hadn't been broken, and he had indeed renewed his vigor for training to become stronger.

However, in the course of this, he'd also become an Idea — a being that could completely destroy the Arch Sage's plans.

The Arch Sage could not have anticipated something like this.

And that's why I need to fix my teacher's mistake. King of Blaze had been inspired by the last Arch Sage, and as a result had become an obstacle. As the inheritor of all of this, Integra was resolved to settle things once and for all.

Finally, the time came.

The star-like orb of fire pulsated, signifying that it was reaching its limit.

"Dragon King Aura! Full power! Now!"

"OOAAGHH!" In response to Integra's order, Canglong created an intense aura that used even his own life force as fuel. At the same time, Integra activated the greatest insulation magic she'd ever prepared.

"Hundred-fold insulation barrier...activate!" Flat barriers, twenty in number for each direction, surrounded Feuer like a box.

The barriers hid away the star inside, and the Dragon King Aura enveloped it.

Then came the fateful moment...and the space was filled with a light so intense it seemed like it might swallow up the whole world.

◆◆◆

Fire

How many people have learned the meaning of their life only at the very final moments of it?

It was perhaps impossible to know the exact number. No one could truly know what someone else was thinking right as their spark was snuffed out.

Why were they born? For what purpose had they lived? And did they leave this life with a feeling of satisfaction?

Only the person in question could come to know the meaning behind their birth...or they vanished without ever learning it at all.

Feuer Lazburn's life was a flame — a life dedicated solely to fire.

He'd sacrificed his time, way of life, morals, and even his body to that flame.

His life was lit by fire and had been consumed by it.

And ultimately, he'd transformed his very body into flame itself.

He understood that he'd given everything he had to create the strongest fire of all — to prove that his kind of magic was the strongest.

However...the meaning was still lost to him.

His life had been dedicated to fire, but for what purpose?

He recalled that his reason for trying to defeat the Arch Sage was to prove that fire magic reigned supreme. He'd taken on his family's goal and trained from a young age to prove the power of fire.

But no matter how hard he tried, he couldn't find a reason for delivering that proof.

He lived to prove he was strongest, but what would that proof accomplish? While he dedicated himself to pursuing that proof, he couldn't think of any reason for it.

Feuer Lazburn was like a fire himself.

A spark caught and burned, shone for a moment, and then was reduced to ash.

His life had been one of light and heat, and it left behind nothing of consequence.

And if he wasn't even able to prove that he was the strongest, it would all be even more meaningless.

He wouldn't even leave a corpse, and his entire life would be...

"I'm...alive. Well...that was some intense magic..."

As the mind Feuer Lazburn had used to comprehend meaning gradually slipped away, he suddenly perceived a voice praising him.

With his eyes, ears, and flesh lost, Feuer still somehow felt the voice of a woman.

It was his first time hearing it, for when she'd first spoken, his ears were already gone.

The voice belonged to Integra...who had survived his flame.

She was still standing in the shelter.

Their surroundings had completely changed. The walls between them and the water main that supplied the castle had melted away, creating a small river on the floor.

It was evaporating as it touched the heated walls and floor of the shelter, but the reaction wasn't intense enough to cause a steam explosion. The walls had only superficially melted away, and the source of the heat — Supernova — was already dissipating.

Now, the water main was slowly cooling all it passed by.

Beside Integra, who was standing near the center of the shelter, there was Canglong, lying down on the wet floor, but still breathing.

The destruction of the capital had been prevented, and the ones responsible for this feat were still alive.

There was now a hole piercing everything from the shelter to the top of the castle, but the castle itself was still intact.

That meant that Feuer Lazburn's final spell had been prevented from demonstrating its immense destructive power to the entire world.

"The hundred-fold insulation barrier, the Dragon King Aura of the strongest Draconic Emperor so far, and this fire damage-cutting accessory made by my teacher himself...and I'm still coming out of it like this." Integra was in an awful state. Her entire body was covered in burns; some parts of her had serious injury-based status effects. Her heat resistant clothes were now nothing but burnt rags.

"My eyes and ears aren't working either. The barrier only stopped heat, so light and sound still passed through. My eyes were burned away even though they were closed, and my ear drums were ruptured too. Honestly, I'm talking here, but I don't even know if anyone can hear me. Or maybe I died and I'm just a spirit now. No — my entire body hurts really bad, so I've got to be alive."

Perhaps Integra was speaking in spite of her heavy wounds because she wanted to convince herself that she wasn't actually dead. That was just how much of a close call this was.

"You might've already burned up completely, but let me tell you just one thing, Feuer Lazburn." Integra continued to address the man before her, who now had no proper shape or shadow.

Would she berate him for harming her so severely, or would she mock him for being a fool?

What she actually said...

“I am the Arch Sage and the inheritor of two thousand years’ worth of knowledge.”

...was neither of those things.

“As such, I assure you that your fire magic is by far the strongest in this entire era. No one alive has mastered the flame like you.”

She actually praised his power.

And these words of hers actually reached his lingering soul.

“Your magic won’t be forgotten. We remember all spells, and we will never forget yours.”

Hearing that about the magic he’d woven, Feuer Lazburn found that his life had, indeed, held some kind of purpose...and was satisfied with it.

I see... In that case...there was meaning to it all...

A moment after that, the soul vanished as though it had no grudges or regrets.

The man who’d lived a life of fire...burned away.

Epilogue

Royal Capital, Altea

Riser woke up due to a slight warmth on his cheek.

He blinked to fix his hazy sight. Slowly, his focus returned.

When his vision became clear, he found himself looking down at the capital from high above it, watching an immense amount of heat rise to the air.

He could feel the heat, but it wasn't great enough to harm him all the way up here.

"That's..."

"Ah! Riser! You're awake!" The voice belonged to a fellow member of the Babylonian Battlegroup, Lang. That was when Riser realized that he was being carried on the back of Lang's hippogriff.

"...What happened since I was out?"

"You beat the leader of the bee-men. That made the other bee-men stop moving, so I flew up into the sky, saw you fall, and went to catch you."

"And that pillar of fire?"

"I don't know. It just appeared a bit ago... But the people at the castle seem to be fine."

"...I see." Realizing that everything would work out, Riser was relieved.

Shortly after, the hippogriff landed in the fountain plaza where they had first encountered Regina Apis Idea.

After dismounting, Riser looked around and confirmed that little had changed since he took to the sky.

Having seen them land, everyone he'd left behind started to approach him.

"Mr. Riser, I'm glad you're...o...kay...?" Kasumi said, only to tilt her head in confusion mid-sentence.

Io and Fujinon also seemed puzzled.

"What's the matter?" Riser asked.

"You are Riser...aren't you?"

“Yes. Why ask— Hm?”

That was when he realized that something wasn’t right about his head.

Touching his head in several places, he realized what it was.

“Oh, right. I lost my mask.”

The full-face mask that defined him had been broken during the midair fight, so his (or rather, his avatar’s) face was now completely exposed.

It was the sort of face one might see on twentieth century tokusatsu heroes before they transformed. It wasn’t all that special, but the very fact that you could see his face at all shocked everyone present, including Babylonian Battlegroup members.

“So that’s Riser’s face... First time seeing it.”

“That guy had a face...?”

What did you think I was? Riser thought in response.

“Mr. Lang doesn’t seem surprised, though...” noted Kasumi. Lang was the one who picked up the maskless Riser, but he didn’t seem the least bit shaken by the sight.

“Yeah. I actually saw his face when we took a bath together.”

“A bath,” the three girls said in perfect unison.

Oh yeah, that happened, Riser thought. It was back when he and Lang had visited Quartierlatin and went to the large bath at the inn. He wasn’t unreasonable enough to wear a mask in a situation like that.

Actually, Riser only wore a mask as a matter of personal pride. The fact that his face was almost completely unknown was merely a side effect.

“Bathing...together,” said Kasumi.

“Two men, completely nude,” said Fujinon.

“Very nice! Thank you very much!” said Io.

“‘...Nice?’” Riser and Lang tilted their heads in unison. The next moment, Fujinon threw a body blow into Io’s side.

“Ghh...?! Th-That’s not fair...! Yours was pretty bad too...!”

“Yours was too blatant.”

“Nnh...! But your collection is way worse than...”

“That’s a declaration of war.”

“Awhawha... Y-You two...stop it...” The girls’ exchange made Riser smile wryly, and some of the others around them began to laugh.

He looked around and saw both Masters and tians here.

This moment of calm after the storm made Riser once again realize something.

"...I protected them this time." He repeated the words he'd spoken before he'd lost consciousness, as though to confirm that they were indeed true.

◆◆◆

Royal Castle, Underground Shelter

After Feuer Lazburn's Supernova was prevented from destroying the castle or the capital, only the sound of running water remained in the underground.

Elizabeth and the Altarians had evacuated, Feuer had vanished, Canglong had fainted, and Integra, though heavily injured, had carried him away, leaving the place empty.

The water from the main was pouring into the shelter through a hole in the wall; through the hole melted into the ceiling by Supernova, sunlight streamed in from several dozen metels above.

Suddenly, a bandaged woman appeared in this previously vacant space.

"Close. This place almost collapsed before the next plan could succeed," she whispered as she waded through waist-deep water.

Feuer...the Idea La Crima gave him had gone out of control. Because of that, Claudiah's plan C had almost fallen apart before it could even begin.

Saying nothing, Zeta privately questioned La Crima's ability.

Besides the mass-produced Apis Ideas, the hybrids she'd deployed here had all been modified while maintaining their personalities. That was good if you wanted to make the best use of the tians' combat experience, and it was especially important if they were meant to operate independently.

La Crima could also make Ideas without any remnants of past personality, but they couldn't function without operating towers such as La Crima herself or Regina Apis Idea.

To I.F., which was far harder to fill than most clans, the Ideas were precious firepower. Logan could provide incidental firepower by summoning devils, but overall they lacked the pieces needed to play on this ever-growing board.

However, if these Ideas could go out of control, Zeta felt that they might be more trouble than they were worth. If they often did as Ignis Idea had and decided to destroy themselves using the very magic they'd been granted, ultimately they'd be nothing but a problem.

I will have to file a report to La Crima about this. Even if he'd caused trouble, though, Ignis Idea had only been capable of crafting a spell this powerful exactly because he still had his mind. It seemed like managing the positives and negatives of Idea creation would be a difficult and dangerous task.

To them, however, the fact that the "material" involved was tians was neither a positive nor negative.

"Commencing. Moving over to prepare for plan C."

Zeta walked through the shelter towards the hole in the wall. As she took out a white whale-like accessory, she looked down at the flowing water.

"...Abundance. This place has a wealth of water and air," she whispered, touching the water in which her lower body was submerged.

That was what she'd said back when she'd first appeared in Granvaloa.

Her real self couldn't even imagine having enough water to get this wet.

That was also the reason why she'd picked Granvaloa as her starting country.

"...I'm jealous." She let her honest feelings show for once. The world of Infinite Dendrogram was full of water and air, and she couldn't help but be jealous of that — as well as loathe it.

It was the sentiment of the have-not. To some, Infinite Dendrogram was a means of escapism...a shelter from reality...and she knew that better than anyone else.

And exactly because she could escape into this world, she understood that it couldn't be just a game.

Zeta slowly looked upwards.

The ceiling blocked the view of the sky, but she could still picture it clearly in her mind — both the sky and even what lay beyond it.

"...I imagine that no one here has ever reached for a world beyond what their hands could touch..." She spoke words that reached no other ears.

And suddenly, her vision was lost.

She'd been thrown into a pitch-black darkness, akin to a starless night. She couldn't even guess which direction was which.

What is this? A darkness where she was blind even with her eyes wide open... Zeta hurriedly tried to use Uranus to create a defensive barrier of compressed air, but before she could, a slight shock ran through her body.

The darkness then vanished, and her vision returned.

She then looked down to see a warped hand sticking out of her chest...and holding her heart.

For a moment, she thought of Xunyu, whom she'd defeated, but it couldn't be her. This wasn't a metal prosthetic, but the arm of a living creature.

Before even looking back, she tried to attack behind herself using Uranus's compressed air bullets, but the owner of the dark hand pulled out his arm and quickly backed away.

Having lost her heart, Zeta almost collapsed, but she used air control to keep herself upright.

The wound was fatal. The attack had taken her by surprise, and her Brooch had already been destroyed by Xunyu.

Before she fell, she gazed at the one who gave her this wound.

"Vesper...tilio..." It was Vespertilio Idea, otherwise known as Morter Cortana, whom she'd thought was dead because the signature of his Idea-fragment had vanished.

The darkness that took her sight had been caused by his Darkness Boundary.

But this just didn't make sense. The Idea-fragment that was keeping his modified body together was gone.

And yet, Morter's body was still intact.

No... As a living creature, he was actually more refined now than he was back when the Idea had been connected to him.

He looked like a human that hosted a devil, like something out of a certain famous manga series.

His agility just now, as well as the ability that allowed him to tear out Zeta's heart without even being noticed...

This was a different Morter than the one she knew.

Saying nothing more, Zeta lost all of her HP and collapsed into the water before beginning to sink.

As her avatar vanished, she thought, I'll really have to complain to La Crima.

◇◆

He watched as Zeta disappeared in the water.

He even checked that the disappearance wasn't some optical trick using echolocation.

Then, he spoke without even opening his mouth.

"It's me. I took care of the previous owner."

"...I see. I will call you if I have need of you again, so stay in the capital for the time being."

"...All right." With that, he cut the telepathic exchange between him and the girl that now owned him.

Morter's life was now supported by Theresia.

Given the choice to live or die, Morter had once again chosen to live.

It was entirely possible that living on, in this case, would be worse than death.

However, he also couldn't help but think that he didn't want his life to end here... After all, he had yet to do anything with it.

He was completely unlike his ex-colleague, King of Blaze. While Ignis had died to find purpose in his life, Morter was still unsatisfied and unfulfilled, so he chose to extend his.

Thus, he took on The Evil's Dependent Transformation and was once again reborn.

He was now neither man nor monster.

Losing his humanity had made him lose all his jobs — King of Raids included — but he still had enough power to make up for that loss.

He was even stronger as a Dependent than he'd been as an Idea.

However, he didn't intend to get comfortable with this power or wallow in it.

In his mind, there was only one question.

"I didn't make the wrong choice again...did I?"

The man who'd abandoned humanity to become an Idea, then abandoned that state to become a Dependent of The Evil herself, vocalized exactly what was on his mind.

◇◇◇

Royal Castle, Medical Office

On the castle's first floor, there was an infirmary equipped with various medicines.

Since it was built right after an era of war and the struggle against The Evil, this place was well-equipped for long stays during sieges and similar situations.

The attack had destroyed most of the castle's equipment, but since the only magic used in the medical office was for preserving medicines, it could still function as normal.

In this room was Liliana.

Around her lay several coffins, each one containing a person.

The abundance of coffins made the place seem like a morgue, but they were actually filled with Lesser Elixirs and other liquid medicines, and the people inside were none other than Theodore and the other ten or so Paladins who had fought with him.

They were still alive, but they couldn't leave the coffins.

This was the result of their fight against Aranea Idea.

They were able to destroy the creature, but the price they paid for that victory was great. They had all touched the poison Aranea released while alive, as well as those he'd spread upon death.

The poisons weren't temporary, and because they'd absorbed as much of them as they did, their cells had actually begun to mutate. As a result, they were now in a critical state that mere medicine couldn't fully cure.

Thus, they were now kept in coffins full of Lesser Elixir to slow down the progression of the disease; additionally, they were subjected to sleeping magic so they did not have to suffer through pain. Magic had been used to put them under instead of conventional drugs, in order to avoid any potential reactions with the Lesser Elixir.

Liliana stood in the room, looking at her subordinates...her fellow knights.

Suddenly, someone tapped her on the shoulder.

"Hey, don't look so gloomy. I mean, you're gorgeous, so a poignant expression really suits you, but here it just makes it look like you're about to hold a mass funeral."

This unfunny joke was spoken by...

"Integra...!"

"It's been a while. We haven't seen each other since I left on the journey to broaden my horizons, which was...two years ago?"

"So it was that long already...?"

The speaker was Liliana's childhood friend — Arch Sage, Integra.

"...Thanks for what you did down there. That was your doing, right? And thanks for taking care of the poison on the first floor too."

"Yeah. I came back to the capital a short while ago, and I sensed some serious magic downstairs. And when I went there, I found King of Blaze ready to blow. I knew I had to hurry up and do something. The poison was just a bonus."

After the Royal Guard was overcome by the poison, Integra had gone to them, cleansed the poison, and done what she could to keep them alive. The timing of her arrival made it seem as though she'd been observing the whole thing and had only gone to clean up once it was over, but no one had questioned it.

Integra had also suffered heavy injuries during the Supernova explosion, but she now had no noticeable wounds. She had treated herself using healing magic and a few precious items she possessed.

"Back to your sad face, though. Is it because of these knights sleeping here?" Integra asked.

"...Yes. Once again...I was powerless..."

"Hmm? But I heard that you were looking for the lost princess."

"I was. But while they fought a deadly battle, I...the current leader of the knights...went through this entire ordeal without facing any danger. That's why, I—"

"You just prioritized what you had to. It is what it is." While consoling her friend so casually, Integra thought, Not like she needed to be found, or any protection for that matter.

Integra knew that Theresia was The Evil and that Dormouse was related to the Incarnations.

During the kidnapping where Theresia had encountered Shu and Sechs, the previous Arch Sage had confirmed that all of this was true.

The records clearly show that the Incarnations erased all The Evils so far. And since they can no longer kill them with tians, they're now trying to delay The Evil's completion by protecting her. Even a battle-focused Superior Job was nothing to her.

Integra considered this, as though she had actually seen Morter try to attack Theresia.

The only real danger was from King of Blaze's final attack. If they'd decided that the explosion would be enough to kill her, there's no telling how they'd act.

The Incarnation accompanying Theresia had neither retreated from the castle nor tried to stop King of Blaze. Integra had actually gone down herself because she'd considered it just that dangerous.

There's been no activity from their side since then. They didn't even get in the way when I was preventing the explosion. Does that mean that their goal wasn't to eliminate The Evil no matter what, but to eliminate it if possible*? I can't tell. I have two thousand years' worth of records describing their actions, but I still don't truly understand them... Not that I* want to understand this invasive species.

She cut her somewhat dark thoughts short, focusing once again on the conversation with Liliana.

Integra had thought about a lot of things, but her entire thought process hadn't lasted even a second of actual time. High-speed thinking was a basic technique of all skilled casters.

Not noticing even a fraction of what was going on inside Integra's head, Liliana vocalized her worries. "I...I can't ever save anyone by myself... Over and over again, I'm the one being saved."

"Hey, don't worry about it. These guys are thankfully still alive. Once Altimia...I mean, Her Majesty is back with that High Priestess who's supposedly with her, I'm sure she'll heal them with her magic."

"That is true... The idea does put me at ease."

Even as she consoled her friend, Integra's thoughts were turning dark.

Altimia's accompanied by Masters, eh...? Unlike the previous king, my teacher didn't mess with her outlook on this. I guess her conclusion is different despite the king's influence.

Regardless, Altar was already open to cooperation with Masters, so she had no intention of objecting. Instead, she'd decided to observe the situation between Altar and Dryfe as they both joined forces with Masters.

Perhaps I should get some information from these Masters too? In that case, I should focus on the strongest among them — the ones they call Superiors. Or perhaps the specific one responsible for Altimia's change of heart...

While considering her next move, Integra searched Liliana's face.

Integra had been sincere when she tried to cheer Liliana up, but it seemed like the knight's regret and sadness weren't so easy to disperse.

She was distressed about the current situation, certainly, but the core of her sadness was a hatred of her own weakness.

This sentiment had been building up inside her for quite some time. She was weaker than the princess she was charged to protect, and she had only barely contributed to solving the many problems facing Altar.

All of that combined was more than enough to justify her gloomy expression.

Integra was good enough friends with Liliana and Altimia to notice all of this. At the same time, though, she felt a bit bad about their intrinsic difference in position.

"If it bothers you that much that you weren't able to fight, there's nothing I can do about that — but if it's your weakness that's the problem, I may be able to help."

"Huh?"

That was why, Integra felt she needed to bring this up, as a friend.

"Out of all the things I've learned, I think there's a way to make you stronger. If you can achieve this, you will no doubt become a great deal more powerful than you are now."

That just happened to be exactly what Liliana wanted in her moment of weakness.

"And that would be...?"

Looking up at her taller friend's eyes, Integra...

"Wanna try becoming the Celestial Knight?"

...spoke the name of the Superior Job that had belonged to her late father.

◇◇◇

Royal Castle, Guest Room

Canglong woke up to find himself on a canopy bed.

He tried to get up, but there was a slight weight on his left hand.

Glancing at his right one, he realized that he had a human body again.

He then looked at his heavy left hand...

"Zzz... Zzz..."

...and saw Elizabeth, clutching at his hand in her sleep.

A glance at the window made it clear that it was already dark outside. A few hours had passed since the battle underground, and he could only guess that Elizabeth had been holding his hand the entire time.

He scanned the surroundings for any presences and sensed one that belonged to a knight beyond the door.

Canglong and Elizabeth were alone in this room, and it was all because she had asked for this.

He'd lost consciousness during the explosion underground, and the next thing he knew, he was here.

All that was certain to him was that both he and Elizabeth had survived.

Canglong slowly raised himself, reached for her head...and after some hesitation, caressed it.

"Mnh..." She moved a bit, but continued to sleep as peacefully as before.

"A lot has happened. You must be tired..." What had happened underground, the attack itself...many things were still unclear to Canglong.

However, for now, he just wanted to enjoy the fact that they were both still alive.

"Let us talk when you wake up... There are many things I must tell you, as well as things I want to tell you..." he said before caressing her head again.

Some time after Canglong woke up, there was a knock on the door — so silent and subdued that it did not even wake Elizabeth.

"Come in," said Canglong. The door opened, and he saw the face of a giant rodent.

"Pardon the intrusion." The giant rodent — Dormouse — entered the room, and Theresia, who was perched on his back, apologized while being careful not to wake her sister.

"Your Highness?" Canglong wondered why she'd come here. Since it was a bit late to pay him a visit, he guessed that she was here for her sister, but then...

"Sorry for leaving the tea party early."

"Huh? Ohh..."

Theresia's words instantly reminded Canglong of the tea party they'd held earlier today.

Elizabeth had arranged the party. She'd resolved to leave for Huang He, and she wanted Theresia to meet Canglong before she left. Elizabeth wanted to show her sister the person she would spend her life with and to introduce Canglong to the family that she so treasured.

The two had ended up barely talking during the tea party and had been entirely separated once the assault began.

Now that everything had subsided, they were finally together.

“Dor.” With just that one word, Dormouse placed Theresia on the floor and walked out of the room.

Now it was just Canglong, Theresia, and Elizabeth, who was still sleeping. Between them, there was nothing but a silence that felt both unbearably long and far too short.

Canglong said nothing and merely waited for Theresia to speak.

Theresia briefly exchanged glances with him before looking down at her sister, still clutching Canglong’s left hand.

Then, she caressed Elizabeth’s head like Canglong had done and...

“Protect her for me...”

...said only four words.

Theresia’s real emotions were hard to read, but Canglong was certain that those words came straight from her heart.

She had come all the way here just to say that.

For all that anyone knew, perhaps she’d actually been gathering her resolve and waiting for the chance to say this even back during the tea party.

After all, these words were a goodbye. Her sister would soon leave for a distant land, and with these words Theresia had entrusted her sister to him.

Canglong understood that.

“I will... No matter what.”

And that was why he swore this with his very soul.

No matter from what or from whom...he would protect Elizabeth.

Thus, Canglong and Theresia — Draconic Emperor and The Evil — exchanged a promise.

◆◆◆

The Gaol, Café “Dice”

On that day, Dice ended up not receiving a single customer.

You couldn't even hear any voices outside.

The gaol was a rowdy place full of commotion, so this was an abnormally peaceful day.

With her head on the table, Gerbera turned the pages of some documents, lost in thought.

She wouldn't say it out loud, but she felt that her clan leader, Sechs, wasn't quite himself today.

After talking about the final boss, his peaceful, hard-to-define aura became more like...uh...the pressure of a beast sharpening its claws? Well, I don't really know how to describe it...

All that she knew was that Sechs was different than usual.

I guess I'm weird for noticing this in the first place. Wait, I guess it's the other way around. If he seems dangerous enough that even I'm picking it up... That explains why we didn't get any guests today.

She nodded to herself in understanding before resuming her scan of the documents.

These documents contained data that the other I.F. members sent Sechs in reality. He memorized it all and wrote it down here by hand for Gerbera.

This wouldn't have been necessary if they could just send an email to Gerbera's real-world self, as well, but she hadn't shared her address with the other members. In spite of how she acted in Dendro, Gerbera — or Kikuko — was actually fairly internet-literate.

I mean, I can't just give my email to people who do Dendro crimes all day...though I guess I'm not in any position to say something like that. Boredom was making her feel even more down than usual, but she continued skimming through the documents nonetheless.

"Hmm... Ignis, Aranea, Vespertilio, and Regina Apis... They sound like real villains."

She was currently going through the info regarding the assault on Altea and the Ideas that had been used for it.

What they're doing is pretty awful too... Being here almost makes me forget this fact, but we're a real group of bad guys, aren't we?

As Gerbera thought that, the bell on the café's door rang.

"Welcome! Oh? It's been quite a while."

"Helloooo! Everyone's favorite GOD is heeere!"

A voice that sounded like candy mixed with honey, fruit syrup, and artificial sweetener resounded through the café. It was so sweet it felt like it might melt your teeth away.

The person was wearing a dress styled like a heavily decorated cake with as many frills as possible, as well as small plush toys. It swayed as the figure came to sit at the counter.

“Sechsy and Gerby! It’s been soooo long! Ah, one caramel macchiato, pleeease!” The painfully sweet voice that suited its apparel all too well spoke to Sechs and Gerbera with notable familiarity. Their drink order was just as painfully sweet — Sechs had created this drink based on recipes from real-world coffee shops.

“Egh... Candy.” Gerbera spoke the visitor’s name, her mood dropping even further down. “Like always...you gross me out.”

“Ahhh! Gerby! That’s sooo mean! I’m gonna shake my head at you!”

“I’m not in the mood for this...” Legitimately starting to become nauseous, Gerbera stared at the newcomer.

She’d first met this person in the gaol, and the times they’d interacted were few...but they were more than enough to leave a mark on her memory.

...The makeup’s even better than before. If you ignore the absurd appearance and voice, you can almost feel like you’re looking at a pretty girl... After reluctantly praising the person’s appearance, she quietly added, “...Yet he’s a guy.”

“Tch tch tch! So naive! Lil’ Candy is a god who’s totally above gender!” the person replied, apparently not the least bit offended.

His name was Candy Carnage. By all appearances he was a girl, but as far as Gerbera knew, his avatar and real body were both male.

She also knew things besides his unusual appearance and personality that made him stand out... Knew them too well, actually.

“This is Dendro, where a god can be a god, so I will forgive your little act of disrespect, but if you push it, I might have to destroy yoouu!”

“...I know.” Even Gerbera could tell that despite the joking tone, that was an actual warning.

After all, he was already doing his thing.

He was one of the Superiors locked up in this gaol — the worst and most far-reaching wide-scale extermination-suppression types of all.

He’d destroyed a city-state, massacred over a hundred thousands tians, and killed even The Hero.

The tian genocider. The "Legionkiller."

King of Plagues, Candy Carnage.

Gerbera knew that she couldn't win against someone like him.

Perhaps she might have a chance in such close quarters, but if Candy wanted to fight with all his might, he would be a complete calamity.

Our leader and Hannya beat this guy up, though... The Superior Killer too... Dendro really is all about compatibility...and about how broken and insane you are in real life.

Realizing the crushing gap in compatibility and power between them, Gerbera once again laid her head on the table.

"...By the way, the city is pretty quiet, considering you're outside."

Gerbera had met Candy once in a created dungeon and twice in town. I died in that dungeon before even seeing him, though. However, the two times she'd met Candy out in town, the locals had been panicking and running around as if he was some kind of natural disaster.

That was why Gerbera found it strange how quiet it'd been the whole day.

"That's because I killed everyone outside! Some ignoramus laughed at my god-ly clothes! I kinda snapped and did a little cleaning in town!"

"...Well, that explains the silence." Man, he's powered up, hasn't he? He spread his infection so fast that they didn't even have time to escape, Gerbera thought listlessly.

"Oh, but I made sure to leave the café untouched! Praise me!"

"Ah, sure, sure. Good job. Very nice."

"Two praises! That's enough to forgive the disrespect from before!"

...He hadn't forgiven me before that? I was in some serious danger. Gerbera knew well that Candy was hard to deal with even for a resident of the gaol.

Though feared by many, Sechs was tolerant and gentle in demeanor, so she had no problem with him. Hannya was also fine as long as you didn't set her off by being lovey-dovey with someone or bad mouthing Figaro.

Fu'uta would destroy you without question if you came close, but he never left his one spot, so he was no trouble either.

However, it was never clear how to deal with Candy. He came into town on a whim, approached her as he wished, and it was never clear what would set him off. Once he was set off, he would always go to extremes.

He's such a pain. I really don't wanna deal with him right now... Ignoring him was one of the things that usually displeased him, so Gerbera had no choice but to interact with him.

Maybe I should log out for the day, she wondered right as Sechs presented Candy the caramel macchiato and began to speak to him.

"So, Candy, what brought you here today?"

"Oh yeah! I have some grreeat news!"

"Great news...? Ohh, so you're done?"

"Slurp slurp... I knew you'd ask!" Candy sipped his drink through a straw and puffed out his chest. "I finally...finally did it! Lil' Candy has defeated the Disaster Bioweapon!"

"That is good to hear."

What Candy had just said was simply staggering.

The gaol had a created dungeon, but it also had a special area where a certain UBM was kept.

Called the Disaster Bioweapon, this creature was beyond even Mythical in power, with level well over 100 and the status of an Irregularity. Many Masters here had attempted to defeat it and take its MVP special reward, but all of them had been completely powerless against it.

Candy was one of the Masters that had challenged it, only to be defeated like all the others. However, he had been certain that he would eventually bring it down.

And today, after many attempts, he had finally succeeded.

Here, in the gaol, Candy Carnage had actually destroyed an Irregularity, all by himself.

"My determination was unswerving... I forgot how many times I tried, though!"

"...Oh, I'll praise you for real this time. That's actually amazing."

"Now I can...probably be super proud. But besides that, I can leave the gaol, so..." Candy smiled like a flower over-blooming. "...I can finally get back at that tasteless, black-clad hitwoman..." His face as he said that was, for the first time since he came, one of pure anger.

...He's seriously mad about getting PK'd. Gerbera herself nursed a grudge — or perhaps an antagonism or even a vengeance — towards Rook, so she felt a tiny bit of sympathy for Candy. "'Tasteless,' though? I really don't think the Superior Killer wants to hear that from you..."

"She wears masculine clothing despite being a woman. That alone makes it clear that our tastes don't match." You sure that's not just a hatred for your own kind? Gerbera thought, but didn't say out loud.

"This seems like a good time," said Sechs. "Your business here is done, and Gerbera is improving fast. With that in mind, Candy — about what we discussed..."

"Okaaay! This will delay my revenge, but I'll join I.F.'s care for a year!"

Upon hearing that, Gerbera made a face that said both "I wasn't informed of this" and "Are you serious?" but neither Sechs nor Candy noticed.

"Excellent... I would've preferred to have Fu'uta join us, as well, but he will likely walk his own path."

"But...do you really think it's possible?"

"Yes. Based on Hannya's attempts, it used to be about seventy-percent doable, but thanks to Gerbera here, we will no doubt be successful."

"Huh? Huh?"

The incomprehensible conversation continued, leaving Gerbera far behind. Her head was surrounded by question marks — more so than on any other moment today, even.

Paying her no heed, Sechs went on to say the most important part of the conversation.

"It is time for us to break out of this gaol."

The king of criminals was finally ready to abandon his temporary home.

The Final Epilogue: Him, Her, and...

Paladin, Ray Starling

The place I appeared once I logged in after my death penalty expired was the same one I'd logged into after the first time I'd died — the fountain at the capital.

There were two differences, though. First was that the sun was still high up, and...

"Nemesis..."

...Nemesis wasn't out of the crest.

I was well aware of the reason.

At the final moment of the battle against Behemot, I'd made her pierce through my body.

I knew Nemesis well enough by now.

She always accompanied me on my endeavors, but she also worried about me more than I did.

And yet, I'd asked her to stab me.

I wasn't so inconsiderate that I hadn't considered how hard that must have been for her.

"Sorry, Nemesis..."

"Mhm..." Nemesis replied, agreeing.

This was unlike the first time, when my apology was met with "No need." That made me realize that I'd actually done something that warranted an apology.

"...My bad."

"You say that...but it is not like you would ever limit what you do in pursuit of your possibilities, right?"

"...I wouldn't," I replied, with nothing but honesty.

"There is no helping it, then. That is how you are, and it is my duty to help you."

Following those words, she left her crest.

Her eyes were slightly red.

"You always do absurd things without considering yourself. You are always tattered... Look, even the armor B3 gifted to you is gone."

"True... I'll have to apologize to her." The armor had been completely destroyed by King of Beasts' attacks. I still had the casual clothes I wore in town, but I would clearly need a replacement sooner than later.

"But bear this in mind, Ray," Nemesis said as she turned away. "You ended up in this tattered state because you protected those things you needed to protect... That surely means that the anguish I felt while obeying your order...was also not without meaning."

"Nemesis..." I couldn't see her expression as she said that. She'd probably looked away to prevent just that.

I thought of what to say to her...and came upon two sentences.

"Nemesis."

The first was just her name.

In response, she said, "What is it?" without even turning back to me.

The second sentence contained what I wanted to convey to her.

It wasn't a "Sorry" nor a "Thank you."

Her tiny back made it feel that she could disappear at any moment, so...

"Stay by my side."

...that was what I was compelled to say.

Nemesis still didn't turn around. With her back still towards me, she wasn't moving an inch.

No... She was actually shaking a little.

"...I-I'm your Embryo... Of course I'll stay by your side..."

"I don't want you by my side because you're an Embryo born from me. I want you to stay with me because you're Nemesis."

I wanted her to be with me not because the Master-Embryo system made it inevitable, but because she wanted to as her own person. She knew me better than anyone else and had always been there for me.

"Heheheh... Of course! I am the greatest Embryo, after all!"

"Yeah. You're the best, Nemesis."

"Nhm...?!" My honest reply froze her in place.

"Nemesis?"

"D-Do not mind this! It is nothing... I-I am going back to my crest! Farewell!" And so, with her face still covered, Nemesis returned to the back of my hand.

I didn’t fully understand her attitude, but it seemed that she would stay by my side.

I walked through the capital, but I was still unable to meet up with my fellow Death Period members who got the death penalty before me. From what I’d seen, they weren’t even online yet. In real time, the time between our deaths wasn’t that great, so I supposed that I’d just happened to log in first because I had been waiting for the penalty to expire.

And according to Shu, who’d contacted me in real life, Azurite and the others had yet to return to the capital.

The reason for that was Azurite herself — she was in bad shape.

Apparently, the battle against The Ram had been extremely draining. Well, I was told she’d also talked to Claudiah right after the battle, and once Dryfe retreated, the relief of all that tension made her collapse like a loose marionette.

The reason for her fatigue was the ultimate job skill she’d used...and Shu’d told me that she’d been immobilized for two whole days.

According to him, she’d recently said, “I never expected to be nursed by the parasite...such humiliation.” Regardless of whether or not she was serious, I saw that as a sign that she was recovering.

They’d departed yesterday in Dendro time, and they were on course to come back here by evening today.

Before meeting up with my clan members and Azurite, I decided to check on the situation at the castle. I passed the main street near the fountain and headed towards my destination.

“Hey, that’s...” I was in my casual clothing, so there were fewer people that recognized me.

However, there were some who knew my face, and I could hear them speak.

“That’s The Unbreakable...”

“The guy who matched KoB...”

...We were hardly matched, and it certainly wasn’t just my doing.

Fuso had lowered KoB’s stats, Rook gave me a chance to fill up my damage counter, B3 and I cornered her together, Marie and Tsukikage broke her Superior item — and in spite of all that, we weren’t able to finish her off.

If Fuso hadn’t been there to strike a deal and get Dryfe to retreat, all of those efforts would've been for naught.

However, there were rumors that I had fought KoB head-on and even ended it with a draw.

Their source was a certain video on the internet.

I didn't know how or from where it was taken, but it seemed to be hidden camera footage of our battle.

Additionally, it was cleverly edited in a way that was only apparent if you'd been at the scene yourself, and the purpose of that editing seemed to be elevating me...and Death Period.

That actually kinda creeped me out, for some reason.

I passed the gate to the noble district and arrived at the castle. Azurite had already given me permission to enter, and the guards who knew me let me into the castle without any trouble.

"...It's burnt," I muttered as I passed the gate. It seemed to have been broken...melted by some intense fire.

That was far from all of it — there were also holes in the walls as well as broken and scorched spires. Just how intense of a battle did this castle go through?

Were Liliana and the others okay? The state of the castle filled me with unease, but then...

"I was just informed that they will return in about two hours."

"I'm happy that I'll get to meet Her Highness again... Wait, she's Her Majesty now, isn't she?"

...I heard a familiar voice and turned towards it.

There, I saw Liliana, slightly injured but in one piece.

"Liliana!"

"Huh...? Ray!" Upon hearing me call out, she turned to me and ran over.

"I am glad you are well!" she said.

"That's my line. What about Milianne and the princesses?"

"...They are well... Though, there are some issues."

"Like...?"

"Hello, hello! A pleasure to meet you! So you are Ray Starling!" Before I got Liliana's response, an unfamiliar voice intruded on the conversation and called my name.

"Who are you...?" I asked. She was the person Liliana had just been talking to.

She was about as small as Nemesis, if not smaller, but she didn't seem all that young. Her tiny frame was swallowed by a wizard's robe straight out of a picture book, and on her head there was a pointy hat of the type you'd expect to see on a generic witch.

"I've been wanting to meet you! The one who brought down enemy Superiors in Gideon and Quartierlatin and thus saved the kingdom twice! No, now it's thrice!" Saying all this with a cheerful voice, she took my hand and shook it up and down.

Her voice and attitude both were brimming with friendliness. But for some reason — no idea why — I felt like there was nothing friendly about those eyes that were looking at me.

Was there a shine in them akin to that of a carnivorous beast that had found its prey...?

No... Her gaze was more like that of an insect that had found a cadaver it had to deal with.

"Whoops! Where are my manners? I haven't introduced myself! I am..." She let go of my hand, spun around, and gave me a slight bow before beginning the introduction. "I am the favored disciple of the previous Arch Sage, and now I am the current Arch Sage..."

Hearing the job alone filled me with surprise...

"My name is...Integra Sedna Clarisse Flagman."

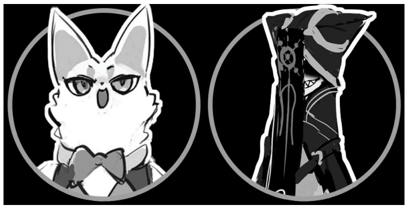
...but before it could subside, she gave a name that was even more surprising.

"Pleased to meet your acquaintance...Unbreakable Hero."

As I looked at her, still bowing, I felt uneasy...as if something had just been set in motion.

To Be Continued...

Afterword



Cat: "It's time for the afterwooord! I'm the 'Cat,' Cheshiiire!"
Xun: "And I'm XunYu. 'Xun' for shOrt. We'rE in this aftErword 'causE we weren't in the lAst one."
Cat: "You worked hard even in the volume itself, didn't yaaa?"
Xun: "Yeah. It was mY first battle in a goOd while... Since volUme 3, actually."
Cat: "Nice fighting back theeere. Though, I gotta ask... Are all of your battles gonna end with you getting burnt to a crisp?"
Xun: "It's gottA be 'cause I'm undeAd. EveryOne and their mOm just wants to cremAte the corpse."
Cat: "I can't blame theeem. Just keep in mind that you certainly weren't the only one struggling in this voluuume. Even the author was attacked by his greatest enemyyy."
Xun: "What enEmy is thAt?"
Cat: "Page count. This volume is so large that putting it all together for printing was a real challenge."
Xun: "Well, I guess evEryone was fIghting theIr own battles hEre."
Cat: "Ray barely appears in it, but the battle count is probably the highest yet."
Xun: "The author mUst have it hArd. Though, I'm glAd I got my first illUstration in a while."
Cat: (...Doesn't it only show your arm?)
Xun: "By the wAy, with so many pagEs, there's barelY any parts that weren't in thE web novel, right?"
Cat: "Yes. But to make up for it, the author is working hard on an original short story that should be released during a twitter campaign on the official twitter account around volume 15's release. I believe it will be rather large."

Xun: "'Rather largE?'"
Cat: "...It's not finished at the point of writing this afterwooord... It's currently January, by the way."
Xun: "JanuarY..."
Cat: "The author usually gets work requests before January breaks, so he tends to be busy during the end and beginning of the year. Anyway, it's time for the author's serious comments."

Dearest readers — thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaido.

The number of people infected by COVID-19 has been growing, heavy snowfall has hit parts of the country... This has been quite an eventful time.

The snow has affected even yours truly, at times making it difficult for me to get around.

However, my dog found nothing but joy in the snow, charging into it at full speed and burying his head in it. He's a Pomeranian mix who's supposed to be an indoor pet, but he has as much energy as any big dog. Silly as he is at times, there's no denying that he's cute.

Oh, another volume of the manga adaptation should've come out shortly before this volume of the novel. It once again includes the shenanigans of the Pomera — I mean, Lobohta — in the form of a short story, so please take a look at it.

Now, about this volume of the novel... It marks the end of the events surrounding the peace conference that began in volume 13. We see what was happening behind the scenes while Ray was fighting, and we are introduced to something very close to the core of the Infinite Dendrogram setting... The Evil and The Demise.

Their relationship with the control AIs is a relationship between "a self-destruct device installed into an incomplete product" and "those who modified the incomplete product to complete it in a different way." They cannot possibly co-exist.

There are many such conspirators with incompatible goals and ideas, and their plots intertwine and compound each other seemingly without end.

The control AIs, The Evil, Flagman, the imperator, Caldina, and others...

The world of Infinite Dendrogram has no shortage of schemers or their grand designs.

Please do pay attention to how the story of Ray and his group will go while they are caught up in this web.

The focus on Ray will have to wait until a later volume, though. The next book will shift the attention away from Altar and onto Caldina in the east, bringing the story back to the other Master-Maiden pair of Hugo and Cyco.

You'll have their encounters with new Superiors to look forward to.

Thank you for continuing to support Infinite Dendrogram.

Sakon Kaido

Xun: "...The guy wEnt on about his dog fOr a moment there."

Cat: "Why not a caaat?! The author isn't a cat persooon?!"

Xun: "You reallY gonna be jealous aboUt that? Oh and VOLUME 16'S SET TO COME OUT IN JUNE, 2021! By the wAy, why's it jUst the two of us this time?"

Cat: "Well, the Fox Lady wasn't in this voluume, while Brother Bear only appeared in a flaaashback."

Xun: "Yeah, I dunnO about these vagUe exclusions based on thE volume content..."

Six: "Then I suppose I can come out for a moment."

Cat and Xun: "HUH?!"

Six: "Hello. I am 'Six,' Sechs Würfel. I make a brief appearance in the tenth chapter of the Crow Record manga, and just like this volume, members of I.F. will have the spotlight in the following one. Do take a look at it if you're so inclined, and goodbye for now." Sounds of leaving

Xun: "The guy just sAid what he wanted and gOt the hell out..."

Cat: "...D-Did he do that just to assert that he was in the volume too?"

Xun: "...You'd think thAt a leader of a criminAl clan wouldn't hAve so much tIme on his hands."

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
[Newsletter]

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 16 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
[J-Novel Club Membership]

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 15
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2021 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2021 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki

All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2021 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2021 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

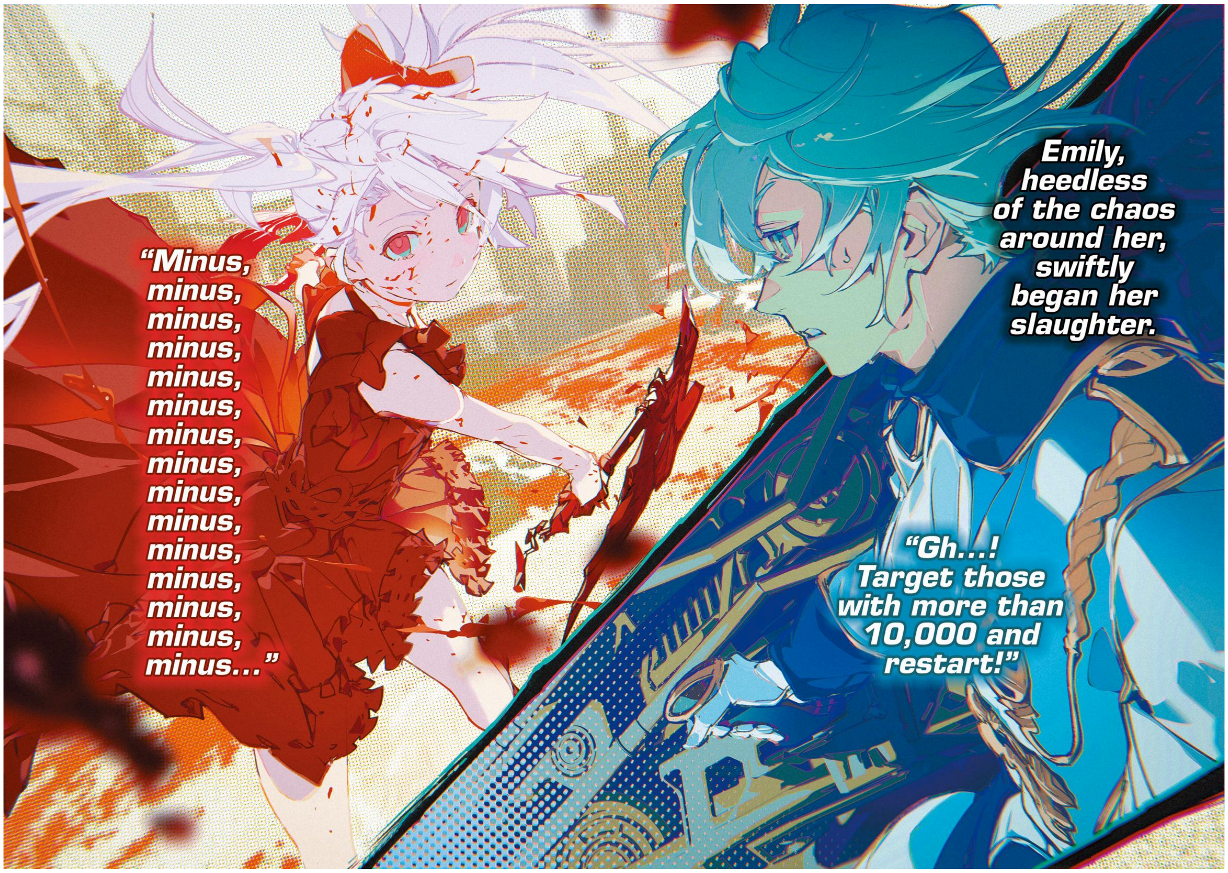
J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

Ebook edition 1.0: October 2021

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
16. The Tartarean Possibilities

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
16. The Tartarean Possibilities

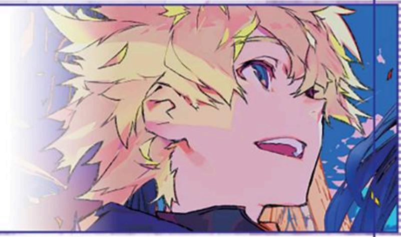
Infinite Dendrogram
16. The Tartarean Possibilities
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki



Emily, heedless of the chaos around her, swiftly began her slaughter.
"Minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus…"
"Gh…! Target those with more than 10,000 and restart!"

Character

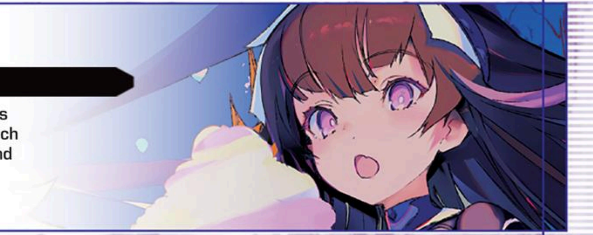
Ray



Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

A college freshman who gets caught up in various incidents within Infinite Dendrogram. Though he is generally mild-mannered, he has a strong will that causes him to fight for his goals and never give up on them.

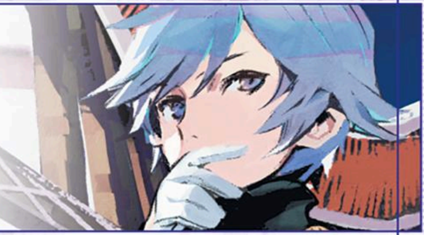
Nemesis



Nemesis

Ray's Embryo manifested as this girl. Nemesis acts as Ray's weapon by taking up the form of armaments such as a greatsword, halberd, shield, pinwheel, mirror, and twin swords. She is also a notable glutton.

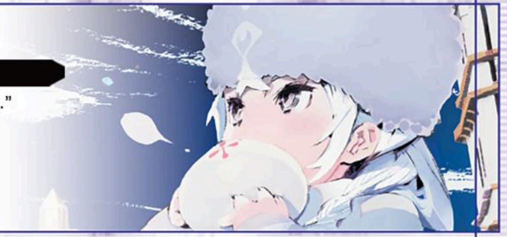
Hugo Lesseps



Hugo Lesseps/Yuri Gautier

An ex-Dryfean Master. He left the country and went on a journey, during which he happened to be caught by Ace, AR-I-CA and was forced to become her disciple. A girl in real life, she is also Franklin's younger sister.

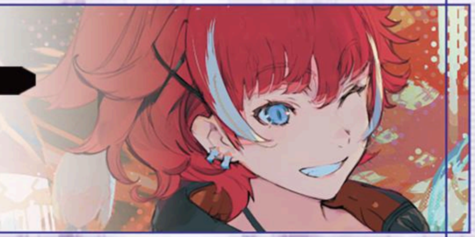
Cyco



Cyco

Hugo's Embryo, officially known as "Palefrost Maiden, Cocytus." She is all white in appearance and has strange eating habits, never touching any food that isn't also pure white. Her face rarely shows any emotion, but she has a tendency to be verbally abusive.

AR-I-CA



AR-I-CA

A Caldinan Superior, also known as the "Blue Sky Songstress." She has an artificial eye Embryo that lets her see danger and holds the Superior Job, Ace, which she uses to ride her flying, singing Magingear, Blue Opera. AR-I-CA swings both ways and never misses a chance to make a play at anyone she finds attractive.

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Prologue: Another Started Game

Chapter One: The Poisonous Oasis

Chapter Two: Minus

Chapter Three: The Gaunt Man

Chapter Four: The Chain

Chapter Five: The Machine Knight of Ice and Roses

Chapter Six: The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis

Chapter Seven: Standing and Indomitable

Prologue: Another First Choice

Chapter Eight: The Tartarean Possibility

Prologue: Another Starting Point

Epilogue: Two Worlds, Two Mes

Afterword

Bonus Short Stories

About J-Novel Club

Copyright

Prologue: Another Started Game

March, 2044, ???

With my exam season over, I finally got the chance to start playing Infinite Dendrogram.

The game came out while I was in my third year of high school. All my friends who really wanted to pass, including me, weren't exactly crazy about the timing.

To make it worse, all of our friends who'd already given up on exams or were set to inherit their family businesses regardless had picked up the game right away — and they had plenty of fun stories of their time in-game to bother us with.

Determined to play only after I'd passed, I fought the urge. I focused solely on my studies, finished the exams...and then, I finally got the gear I back-ordered and logged in for the first time today.

"It really is realistic... The wind is so hot."

For my starting point, I chose the country called "Caldina."

It was a merchant nation in the desert. The dry winds rolling in from the dunes tickled my skin with such detail that it felt real, even though I'd never been to a desert before.

The city I appeared in was a "City of Commerce" called "Cortana."

The main thoroughfare had many stalls lined up on both sides, all filled with merchants enthusiastically hawking their wares.

As big and populous as this city was, though, it wasn't actually the capital of the country.

The cat that had helped me with character creation told me that new Caldinian players started in Cortana instead of the capital because the strength of the monsters around the capital tended to fluctuate a lot, for various reasons.

That seemed to make sense. Right now, I was level 0 without a single job. If they dumped me right into an area swarming with powerful monsters, I'd be softlocked.

Speaking of which, I really needed to choose a job and start leveling up already.

The "Embryo" I was told about still hadn't hatched, though, so I decided to leave the job-picking for later and just enjoy the sights for now.

Cortana had a very Arabian Nights feel to it, reminiscent of various picture books and animated movies I'd watched when I was little.

The bazaar was as lively as it was colorful, and among the goods on display were many magic items that caught my eye. Unfortunately, the five pieces of silver given to me by the receptionist cat — 5,000 lir, apparently — weren't nearly enough to buy even a single one of those.

All I could afford was the food, so I got myself some skewered meat of unknown origin, along with some fried snacks.

The taste was about as real as it could get, and though I personally would've preferred if it was all a bit sweeter, it was perfectly fine for eating while walking.

Doing this made me feel less like I was playing a game and more like I was actually touring a foreign country.

...Honestly, I still had trouble believing that this really was a game — even after being online for a whole hour.

The environment I perceived with all five of my senses and the merchants who sold me that food all seemed like the real thing.

When did technology advance this far?

"...Huh?"

I suddenly realized that I'd wandered into an empty part of the city as I was lost in thought.

Desolate and silent, this place was nothing like the lively road I was just strolling down. Looking around, I saw nothing but decrepit buildings cramped together as close as possible.

It was astounding how different two sections of the same city could be.

"Hm...?" As I walked around, I caught something out of the corner of my eye.

In the tight space between two buildings near the entrance, there was a little girl sitting with her back against the wall.

Just at a glance, I could tell that she was abnormally thin. In fact, even the refugee children I saw on the news some time ago looked healthier than she did.

There was no one nearby — no family or anyone else.

She was just sitting with her back against the wall.

Without a word, without any sound at all, she turned her head slightly to look at me.

No — not at me, but at the bag of snacks in my hand.

I'd found those snacks rather bland... But oh, how the mere sight of them seemed to draw her hungry gaze.

She raised her twiglike arm and reached towards me. But she lacked the strength to even get up, and the way her little hand shook made it clear just how empty that movement was.

That tiny gesture, her fragile little action, made my heart want to burst out of my chest. It was a tight, emotional kind of pain.

"I-I'm so sorry! P-Please, take them!" Those words escaped my mouth as I approached her.

That girl was the most tragic thing I'd ever seen in my life. I tried to think about her, this situation, about what I was doing right now or should've been doing — but my thoughts were nowhere, letting my words and body take charge.

I was unable to ignore her, to leave her like this, so I approached and presented the bag of snacks.

She reached for it and tried to put her hand inside, but she missed every time she fumbled for it.

"I'll feed it to you. Here..." I took a snack and gently brought it close to her face.

She slowly opened her mouth. She tried to chew. And then, she fell still.

"...Huh?" The snack fell out from between my fingers and rolled across the ground.

Sensing that something wasn't right, I hesitantly reached for her cheek.

And that was enough for her malnourished body to slowly collapse to the side...and she made no attempt to get up again.

"...Huh?" She wasn't moving. Not an inch.

She'd just fallen asleep, I rationalized. Surely that was it.

But her eyes were open.

The light had just gone out of them.

Grains of sand blew along the ground, but not a single grain near her mouth or nose was moving.

I stood there and stared in disbelief...and before long, an ant crawled along her face, to no reaction whatsoever.

“Ah... Ah...?” I touched her withered wrist...and felt no pulse.

This complete stranger. This innocent little girl... She had starved, faded...and died right before my eyes.

Chapter One: The Poisonous Oasis

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

Early August, 2045.

A month of Dendro time had passed since I moved away from my sister and friends in my starting country of Dryfe. Three weeks had passed since Teach — Ace, AR-I-CA — got me involved in her quest to find the Treasurebeast Orbs.

Since then, I'd done some desert crossing and ruin raiding; since I'd maxed out High Pilot, I had switched jobs to Armored Pilot.

And now, having retrieved the first Orb in Hermine, we'd moved to the City of Commerce, Cortana, where we would supposedly find the second one.

The title of this city was well deserved. Full of shops and bazaars, it was quite wealthy even by Caldina's standards. It was as though Gideon's fourth district had been spread out to the size of a city.

"Well, I suppose it wouldn't be weird for strange objects like the Orbs to end up in a city like this...but imagine what kind of trouble it'd bring." I vocalized my worries as I gazed at the street outside the café's terrace.

Then again, there probably aren't many places in this world that are free of trouble, I thought.

"You're not gonna eat that?" asked Cyco.

"Oh, I will. I just had something on my mind."

Having done some shopping in the morning, we were now taking a lunch break while waiting for Teach.

Cyco was eating vanilla ice cream...or what was left of it.

Here in the desert, ice cream melted extremely fast. She'd tried to finish it before it melted completely, but eventually resigned herself to eating its milkshake-like remains as if it were a soup.

She seemed satisfied, though. I could only guess that the state of the food didn't bother her as long as it was white.

"Good thing you found the right parts, huh?" Cyco said with a white stain around her mouth.

She was referring to the Magingear parts I'd bought at a store before coming here.

Custom Magingears like my White Rose or Teach's Blue Opera had two general types of parts.

First were the new, custom parts that my sister had produced specifically for White Rose. They were costly, but they came with an auto-repair function similar to those found on original Prism Steeds.

The other type of parts were the standard, ready-made ones. Those were used in Marshall IIs, and they had to be replaced through maintenance every now and then.

Blue Rose didn't fully auto-repair, which was probably due to a technical flaw.

It just highlighted the fact that even if you built mechs using real-life knowledge like The Triangle of Wisdom, you'd never reach the level of Flagman, the Grand Artificer of the pre-ancient civilization.

Anyway, I had to replace the parts that I'd lost, but being away from Dryfe had made that rather difficult for most people.

Thankfully, among the grand total of three good things Teach had taught me, one of those had been the means of finding quality Magingear parts in Caldina, so I had no trouble getting what I needed.

The other two good things, by the way, were some piloting tricks and the location of the ruins with a crystal for the pilot job grouping.

I still had part of the money I got for assisting the fight against Gouz-Maise, so I could pay for the parts no problem, but...

"...When Caldina's stores sell wholesale parts made for the Dryfean army, you know something isn't right." Just how did they end up here, I wondered, finding myself a bit awed by Caldina's distribution channels. That was probably something that bothered every country, not just Dryfe.

"I gotta say, she's really late," said Cyco.

"...She is." Teach was the one who'd told us to wait for her here.

Last evening, she'd said that she was going to search for the Orb and headed straight to the mansion of Cortana's mayor. And if she didn't return the same day, we'd agreed to meet up here in the morning or at noon.

Since she was nowhere to be seen in the morning, we'd gone out and bought the parts we needed, but she wasn't here even now when we returned. It was now noon.

"Is Teach just bad at keeping time or did something happen?"

"Hmm... Both?"

Yeah, knowing her, that's probably the correct answer, I thought. She was an ace pilot, but you really couldn't trust her on many things. It probably isn't even trouble that's keeping her. I fully expect her to come back and say that she was busy messing around with some girls.

"Heyoo! Yu and Cy! Sorry for the wait!"

"Teach! Oh..."

She came in right as I was thinking about all of that and, well...

"The investigation dragged on a bit," she said. "Yeah, that's it."

"Is that so? By the way, Teach..."

"Yeess?"

"Your neck."

My words made her flash me an awkward smile and rush to cover a spot on her neck.

The spot, by the way, was clearly a hickey.

"I see you had some fun at the mayor's place," I said.

"There was this baby-faced maid with a nice body! I flirted with her a bit and we talked straight until dawn!"

Yeah — pillow-talked, I thought.

"I hope you die."

"Cy! That's way too harsh! I actually got the info!" So the little chat with the maid hadn't distracted her from her job after all.

"So, guilty or not?" I asked.

Teach had gone to the mayor's place to find out where the Orb might be. At first, I'd thought she'd solicit the mayor's help directly, but while she was away, I'd realized that probably wasn't the case.

It had been the same way back at the casino. In situations like these, Teach already knew where the Orb could be, so she'd likely gone to the mayor's mansion because that was probably the place.

"Heh heh heh. I see you're startin' to catch on. And yeah, he's obviously hidin' the Orb somewhere. If he wasn't, he wouldn't try to assassinate me or get a maid to spike my drink with poison."

A slight shock came over me as I asked, "...They tried to poison you?"

"Yeah. I didn't drink any and came on to that same maid instead. She was sooo cute and lewd!"

"Teach, why are you so...?" How could someone be so carefree when they'd almost gotten poisoned...?

Well, Teach's Superior Embryo, Cassandra, saw not "the future," but "danger," so poison was perhaps the most useless method of assassination to employ against her.

Then again, everyone could counter poison with an Elixir, so maybe this "attempted assassination" was nothing but a warning from the mayor.

"I know that he's hidin' the Orb," Teach continued. "If the info I already have on it is true, everyone with wealth and power would want to have it more than anything else!"

"You already know the Orb's...um, the UBM's abilities?"

"Yep. Some of the leaked Orbs also had their powers leaked too, and this is one of them. They say that it 'gives the user a healthy life, and then a new life eternal.'"

A healthy life and a new life eternal.

Well, it was true that those who already had wealth and power might fear death more than other people. They would be afraid of losing their riches to age or illness, so it was no exaggeration to say that they'd want eternal life more than anything else.

"And it seems like it actually works. Hell, the mayor is using it himself!"

"Hm?"

"This is the mayor's photo from the documents I brought." She showed me a picture of an obese, jaundiced man with rough skin and bags under his eyes. If intemperance and bad health was a person, this would be him. "And this is a picture I secretly took of him last night. His age, by the way? Seventy years."

"...Huh?!" This photo clearly showed a middle-aged man no older than fifty. He looked vigorous, his skin was smooth, and overall he seemed to be brimming with life.

I could hardly believe that this was the same person as in the first picture. I'd say he was rejuvenated, but that would feel like an understatement.

"You can see why he'd act like he doesn't even know about the Orb," Teach said. "For all we know, he might change back if he loses it."

"...But you're Sefirot, aren't you? Can he really lie to you like that?" Sefirot was a clan that had nine Superiors, making it the strongest clan in all of Infinite Dendrogram.

At the same time, it was the greatest force serving Madam President La Place Phantasma herself.

Teach had told me that Sefirot could only do quests that might lead to international problems — such as this very Orb-hunt — after the president had given them her explicit approval.

Although Teach was officially acting on the request made by the head of a certain company, the person behind this quest was the president herself.

The Orb in Hermine was in the hands of a foreign mafia, so I could understand the lack of cooperation there, but the mayor of Cortana was a member of the congress, so I'd really thought that he'd help us in finishing this quest.

"Ah ha haa! You still don't really understand Caldina, do you?" Teach said, showing me a map of the country. "This nation is a union of city-states. Some have elections, some have a hereditary system, but each city is its own country, and the mayor is its king."

The city-state union of Caldina was an assembly of small individual nations, run by a congress where the mayor of every city-state held a seat. This made it the only major country with a "proper" government.

...Yeah, I didn't count Tenchi. A land of constant civil war seemed less than "proper" to me.

"...So, Caldinian laws don't fully apply to the cities themselves?" I asked.

"Not exactly," Teach said. "There are Caldina-wide laws you'd be penalized for breaking, but the mayor of this city thinks he's above them, and he's not exactly wrong."

"Hm?"

"Yu, where did you log in when you started in Dryfe?"

"Well... Vandelheim?" It seemed obvious to me. You picked a country, you appeared in its capital.

"Yeah. Same here. But in Caldina, the starting city is right here in Cortana."

"Huh?"

"Drag-Nomad, Caldina's capital and seat of congress, moves from place to place. The level ranges of the monsters around it constantly change, so it's not a good place for newbies."

"The capital...moves?" What did she mean by that?

"We'll visit it someday, so I'll tell you the details then. It'll be a surprise!"

"Okay...?"

"Well, anyway, Cortana is Caldina's second major city, its heart of commerce, and the starting point for its Masters. It's extremely important... So much so, in fact, that it's hard to levy any penalties against it."

"..." The president controlled the actual capital, but the mayor of Cortana held the capital city in every sense but its name. Both cities were actually tiny nations, so if you ignored their stated political roles within the union, they were both essentially kings.

And if anyone tried to do something against this particular king, it could negatively impact the country as a whole.

"So what will you do?" I asked.

"I could just tell the prez that I know he's hidin' the Orb somewhere, but that seems lazy...so I'll obviously go and take it!"

"Huh? But..."

"Listen, Yu. The mayor told me that he 'doesn't know about any Orb' and that 'there's no way it's in this city.' So..." she said as she cracked a smile. "...He won't be able to complain if something he 'doesn't know of' and 'isn't here' just disappears. Will he?"

That was basically a declaration that she would steal the Orb.

"Ughh..." a sigh escaped my mouth.

Her face looked just like it had back when we went into the Huang He mafia's casino in Hermine.

We'd spent enough time together for me to understand that despite having an Embryo that let her sense danger better than anyone else, she definitely had a taste for those exact same dangers.

She was the opposite of my sister, who could never have enough safety nets or secondary plans.

Perhaps those two had become friends exactly because they were so different? They did have a similar vibe, though, even if Fran's was more RP-oriented.

"Hold on. Yu, are you thinking that I'm gonna do something rough just for the thrill and the laughs?"

"...Am I wrong?"

"Nope! But that's not all of it."

"Hm?"

"I mean, we're on a time limit. If we just report it to the boss, someone else'll come and take it."

Time limit? Someone else? I wondered.

"Yu. About this Orb-hunt quest...it's not just some grand little adventure with just the two of us."

"...You dragged me into this, you know."

"Yeah yeah, just accept it already. Anyway, what I'm trying to say is that we have rivals on this quest."

"Rivals?"

"Remember how I told you that some of the orbs' powers are already known?"

"Yes."

"Well, there's also people in the world who'd love to take these powers for themselves."

"Those people being...?"

"Well, there's some evidence that Granvaloa's makin' moves to grab the Orb that turns water into land, while Legendaria's degenerates are comin' after the one that Anthropomorphizes monsters.”

“Ah!” That meant that this Orb-hunt was also a race...and that Teach probably wouldn’t be the only Superior that would get involved in it.

And, perhaps most importantly...

“So we’re not the only ones after the Orb in this city?” I asked.

“That’s very likely.” Well, an orb that “gives the user a healthy life, and then a new life eternal” certainly did seem like something a lot of people would want. “Whatever’s comin’, you better hope for the best, but expect the worst. Boy, I suuure wouldn’t like to run into anyone like that,” she said, sounding somewhat joyful.

I had a really bad feeling about this.

The chill running down my spine told me that I should prepare for a battle more intense than the one back in Gideon.

◆◆◆

City of Commerce, Cortana

Cortana was the second largest city in Caldina, and it was built around a giant oasis somewhere in the middle of The Great Desert.

Defying the searing heat, the waters flowing up to form the oasis lake were almost unnaturally pure, making the land around it more than fertile enough to support such a city.

With the exception of the capital of Drag-Nomad, all the cities of this desert country were built around these welcoming patches of land in an otherwise treacherous desert. Even the Gambling City of Hermine was no exception.

Many wondered why the vast scorching desert, home to ferocious giant worms, even had such oases of safety.

There were various theories about this phenomenon, but the most popular one proposed that it was due to the influence of save points.

Currently, save points were best known as the points through which Masters moved to and from a different world, but people had been aware of their existence for a long time.

In fact, save points had actually existed before there were any cities built around them.

As strange as it was, the environments around save points were very conducive to human survival, as though someone was intentionally adjusting them to be that way.

But no matter what the reasons for it were, people were attracted by the safety that save points provided. Over the many centuries, grand cities had been built around them.

Even places that weren't known to be save points at first eventually came to be called that.

The name of whoever had first used the term "save point," though, had been completely lost to history.

As mentioned earlier, Cortana, the City of Commerce, was Caldina's second most important city — though some would argue it was the first. This desert jewel of water and coin was notably affluent even for a Caldinian city.

However, that didn't mean that it was free of the nation's ever-present heat. The oasis made the city slightly cooler than the barren dunes, but compared to the climate in other countries, the temperatures were still unbearably high. Even those used to it would find themselves sweating, while visitors from other countries were in serious danger of suffering heatstroke.

This applied to one of the two people walking in this searing heat — the little girl trudging through the sands. Clad in a red dress, wearing childish boots, and sporting a large ribbon in her hair, she walked while sweating waterfalls.

"Nnh... It's sho hot. I'm gonna melt..."

Though she looked at least ten years old, her manner of speaking made her sound several years younger than that. However, most of those hearing her speech from up close would have the impression that this wasn't an affectation — she simply wasn't very good at talking.

"I wanna go to Dryfe. There's lots of snow there... Or maybe to Granvaloa on the sea... Ah..."

Suffering the heat, she looked up at the person walking beside her and holding her hand — a man who seemed to be in his thirties.

"Mr. Zhan, can I swim in that oasis?" the girl asked.

The man shook his head and said, "You're not allowed to swim in most of Caldina's oases. People get their drinking water from there."

"I see... I guess I won't be swimming then..."

Instead of throwing a tantrum, the girl gave up and continued to trudge along.

“...That café over there sells fruit juice. Want to take a break there?”

“Can I?! Do they have ice scream?”

“They might, but it would melt really fast.”

“Then I’ll eat it fast!” the girl said as she hurried to the café.

Watching her from behind, the man — Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi — said, “...It really is so hard to believe it. I know it’s true, but still...”

At that moment, he was reminded of something that happened a week ago, when he had taken on his current job.

◆◆◆

A Week Before, a Certain Place in Caldina

Zhang, the head of the Caldinian branch of the Huang He mafia called “Mirage,” was having a nightmare.

In it, he saw his battle against a flying blue robot.

He saw how it destroyed the five dragons that were his namesake as well as the crystallization of all his power and technique.

Even after giving it everything he had, he was unable to harm the robot — while the robot’s weaponry blew off his right arm.

“...Ah!”

That was when he woke up.

The nightmare had left him sweating all over. He tried to get up and wipe the sweat from his body, but...

“What is this?”

...he found himself bound to the bed he was lying on.

He then examined the state of his body.

His skin was covered in wounds. Most were marks left by his many days of fighting, but some were completely new to him.

And most importantly, his right arm was missing from the elbow down.

“...I see. So that was no dream.” Zhang realized then that he’d somehow survived his staggering defeat against The Blue Sky Songstress.

Most of his newer wounds showed signs of treatment with Potions or healing magic, but it seemed like whoever had taken care of him had no means of restoring his arm.

He then looked around to examine his surroundings.

He was in a small but hygienic room, highly reminiscent of a hospital. If you ignored the fact that he was bound to the bed, it was a fitting place for someone in his current state.

However, he didn't recognize the room at all.

If this is a sickroom...who is it that helped me? he wondered. At first, Zhang thought it must have been one of his subordinates, but that was impossible. If he had been defeated by AR-I-CA, the others must've suffered the same fate.

It also couldn't be another criminal organization. Zhang had often used his combat-capable status to exercise authority over the other criminal leaders in Hermine. If they found him on the verge of death, they would not have helped him — they would gladly finish him off instead.

A kindly citizen, then...? No, that's the least likely thing of all, he thought before chuckling in self-derision.

His life was definitely not one of virtue. There was no way fate would grace him with salvation at the hands of a benevolent stranger.

In the end, he failed to guess who saved him, and eventually...

"Yo. You awake, Zhang Zangqi?"

...someone entered the room, calling his name.

It was a man, and at first glance it was obvious that he was part of the societal underworld.

First of all, he was clad in a fashionable gray suit. There was no country in Infinite Dendrogram where such suits were worn by upstanding individuals. This kind of clothing only existed in this world because certain Masters had them custom-made.

Over the suit, he wore a trench coat in a strange style, suggesting to Zhang that it was a UBM MVP reward.

And finally, there was a gangster-like hat on top of his head.

All of this combined would make it obvious that he engaged in illegal acts.

At a glance, he wasn't very tall — about 160 centimetels — and he had a young face that made him look no older than twenty, but that only made his threatening aura more intense by contrast.

The crest on the back of his left hand, showing interlocking gears, was proof that he was a Master.

As he observed him, Zhang also realized something else about the newcomer.

This man...is far stronger than I...and perhaps even The Blue Sky Songstress.

In his current state, he wasn't even able to determine the extent of this Master's power.

"Can ya talk?" he asked.

"...I can," Zhang answered.

"That so? Let's start with names, then. I'm Rascal the Bloodonyx. Though, I guess 'The Weapon' works better for you."

"Ah?!" The name filled Zhang with shock.

Everyone in Caldina's criminal underworld knew this name.

The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx — the Superior who made a living exploring ruins and selling the items he discovered. He was especially well-known for his weapons, with some of his finds having made it into the hands of truly infamous criminal organizations.

He was especially well-known for destroying ruins after he was done with them. That was a crime in every country, and he was already on every wanted list for it...but no one had defeated him so far.

Besides that...

"Now, as ya probably know, I'm the sub-leader of the clan known as 'IF.'"

...he was also a core member of the clan whose membership consisted solely of wanted Superiors. With the leader, King of Crime, currently in the gaol, Rascal here was functionally at the top of it.

"IF..."

"Yeah. The clan that was supposed to take the UBM treasure Orb from Huang He off ya hands."

Indeed, that had been the plan. Zhang's role had been to receive the Orb from the main branch in Huang He and give it to IF to create a bond between their groups.

He wasn't told what the groups would do afterwards, but...

"...I am sorry."

"Hm?"

"The Orb was taken from me... I cannot complete the exchange." Zhang had used the Orb during the battle against The Blue Sky Songstress, but he'd been defeated by her regardless, resulting in the loss of both his arm and the Orb. "But...please! Take my life if you must, but please consider making another deal with Mirage!"

Zhang believed that he couldn't let his failure be the cause of a conflict between IF and the organization to which he'd dedicated his life. Mirage was the greatest criminal organization in Huang He, but having faced a Superior himself, he now knew too well that Mirage stood no chance against an entire group of them.

Thus, he tried to prevent that by offering up his own life.

"I see... I'll just get right to the point and say that we can't make deals with Mirage anymore."

Rascal's words almost sent Zhang into despair, but...

"That's 'cause Mirage doesn't exist anymore."

...he then said something Zhang couldn't even understand.

Rascal then began telling Zhang about what happened over the two weeks he'd spent unconscious.

He told him about how Huang He had gotten serious about dismantling Mirage.

About how Dancing Princess, Huili and her Huili Yuminjun — Huili's Army of Fools — had destroyed every Mirage base in Huang He.

About how even the strongest among them, including The Fang, had been either killed or arrested, and their leader had been captured as well.

And about how, by this point, the prosecutions and executions must've already finished.

Zhang's first reaction was silence. Then, having been freed from the bed, he covered his face with his still-healthy left arm...and wept.

He wept from sadness over the destruction of the organization he had given his life to, his own powerlessness to do anything about it, and his guilt over the possibility that things might have turned out differently if he hadn't lost against The Blue Sky Songstress.

"Zhang Zangqi... I know you're having a moment, but can I keep talking?" Rascal asked.

"...Yes," Zhang said, looking at him with reddened eyes. "You saved my life. It would be more fitting for me to listen to your words than to lament my foolishness."

“Actually, I ain’t the one that saved ya. It was the other sub-leader — the one who was gonna make the trade with you. She picked ya up and told me to look after ya.”

The sub-leader in question — King of Thieves, Zeta — was no longer in Caldina. She’d left the country to get involved in the conflict between Altar and Dryfe to the west.

“I see... But that doesn’t change the fact that I am indebted to you,” said Zhang.

“Well, it’s fine if ya think that way. Anyhow, to get to the point, we saved ya because we want ya to join us.”

“...What?” That was so out of the blue that Zhang couldn’t believe his ears.

“Not as an official member, though,” Rascal continued. “In IF, we only take Superiors who are on wanted lists. It’s part of the ‘brand,’ so to speak... Even with that limit, we’ve got dumbasses who misuse their damn powers, though. Haah...” He let out a fatigued sigh as he thought about something.

Zhang didn’t have the slightest idea what it was that Rascal found so draining.

“Sorry about that,” Rascal said. “Anyway, back to the point — I want ya to be a ‘supporting member’ for the clan. You won’t be an official part of it, but you’ll have to assist us with this and that. Most of these supporting members are tians, and we got a pretty good number of them.”

“...But right now, I have nothing. I’ve lost my organization and my subordinates.”

“Your technique and level haven’t gone anywhere. There’s exceptions, sure, but Masters are generally below tians when it comes to technique. We want you, yourself.”

Having been defeated by The Blue Sky Songstress and seen his organization destroyed, Zhang had lost all confidence in his abilities — and yet Rascal sincerely solicited his aid.

“...If you just want my Superior Job, I can take my life. You will know exactly when Great Soul Daoshi can be taken again, giving IF the advantage in the ensuing race to find it.”

“No, that wouldn’t be good for us. We’ve got no one who can take the job, so if ya die, it’ll probably go to some other Master. If that happens, we’ll never have it again. That’ll be no good at all.”

Rascal was basically saying that if they had a Master who could fulfill the job's conditions, they might've already let Zhang die, but that didn't really bother him.

"So, what will become of me? Should I just be locked up until you find someone who can take Great Soul Daoshi?"

"That'd be a waste of human resources. Like I said, our group wants you. We can always use people."

"Why? Why would a group made up of Superiors insist on hiring a mere tian?"

"...Yeah. I suppose I should've opened up about that," Rascal said, looking Zhang straight in the eye.

Then, he slowly began revealing the very foundation of the Illegal Frontier.

"Our goal as IF is to..."

◆

Ten minutes later, Rascal finished telling Zhang all about their intentions.

"And that's what we're planning to do." Zhang silently processed what he had been told...and it all added up to him.

He also understood why IF had tried to make a deal with Mirage.

I see. It does make sense. This explains the actions of both Mirage and IF, he thought.

Through his line of work, Zhang had maxed out Truth Discernment, so he knew that Rascal wasn't lying.

In fact, he didn't even need the skill to know that. The experience gained from dealing with scores of crooks was enough for him to know that Rascal was saying nothing but the truth.

"...I see." From IF's perspective, Mirage's plot was nothing but one of the many options they had for fulfilling their goal, but Zhang could at least understand that they did indeed wish to cooperate with Mirage.

It just so happened that he had been defeated and Mirage had been wiped out by Huang He before the partnership could bear fruit.

"That's how it is. We'd like to have you with us."

"...I have a question."

"Go ahead."

"Which is the next most likely place?"

"Tenchi," Rascal replied in an instant.

"I see..." Zhang said as he closed his eyes.

And when he opened them again, they gleamed with determination.

"In that case, when you face Huang He, put me on the front line. If you can promise me this, I will accept your offer."

"I promise."

The determination in those eyes was also a blazing urge to fight Huang He.

However, it wasn't the dark flame of vengeance.

...Heh. I always thought that Mirage's long-term goal of destroying Huang He was unrealistic... But I suppose that I am a member of Mirage to the core.

He'd dedicated his life to that organization, and now, as its last living member, he was given a chance to do the deed they'd failed to do.

For this, he resolved to live on as a supporting member of IF.

"Don't think you can go off and die just 'cause I put you on the front line, though. It'd be a waste of human resources."

"Yes. I am well aware," Zhang said as he took the hand of Rascal — his new associate. "I will work for you and IF, Mr. Bloodonyx."

"That sounds way too stiff. You're older than me. Just 'Rascal' is fine."

"Well...I suppose I should respect the wishes of my superior. 'Rascal' it is." Zhang considered calling him "Sir" instead, but he thought that might also sound too "stiff" for him.

"Hmph. This ain't about me. I just wanted ya to use something more comfortable. Anyway, thanks for joining us. Can we do the Contract now?"

"Of course."

Rascal then took out a Contract.

This was common practice in the societal underworld. Contracts that forbid actions such as betrayal or leaking secret information were, in a way, the very first step towards earning someone's trust.

However, from what Zhang could tell, IF's contract conditions were unusually relaxed.

The only conditions written on it were "until the time comes, Zhang Zangqi must not talk about IF's goals without the permission of an official member of IF," and "unless the situation is such that Zhang Zangqi deems that there is a high chance he will die, he must obey the orders of the official members of IF."

"Is this really good enough?" On a Contract for the entry to Mirage, the second condition would be more like "if a higher-up tells you to die, you die," and that would be just one condition out of far more than just two. IF's conditions seemed almost lax in comparison.

"Yeah. Knowing what may happen in the future, a contract that's too strict might do more harm than good."

"I see," Zhang said, signing the Contract with his left hand.

And so, the ex-member of Mirage became a supporting member of IF.

"I know you just joined and all, but I already have a job for ya. It'll be your role for the time being."

"That is fine by me. What would this job be?"

My first job in service of the Illegal Frontier, he thought. What kind of trial am I about to be put through, I wonder...? Whatever it is, I will overcome it.

His resolve firm, Zhang waited for Rascal to speak.

And after a brief silence, he...

"I need ya to do some babysitting."

...said something so absurd that almost all of Zhang's resolve dissipated immediately.

A deafening silence followed. Babysitting? As his first job for IF? The idea was enough to make Zhang freeze.

"Sorry about that," said Rascal. "I worded it wrong."

"Oh, no need to apologize..." So he merely misspoke, Zhang thought as he readied himself for his first mission once again.

The words that followed...

"Babysitting's just part of it. There's more to do besides that."

"Babysitting is part of it?!"

...made Zhang raise his voice, completely dispersing the tense atmosphere.

Naturally, he found it hard to simply accept such an unfitting job.

"Are you being serious?!" he asked.

"I'm good at manipulating people, but I don't lie or hide anything. Yeah, we need a babysitter."

Unfortunately, Zhang's Truth Discernment didn't react to anything Rascal was saying.

That meant that, sadly, Rascal was speaking the truth.

"No, wait! What does babysitting have to do with IF?!" Zhang could not see any possible reason that a clan of infamous criminals would need a babysitter.

Do they run a preschool as a subsidiary business? Zhang wondered, when suddenly...

"Is the talking over?"

...the door to the sickroom opened, and a childish voice that sounded quite out of place reached their ears.

Zhang looked at the door and saw a little girl looking in.

She looked no older than ten years old and, likely because of someone else's tastes, was wearing a frilly red dress that wouldn't be out of place in a piano recital.

And on the back of her left hand, there was an Embryo crest showing two crossed axes.

A girl... Is she the one that Rascal wants me to babysi... Hm?! Zhang's thought was cut short by the realization that Rascal's aura had completely changed.

He still looked calm on the surface, but he was clearly extremely tense on the inside, like he was standing right next to a bomb that could explode at the slightest wrong touch.

"Ah. Mister! Are you the new 'support' guy?" the girl asked Zhang, seemingly oblivious to Rascal's state.

"Y-Yes. I just signed the contract."

"I see. Nice to meet you."

"Yes... You too." Still not sure what to make of the situation, Zhang returned the greeting.

He took her extended hand and, careful not to be rough, shook it.

That made the girl happier than one might expect, and she put on a broad, innocent smile.

"You're a good person, mister! A plus! Not an enemy!"

"Hm...?" Zhang didn't understand what she was saying, but also couldn't help but wonder why Rascal relaxed and let out a sigh of relief.

"I'm Emi-ee Killingshton! Call me Emi-ee!"

“Zhang Zangqi. Let’s get along, Emmie.”

“No! Not Emmie! Emi-ee!”

“Hm...?” Zhang tilted his head in confusion. Rascal, growing tense again for some reason, came to his aid.

“...This here’s Emily Killingston. She’s still not good at saying her name.”

“Hey! I can say it fine! Don’t bully me, Rashcal!”

“...Can’t imagine how long it’ll take until you can properly say mine.” Listening to them, Zhang understood the problem of the name and spoke again.

“Sorry about that, ‘Emily.’ Is that better?”

“Yeah!” Emily seemed very satisfied that Zhang had said her name correctly.

“Emily, we’re not done talking, so go play elsewhere. My Machina can keep ya company, can’t she?”

“Huh? But Machinya’s a very bad player. I made the whole Oshello board black!”

“...That dumbass can’t even win a game of Othello against a child?” Rascal heaved a fatigued sigh.

Though they’d barely just met, Zhang already felt that Rascal was dealing with a greater share of problems than most others in IF.

Regardless, he soon sent Emily away.

“Later, mister!”

“L-Later.” Right after the door closed with Emily on the other side...

“Phew...”

...Rascal let out a sigh of relief as if all the tension instantly left his body.

Zhang then asked, “Rascal... Do you want me to ‘babysit’ Emily?”

“Yes. Until now, it’s been me, the other sub-leader, La Crima...and a certain dumbass who got herself jailed who’ve been taking turns looking after her — but now, I’d like to put her in your hands. For the time being, anyway.”

The fact that he mentioned La Crima — a criminal infamous even in Caldina — made Zhang understand that Emily was being cared for by IF’s official members, which said all that needed to be said about her importance.

However, there was something he didn’t get.

Why was Rascal so tense while Emily was here? There was another thing that had him confused: for some reason, Rascal's tension was directed at Zhang as well.

It was as though Rascal had been worried that he would do something to Emily.

That seems like a sign that he doesn't trust me yet, but...

There was something strange about it all.

Rascal did indeed dedicate a bit of his focus to Zhang, but it felt more like he was preparing to jump in to protect him.

That didn't make much sense to him.

"Rascal, what is that girl...?"

"...Hmm." He couldn't exactly come to a conclusion just by thinking about it, and since this was related to his job, Zhang elected to just ask.

And Rascal, being the type who didn't lie or hide anything, readily answered.

"Zhang Zangqi... You didn't use Reveal on her?"

"I didn't..."

"Good move... You might've been a minus if you did."

"Hm?" Zhang couldn't help but note the emphasis on "minus."

It reminded him of how Emily herself called him a "plus." It didn't take much to connect the two terms.

"But...didn't you realize who she is after just hearing her name? As far as we IF members go, she's better known than me, La Crima...and maybe even the leader in some places."

"What? I... Hmm... Ah?!" Zhang tried to remember if he had ever heard the name "Emily," and after a few moments, he did recall something.

He knew the name, but Zhang could hardly connect it to the girl he just met.

Who could blame him? There was no logical way to link that name to a little girl who could barely speak.

"Let's keep talking, Zhang Zangqi," Rascal said as he put a hand on Zhang's shoulder.

"V-Very well..." Zhang replied, still shaken.

"Your first job is to be Emily's babysitter...or 'a supporter for her job.' Though, keep in mind that the job isn't unrelated to you." Rascal, noticing Zhang's state, decided to change the subject. "So, about that UBM Orb that Mirage was supposed to give us... Including that one, there's actually six of them spread out across Caldina. Lots of Superiors the world over, as well as tough guys from the underworld, are coming after them."

"The Orbs...?" The Orb he'd obtained by the order of Mirage's main branch contained a UBM called "Thundershield Beast, Dangai."

It was a very potent weapon, and the idea that there were five more in this country made Zhang quite nervous.

"So you want me to join the competition for the Orbs and take them?"

"No. I mean, it's fine if you do get them, but that's not the top priority."

"What is, then?"

"I want you to observe who's seeking the Orbs. Find out their abilities, goals, personalities, dispositions...and if they'd be open to having a chat and joining us," Rascal said before looking Zhang right in the eye. "We're not after UBMs or MVP rewards, but the human resources they attract."

Those words made Zhang realize something.

Using the Orbs as bait seemed inefficient while they'd been spread across Caldina, but if you looked at it another way...

"...Let me ask something."

"Sure. Ask away."

Gathering his determination, Zhang asked, "Is IF behind spreading the Orbs into Caldina?"

"Yes. The other sub-leader stole seven orbs from Huang He's treasury and spread six of them across this country."

Zhang had actually expected Rascal to dance around this question. After all, one of those Orbs had been the reason why he'd fought The Blue Sky Songstress and lost his right arm.

However, Rascal answered truthfully, still adhering to his creed of never lying or hiding anything.

"...I see. So you made a deal with Mirage to get back something you let go of just so you could use it as bait for human resources?"

"That's only half of it."

"Half?"

"We planned to collaborate with Mirage and execute our plan within Huang He, but with us being as infamous as we are, it'd be hard to trust us if we just approached ya and asked to join forces, wouldn't it?"

"Hm..." In such a case, Mirage would have no doubt assumed that IF had ulterior motives, leaving no room for trust.

"Now, imagine if ya had something really valuable, like a national treasure of Huang He, and solicited our cooperation with that... What happens then?"

"...At the very least, we would understand your motives better. It would put our minds at ease much more than if we'd gotten your trust for free."

"Exactly. There's no such thing as a free lunch, and nobody in the underworld believes in uncompensated kindness. My plan was to gain your trust by first letting ya get your hands on something that could act as a vector for it."

Zhang completely understood Rascal's perspective.

"...Though, that's not to say that I know exactly what she was thinking while going through with the plan," Rascal said, thinking of Zeta. Zhang noticed that Rascal occasionally described his actual feelings, rather than conveying facts, though he couldn't tell whether that was because of Rascal's creed to not lie or hide anything, or if the words merely escaped his mouth on their own.

"I know exactly where some of the Orbs are, and I'll tell ya. You'll go to the closest one from here and get cracking."

Zhang nodded in response before a question from earlier came back to him.

"I understand my job now, but there is one more thing I need to confirm."

"Emily, right?"

"Yes. Is she...truly that Emily?"

"She is." Truth Discernment didn't trigger yet again.

Zhang didn't actually need to ask — he already knew it was the truth.

It was just that he found it so difficult to link the stories he'd heard to the girl he'd seen.

"But as you can tell, she's still a child. We can't just throw her into the desert by herself. We need some human resources by her side... This reminds me of when Zeta said that 'the girl is a whole ten years old, she can travel across the countries and do proper work.' The hell was that about? There's no damn way she can do that. She ain't some prodigy. Child wonders like that probably don't even exist," Rascal trailed off again, but he soon had himself back on track. "Anyway, there's really only one thing I can say to someone who's gonna act as Emily's support."

"And that...would be?"

"Don't become her 'enemy.'"

"'Enemy?'"

"Act like her guardian. Scold and admonish her when you must. But don't disparage her without a purpose. Don't hurt her for no reason. Don't treat her with disdain. Don't flip her 'switch.' Otherwise..."

"Otherwise...?"

"You'll end up seeing her true nature for yourself." Rascal said that with more gravity than he had anything else so far.

That was when Zhang realized that Rascal had been tense because he was worried that Zhang would do something that Emily disliked, letting him see her "true nature" then and there.

"...I will keep this warning in mind."

"I can understand if it's hard to understand and believe, but it won't be long before you do," Rascal said as he gave Zhang a paper with the job details, opened up a map, and pointed to a location. "You'll know when you make it to the location of your first job...Cortana, the City of Commerce."

◆◆◆

City of Commerce, Cortana

A week had passed since then, and both Emily and Zhang had made it to Cortana.

It was worth noting that while Emily was struggling with the heat now, it wasn't a problem for her while traveling on the sands. At that time, they'd been on a small sandboat provided by Rascal.

It was air conditioned, and Emily spent most of her time there, reading picture books and such.

Zhang dealt with the occasional worm, turning them into jiangshi before putting them in Jewels.

During all this time, Emily had not shown even a glimpse of her "true nature," so he still had trouble believing that she was the same Emily that he'd heard so much about.

...But Rascal wasn't lying. There must be something more to her. I just have not seen it yet.

As that thought was running through his mind, Emily, standing at the front of the café, called out to him.

"Mr. Zhan! Are you coming?" The way she did it made her look like a normal child, which brought a bit of a smile to Zhang's face.

Zhang and Emily both were currently wearing accessories that hid their true appearances. This was because Emily, as a member of IF, was a wanted criminal, while Zhang could be targeted due to his ties to Mirage.

The accessories, provided by Rascal, were highly potent. Even the highest levels of Reveal would have trouble with them. First the ship, then these trinkets... Rascal was an absurdly well-prepared man.

In the eyes of passersby, Zhang and Emily likely looked like a normal family or at least close enough to it.

With his right arm being a prosthetic made of Fu, though, he might've stood out at just a bit.

"Yes. I will be there in a moment," Zhang said as he began walking towards Emily...but then something rendered him speechless.

...Why is she...here? The café's windows were large, so you could easily see inside.

And what Zhang saw was The Blue Sky Songstress, sitting at a table and chatting casually.

Indeed — this café they were about to enter was actually the exact location where Hugo had been waiting for AR-I-CA.

She's after the Orbs too, so I guess it makes sense to run into her here, but... To Zhang, this woman was first and foremost the person who had destroyed his organization and taken his right arm. It was safe to call her a sworn enemy.

What do I do...? My job here is reconnaissance... Rascal told me to gather info about the people who come after the Orbs. If I get into trouble here, I might be exposed, and that would make my job harder...

Zhang was actually thinking about his role and how he would execute it. Despite being a man of the underworld, he was rather like a diligent, hardworking citizen.

"Emily, why don't we go to another—?"

"Yay! It says 'ice cream!'" In Zhang's mind, the optimal course of action was to go to another café, but that course of action was shut down by Emily, who read the menu and beamed.

And needless to say, he couldn’t just leave her here.

“Ugh... Come what may.” So, Zhang and Emily both entered the café.

“Oh, we are sorry, but there are no open tables,” an employee said.

“Ahh, now that is unfortunate,” Zhang said, regaining the hope that they could go somewhere else.

“We will have to seat you alongside some other customers.”

Zhang was at a loss for words.

Why? Because the six-person table they were led to was the very one occupied by The Blue Sky Songstress and her group...

“Yaay!”

...and Emily had already taken a seat there.

In silence, the Great Soul Daoshi — the peak of Huang Hean necromancy — prayed for his own bliss in the afterlife.

Chapter Two: Minus

A Certain Place in Caldina

While Zhang was in Cortana, suffering through his unexpected encounter with The Blue Sky Songstress, Rascal was sailing on a boat, heading out to do business with someone in the Gambling City of Hermine.

The boat was cutting through the desert dunes as though they were ocean waves. Caldina had access to technologies from all over the world, and sandboats such as this one were a hybrid technology created by mixing Granvaloan shipwrighting, Dryfean magitech, and magic items from Huang He.

In a way, these boats were some of the most advanced creations in the world, but they actually didn't see all that much use.

The reason for this was that the engine sounds could attract the worms that lived underground, making the journey far more treacherous. These worm monsters were often Demi-Dragon-tier or above, so tians, who naturally wanted to avoid them, preferred to use dragon carriages as they had in the old days.

If they did end up using sandboats, they would opt for the quieter, smaller kind, like the one used by Zhang and Emily.

However, the one carrying Rascal certainly wasn't that kind of ship.

Instead, it was a massive construct that rode the dunes while exterminating any worms that dared attack it. The creatures, attracted by the engine sounds, were instantly shot to bits by the cannons installed all over the hull, quickly turning them into bits of light. It didn't matter if they were Demi-Dragon-Worms or Pure-Dragon-tier Dragon-Worms — they all broke before this giant battleship.

Boasting an overwhelming power, this giant vessel sliced through the dunes while thoroughly negating the great menace of the desert worms. It was an outlandish scene, but it made sense the moment one learned that this ship was the headquarters of IF.

Its name was "The Tetragrammaton."

It was constructed using a three-hundred-metel-long prototype battleship from Granvaloa as a base. A vessel with a dark history, it had been sunk by the SUBM, Twin Moby Dick, during its test run.

Having been sent to the depths of the sea, it was considered unsalvageable; but Zeta — a Granvaloan Superior at the time — knew where it was resting. After joining IF, she suggested to Rascal that they retrieve it, and with a bit of cooperation and the help of one of Rascal's Superior Embryo skills, they went on to do just that.

Since then, Rascal had repaired and improved the ship many times, using pre-ancient civilization technology to turn it into a fearsome battle cruiser capable of dominating both land and sea.

Now, the vessel served as the mobile headquarters of IF.

"...There sure are a lot of them today," Rascal said, glancing through the thick window.

What he saw beyond it were the dunes of Caldina — as well as the ship's mechanical arms, retrieving the loot dropped by the worms.

He was currently the only human on this ship, but he wasn't the one controlling it.

The Tetragrammaton had an autopilot mode, so Rascal, the only actual person on board, could just stay in his room and prepare for the negotiations.

This ship had many rooms, among which was the sickroom where Zhang had awakened two weeks ago. The group's prisoners and members alike had their own living spaces here.

"...That dumbass is the heavier ordnance. It could give away our position to Caldina. I'm not in the mood to sneak through the desert on foot again."

Powerful as it was, The Tetragrammaton wouldn't be enough for Rascal to take on Caldinian Superiors like The Earth by himself. Luckily, his Superior Embryo had a skill that let him store it away, allowing him to hide and log out.

"Master! I brought tea!" someone cried as they entered the room, carrying a tray with a teapot and cup balanced on it.

Dressed in a maid's uniform and sporting green, fluffy hair, the newcomer looked like a beautiful girl in her late teens at first glance. A closer look, however, would show that she wasn't even human.

Most of her body was covered with glossy skin, but her left arm was bare of flesh from the shoulder down, showing its metallic interior. Her well-defined face also seemed to be damaged. There was a large black bandage over the right eye, and her forehead showed signs of something having been removed from it.

She was very obviously a female android — a gynoid — straight out of a sci-fi novel.

Her name was Machina, and she was the Superior Embryo of The Weapon, Rascal the Blackonyx.

"...Machina, turn down the sound and power while exterminating the worms."

"Okaay! More importantly, do you think Emily and Zhang have made it to Cortana yet?!" The way she so casually swept aside her Master's order made Rascal sigh before answering.

"...Yeah. As long as they didn't run into a Superior or some Mythical, they should be there by now. If they get into that kinda trouble, though... Worst-case scenario, Zhang will die and I'll know that through his Contract. They're fine."

He said all of this as though the prospect of little Emily running into Superiors or Mythicals didn't worry him one bit.

"Good to hear! I still need to get back at Emily for beating me at Othello fifty times in a row!"

"Machina... Don't ya think that's way too much?"

"I'm using most of my processing power on other things! If I want to win, I need to rely on your strategy! That goes for Othello too! I won't win if you don't stand behind me and tell me what to do!"

"...What's the point of you playing when I'm making all the moves?"

"I might be able to win by myself with some optimization! I would only need about a hundred more games!"

"...That so?" Rascal whispered as though tired, taking a sip of the tea Machina had brought.

Then, not speaking a word, he slowly set the cup back on the tray before saying, "Hey, you dumb hunk of scrap...what did you use as the water for this?"

"Elixir! You're tired, so I poured a whole five bottles!"

"That so...? Drop down and give me five hundred push-ups."

"Why?!" After giving that order, Rascal picked up the cup of tea again. As awful as it tasted, it was made using five Elixirs — each one costing 100,000 lir. It would be a waste to throw it out, so he drank it properly, all the while making a bitter face.

Boiling the Elixirs had made them lose their effects, so dealing with this only made him feel more tired than he was before.

As his idiot maid began doing her push-ups, he began looking over a certain set of documents.

"My frame...my frame is creaking... Ah, what're you looking at, Master?"

"This here has info about recent sightings of independent Superiors and pre-Superiors. I bought it at the DIN in that town we stopped by yesterday. I haven't gotten the chance to look at it yet."

"Ohh?"

"It's way easier to bring in those who aren't already working for any faction. Zeta was able to take the Hell General away from Dryfe, though. First she stole the Orbs from Huang He, then did this... It's damn impressive."

Rascal couldn't help but respect Zeta's ability. As a capable Superior, the Hell General must've been heavily supported by Dryfe. Rascal honestly had no idea how Zeta had been able to convince him to join IF.

He couldn't possibly have guessed that she merely broke the Hell General's underdeveloped mind in a duel, then persuaded him to join by enticing him with various things he needed.

"Wasn't Gerbera the one you recruited?! And the both of you are sub-leaders! Zeta really is capable!"

Being reminded of the now-jailed problem child made Rascal hurt inside — or perhaps that was just all the boiled medicine starting to take its toll.

"...I know I might be responsible for hiring Gerbera, but saying we're both the same rank makes me look kinda bad, don't ya think?"

"I'm not putting you down, but you should feel guilty! Yep!" Machina said, puffing out her chest.

"That so...? Then, with a guilty heart, I order my Embryo to do five hundred more push-ups."

"Ugh?! Why are you so sadistic to me?! You're nice to other people!"

"...I wouldn't be this way if you got your shit together," Rascal sighed as he resumed reading the documents. Machina was a natural at putting her Master in a foul mood.

Upon reaching a certain page, though, Rascal stopped.

"...I see. So that one's near Cortana now. They might bump into each other."

"Who do you mean by 'that one?'"

"Someone you know. We fought in the desert and the nearby ruins were destroyed before we could completely empty them."

"Oh yeah! Ace, right?!"

"We had a similar encounter with her, but we're talking about independents here! It's the other one!"

"Other one...other one...ohh..." With that, Machina recalled who Rascal was talking about and nodded to herself, doing her push-ups all the while. "Huh? Wait, isn't Cortana the place where Emily went?" she then asked.

"Yeah. I guess I should inform Zhang, just in case... But, man, this is interesting. As a Master, I'd like to see how Zhang and Emily would handle 'em. If at all."

"Okay! Changing course to Cortana right now!"

Following those words, with a low hum, the room — or, rather, the entirety of The Tetragrammaton itself — began to shake as it turned.

Machina's mere thought was enough to move this giant battle cruiser.

However, that wasn't unexpected. The Tetragrammaton's autopilot functioned because Machina, as Rascal's Superior Embryo, was controlling it. As foolish as she appeared to be, she served as the ship's helmsman as well as its central computer.

"Don't! I told you, I've got negotiations in Hermine!"

"I get it! You're just pretending to have negotiations! You actually don't want me to change course at all!"

"I see... Looks like I'll have to take off your defective ears and clean them real good!"

"Yaay! Master's gonna clean my ears! What a rewa— OW OW OW! Don't pull on them! That hurts!"

As they argued, the entire vessel shook, but they were soon back on course towards their business in Hermine.

All of this, however, had rather made them forget to inform Zhang and Emily of the coming storm.

◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

A little while after Teach told me about the location of Cortana’s Orb, we were asked to share the table with a pair of other customers.

“Ice creeeam! Ice creeeam!” Clearly excited to eat some ice cream, one of these customers — a little girl — sat down while singing that song, all smiles.

The other person was a man who looked to be in his thirties, and he sat by the girl’s side wearing a somewhat exhausted expression.

He seemed like her guardian, so at first I assumed they were father and child, but then I noticed the crest on the girl’s hand — and the lack of a similar crest on the man’s. This marked her as a Master and him as a tian.

Personally, I didn’t feel that it was that strange for tians and Masters to associate. Even The Triangle of Wisdom had tian employees like Lufia.

“Hngh... Nh?” Cyco suddenly let out a quiet groan while tilting her head to the side.

I looked at her face and noticed that she didn’t seem too well.

“What’s wrong, Cyco?”

“I feel kinda...chilly.” Chilly? In this weather? Was it because of the ice cream? It was so hot that it was more like a milkshake than ice cream right now, though...

“I’m going back in for a bit,” she said before returning to the crest on my left hand.

That made the little girl’s eyes go wide with surprise.

“Wow! She was a ‘Mayden!’” she said, flashing a childish smile brimming with wonder and joy. “Mister, you’re a ‘Mastar’ too!”

“Yeah. I am.”

“Wow! Wow! That’s sooo nice! I never saw a ‘Mayden’ before!”

“Huh? Ohh, right...” I was a Master with a Maiden Embryo and knew other people like me, so I tended to forget that Maidens were actually pretty rare.

This girl surely wasn’t the only one who had never seen a Maiden.

“Umm! The ones I saw were, uh...a slimey, a buggy, a thingy you can’t see...and another thingy you can’t see!” A slime guardian, a bug-like guardian, and two Embryos she couldn’t see... Territory types without any visual effects, maybe?

A part of me noted that she probably couldn't say that she "saw" those Embryos if she "couldn't see them," but this was just how conversations with children went — nuanced in a very strange way.

Also, the girl really wasn't very good at speaking. She looked about ten, but her actual age might've been even lower. Many people on the younger side created avatars older than themselves. I myself was one of them...

The tian man accompanying her might've seemed anxious exactly because this girl was so childish. It seemed likely that, since the girl was so young, her actual guardians had gotten a trustworthy tian to look after her.

"Ah. There's Machinya too!" she said.

"'Machinya?'"

"Machinya is very very clumsy and very very bad at Oshello! Rashcal always gets mad at her! But we are friends!" Based on the flow of the conversation, this "Machinya" was an Embryo as well as her friend. Since she said she'd never seen a Maiden, it must've been a humanlike Guardian instead, like that one succubus.

"Hm...?" Feeling that something wasn't right, I turned to Teach.

She hadn't said a single word since we'd been joined by the girl and the man. Her expression hadn't changed, but the atmosphere around her was different somehow.

Most notably, the iris of her right eye — her Superior Embryo — was changing intensely, like a kaleidoscope.

Also, for some reason the tian man accompanying the girl was sweating profusely, and it didn't feel like it was because of the heat.

"Mr. Zhan, you're swetting a lot. Are you okay?"

"Yes... No need to worry."

"Really? But talking so much made me very swetty too! It's sho hot! Your clothes look very hot too, mister!"

"Ah. Yeah. But I'm used to wearing this in the desert."

I was curious about Teach and the tian man, but I couldn't just ignore the girl.

"I never get this hot over there, so it makes me very tired."

"'Over there?'"

"Outside of Dendrogryam!"

"Ohh. Well, it's hard to feel heat like this if you don't live somewhere that's hot."

"Yeah! And I'm always in a bed inside a white room with air-condishonining, so I only feel hot or cold when I'm here!" A bed inside a white room...a hospital, I assume?

I vaguely remembered reading an internet article that talked about hospitalized children who go on trips inside Infinite Dendrogram. The monsters, though, made it necessary for them to be accompanied by skilled attendants. It always reminded me of the adventurer guild quests from low-level Masters looking for bodyguards who would escort them to scenic locations.

"Your ice cream, little lady," a waitress said as she brought the girl's order in.

"Yaay!" the girl cheered.

Just like Cyco's, the ice cream instantly began to melt, but...

"Wow, it looks so tasty! Thank you very much, it was delishus!"

...it all vanished in the blink of an eye, leaving the cup empty.

"...Huh?" The sudden change left me perplexed. The tian employee who brought the ice cream also tilted her head in confusion, whispering, "It was just there, wasn't it?"

However, Teach and the tian man had different reactions.

The tian man seemed surprised by something, while Teach...was smiling.

"Little lady, did you really have to eat the ice cream at supersonic speed?"

"Huh? But it would melt if I didn't..."

"Ha ha hah! That's true! It wouldn't be ice cream if it melted! With the weather like this, I guess it makes sense to eat it before it melts! Well, your experienced time is still the same, so maybe it really is better." While Teach laughed, the girl used her spoon to eat what little remained of the ice cream.

The peaceful scene did nothing to change the meaning of their exchange.

Teach had just said that this little girl moved at supersonic speeds — an impressive feat available only to a select group of individuals, most of them battle-focused.

"...W-Well, you got your ice cream, so let's go, shall we?" the tian man, still somewhat shocked, said as he laid down the payment and stood up in such a hurry that it seemed awkward. “Okaay! Bye-bye, mister and miss!”

The two then left the café, leaving me and Teach behind.

“Yu, follow those two.”

“Huh?”

“While I go retrieve the Orb, you keep an eye on those two. If something happens, use La Porte de l’Enfer to suppress them. It’s a hard counter to them, I’m sure of it.”

“Teach, what do you...?!”

“If I explain, they’ll get away. Act now. I’ll give you the details through Telepathy Cuffs.”

That was when I realized she was completely serious.

She’d kept her composure even when fighting the Huang He mafia back in Hermine, yet all of that was completely gone now.

I also realized that to her, that exchange with the girl was about more than just the supersonic speed.

“All right...” I’d ask for details later. For now, I stood up and went out to search for the pair.

“‘Machina’ and ‘Rascal’... Haven’t heard those names in a while,” I heard Teach say behind me, her tone dense with displeasure. “A girl Master who says those names like they’re friends... If she’s who I think she is, then things might get really bad.”

◆◆◆

City of Commerce, Cortana

Overcome with unease, Zhang rushed through the streets of Cortana with Emily beside him. That conversation...her eyes and aura... There is no mistaking that she knows, he thought.

Not even Zhang expected Emily to reveal IF-related information so casually.

The Master that was with The Blue Sky Songstress seemed clueless, but she herself suspected us from the moment we sat down, and those suspicions were confirmed when Emily spoke Rascal’s name.

And to top it all off, Emily performed the absurd feat of eating ice cream at supersonic speed.

Zhang hadn’t even known that she was capable of that, and he certainly didn't expect her to do it in front of someone who could be one of their enemies.

With that, the disguises given to them by their accessories became completely pointless.

"Emily, why were you so incautious in front of our enemies?" Zhang asked.

"Huh? Enemies? Who?"

"The Blue Sky Songstress and the other Master. We were sitting with them," Zhang answered, still holding Emily's hand.

"But the mister and miss weren't enemies..." The girl tilted her head in confusion. "I mean, they weren't minuses. Also..."

"Also...what?" Zhang already heard the word "minus" before, so he was more curious about what she had to say beyond that.

However, before Emily could answer...

"Whoa, would ya lookit that. Travelers? In a place like this?"

"Heh heh heh heh heh. What brought ya to our alley? Lookin' for somethin'?"

...a bunch of men — clearly not respectable individuals — stepped out in front of them and blocked their path.

Armed and with malicious grins on their faces, they moved to surround the pair.

...I made a grave mistake. I was so focused on getting away from the café that I chose the wrong turn, Zhang thought.

He was deeply familiar with their type. They targeted those weaker than themselves and took their valuables or even lives. While in charge of the Huang He mafia in Hermine, he used to suppress these kinds of people every time they overstepped their boundaries.

Another thing he knew about them was that they were often terrible at gauging their targets' power.

"Wow, the brat's a damn Master."

"Heh! I'm not gonna be scared of a little girl just 'cause of that."

"Hey, you two — if ya don't wanna get hurt, ya better start layin' down your cash."

The thugs hadn't the slightest clue that Zhang was a Superior Job or that Emily was part of Illegal Frontier. They didn't even entertain the idea that they were the weaklings here — they assumed that these two were no different than their usual victims.

In this particular scenario, Zhang and Emily's disguise accessories were actually a drawback. If they revealed their true powers, those who came to Cortana in search of the Orb would be wary of them, so the accessories were set to make them look non-threatening. Even Reveal would show fake stats that made them look like common folk, so perhaps it was hard to blame the men for thinking they were easy targets.

Though, in a way, the criminals' mistakes weren't quite fatal yet. Perhaps if they felt an instinct or something warning them to run, this encounter wouldn't escalate any further.

After all, they were still in her gray zone.

But then, they sealed their own doom.

"You gonna just stand there or what?!" The largest man among them stuck out his weapon...

"Fork over the money! I'll kill ya!"

...and said those words — the greatest mistake of his life.

"...Minus." Two sounds followed, and Zhang needed a moment to figure out their source.

The first sound was a voice as cold as ice, and Zhang just barely realized that it belonged to Emily.

The second sound only lasted for a split second, making it extremely hard to guess what it was.

It took Zhang a long moment to figure out that it was the sound of a blade splitting the man from the top of his head to his groin.

The blade in question was a reddish-black axe that shone with a faint luster like dried blood. Its overall shape was similar to a tomahawk, but the blade was styled like the spread wing of a raptor.

That detail made the blade look like decoration, but any doubts about its ability to cut were dispersed by the fact that it had just severed a human in half.

And the one holding this blade...was Emily.

The blade that had just brutalized a man was clutched in her right hand, but she held another one just like it — though still unbloodied — in her left. She was facing away from Zhang, and though the appearance of the axes was the only thing that had changed about her physically, her aura was completely different.

“Emi...ly?” Zhang hesitantly called out, but the girl didn’t turn to him.

This made it impossible for him to see her expression. Somehow, he doubted that it even looked human.

However, from the angle of her neck, he could at least guess what she was looking at.

She was looking at the men who were still alive — and who had just witnessed one of their own be split in half, his entrails spilling onto the ground and starting to reek in the sweltering heat. They could barely process what was happening.

“Huh...ah? Huhh?”

“H-Howard? Huh? B-But he’s a...high-rank...” They stared at the man’s remains in disbelief.

But then they noticed Emily...looking right at them.

“AIEEEE?!”

“A-AHHHHHHHHH!”

Just what was it that they’d seen in her gaze?

Whatever it was made them flee in abject terror, some tripping over themselves.

However, one remained, practically popping a blood vessel as he glared back at her with his face twisted in rage.

“My bro... YOU FUCKIN’ DEMON!” The man raised up his two-handed sword, but the moment he did that, Emily threw the axe in her left hand.

Spinning wildly, it flew into the man’s raised arms and severed them at the elbows...

But then it flew back like a boomerang...and decapitated him.

When the axe returned to her, there were now two bodies on the ground — one without a head and one split in half.

Upon seeing this, the remaining men screamed again and fled with even more fervor. However, Emily merely watched them run away, showing no intent to follow.

Throughout it all, Zhang wasn’t moving a muscle.

It wasn’t fear that had immobilized him — he hesitated to move because for all he knew, that could set her off.

Once the men were completely out of her sight, Emily began to do something else.

She stuck an axe into each of the remains.

At first, it seemed like she was getting rid of the bodies, but that wasn't her aim.

The axes began absorbing the remains as though they were drinking water. The corpses dried up at an immense speed — and soon enough, the water within them as well as each and every cell they had were completely gone.

Then...they turned into motes of light.

Tians were supposed to leave behind corpses, yet here, they had turned into light and vanished like monsters and Masters.

The motes soon mixed with the passing desert wind and were completely gone out of sight.

Once that was done, Emily turned back to Zhang.

"Mr. Zhan? What's wrong?"

Emily's curious eyes as she gazed at Zhang were all innocence. They were pure — certainly not the eyes of someone who'd just committed a brutal murder.

This perplexed Zhang, making it hard for him to respond.

But eventually...

"Emily..."

"Yes? What is it?"

"...What were you going to say?"

...he spoke up, but didn't ask about what happened just now.

Perhaps he simply needed a moment to collect himself before asking about the brutality he'd just witnessed.

Regardless...he certainly didn't know that he would get his answer immediately.

"When?"

"You said 'They weren't minuses. Also...' You were about to say something, right?"

"Oh! I remember!" Emily said. "I was saying that if they were enemies, they'd just go away somewhere. That's why that mister and miss weren't enemies!"

Cryptic words, spoken with an innocent smile.

"'Go away somewhere?'"

"Yep! People who become enemies hate me, so they get away from me.

I wonder where they go...”

As terrifying as it was, Zhang’s Truth Discernment didn’t go off.

The one flaw the skill had was that it didn’t react to words that the speaker honestly believed were true.

This meant that Emily actually thought that people who became her enemies simply went away from her...when the reality was that she killed them. Every last one of them.

So this...is her “true nature,” huh? Zhang now fully understood what Rascal had meant.

When faced with someone she saw as an enemy, Emily was like a machine that instantly sliced them apart. However, she didn’t actually remember any of these murders.

If Zhang somehow became her enemy, she would instantly kill him and not even recall the event.

Just...how? How does a person like her come to be? Zhang had been through a lot and seen all manner of people, yet the true nature of the little girl before him sent chills down his spine.

At the same time, however, he now understood that this Emily was the same Emily that he’d heard rumors about.

She was the holder of the Superior Job “Murder Princess,” which was unlocked by killing at least ten thousand people using melee weapons.

She was the bearer of the Superior Embryo, “Soul-Eating Axes, Youaltepuztli” — a pair of blood-colored hatchets.

She was the most infamous serial killer among all Superiors...Emily Killingston, “the Kill Leader.”

Chapter Three: The Gaunt Man

The Tetragrammaton

"Yeah, that's right. It's likely that that one's in Cortana too... Huh? The Blue Sky Songstress? I did consider it, but it looks like Caldina really is plannin' to gather everything."

In his own room aboard The Tetragrammaton, Rascal was talking into a magic comms item. On the other end of the line was Zhang; the purpose of this call was to inform him about the Superior that was sighted in Caldina, but Zhang responded by saying that he'd run into AR-I-CA and that she most likely knew who they were.

"First of all, use those accessories to change your appearance again. Yeah. Like I said before, just twist the knob to choose between five different disguises. It'll buy ya time, at least," Rascal said, explaining what he thought was the current optimal approach to Zhang. "Your top priority is survival. Data gatherin' is secondary, and gettin' the Orb is tertiary. And don't worry about Emily. If a massacre breaks out, just wait in a safe place before pickin' her up. Yeah, that'll be fine... All right, then, keep it up."

Having said all he needed to, Rascal cut the call. Machina was still doing push-ups at his side, and he set the comms device on her head.

Supporting herself with just her left arm, she used her right to move the bandage over her right eye slightly, prompting the device to smoothly roll into the gap between her eye and the bandage and be stored within.

The device was as big as a palm, yet it had no trouble fitting into that seemingly small space.

Rascal was quite familiar with the workings behind this, so he didn't even comment on it.

"Zhang didn't ask why it was okay to leave Emily. I guess he finally discovered her true nature." Based on Zhang's words and tone, Rascal could tell that the two of them had already been caught up in some trouble that had exposed Emily's true nature, just as he'd expected.

"Well, Caldina's cities are full of people she'd see as enemies," he added.

“Up, down, up, down... Master, I always wondered... What do you actually think about Emily’s thing?” Machina asked, still doing her push-ups.

“By ‘thing,’ you mean...?”

“The Emilynation Mode, of course!”

“...Oh, that was the name the dumbass gave it before she headed out to Altar,” Rascal noted, remembering Gerbera’s smug face as she said it to him. “I can’t believe how proud she was of that one. ‘It’s like elimination, but it has her name!’ she said, grinnin’ obnoxiously and puffing out her chest...not like she’s got anything to puff out.”

“How lecherous of you to stare at a lady’s pa— I mean, chest-armor! Also, you’re not one to talk! You’re the one who named this ship!”

“What’s wrong with ‘Tetragrammaton?’”

“...Wow! That’s a serious face!”

Rascal was indeed the one who had named this ship. At the time the vehicle was restored, Illegal Frontier had four members, each with an Embryo related to gods. So, he’d chosen “Tetragrammaton,” which referred to “the four letters of God.”

Another reason for the name, though, was the fact that Machina would be the one controlling it.

“...Back to the topic of Emily,” said Rascal. “After she does the switch, her mind and actions are fixed on the sole purpose of killing anyone she sees as an enemy. And as you know, she forgets it all once it’s done. That’s how her ‘thing’ works.”

The people she saw as enemies were the ones her brain personally judged as “minuses.” Based on Rascal’s experience, he believed that Emily remembered absolutely everything other people did to her. She remembered who was a plus or a minus to her — and if they were the latter, she would deem them an enemy and slaughter them.

Because of this, she was most dangerous during her first impression of a person, when they were neither a plus nor a minus.

If someone she just met raised a weapon against her or threatened to kill her, she would see them as enemies immediately and kill them even if the threats were empty ones. There was even a chance that it would develop into a “chain.”

That was the reason why Rascal was so tense when Zhang and Emily first met. If Zhang had done something “minus”-like, she might’ve killed him right there.

It also meant that she would never murder a fellow member of IF.

As long as the plus-minus system inside her head was functional, it was difficult for her to ever view her friends at IF — who had many pluses in her book — as enemies.

That dumbass almost managed it, though, Rascal thought, thinking of Gerbera. Emily had grown very attached to her since then, however, for reasons unknown to Rascal.

When Rascal had asked, Gerbera seemed to be just as ignorant of the reason; Emily on the other hand had only said, “It was very very tasty!”

Back then, the question of what had caused them to become so close had bothered him to no end.

The answer to that question turned out to be a chance encounter where Emily had walked in on Gerbera while she was making sweets. Gerbera had casually offered some to Emily, and they were so delicious that the girl had instantly become attached to her.

Back then, Emily was the only IF member who had any idea that Gerbera’s sweet-making skills were extraordinary. Not even Gerbera herself was truly aware of it.

“But Emily is human, isn’t she? Why is it that she can basically become a killing machine?” Machina asked.

“...This is just my outlook, but I think it’s a kind of mental illness.”

“Hmm?”

“It’s basically an alternate personality focused on nothin’ but murder... Though, I’m not sure if it can even be called a ‘personality.’ She just kills her enemies, then watches out for any more enemies, then goes on to kill those enemies, repeating this loop until they’re all gone.”

“Hmm... That reminds me of the robots we find in the ruins.”

“Yeah. Like you said, it’s almost mechanical... It’s like she boots up some sort of murder program. Though, knowing her real life, it’s not that weird for her to develop these kinds of symptoms. ‘Reality is stranger than fiction,’ as they say.”

Rascal wasn’t as uninvested in this as he initially appeared.

For certain reasons, he knew of Emily’s situation in real life. He was aware that the Emily here was no different from the Emily on the other side...her true nature included.

Thankfully, her real self was never in any situations that would call for her to switch to murder mode.

Or more accurately, it was no longer possible for that to happen.

I guess we can only hope that her condition subsides as she matures, Rascal casually thought. Good thing it's not a big deal if you kill people here. Between that and the tripled time, I'd say this is a pretty good environment for her.

"Master! Why are you so quiet?! Is all the sweat from these push-ups highlighting my curves that well?! Feel free to come and get some, in that case!"

"Like hell, ya piece of scrap. And you don't even have the glands. You can't sweat."

"Not with that attitude!" Machina said before letting out a war cry and speeding up her push-ups.

Needless to say, not a drop of sweat resulted.

"Oh yeah! I just remembered something!"

"What?"

"I asked Zeta the same thing before! She gave me a different answer! She's the correct one, right?!"

"...Why are ya so confident I'm below Zeta?" Rascal said with a sigh before shifting to the topic of Zeta's outlook. "Yeah, Zeta has a different opinion on Emily. She thinks that Emily's still conscious after she switches, and later uses extreme autosuggestion to make herself believe she didn't do anythin'. I'm not convinced you can fool Truth Discernment like that, but I guess it's not impossible."

Part of Rascal thought that such distinction meant nothing to post-switch Emily.

"Hmm? Which one of you is right, then?" Machina asked.

"To find that out, you'd have ta look directly into Emily's mind. And with the player protection system in place, that's not happenin'. Even if ya bring a Superior Embryo."

Rascal believed that Emily's killing mode was a symptom of mental illness, while Zeta thought it was all acting and autosuggestion. At this point, no one could know which one of them was right, for not even Rascal knew of any Embryos that could interfere with the minds of Masters.

"Regardless, the result will be the same. There's no point thinkin' about it."

"Result of what?"

"With The Blue Sky Songstress, Emily, and that one we talked about, Cortana's Orb has three Superiors gathered around it. It's gonna get ugly."

The city was on the verge of becoming a battlefield. The explosives were set, and now all it needed was a spark to set it off.

However...

"No matter what, Emily'll be the last one standing. That's gonna be the result, and it ever ain't gonna change."

Regardless what kind of battle ensued, The Weapon, Rascal the Bloodonyx, was absolutely certain that Emily would never fall.

"That is true!" nodded his Embryo.

Everyone else in IF who knew Emily would have surely agreed with them.

They all knew how extreme Emily's abilities truly were.

"Her job is to observe, though. The other two'll fight before she gets involved... But I don't think she'll stop at just 'observin',"' Rascal said as he gazed out the window, in the direction of Cortana.

◇◆◇

City of Commerce, Cortana

After leaving the café, AR-I-CA went to a particularly gaudy mansion here in Cortana — the mayor's residence.

With her back against the mansion's walls, she was communicating with Hugo.

"I'm sorry, Teach," he said. "I lost them."

He'd combed through the café's surroundings but failed to find the pair they'd shared a table with. While searching, he'd passed by a bunch of terrified men — but besides that, he'd found nothing of note.

"Yeah, they probably changed their appearances," AR-I-CA said. "There's accessories that give you multiple disguises to choose from." The face Emily "wore" at the café was different than the one in her wanted photo, so AR-I-CA was fairly certain about this. "Her appearance and stats might be fake, but her actions will be all too real. If she's really who I think she is, then she'll definitely do something. You just go wherever there's any sign of trouble."

"...All right."

"Anyway, I'll go grab the Orb off the mayor. Byeee!" AR-I-CA said before ending the call.

Okay, I'll leave the girl to Yu for now and just get this over with, she thought. She'd already told Hugo about the Murder Princess. There was still no guarantee that the girl was really her —but you could never be too careful.

The atrocities committed by the Murder Princess were many and well-known. It was said that she'd even slaughtered each and every single member of the Pentagon Caravan — the 469-strong clan that was second in Caldina's rankings.

We know her job, but we don't know much about her Embryo. That's bad. The details of the Murder Princess job were well-known even among tians, but the details of her Embryo, Youaltepuztli, were a mystery even to Sefirot.

All that they really knew about it was that it was focused not on large-scale destruction, but rather on lengthy battles against many enemies.

Remembering a fellow Sefirot member who was focused on endurance battles, AR-I-CA tried speculating about the Murder Princess. Is she like our boy Carl? If your defense is broken, you can take out lots of people one by one. But man...I'm glad I had Yu and Cyco with me when she came. Going by Cyco's reaction, it should work real good.

AR-I-CA had a good guess about what caused Cyco to change.

Embryos with skills based on certain numbers had some sort of sensitivity to those same numbers. Ray Starling's Nemesis, for example, had an innate counter that tracked the amount of damage Ray suffered.

Similarly, Cyco could just feel how much of a kinslayer someone was.

Faced with the Murder Princess's obscenely high kill count of her own kind, Cyco, understandably, had found her senses overwhelmed.

However, that also meant that...

They're probably the Murder Princess's greatest enemy.

...she would be extremely susceptible to the effects of Cyco's La Porte de l'Enfer.

The skill Froze targets based on the amount of their own kind they'd killed. If Hugo could just activate it, the Murder Princess — whose kill count far exceeded a hundred — would Freeze without a doubt.

That skill alone should end the battle, and White Rose should be able to hold out until Yu can use it... Fran made that thing really tough.

MGFX 002 White Rose — the unit that Mr. Franklin of The Triangle of Wisdom gifted to his little sibling, Hugo. Its multilayered armor, Fleur d'Hiver, was created with extremely sturdy material as well as having its defense enhanced with skills. If AR-I-CA's assumption was correct, the surface armor was actually made of the Mythical metal — the scarlet Hihi'irokane. It was just a different color, either because adding the self-repair function had changed the metal's properties or because Franklin had just made it white somehow.

Regardless, it was clear that no Magingear in this world was sturdier than White Rose. It could no doubt withstand even the Murder Princess's attacks.

It probably cost several times more than Opera. It has crazy stats too... Looks like Fran intends to keep the promise she made to me. I dunno about the "entrusting to Yu" part, though...

AR-I-CA cracked a smile as she recalled the promise she'd shared with her dear friend before leaving The Triangle of Wisdom.

"I guess that promise will have to wait until Yu's grown some more," she whispered to herself before switching gears.

Now, she would infiltrate the mayor's mansion.

AR-I-CA could sense danger, so it wasn't difficult for her to sneak past the security. If she could acquire the Orb just like that, everything would be fine — and if the mayor had it on his person, she'd set up an ambush and take it using Blue Opera's supersonic speed.

Killing him could destabilize the city, so she was planning to just take the Orb and get out. If that caused any political problems, she'd just leave them to her sponsor — the president.

"Let's-a go then! Wait, huh?" As she psyched herself up to cross the wall and start the operation, she noticed something happening at the main gates.

"ARE YOU MESSING WITH US?!"

"..."

It was a conversation. One side could be heard easily, but distance made it hard to hear the other.

AR-I-CA considered the situation.

An incident at the front gates would act as a good distraction for her operation. However, her woman's intuition — a force separate from Cassandra — told her that things could be bad if she didn't figure out exactly what was happening.

With that in mind, she leaped over the wall and entered the mansion's garden before making her way closer to the gate, keeping concealed behind trees and greenery all the while.

Of course, she was there in no time.

At the gates, there was a group of ten men. Or more accurately, a group of nine men and one lone man.

The nine were brawny tians who, based on the results of Reveal, were all over level 300 — very impressive for Caldinians. That, combined with their high-grade equipment, led AR-I-CA to assume that they were members of the private army tasked to protect the mayor's mansion.

Tians were still seen as better full-time guards than Masters. People who had a tendency to suddenly disappear were obviously unfit to provide security for anyone.

The person facing these tians seemed to be the exact opposite of them.

He had a gaunt face and a body so thin a strong wind could blow him away. Not even his loose robe could hide just how lean the man was. If someone said that he'd just recovered from a serious illness, no one would doubt them for a second.

AR-I-CA's Reveal told her that his stats were far below those of the men, but...

...They're fake, she thought. Her instincts told her that the man wasn't weak, but had only made himself seem that way.

"What's yer deal, anyway?! Ya think ya can just waltz in here and see the mayor just like that...?!"

"I'm sorry... I just need to talk to him. But if I told you why...it wouldn't be good for him."

"And ya expect us to understand ya?! Ya got any clue how shady ya look right now?! There's no damn way we can let ya see 'im!"

"I suppose you're right... Ohh, how should I put it...?"

The man hung his head and put his left hand over his forehead, revealing a crest depicting “a woman holding a skull.”

The lone man facing the tough private soldiers was a Master.

“Ohh. I see, I see. This much can be said, I think...”

“What?! Say it!”

“Please pass this message on, from me to him: ‘Please show me the Orb’ and ‘I heard about this from Fria’...”

The representative of the soldiers pondered this for a moment.

The gaunt man was no doubt suspicious, but he was also a Master, making it possible that he had good reasons for being here. They’d had a visit from a Superior just yesterday, and perhaps this man was somehow related to that.

“Wait here!” the representative said before returning to the mansion.

A few minutes later, he returned, accompanied by the Mayor of Cortana, Douglas Coin. His complexion was as good as it was when AR-I-CA saw him yesterday, but his expression was laden with profound distress.

“Are you the Master who sent the message?” he asked.

“Yes,” the gaunt man replied. “I came here to look at the UBM Orb you have.”

“I have no idea what you are talking about!” the mayor insisted. I knew it! A robber seeking the Orb of De Vermis! he thought, panicking.

The mayor was secretly keeping the Orb containing an Ancient Legendary UBM called “The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis.”

Just some time ago, he’d used it to make himself younger.

Some Orbs could only be used if you knew exactly how to use them, but De Vermis was different. Anyone who possessed it and merely desired its power would quickly be granted healthy bodies.

After wishing upon the Orb, the mayor had actually regained his youth overnight.

De Vermis was also particularly loyal. The day after the mayor became healthy, the Orb began talking directly to his mind, telling him how to perform a ritual that would grant him “a new life eternal.”

He was actually working on that even now.

I only need three more days... Then I will finally be immortal!

Having gained immense wealth and power even for a Caldinian elite, just like many others before him, he now craved immortality.

De Vermis had told him that “a new life eternal” would not only be impervious to death, but also grant him immense amounts of power.

When that happens, I will no longer need to fear the congress or any Superior! That is why I simply cannot let them take De Vermis!

That was why he'd ordered his maid to assassinate AR-I-CA last night. Doing so would buy him the time he needed to finally become immortal and gain the power to resist those who would judge him for it.

Most would see his line of thinking as extremely narrow-minded, but the mayor couldn't understand that perspective. He was so close to the impossible goal of achieving immortality, after all.

"But...Fria is telling me that you have it..." Though the mayor denied it, the gaunt man weakly, but with certainty, claimed otherwise.

"That is what I came to ask! Why do you know about Fria...?! What is your relationship with her?! Speak!"

For some reason, the man's words had driven the mayor into a panic. Neither the personal soldiers nor AR-I-CA could understand why.

However, the gaunt man could.

"...'Speak'? Do you really want me to?" the man asked as he looked around. It was hard to tell if he was looking at the mayor's soldiers, AR-I-CA, both, or neither.

"Yes! Do it! After all, she could not possibly have told you about any Orb! It's impossible!"

"Impossible because...she died years before you even had it?" the man asked, looking straight at the mayor.

No, not at him, but...

"But it was Fria who told me about the Orb. And she did so just minutes ago, actually. After all..."

"Fria...the same Fria that you tortured and killed...is right over there," he said, pointing behind the mayor.

"Wh-What...?" The mayor hesitantly turned around, but there was nothing there.

He wasn't the only one confused. The soldiers and AR-I-CA also didn't see anything.

However, anyone with Truth Discernment saw that it wasn't a lie, and the man's eyes were focused on the space as if there was truly something there.

"She's saying that she's the wife of your political opponent and that you brought them down and killed them."

"W-Wait..."

"And...Fria is far from the only one who's buried underneath this mansion. Ohh... I was wondering why there aren't any dead children in this city's streets. You were gathering them up... Wait, some died after you got the Orb... A total of a hundred and ninety-eight, it seems. And most died as slaves..."

"Wait! What are you saying?!" the mayor shouted, thoroughly confused.

It wasn't because the man was speaking nonsense. Quite the opposite, in fact — he had a full grasp of the deeds the mayor had committed under his mansion, right down to the number of people involved.

To complete the ritual to gain "a new life eternal," he'd secretly gathered corpses and even killed slaves, but the gaunt man knew it all.

He even knew of the sins the mayor had committed long before he even knew of the ritual.

"Ohh... I'm sorry," the man said. "I happen to have this skill, Soul Sight...which, well, lets me see souls. That includes people who are no longer with us. I can talk to them and even negotiate with them. Fria actually told me about your crimes in exchange for doing her a certain favor."

Upon hearing those words, the mayor was overcome by shock.

He was well aware of the skill this man had just named.

"Soul Sight...! Th-That... That is the ultimate job skill of the necromancer grouping...!"

"...Huh? Ohh... I'm sorry... I haven't introduced myself yet."

The man put his hand to his chest...

"My name is Benetnasch. My job is...King of Tartarus."

...and declared himself transcendent.

"King of...King of Tartarus?!" the mayor exclaimed in a panic, backing away. The mayor's soldiers all stepped in front of him, but their expressions were stern, clearly showing their fear of Benetnasch.

Unlike Masters, who had well-rounded avatars crafted by the control AIs, tians were born with sets of talents that prohibited all but a few of them from ever acquiring Superior Jobs. This made them acutely aware of just how powerful the bearers of these jobs were.

"So, let me ask again... May we talk about that Orb you have?" Benetnasch asked.

"Y-You're planning to take it from me...!" said the mayor, showing no intention of hiding the truth any longer. It was obviously futile by this point — if Benetnasch's stats as they appeared to Reveal were indeed fake and he was actually the King of Tartarus, then it was fair to assume he had accessories with skills like Truth Discernment.

The mayor also used a magic item to activate a barrier around the mansion that would prevent people from noticing whatever happened inside it.

After all, if someone were to hear the sins Benetnasch had alluded to, not even his position as a mayor would save him from severe punishment.

"For now, I just want to see it," said Benetnasch. "I still don't know if it has the power I seek. If it doesn't, I'll back off..."

"And what if it does?!" the mayor exclaimed.

"If it happens to have the power I want...I would like to have it. Through a trade, of course."

"A trade...?" the mayor asked.

Benetnasch nodded before replying, "The souls here told me about many of your crimes...but I won't report any of them to the Caldinian congress if you have what I want. Oh, but if it isn't what I want, I'll report it regardless. It's what I promised to your victims."

"Guh...!" the mayor winced. Burglary was a crime that could get you on a wanted list. Because of this, Benetnasch wanted to get the Orb with a trade instead of just taking it — but to the mayor, this was no better than blackmail.

The courts of Infinite Dendrogram used Truth Discernment without restriction, so verbal testimonies had as much gravity as physical evidence. Even if that hadn't been the case, a search of the mayor's mansion would turn up plenty of proof.

This might not have been a problem immediately, since this city was still in the palm of his hand. However, if his memory served him well, the capital of Drag-Nomad was currently about a day away by dragon carriage. It would take only two days for Benetnasch to report his crimes to the congress and return here with government officials in tow — perhaps even less if Benetnasch had any faster means of travel.

The Mayor of Cortana was powerful even among the Caldinian elite, but the sins he'd committed were so numerous and severe that even he would be made to face judgment.

He would lose his title as mayor as well as the Orb itself before the ritual's completion in three days.

I have not yet accomplished all that is needed to become immortal! It is too early for me to be caught! the mayor thought in distress. For a moment, he considered refusing Benetnasch's offer and just fleeing Cortana the moment his crimes were reported.

After all, the mayor didn't have to perform the ritual in his mansion. He could put the necessary corpses in an inventory, find a safe and secret spot outside Cortana, and complete it there. However, before he could resolve to do that...

"T-h-a-t...i-s...n-o-g-o-o-d."

...he heard a voice in his head — the fluent, but not flowing, words of De Vermis, the Orb that served him.

Wh-Why? the Mayor asked.

"L-e-a-v-i-n-g...t-h-e c-i-t-y...m-e-a-n-s...m-u-r-d-e-r," the Orb replied. Its words made the mayor gasp.

The reason Benetnasch wanted to obtain the Orb through a trade instead of by force was because there were many potential witnesses here. The King of Tartarus had yet to be put on the wanted list, but if he tried to steal the Orb from the mansion of the mayor himself, he would certainly be branded a criminal. That was why he was taking the soft approach.

But if I leave Cortana and find a place where no one would find me...

"Y-o-u-w-o-u-l-d-b-e-k-i-l-l-e-d." De Vermis cut the thought short.

The mayor hadn't considered that angle. Away from prying eyes, Benetnasch could kill him and take the Orb without anyone noticing.

There was no guarantee that was indeed the King of Tartarus's plan, but the idea still filled the mayor with fear, urging him to take a step back.

"I see. So he would leave to report me...and then kill... In that case..." the mayor mumbled, covered in sweat and hanging his head.

"Hm...? Is something wrong? Are you talking to someone? Wait... Now that I look at it... Your body... The soul inside is..." Benetnasch said, looking at him with a worried expression.

His gaze was directed not at the mayor's face, but at something deep below the surface — something only he could see.

This is my only chance...! If I dispose of him now...!

"...T-h-e-n-y-o-u-w-i-l-l-h-a-v-e-a-n-e-w-l-i-f-e-e-t-e-r-n-a-l." De Vermis finished the mayor's thought for him. Murdered Masters didn't come back for three whole days. If killed here, Benetnasch wouldn't be able to report him before the mayor had finished his ritual and become immortal.

Normally, challenging a Superior Job — as well as a Master with a Superior Embryo — would be sheer recklessness. However, King of Tartarus was a job that commanded the undead.

Undead were monsters without living bodies. This gave them nigh inexhaustible fortitude, but in exchange they were vulnerable to many things — sunlight, fire, and holy attacks, to name a few.

It was noon right now, and a searing hot one, at that. In an environment like this, any undead were bound to wither away in mere moments.

That meant that Benetnasch couldn't employ any of his monsters, leaving only his own frail self.

The mayor knew well that rear guard casters had low physical stats, and this was enough information to convince him that he could win this battle.

His decision firm, the mayor raised his head and held up his right hand, displaying his Jewel.

"Call! Flame Dragon! Saint Dragon!" He raised his voice to activate a skill and summon two of the Pure-Dragons he'd acquired using his vast wealth. Both were of the skydragon kind, but one was a red-scaled fire dragon, while the other was a white-scaled dragon of the holy element.

"Mayor?!" the soldiers exclaimed, shocked that he would go on the offensive against a Superior.

"Kill him! He cannot wield his undead now!" the mayor urged them.

“And keep in mind that if my crimes are laid bare, you will be judged along with me!”

“Ah!” The soldiers all voiced their shock. They had acted as the mayor’s hand for a long time, assisting him in committing many foul deeds. Even before he’d begun the preparations for the ritual, they’d done many terrible things on his behalf.

For them, the great payment made it worth it, but there was no denying that they were as guilty as the mayor.

With that in mind, they gathered their resolve and faced Benetnasch.

“I...really can’t recommend using force,” Benetnasch said, still apparently trying to be considerate of everyone present. “If you use violence against me, I will be legally permitted to fight back.”

Fights between Masters were completely outside of tian law, but that wasn’t the case for conflicts between tians and Masters. Masters who killed tians would be placed on wanted lists, while Masters who were attacked by tians would become legally able to retaliate...in self-defense.

Benetnasch knew this well, and that was exactly why he showed concern — or perhaps pity — for these people who raised a hand against him.

“I really think you should reconsider,” he said. “I’m speaking to you Pure-Dragons, as well. Please refrain. You will surely die if you don’t.”

He showed extra sympathy to the two dragons summoned by the mayor. However, the great beasts only chuckled in response.

These intelligent creatures could feel the aura of death about Benetnasch, so they knew well that he was a necromancer. In broad daylight, he couldn’t even hope to match these wielders of fire and holy power.

Thus, Benetnasch’s warnings fell on deaf ears.

“Kill him!” the mayor ordered, prompting the two dragons to ready their breath attacks...

“Awaken Undead — Aragorn.”

...only for their heads to be severed a moment later.

Separated from their bodies, the large dragon heads rose into the air before falling to the ground. A drizzle of flame and holy radiance escaped from their opened throats before their entire bodies dissolved into specks of light and vanished.

“Huh... Ah?” The mayor and his soldiers were struck dumb — partially because the two dragons had died in a flash, but even more because of the giant object that had appeared before their eyes.

It was an entire massive skeleton, and one that possessed the majesty of a four-legged dinosaur fossil enshrined in a prestigious museum. There was a faint glow in its empty eye sockets, and its tail was a blade whose edge shone sharper than any sword of legend — no doubt the very weapon that rid the dragons of their heads.

“...Over-tamed and overfed. Too much flesh and fat on those bones. They were more swine than dragon,” the skeleton said in an imposing voice, its disdain for the dragons all too obvious.

Referring to this creature as merely a “skeleton,” though, did not convey the truth. Actually, it was a “High-End King-Edge Skeleton Dragon” and its — or rather, his — true name was Aragorn.

Once an Ancient Legendary UBM called “Bladedragon King, Drag-Edge,” he’d been defeated and as a result had become Benetnasch’s MVP special reward in the form of “Full-Body Skeleton of the Bladedragon.” Now, Benetnasch had revived him using Necromancy.

“...And there it is,” said Benetnasch with a sigh. “Those Pure-Dragons seemed like the type you’d dislike. I knew you wouldn’t hold back against them.”

“It is a grievous sin to debase a strong life. Thus, dragons must never fall as far as they have.”

It was worth noting that Benetnasch had actually summoned Aragorn using an impressive technique that combined the Instant Release function of the inventory where he’d stored Aragorn’s skeleton with a perfectly timed cast of Awaken Undead.

“...I’ll salvage their souls, at least,” Benetnasch said, removing a crystal-like object from his robe.

It looked like a Crystal of Resentment, the kind used to unlock the King of Corpses job — but unlike that stone, it was shining with all sorts of colors.

Once he was done, there was slightly more red and white in it than before.

“H-How...?!” the mayor exclaimed, having somewhat recovered from the shock. “We are in broad daylight! Why is this undead unaffected...?!”

"My Embryo has a passive skill that nullifies the sunlight- and fire-related vulnerabilities of all undead in my party. That lets them function just fine even within daylight."

This was an outright negation of the one thing that had led the mayor to believe he would win.

He'd ignored the existence of Embryos — arguably the thing that defined Masters — and it had led to his staggering defeat. But that didn't matter anymore.

All that mattered was the result.

"This is now a situation where I wouldn't be punished if I hurt you, just like I warned it would be," said Benetnasch, and he was right. The mayor had just attacked him with intent to kill.

This was a world full of violent bandits and other humanoid dangers, so self-defense laws were far more lax than they were in real life. Because of this, Benetnasch could now kill the mayor outright without facing punishment.

"I'll ask one more time... May I see the Orb?" he said as he extended his right hand.

"Ghhnh..." The mayor let out a moan. Having lost the dragons he'd been counting on, he felt like he could barely move. His soldiers were slowly backing away as well.

All of them could feel the sheer difference in power between them and Aragorn. They were neither stupid nor courageous enough to challenge a creature they couldn't hope to defeat even if they gave their lives for it.

What do I do...?! What can I do...?! the mayor thought in a panic, but no answer came to him. If Benetnasch willed it, Aragorn could lop off his head just like he'd decapitated those dragons.

That fear made the mayor reach for the Orb in his pocket when suddenly...

"G-o-t-o-t-h-e-u-n-d-e-r-g-r-o-u-n-d."

...he heard De Vermis's voice again.

"...What?" the mayor asked.

"I-t-i-s-a-b-i-t-e-a-r-l-y-b-u-t-w-e-w-i-l-l-p-e-r-f-o-r-m-t-h-e-r-i-t-u-a-l."

"You can do that?!"

"N-o-t-p-e-r-f-e-c-t-l-y. N-o-t-e-n-o-u-g-h. B-u-t-i-t-i-s-p-o-s-s-i-b-l-e," said De Vermis.

This was nothing but good news for the mayor. Even if it wasn't perfect, gaining some degree of immortality and power would rescue him from his current situation.

Gathering his resolve, he turned back and ran towards his mansion.

"Ah. Wai—"

"I will sever his legs." Before Benetnasch could tell someone to wait, Aragorn made his move and swung his blade-tail.

It easily sliced off the mayor's legs...

"OWWAAAHHHHHHH...! AAAHHHHHHHH!"

...but he continued running in spite of that.

"...What?" Aragorn muttered as he watched it happen. The spark in his eye sockets shook, like he couldn't believe his nonexistent eyes.

No blood came from the mayor's severed legs. Instead, something deathly white flooded from the wound and quickly assumed the form of replacement legs.

To Benetnasch and Aragorn, the white mass seemed like a swarm of maggots, and the mayor used those maggot-legs to run into the mansion.

Benetnasch watched him disappear inside, his expression a bit darker than before.

"...My friend," Aragorn said. "That does not seem like the item you seek."

"...Yeah. Chances are that it isn't." Benetnasch let out a tired sigh... It wasn't an expression of despair, but a slight sense of wasted effort and resignation to an arduous future. This particular endeavor had been for naught, but there were others awaiting him.

"But I should still confirm it, just in case," Benetnasch added. "And even if it turns out it isn't what I want, I may still be able to trade it for an Orb with the right power."

"Truly?"

"I mean, I already got the Orb that turns water into land. If I got one more, I'd have two things I could tra— Necro Aura." Benetnasch cut his words short and gave Aragorn a stat buff.

The next moment, a melodic engine sound rang out, followed by a rain of artillery.

"RRHHOOAAAGHH!" Aragorn roared as he rushed to cover Benetnasch with his blade-tail.

The sturdy skeleton deflected the shells, and the King of Tartarus didn't suffer any damage at all.

When the rain of artillery paused, Benetnasch and Aragorn looked up at their attacker high in the sky.

There, they saw a singing, azure Magingear — Blue Opera.

It could only belong to Ace, AR-I-CA the "Blue Sky Songstress" of Sefirot, Caldina's top clan.

And, indeed, that was exactly who had just attacked him.

"...Honestly, I thought of just watching this play out, but if you've got an Orb too, then I can't possibly ignore you!" AR-I-CA spoke through the machine's speakers.

Those were AR-I-CA's honest thoughts at the moment. Her best-case scenario was one where the Orb turned out to be something Benetnasch didn't want, causing him to leave it behind. She planned to settle things with the mayor after that.

But Benetnasch already had an Orb of his own and was planning to take the mayor's regardless of its use to him. That made him another target and a competitor.

AR-I-CA herself hadn't been expecting this fight, but she couldn't miss this opportunity.

...There's the Murder Princess too, she thought. If she causes trouble, this guy'll probably get away. That'll make it hard to get his Orb. I gotta end this here and now.

She'd decided to defeat Benetnasch, take his Orb, then pursue the mayor and take his.

She also believed that this was her only chance to fight Benetnasch.

"A blue Magingear... Sefirot's AR-I-CA, right?" Benetnasch said. "I've heard...certain rumors."

"I've heard 'bout you too," AR-I-CA replied. "Like the fact that you always have a pretty purple-haired little Maiden at your side. She hates being in the crest, right? Wait a minuuute. I'm not seeing her anywheeere."

Her tone casual, she said this before looking around. Benetnasch kept looking up at her, not responding.

"I know 'bout your skills too," she continued. "You can use your undead-protection skill from any distance, but you need her at your side to use your absolutely broken ult." Those words made the necromancer's eyes widen. “So... Let’s dance, shall we? Just the two of us.”

The truth in her statement slightly rattled Benetnasch.

A moment later, Blue Opera resumed its attacks, intent on finishing this while Benetnasch’s Superior Embryo was elsewhere.

Chapter Four: The Chain

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

After ending the call with Teach, we continued the search for the Murder Princess and the tian with her.

I had actually been aware of the Murder Princess before that conversation.

She was rather famous among wanted criminals, and I'd heard about her a good number of times while I was still in Dryfe as a member of The Triangle of Wisdom.

Honestly, I had trouble believing that girl and the infamous Murder Princess were one and the same. Though maybe a bit immature for her age, she seemed like a normal kid.

Still, I knew I had to do something. If it turned out that she really was the Murder Princess, the situation could get really bad.

"Can you feel something?" I asked Cyco.

"Hmm... She's not nearby." Cyco could sense any kinslayers in her immediate surroundings — specifically, within the effective range of La Porte de l'Enfer.

The girl's appearance and stats were concealed, making Cyco's skill the best way to search for her, but Cortana was quite a large city. Built around a lake, it was doughnut-shaped — but even taking that into account, it covered a massive area.

The range of Cyco's senses would be only a small dot on the map.

"Compared to this city...my power is minuscule."

Oh... She's a bit sad about it, I thought.

"It's like your chest in real life," she continued.

...But not sad enough to be nice, I thought again. And it's not that small... I'm still growing!

"Anyway, we need to keep combing the city," I said. "If something happens, it'll be too late."

"Yeah," Cyco replied. "You should also consider that they might attack you."

"...That is true," I nodded. They now knew my face, and Teach's face too. If they realized that she was part of Sefirot, it was possible that they would launch some assault against us.

I couldn't just ride White Rose around town, but I could at least prepare to take it out of my Instant Release inventory.

Several dozen minutes of searching later, we arrived at a bazaar full of people doing business while seated on carpets. Some were even selling wares that were on the larger side — I could see caged monsters in the distance. Careful not to be swept up by the crowd, I entered a relatively empty alleyway.

"Ohh? Well if it isn't a Maiden I have seen before," someone suddenly said — clearly addressing us.

"Hm?" I looked around, but I couldn't see anybody. "Who's there?" I asked.

The "Maiden" mentioned by the voice could only be Cyco, but that didn't make sense.

To prevent the Murder Princess and the tian with her from gathering too much information about us, I had Cyco use Crest Disguise, just like I had back when we first met Ray.

However, the voice seemed certain that Cyco was indeed a Maiden.

The fact that they had also "seen her before" implied that the voice didn't belong to a stranger, but there wasn't a familiar face anywhere in sight.

"To fail to recognize me this badly... You should know that even my feelings can be hurt," the voice said.

"Hugo. Down," snapped Cyco.

"Huh?" I said and looked down, where I saw a mop of purple hair that didn't even reach my waist.

Apparently, the person talking to us was so small that I had completely overlooked them.

...My avatar was way taller than my real height, so I had trouble acting my size.

"I called out to an acquaintance only to have that same acquaintance imply that I am tiny... How disappointing..." the person — a girl smaller than even Cyco — said, covering her face.

I couldn’t see her expression, but I could see that her small body was covered in an ancient Grecian-style dress that left one of her shoulders exposed. Just like her hair, it was purple, and the predominance of this color helped me remember who she was.

“...Are you Persephone?” I asked.

“Oh? You do remember? I was worried, seeing as we barely talked when we met at The Triangle of Wisdom...but you seem to have a good memory!” she said, standing on her toes and slapping my shoulder a couple times.

“Though, Franklin told us a great deal about you. For example, you are the clan’s rising star — and a Maiden’s Master, just like my Master Dearest! ‘Hugo’ and ‘Cuckoo,’ was it?”

“...I’m Cyco.”

“Oh, I got it wrong! My apologies!”

“Well, you look like some kind of colorful baby bird, so it’s not surprising that you’d have the memory of a bird too. It’s fine.”

“This is the first time we have even talked! Why are you so mean?!” the girl exclaimed.

Anyway, I did indeed know who she was.

She was Persephone — a Maiden Embryo, just like Cyco. The one she referred to as “Master Dearest” was...well, her Master — King of Tartarus, Benetnasch. He’d once helped my sis with some particular research projects.

“Now, why is a member of The Triangle of Wisdom here in Caldina? Traveling, I presume?” Persephone asked.

“More or less...and since you’re here, that means that...”

“Indeed. Master Dearest is in the city, as well. Ohh, he is currently at the mayor’s residence, facing a Magingear. A metal giant with a sky blue color,” she casually said with one eye closed.

“Huh...?!” I exclaimed. If she was telling the truth, then Teach was currently fighting Benetnasch.

I spent a moment wondering how it could have come to that and remembered what Teach said at the café.

“Is he here...to get the Orb?” I asked.

“You know about it? Impressive. Wait, are you after it as well? What a coincidence!” Persephone said.

Teach had mentioned that other Superiors were after the Orbs, but I never would’ve guessed that the King of Tartarus was one of them...

“Why is he after it...?”

“Ohh, saying that would infringe on Master Dearest’s privacy. I cannot give you the details, but I can give you the rough outline.”

"Huh?"

"Basically, he is chasing an unreachable dream. He is searching for something that would let him achieve an impossible task. Though, assuming it is possible, his best bet is to take me to the next stage," she explained.

I looked at her in silence. Her description was abstract and I could barely understand the details.

However, one thing was fairly obvious.

Persephone was a Superior Embryo — one in her seventh form — and Benetnasch was after something that required "taking her to the next stage," as in making her evolve to the eighth form, something that wasn't even confirmed to exist.

There was a chance that the Orb in Cortana, which was said to "grant a new life eternal," could help him achieve whatever it was he was after, so he was now fighting Teach for it.

"Personally, I wish he would focus on the main objective instead of getting sidetracked by these futile wastes of time... And how am I supposed to feel if he achieves his goal without me?"

"...Oh. I see," said Cyco, noticing something. "So that's why you're not helping him fight AR-I-CA."

"More like not helping him hunt the Orbs at all. I am boycotting this meaningless endeavor!" she claimed.

...So Persephone was walking around here instead of helping her Master because she was fundamentally against what he was doing. That must've been part of the reason why she revealed some information about her Master's goal. It wasn't uncommon for Maidens and humanoid Guardians to act on their own will, but Persephone seemed to take it a little far.

"Wait, if Master Dearest is fighting a Magingear pilot... Is it an acquaintance of yours?" she asked.

"...What if it is?" I countered.

"I pray that they do manage to take away the Orb! It is a nuisance! A revolting one, at that! I do not even want him to have it!"

...This is the first time I've seen an Embryo actually wish for her own Master to lose, I thought in surprise. What does she mean by "revolting," though?

"So there! I will not involve myself in the fight... So don't even think of harming me!"

...Pardon? I thought, eyebrow raised.

"Do not attack me thinking it would help your pilot friend!" she explained.

Well, I suppose it wasn't out of the question that we'd decide to do something like that. Persephone was Benetnasch's Embryo, and though she wasn't helping him now, there was no guarantee that wouldn't change if he was close to getting the death penalty.

We did have the option of beating her just to raise Teach's chances.

"Wh-What is that look in your eyes supposed to mean?! Just so you know, I am frail and weak! Even a low-rank Guardian would leave me beaten and crying! So don't attack me! And no looking at me with those eyes! I know what is currently going through your head! You are thinking 'What nonsense is that? You're a Superior Embryo,' are you not?!"

What nonsense is that? You're a Superior Embryo, I thought.

"The idea that every Superior Embryo is strong is a myth! And I am so specialized on one thing that I am especially weak! I cannot even be compared to that Pandemonium your clan leader has! That is a monster factory first and foremost, but it is plenty strong even when used to just trample — plus, it has camouflage! I am not nearly as versatile!" The Superior Embryo continued to desperately assert her weakness, leaving me unsure how to react.

Honestly, I felt like it was best to just leave her be, though that didn't change the fact that Benetnasch and Teach were fighting. That was something that I couldn't ignore.

But there was still the matter of the Murder Princess. What was I to do in this situation...?

"By the way, Hugo," Cyco asked telepathically.

What is it? I replied in thought.

"Persephone is a bit like Nemesis, isn't she? A bit smaller than even her, though."

...Yeah, I thought that too.

Their appearances and mannerisms weren't exactly the same, but they were alike in many ways.

I had no idea why, though.

It wasn't like Embryos had siblings, after all.

◇◆◇

City of Commerce, Cortana, The Mayor's Mansion

During Hugo's encounter with Persephone, the two Superiors at the mansion were still fighting.

Blue Opera danced in the air at supersonic speeds, raining down bombs and artillery that quickly turned the mansion's garden into a devastated wasteland.

Despite that, Benetnasch was unharmed.

"Necro Aura, Necro Repair." He cast his skills as he stood.

"This is the third time... Goddamn, you're tough!" AR-I-CA spat out. The necromancer was protected by Aragorn — an ex-Dragon King specialized in STR and END.

The King of Tartarus's combat style could be summarized with the phrase "tank and caster."

He used sturdy undead like Aragorn as vanguards while staying back and buffing them, debuffing the enemies, or casting offensive magic. It was a configuration that was focused on defense first and foremost.

It was hard to break through even for a Superior — especially one like AR-I-CA, whose offensive abilities were lower than the average Superior.

No matter how intensely she attacked, Aragorn only lost an insignificant amount of HP. That was quickly healed by Necro Repair — a regeneration buff — leaving the bone dragon completely unharmed.

On the other hand, Benetnasch and Aragorn had yet to land a single hit on AR-I-CA.

"Such an irritating assault," Aragorn said with a growl. "Friend, my blade just cannot reach her."

"And she's out of the range of my spells..." Benetnasch added.

Aragorn's attacks were purely physical, limited by the range of his skeletal frame. He could leap extremely high, but even that wouldn't have helped him harm AR-I-CA, who had far more maneuverability and could use Cassandra to avoid danger.

In fact, trying to attack her in that way would leave Benetnasch vulnerable to her artillery, which would quickly result in a death penalty for him.

Benetnasch himself couldn't attack her either. At the very least, she was outside the range of his curse-based debuffs.

His main alternative to that was his equivalent of the Lich's Deadly Mixer — the High Necromancer's ultimate job skill called "Deadly Explosion."

This skill made grudge combust to create an explosion. That might reach her, but chances were that she would evade it.

With the amount of grudge that saturated the mayor's mansion, the whole place was like powder keg. Deadly Explosion would no doubt level everything in the area. That did make the explosion potentially powerful enough to reach AR-I-CA.

However, Benetnasch had refrained from using it so far because it would kill so many innocent people. Even ignoring the mayor, who was on the verge of losing his last shreds of humanity, there were still servants and similar individuals who would no doubt die in the explosion.

"Well, with how much grudge there is around here, I'll have to burn it down anyway," Benetnasch said.

"Indeed," Aragorn agreed. "The grudge here is abnormally dense. Were I a grudge-based undead, I would have no doubt been affected."

The dragon was undead, but he wasn't powered by grudge.

This was a result of the manner in which he had been created.

The necromancer grouping powered their undead using either grudge or their own magic. Maise, the Lich of the Gouz-Maise Gang that Hugo once fought, had used grudge. Benetnasch, on the other hand, used magic.

Grudge-based undead weren't taxing on the caster, but they were never intelligent and came with the risk of escaping the caster's control.

Magic-based undead were the opposite, eating away at the caster's magic in exchange for creating an undead monster like Aragorn, which retained the soul and mind they had in life.

Another flaw of magic-based undead was that they had enough free will to disobey the one who had resurrected them, but Benetnasch had forged a relationship of mutual trust with his undead — Aragorn included — so that wasn't a problem for him.

The army of the dead he commanded — his company — was no doubt a force to be reckoned with, but he had no allies who could counter Blue Opera.

"It seems like I really should've gotten someone who can fly," Benetnasch said. “But undead skydragons lose a lot of the flying ability they had in life... That’s not the case with Dragon Spirits, but you can’t ride those.”

It was worth noting that undead avians could fly as well in death as they could in life, but Benetnasch did not have command of such a beast. The reason for that was that Aragorn unconditionally hated all avians, which showed that not even death could cure a landdragon’s natural prejudice.

“I could’ve done something if Persephone was here, though...” he said with a sigh. He recalled how, right as they’d arrived at Cortana, Persephone had said, “I am not helping you look for any Orb, you cheater!” and walked away from him.

At any rate, this battle was a stalemate. AR-I-CA’s attacks were all blocked by Aragorn, while Benetnasch’s attacks couldn’t reach her.

This will never end, huh? AR-I-CA thought and sighed. I guess this is still better than dealin’ with Carl’s broken defense.

Neither of them had any moves that could quickly conclude this battle.

AR-I-CA had her ultimate skill — the one she’d used to break through Dangai’s electrical defense.

Benetnasch also had an ace up his sleeve that he could use without Persephone present, and it would likely be enough to defeat AR-I-CA.

However, neither of them intended to use these for two reasons: first, they were extremely costly, and second, they had to consider the possibility of additional enemies.

The mayor’s mansion was already being targeted by King of Tartarus and Ace — two powerful Superiors. Neither of them were stupid or optimistic enough to believe that they would be the only ones who might get involved in the struggle for this Orb. This was doubly true for AR-I-CA, who knew that the Murder Princess was in this city.

Man... What to do? What to dooo? AR-I-CA thought. If this continued, Benetnasch would definitely gain the upper hand.

In battle, Magingears quickly drained the pilot’s MP. With Blue Opera being more advanced and power-intensive than the usual Magingear, as well as with all the skills AR-I-CA was using, her MP wouldn’t hold forever. Her Superior Job, Ace, provided her with vast MP reserves, but there was still a limit to how long she could fight.

Benetnasch’s Aragorn, on the other hand, was undead. That meant that there was no limit to his health, while the amount of MP the necromancer was using on skills was no doubt less than AR-I-CA's.

If this battle continued for an hour or two, Benetnasch would eventually come out on top.

Looks like that's his plan too, she thought. Well, the boney boy has the endurance for it. It looks like it was made using material from...an Ancient Legendary dragon king. It actually looks like something Fran'd make. For a girl, she really likes dragons and reptiles and stuff.

Remembering her friend, AR-I-CA smiled to herself.

Oh well. The situation won't get any better for me, so I guess I'll have to use the quest item, she thought, taking an object out.

It was the Orb containing Thundershield Beast, Dangai — the very same one that she'd taken off of Zhang Zangqi in Hermine.

Taking on the will of its new wielder, the lightning-clad UBM unleashed its power, quickly enveloping Blue Opera's armor in lightning — but not even scratching it.

The lightning then focused on the rifle in the unit's hands...

"BANG!"

...and imbued the shell it fired.

The charged projectile cut the air and landed straight on Aragorn.

"Ah...!"

"This is...!"

Both Benetnasch and Aragorn were overcome by shock at what happened next — the impact shattered one of the dragon's ribs.

Thundershield Beast, Dangai possessed the power of lightning, and he also controlled it to a minute degree.

AR-I-CA had covered her bullet in this lightning in an attempt to enhance its power, and it had been entirely successful.

Unlike her previous attacks, which had all been deflected by Aragorn's sturdy frame, this shell clearly injured him.

There were multiple reasons why it was so effective.

Being undead, Aragorn had high physical defense and nigh inexhaustible fortitude — but in exchange, he'd lost many of the qualities he'd had in life. This included defensive skills like Dragon King Aura as well as all of the elemental resistances dragons tended to have.

Because of this, the storm of lightning shells shaved away his HP at a rate so high that Necro Repair couldn't keep up.

Additionally, since the lightning had come from Dangai from within the Orb, it didn't drain any more of AR-I-CA's MP.

"Albeit weak, I sense the power of a fellow Ancient Legendary," said Aragorn. "My friend, it does not seem that we can wait until our adversary exhausts her magic."

A quick analysis of the situation was enough for him to realize that his HP would run out faster than AR-I-CA would run out of fuel.

In response, Benetnasch spent a moment thinking before giving a nod and saying, "...All right, I'll do something."

With the stalemate broken, he gathered his resolve to use the ace up his sleeve.

"I can't use Persephone's ultimate...so I'll use this," he said, pulling out the pendant hanging over his neck.

It looked like the lower half of a gargoyle, but it was made of a strange metal. At first glance it seemed to be silver, but it had a luster that proved it was anything but.

"...You will awaken it?" Aragorn asked.

"This will no doubt withstand her attacks. And while it protects me, you can go on the offensive."

"But my blade cannot—"

"I don't mean attacking her. I want you to chase after the mayor and secure the Orb. Once you get back, we'll leave this place, go pick up Persephone, and then escape the city."

"I see. Very well."

"All right... Here I go. Awaken, Standing and Indomi—"

Right as he was about to pull out the ace up his sleeve...

"...Huh? Persephone?"

"Hm...? Yu?"

...both he and AR-I-CA received messages from their companions in some other part of the city. A moment later, screams rang out from somewhere in Cortana.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps.

"The Murder Princess might be in this city? Good grief, we've got quite the crowd of walking disasters here!" said Persephone.

I'd ended up explaining our goal to her as well. Or more accurately, she asked and I just answered.

"But...Murder Princess, eh? I see..." she said, smiling for some reason. "Heh heh. That makes this city a true crucible of death. One who transcends death, one who mass-produces death, one who changes the meaning of death... Certainly this is not the result of deliberate meddling, but it is no doubt interesting."

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow, not sure what she was talking about.

"So, I assume you wish to both keep me from going to assist Master Dearest, while also maintaining the search for the Murder Princesss?" she asked.

"...You could say that, yeah," I said.

"How greedy of you. But...very well. I will help you in your search."

"Huh?"

"For better or worse, I have nothing better to do, and this will likely be more productive for me and Master Dearest than fooling around with some Orbs."

"Productive? In what way?"

"I cannot say that, but rest assured that it will not be detrimental to you as you are now," she said before walking away. "Come. Let us go. You wish to find her quickly, do you not?"

"...Yeah," I said, and Cyco and I followed after her.

I intended to search for the Murder Princess while keeping an eye on Persephone, but she was the one who took charge.

She was so lively that it was hard to believe she was the same girl who had just recently been reduced to tears, whining about how weak she was.

With her in the lead, we walked deeper into the bazaar.

But suddenly, she turned around.

"Oh! If we will be together for the time being, why don't we have a conversation?" she said.

"Like...?" I asked.

"Well, I may answer your questions. Is there anything you wish to ask?"

"Your clothes leave your shoulder exposed... How can you handle this heat?" Cyco asked.

...Is that really the thing you're most curious about? I asked her in thought.

"Heh heh heh. Quite easily, actually," Persephone chuckled. "I have a passive skill called 'Kálypsi ton Nekrón.' It gives undead enough sunlight and heat resistance to let them operate at full capacity even in broad daylight! I can use it on myself too, so I will never be sunburned."

"...That sounds so nice," Cyco said with a jealous expression.

I could tell by her expression that this made her wish she had a higher level of control over ice, which she'd use to keep her ice cream from melting.

"What about you? Any questions?" Persephone asked.

"...Yeah," I said before posing a question that had been bothering me for a while. "It's about The Triangle of Wisdom's grudge engine research. Why did your Master help with that?"

At one point in the past, the clan...or rather, my sister had an idea for engines that ran on grudge. Magingears were MP hogs, and she thought she could fix this issue by giving them the ability to convert any surrounding grudge into usable energy.

That was her reason for investing into this research. For all I knew, she might've even planned to use the results to overcome the White Rose's greatest flaw.

However, Benetnasch didn't seem to have any obvious motive for helping. I'd thought that he might've cooperated in exchange for money, items, or some other reward, but he didn't seem like the type of person who'd be convinced by that kind of thing.

That was why I just directly asked Persephone about it.

Her answer...

"Because it would make cleaning up easier."

...was a bit hard to understand.

"...Cleaning up?" I asked, raising an eyebrow.

"Ohh, not the mop and bucket kind of cleanup, of course. Master Dearest takes care of that himself. I mean the cleaning up of grudge."

"Hm?"

"Explaining what I mean requires explaining the nature of grudge and souls... Hmm... Give me one moment," Persephone said before heading off to a nearby bazaar stand.

She came back with a cup full of juice, complete with large chunks of ice.

"Thirsty?" asked Cyco.

"No. This is for the explanation," she said as she used the straw to point to the cup, ice, and then the juice. "So, here are the parallels. Assuming that the cup is the body and the ice floating in it is the soul, then the juice filling it is what you might call the 'mind' or the 'heart.'"

Flesh, soul, mind or heart... I thought.

"Master Dearest and myself can see souls, so we know that there are ghosts who do not count as monsters," she continued.

I was aware of graveyard- and dungeon-dwelling undead like Spirits and Wraiths, but she was obviously talking about something different.

"Imagine if the cup — the body — is lost, leaving the ice — the soul — exposed. Ghosts would then be like the remnants of juice — the mind — that still cling to the ice. If these remnants vanish, the pure soul also vanishes. In fact, it vanishes in the process of any normal bodily death. The remnants are what some might call 'regrets' and without them, the soul merely vanishes in peace."

Hearing this made me wonder if there were any real world religions with a similar outlook on death, but that line of thought was a bit too much for a girl who'd just turned fifteen.

"And grudge is...akin to boiling water," she continued.

"Boiling water?"

"A fraction of mind that has had its nature changed. Minds that die while harboring great resentment or dread boil especially well. Of course, you can feel such things while alive...but they are not much of a problem then. At most, you will generate an apparition or some negative emotional energy," Persephone explained.

...I could understand that. Ray's Grudge-Soaked Greaves turned grudge into MP and SP, but they could feed just fine on the negative emotions of living people.

"But matters are different when death is involved. As a corrupted form of the mind, grudge can greatly affect the bodies and souls of the dead," she continued before downing all the juice in the cup. "Phew... For example, if you fill an empty cup with boiling water, it will be difficult to touch that cup with your bare hands. In this analogy, that is an undead monster — albeit a kind quite unlike Master Dearest's magic-based undead. Oh, and I suppose it needs to be mentioned that grudge-defiled items may become cursed."

Persephone then paused for a moment, then took a piece of ice in the cup.

"Now, what would happen to the soul of a dead person — this piece of ice — If it were to fall into boiling water?" she asked.

"...It would melt and disappear," I answered.

"Exactly. If the water is lukewarm, a soul may remain in some cases, usually as undead like Spirits, but boiling water... Truly deep grudge melts souls completely and turns them into more grudge. After that, nothing is left. At the very least, the soul would not vanish peacefully," she explained.

The idea that grudge literally melted souls made a light chill run down my spine.

"The souls of villains are especially susceptible. Exposed to the grudge of others throughout their lives, they are already partially melted. Prime for the crucible."

Those words reminded me of the Gouz-Maise Gang.

They were fiends in life and became an undead monster in death. That UBM — Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise — seemed to be exactly what she was talking about — a monster born from the molten grudge of many vile souls.

If that was the case, it would explain why the damage Nemesis had accumulated while fighting Maise could be used for a Vengeance on the UBM he became a part of.

"On the journey to achieve his goal, Master Dearest had made a point to disperse any grudge that could melt away pure souls, but since there is so much of it in this world, continually replenished by the vices of man, he cannot disperse it all no matter how hard he may try. It is such a threat to souls, however, he could not simply ignore it either. That is why he cooperated with Franklin."

She'd finally reached the part that I wanted to hear about.

"If they were able to create a mechanism that absorbs grudge and turns it into energy, there would certainly be far less of it in the world, especially if the technology spread across the land. Master Dearest would have less work to do, and the pure souls he wished to save would vanish far less often," Persephone explained before her expression became somewhat saddened. “Though as you are well aware, they only created engines that lost more and more control the more grudge they gathered. They were essentially machines that automatically moved towards creating more grudge — the exact opposite of what Master Dearest wanted.”

I didn’t know what to say here, but my expression seemed to be response enough.

“Do not make such a face. The Triangle of Wisdom is not at fault. This merely proved that there is a limit to how much control technology can have over the realm of souls. Magic or science — the result is the same,” she said.

She had a point. Sis tampered with grudge using science, while Maise the Lich took the magical approach, but the result was the same — complete lack of control.

Perhaps this meant this wasn’t something people should have been meddling with in the first place.

“Because of that, Master Dearest still continues his ‘treatments.’ He has a core goal to achieve, yet he still makes certain to disperse any gatherings of grudge. Good grief... He burdened himself with far too much,” Persephone sighed.

Her expression seemed far beyond her apparent age.

Also, what she’d said so far made me curious about something else.

“...May I ask two more questions?” I asked.

“You may.”

“Everything you said makes it sound like your Master is very busy... How long does he usually stay logged in?”

“Converting to the other side’s time, about twenty-two hours per day. He never forgets to eat, relieve himself, and bathe, but any time not doing those things is spent here.”

I was at a loss for words. What she just said made me all the more curious about the answer to the third question I had.

It pertained to King of Tartarus’s motivations.

What Persephone said so far was enough for me to understand what he was doing. It might’ve been a slip of the tongue, but she’d said, “the pure souls he wished to save would vanish far less often,” and I felt that that was the heart of it.

He wanted to save souls. He was probably after Cortana's Orb for the same reason — he thought that its power to grant "a new life eternal" could be used to that end.

He cooperated with The Triangle of Wisdom, purified grudge the land over, and now worked to gather these Orbs, putting in obscene amounts of effort...all to save souls.

But...I didn't know his reasons for doing this.

He certainly wasn't the kind of person to save the dead just for the sense of accomplishment. I'd seen him a few times while he was at The Triangle of Wisdom, but I'd never once seen him having a good time.

He always looked tired, worn out — and like he was feeling responsible for something.

And now I just found out that he was even sacrificing his real life to keep doing what he was doing here.

Basically...he wasn't enjoying Infinite Dendrogram at all.

I was a Maiden Master myself, and I didn't think of this world as a mere game. However, I would never be able to sacrifice my real life to save the dead of Infinite Dendrogram.

This world and reality — they were both worlds I lived in and belonged to.

For Benetnasch, though, this world had far more weight than the other one.

"Why does he go so far...?" I asked. He'd sacrificed his real life and was now traversing this scorching desert. What was he actually seeking here? Why was he trying to save these souls?

In response, Persephone...

"...I see I said too much. I cannot answer that."

...didn't give me an answer.

"And even if I did say it, you would not fully comprehend it. Your nature is different from his."

"What do you mean...?"

"I believe the only ones who could understand it are Masters who have already pulverized their minds and hearts for the sake of this world, yet still cannot break. Though I do doubt there are any besides Master Dearest."

Persephone's words brought the image of a certain friend's face to the forefront of my mind.

Perhaps he could understand it?

The moment that thought passed through my mind...

"Ah...! Hugo!"

"Seems like this conversation is over. Hmm... So this is the Murder Princess? What a curious presence she has."

...the two Maidens said all of that, putting me on edge.

At the same time, I heard something shatter, followed by the roar of a beast.

◆◆◆

City of Commerce, Cortana, Bazaar, A Short While Ago

Meanwhile, Zhang and Emily were actually in the very same bazaar as Hugo's group. The pair had already used their accessories to change their appearances, this time making both Zhang and Emily look like harmless tians.

Zhang had one of his eyes covered up, overawed by what he was seeing.

So that is the zenith of western necromancy... King of Tartarus the "Indestructible," he thought. "Indestructible" was the least threatening of Benetnasch's multiple nicknames.

Zhang was watching the events at the mayor's mansion using the vision of a bird jiangshi under his command. Having been informed by Rascal that King of Tartarus was in Cortana, he'd sent the creature to do some recon around the mansion.

Although jiangshi were undead that ran on magic rather than grudge, they had no will of their own, instead moving like machines controlled by the Fu that acted as a substitute brain. Additional Fu could be used to do things such as lessen the negative effects of sunlight, making them quite versatile as far as undead went.

The problem with them was that they could only operate based on set patterns imprinted on the Fu, but that usually presented no obstacle with a simple task like observation.

His undead are far superior to mine. A fight against him would be nearly hopeless even when I still had my Wuxing Jilong, he thought, looking at Aragorn.

Even with the five Pure-Dragon jiangshi that had been his namesake, at best Zhang could have hoped for an outcome where both he and Benetnasch were defeated.

To have even the slightest chance of winning the battle alive, he'd have to still possess Dangai's Orb and give it everything he had. That was how wide the gap was between him and Benetnasch.

I see that powerful people have indeed gathered here...just as Rascal expected. This fact made Zhang feel uneasy.

The one Orb here in Cortana had attracted the Indestructible and The Blue Sky Songstress. Since there were several more Orbs spread out across Caldina, what other people of great power would they attract, and how fierce would their battles be?

...Perhaps what happens here will be merely the prologue, he thought, bracing himself.

His job right now was to support Emily and gather data on the major players here, and that was what he would focus on.

At the same time, Emily was looking up at a giant cage in the bazaar. Inside it, there was a horned, lionlike creature of the upper-Pure-Dragon tier — a Taurus Leo.

It was lying on its belly in its own filth, and the reek made many people keep their distance.

However, some were still actually lining up in front of it.

"Mr. Zhan! Why is that in a cage and not a Jewel?" Emily asked, pointing at the cage and tilting her head.

Normally, tamed monsters were sold through Jewels. Even when let out for a proper examination, they would never be put in cages.

Still, some monsters were sold in this state for a reason.

"Because the monster is not tamed yet," said Zhang — and indeed, the creature inside was still wild.

When the traders didn't have Tamers capable of taming the monsters they'd captured, the creatures would sometimes be carried around in cages instead. Of course, such trade was highly regulated, obligating the traders to keep their "products" sedated using drugs or other means and to make sure to keep them in cages strong enough to contain them. Naturally, appropriate measures had to be taken if they had fire breathing or other special skills.

Many believed that it would be easier to just put in a request at the appropriate guild to find a Tamer capable of subduing the monsters, but if the beast was particularly valuable, there was always the chance that any Tamer they hired would just take it and run.

There were already several cases of Masters doing something like this. They had save points in other countries and didn't mind getting the death penalty, so they readily signed Contracts and took their punishment — as well as their place on the wanted list — just so they could keep a precious monster all for themselves.

"The monster is cheaper than normal because the buyers would have to do the taming themselves," Zhang said. "Or rather, what they're selling isn't the monster, exactly, but the right to attempt taming it."

This was especially evident when considering the fact that instead of a number of chances, the seller gave the buyer ten minutes to complete the taming.

"And if they can't do it?" Emily asked.

"They do not get their money back," Zhang answered.

"Hmm... So the seller doesn't want the buyers to tame it," Emily said with unexpected frankness, at which Zhang gave a slight nod.

According to the sign next to the cage, no one had succeeded at taming this monster for weeks now.

In a way, that was to be expected. Zhang could tell that in addition to sedatives, the monster was also under the influence of mind-impairing items that interfered with the taming process.

However, the Tamer who had just stepped up to subdue it this time seemed to be utterly unaware of this fact. Confident that he would succeed, the man was smiling as he envisioned the moment he would make the Taurus Leo his own.

"He will not succeed," Zhang noted. The Tamer's repeated attempts were failures, only making the Taurus Leo squirm. Panic began to creep into his expression.

"It's moving around a lot," said Emily.

"Unsuccessful taming attempts can make monsters go berserk," said Zhang. "Though, thanks to the cage and drugs, that should not be a problem."

"Ohh. This is dangerous, then."

"Hm...?" Zhang raised an eyebrow, unsure what she was talking about. Emily pointed inside the cage and said, "The drug's gone. It's only pretending.”

“What?”

“And it’s moving around ’cause it’s preparing. It’s gonna crash into the cage,” she explained.

Zhang wondered how she knew that, but was forced to set that thought aside as the Taurus Leo got up and began throwing itself against the cage.

But the cage is supposed to be designed to contain it... Wait, no! Zhang panicked as he began to notice the dents in the bars.

Apparently, the lower half of the cage had rusted through, and the stench surrounding it explained why.

...Feces and urine! The monster used them to degrade the cage over time and wait for a chance to break out of it!

Not every monster lacked intelligence.

Caged monsters were valued as products based on thorough examination of their stats and abilities using Reveal or other skills, but none of this could gauge how cunning the monster was.

This one was smart enough to pretend to be affected by the drugs its captors employed and to use its own waste to ruin the cage containing it.

Because the seller had used anti-tame items on the Taurus Leo, preventing any buyers from actually taming it, the monster had had ample time to slowly rust away the cage.

“BRROOAAAAAARRRGGHHHHHHHHH!”

And now, with a mighty roar, it shattered its prison and leapt out into the bazaar.

It started by killing and devouring the tamer in front, then attacking the workers at the stand who had been selling the rights to taming attempts.

It was as though the monster was finally venting all the anger that it had built up over its long imprisonment.

...What do I do? I could subdue it using the Drag-Worm Jiangshi I’m keeping outside the city, but if we make ourselves stand out, we might attract the attention of The Blue Sky Songstress and her companions... While that thought ran through Zhang’s head, the Taurus Leo finished off the workers.

It had stained the area around it in blood, yet it still wanted more.

Its next targets, however, weren’t Zhang and Emily, but a little girl and her parents who were trying to flee the scene.

"BRRGHAAAAAARRH!" With another roar, the Taurus Leo rushed towards its prey, fully intent on consuming them to fuel its own flesh and bone.

The girl began to wail in fear as the beast approached, while the parents wrapped themselves around her, hoping to at least save their daughter.

However, their fragile bodies would not be nearly enough to stop the terrible creature. They would quickly become its sustenance.

But just before that could happen, a small figure appeared in the beast's path.

Shock overcame Zhang. The girl that had just been right next to him had moved at supersonic speed to stand before the Taurus Leo.

"BROOOAAAAARRGHHHH!"

Obviously, the beast saw her as just more prey and tried to attack her...

"Minus."

...but Emily switched into her killing mode and swiftly dismembered and decapitated the creature, destroying it instantly.

The beast didn't even have time to realize what happened. The destruction of its body was so intense that it immediately began turning into motes of light and vanishing, leaving behind only its loot...and Emily, covered in its blood.

"...Emily," Zhang whispered in confusion.

Why had Emily rushed out like that?

Before she stood in front of the Taurus Leo, she hadn't been in her killing state, which could only mean that it was the standard Emily who was trying to protect the family.

Zhang didn't understand why she would help a group of strangers...and decided to wait until the girl had stopped being a killing machine to ask her.

However, before that could happen...

"Hey! Are you the one who killed my monster?!"

...a portly man — or an obese one, depending upon who you asked — appeared, practically dripping in gold and gems. Behind him stood several burly men.

The fat man seemed to be the merchant who owned the stall that sold attempts to tame the Taurus Leo. However, based on his attitude, it didn't seem like he'd come to thank Emily for stopping the beast's rampage.

"How dare you destroy my merchandise like that! I'll have you pay for it in full!” he shouted.

Zhang and the rest of the onlookers were united in their feeling that the merchant was being absurd. Between the neglect of the cage, the misuse of drugs, and the way he’d interfered with the monster’s ability to be tamed at all, the merchant was no doubt the one at fault here. And yet, he wanted Emily to pay for essentially preventing any more casualties.

“Wait,” Zhang said. “That is just unreasonable. This was a—”

“Are you her guardian?! You better take responsibility and pay up! It’s ninety million lir!” the merchant said, cutting Zhang off and naming an insanely high price.

He wouldn’t be nearly as confident if he’d known Zhang’s and Emily’s true identities, but they were both disguised as normal tians.

“I have the backing of the mayor, Douglas Coin himself! I can have you arrested and condemned to slavery!” the merchant claimed.

Hearing those words filled Zhang with fatigue. He’d lived in Hermine for years, which was long enough for him to know that Caldina was full of people like this.

With money deciding so much of what went on there, most of the wealthy were also exceptionally greedy. Some even tried to get more money using illegal means — like those hooligans back at that alley.

Things weren’t as bad in places that had some degree of “self-regulating” activity, but the current mayor of Cortana was one of the lowest among the low. This merchant who was supposedly backed by him was obviously cut from the same cloth. He had no doubt used his wealth and power against many people.

With corruption here being so obvious, I would have expected the mayor would have been voted out by now, Zhang thought. Wait...if I recall correctly, in the election five years ago, every candidate besides the mayor dropped out of the race.

There was clearly something happening behind the scenes, but if the mayor had extended his power over the entire justice system, no one would be able to do anything about it.

With various countries funding the casino industry of Hermine, we actually struck a balance that made for a fairly clean government in comparison... Though, anyone who stood against casinos had no chance of winning.

The irony made Zhang sigh, and apparently the merchant didn't like that.

"Tch! You don't have the money, do you?! Hey! Seize them!" he cried. The bodyguards behind him made ready to capture Zhang and Emily.

"Hey! Hold on!"

"That girl stopped the monster's rampage!"

"Yeah! People died!" The onlookers could no longer stand idly by and began to protest this obvious injustice.

"Huh? The only ones who died were my workers and the customer who signed a Contract saying that he will not hold us liable for anything that happens. That means that the only actual problem here is that my monster died. Or what, do you wanna pay for them too?" the merchant said, making the people fall silent.

Ninety million lir is a lot of money... Much more than the monster is worth, but still, Zhang thought. Is it best for us to just pay him using the money Rascal gave us? Or should we simply run away?

The Blue Sky Songstress and the Indestructible were still fighting at the moment, but there was no telling how long it would last.

From what Zhang had seen through the bird jiangshi's vision, their battle had actually paused. If they'd settled their differences and were intending to come here next, Zhang wanted to get away as soon as possible.

However, this line of thinking was fundamentally flawed.

In Zhang's estimation, the time limit on their current situation was up the moment either of the two Superiors arrived here, but it was actually much closer than that.

"Just grab them!" the merchant said, ordering his bodyguards to take Zhang and Emily.

"Wait. I'll—"

"Minus."

"...pay... What?" The girl's single word cut his sentence in half. Zhang looked to the side and saw nobody.

"Khh...?" A confused gargle reached his ears — one of the bodyguards that tried to take them had had his throat and chest torn open by an axe.

Needless to say, the one wielding the weapon was Emily.

In confusion, the injured man tried to examine his state, only for Emily to swing her other axe and cleave his head in two. By the time Youaltepuztli had drained him and transformed him into bits of light, Emily had already sunk her axe into the other bodyguard's side and split him in half.

Once the brutality was over, the onlookers finally realized what was happening.

"AAAAHHHHHHH!"

"M-Murder...!" They shrieked and scattered in a panic, creating a chaotic scene that was no better than when Taurus Leo broke out.

"Y-You monstrous brat! Hey! Just kill her already!" the merchant yelled, unaware that these would be his last words.

"Minus," Emily said as she threw an axe at the man's saggy cheek, slicing off the upper half of his head and instantly killing him.

The remaining bodyguards also readied their weapons, but they died as easily as the others.

And just like that, the merchant and his bodyguards were all dead.

The disaster left Zhang at a loss for words.

I was too careless. I underestimated how easily Emily could deem someone an enemy. It is not merely a matter of pointing weapons and threatening her, he thought.

Regardless, the situation was taking a bad turn for them. They had to hurry out of here before things got any worse.

However, before they could, three Masters ran up to Emily.

"That's enough," a woman said. "Please put those down and relax!"

"We saw what happened," a man said. "I understand why you resisted, but there's no need for any more violence."

"We'll vouch for you when the guards get here," another man said. "So let's settle this peacefully, okay...?" They seemed to have good intentions and were acting to get the situation under control.

Zhang wondered how to get away from them, when suddenly...

"Minus, minus, minus."

...Emily swung her axes thrice.

Two lost their HP and died instantly, while the third one — the woman — survived thanks to her Lifesaving Brooch.

"Huh?" she said, confused, as Emily began repeatedly maiming her with the twin axes. "Wha—? S-Stop...!" she begged, but Emily ignored her, pulverizing her until she was nothing more than a hunk of flesh, then tiny motes of light.

“...What is happening?” Zhang said in confusion.

He couldn’t believe what Emily was doing.

The Masters had all approached her with good intentions, showing no desire to harm her, yet she had judged them as minuses and instantly killed them.

In fact, it was also strange that she’d murdered the bodyguards who had intended to merely capture her. Unlike the hooligans from that alley or the Taurus Leo, they hadn’t threatened her life at all.

The bar that those bodyguards and the Masters had to pass to be deemed as “enemies” seemed to be significantly lower.

“Is she actually...?” Zhang muttered as an idea came into his head that made his blood run cold.

While that was happening, the situation was only escalating.

“Stop that girl!”

“The stats Reveal gives you are fake! She’s not what she seems!”

Drawn by the commotion, other Masters had gathered here, some of them ready to face Emily.

Upon seeing them...

“Minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus, minus...”

...Emily repeated the same word over and over.

◆

Normally, Emily was an innocent little girl who was generally friendly and usually liked the people she met, rather than disliking them. Because of this, there weren’t many things she recognized as enemies, making her switches to killing mode rather uncommon.

However, things were different once she’d already made the switch. While she was in her killing mode, the bar for her to judge someone as an enemy was much, much lower.

Those trying to restrain her, those trying to make her put down her weapons, those who simply approached her and happened to be powerful...

As long as they weren’t Zhang or other people from IF — essentially anyone she’d already recognized as a friend — her killing mode would see anyone who came too close as enemies.

Even trying to stop her would make you an enemy, making the number of targets increase endlessly.

Rascal and the other members of IF referred to this as a “chain.”

This was the phenomenon that devastated the massive Pentagon Caravan clan, led to the death of every fighter in a whole city, and drove a species of worms to extinction.

It was the murderous stampede that continued until all possible enemies were gone from her sight.

And it had now begun here in Cortana.

◆

Emily dashed towards a group of Masters that had come to defeat her.

She covered a distance of fifty metels with a single step and swung her axes at the same time, removing the head of one of the Masters.

“Ah! Supersonic speed?!”

“EEYAAHH! STORM STINGEERRR!”

Right after the decapitated Master vanished, the Gale Lancer nearby used his ultimate job skill on Emily. She was wide open, and the supersonic attack was too fast for her to evade. It was a direct hit, but all of it was nearly negated by the defense of her skin.

The lance only barely hurt her.

“How...? Ghuh?!” the lancer exclaimed as Emily gave him the death penalty a mere split second later.

While this was happening, a Gunner Master fired his Embryo bullets, only for them to be repelled like it was nothing.

“What’s with her?!” one of the Masters said.

“She’s way too tough...! There’s no way she’s a tian! She’s probably a Master with an Embryo focused on phys-def!” said another, analyzing their enemy.

“Guess it’s a job for me, then!” a robed Master — a Pyromancer — said as he took a step forward.

Emily quickly faced and charged at him...

“Instant Charge! Crimson Sphere!”

...but the Pyromancer, who had an Embryo specialized in high-speed spellcasting, quickly cast his ultimate job skill on her.

Emily's vision was drowned in crimson, and her whole body was covered in flame.

"I did i— Guhh?" the Master said as, a moment later, Emily's tiny arm reached out from the ball of fire, grabbed his neck, and snapped it like a dry, withered twig.

The flame soon expired, leaving only Emily, completely unharmed.

However, the same couldn't be said for her equipment. Her custom-made dress was resistant to fire and had withstood the Crimson Sphere's flame, but the accessory that maintained her disguise had melted away. Now she stood there not as a harmless tian, but as herself.

Her face was clearly visible, exactly as it appeared on the wanted list.

"...No way," murmured a Master as they stared at her unmasked stats.

Emily Killingston
Job: Murder Princess
Level: 528
(Total Level: 928)
HP: 8,056 (+36,550)
MP: 350 (+36,550)
SP: 1,980 (+36,550)
STR: 3,050 (+36,550)
AGI: 4,356 (+36,550)
END: 1,680 (+36,550)
DEX: 687 (+36,550)
LUC: 100 (+36,550)

Everyone present was perplexed by Emily's stats. They were abnormal — simultaneously too low for an SJ, as well as too high with the bonus.

However, this was only to be expected. The bonus was created by the very skill that made the Murder Princess such a fearsome job.

This skill's name was "Kill Leader," and it had actually given Emily her nickname.

It was the Murder Princess's passive ultimate job skill that made the job what it was.

Its effect was simply "give a bonus to all stats equal to the amount of humans killed."

Indeed, the total number of people she'd killed, tian or human, was 36,550 — and each of them had added a point to her stats.

The more Emily killed, the stronger she became.

Chapter Five: The Machine Knight of Ice and Roses

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

By the time we arrived at the source of the screams, we found a scene of absolute mayhem.

People were fleeing in all directions while countless Masters engaged in fighting something that turned them into bits of light one after the other.

My low AGI made it hard to see it, but there was definitely something moving around at an incredible speed.

The first time I did manage to see anything properly was when it used an axe to split open a Master’s head.

The figure was a girl, wearing a dress so drenched in crimson blood that I couldn’t tell the original color.

With her disguise gone, her face was different, but I was certain that this was the very same girl I’d met at that café.

“The Murder Princess,” said Persephone. “This is my first time laying eyes on her, but she is truly something. I can see why she is in the same clan as The Weapon... She is clearly on a rampage, but she’s killing them one by one.”

“What now, Hugo?” Cyco asked.

I knew why she was asking me that question.

She wanted to know what I, myself, would do now.

I closed my eyes and pondered. Teach had told me to suppress the Murder Princess using La Porte de l’Enfer. I was reluctant to use it against a little girl, but I couldn’t just sit by and let the casualties pile up.

More than that, I felt that I had to stop the girl from doing this for her own sake.

Neither Yuri nor Hugo could tolerate the disaster before them.

“Cyco... Let’s do this!” I shouted.

“Roger that!” she responded. I used Instant Release to take out my

White Rose, summoning a pure white Magingear into the bazaar.

The scene attracted many eyes...including Emily's.

Under the gaze of all present, I rushed to enter White Rose.

It only took me a few seconds, but that was a long time when dealing with someone who moved at supersonic speeds. As I put my hand on the edge of the cockpit, the Murder Princess fixed her eyes directly on me.

I looked right into them and saw...tranquility.

Despite the violence she was committing, her eyes were as still as a calm lake.

She's gonna kill me, I thought.

She had plenty of time to reap my life while I boarded the cockpit.

I expected her blade to reach for me next...

"..."

...but she did nothing.

She allowed me to enter my Magingear. It was as though she didn't see me as an enemy.

She then looked away from me and resumed moving at supersonic speed, disappearing from my sight.

While that was happening, I finished boarding White Rose.

"Cyco!" I called, ordering Cyco to merge with White Rose and become its frozen armor.

"La Porte de l'Enfer!" she shouted the moment the fusion was complete.

This was a skill that Froze X% of any targeted creatures' bodies with a probability of X%, where X equaled their kill count of their own kind.

It activated the moment it was used, then ticked every thirteen seconds afterwards.

Because of this, anyone that had killed a hundred or more of their own kind would instantly freeze solid, just like the dozens of Masters I'd faced in Gideon.

"Wh-Whoa...!" a Master voiced his surprise.

"What the hell...? Is this one of her skills?" another one asked. I was in too much of a hurry to set the skill's target, so I ended up just using it indiscriminately. As a result, many other Masters had their bodies partially or completely frozen.

That wasn't what truly mattered here, though.

"...What became of her?!" I asked. Moving at supersonic speed, she was too fast for me to follow, so I didn't know where she was or if she had even been affected by my skill.

I knew the extent of La Porte de l'Enfer's power.

I'd used it against skilled Masters back in Gideon and even tested its viability against Superiors with Fran.

However, I'd never once used it against a combat-focused Superior. If it didn't work because of, say, the sheer difference in power output of our Embryos, then I would have no means of stopping her.

As such worries flickered through my mind, I looked around as I suddenly heard a voice.

"H-Hey! The Murder Princess... She's Frozen!"

Looking for the source of the voice, I moved White Rose's camera-eye.

There, I saw an ice statue of a girl holding two axes.

◇◆

City of Commerce, Cortana

With Emily neutralized by La Porte de l'Enfer, the situation was brought under control.

One could say that this positive result was pure coincidence.

Normally, Hugo would've been instantly killed while he was boarding White Rose. In her killing mode, Emily rushed towards and murdered anyone she deemed an enemy.

However...Hugo had chatted with her before she'd entered her killing mode.

Although briefly, they'd had a pleasant exchange back at the café. Emily remembered it, and that was enough for her to recognize him as a friend even in the heat of battle.

While killing mode made it far easier for her to see strangers as enemies, those that normal Emily had already deemed to be friends would still be hard-pressed to become her targets.

That was what had made it possible for Hugo to enter his Magingear and activate his skill without interruption.

And the ultimate result of that was his act of giant-slaying — a high-rank Master subduing a Superior one.

The onlookers were filled with shock.

This included the many Masters that had been battling Emily...as well as Zhang Zangqi — Emily's only real ally in this city.

"Wh-What...?" he stammered as he observed Emily's Frozen form through the vision of a bird jiangshi.

When La Porte de l'Enfer was activated, Zhang had been nowhere near her. After Emily had begun her "chain," Zhang had obeyed Rascal's words to the letter — "If a massacre breaks out, just wait it out in a safe place before pickin' her up."

Emily's rampage was no doubt something that would attract the other Superiors.

It was an unusual situation, but Zhang's primary objective was to survive, and his secondary objective was to collect information. He was hesitant to leave Emily, but he did so anyway to fulfill these two objectives.

Thankfully, he'd gone far enough to leave the range of La Porte de l'Enfer.

If he had been nearby, he'd have been turned into an ice statue just like Emily.

However, he was in no state of mind to appreciate the danger that he'd narrowly evaded.

Emily...someone so powerful Froze in an instant... he thought, stressed. I must save her. Rascal said that I should not, but with the situation being what it is, I need to retrieve her no matter the cost. I doubt even he'd expected that she'd be neutralized like this.

As things were, Emily's Frozen body would either be shattered or locked away, and both of those things would lead to her being sent to the gaol.

With that in mind, Zhang rushed to Emily's aid...

"Ah...!"

...but the very moment he stepped into La Porte de l'Enfer's range, the skill had another thirteen-second tick, which instantly Froze his right leg.

If he had been just a couple seconds later, he would've been an ice statue; he was lucky to get away with just a leg.

"I am not sure how this works, exactly...but I see that I cannot enter either," he said. However, his observational jiangshi were untouched by the ice, which told him that jiangshi were unaffected by whatever this was.

Zhang came to the conclusion that he might be able to use his jiangshi to approach and retrieve Emily.

"Drag-Worm Jiangshi, move!" he said. "Will they make it in time, though?" Positioned outside and moving through the ground, Drag-Worm Jiangshi weren't fast monsters. They couldn't even be compared to the High Dragon Jiangshi he'd possessed in Huang He and Hermine.

Zhang was worried that they wouldn't make it to his location before Emily was shattered.

If it had been Rascal in his place, however, he wouldn't have been the least bit anxious. Instead of calling for reinforcements, Rascal would've merely resumed his hunt for information.

"No matter what, Emily'll be the last one standing. That's the result, and it ain't ever gonna change."

Rascal had said those words a mere hour ago.

He hadn't said that for any reason as simple as Emily's Kill Leader skill and the immense stat boosts it gave her.

No. The true value of the Murder Princess lay elsewhere.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

"Cancel La Porte de l'Enfer..." I said.

"Okay," Cyco replied and did as told.

At the same time, she thawed everyone out besides the girl.

"Whoa... I'm back."

"So this was the Magingear guy's skill. Damn, he completely stopped the Murder Princess."

"I feel like I've seen this skill before..." I heard such voices around me, but I had something more important to focus on.

Hurriedly, I established a comms line with Teach's Blue Opera.

"Teach, can you come here right away?" I asked.

"Kay kay," she replied. "Ya met the Murder Princess, didn' cha?"

"Yes... I neutralized her with La Porte de l'Enfer."

"Niiice one!" She gave me an impressed whistle.

"...What do I do now?" I asked.

"Just wait there. Oh, but she had a friend, so watch out for him too, okay?" she said.

That much was true. Back at the café, the girl had been accompanied by a man with the air of a guardian. If he was actually with her, then he certainly wouldn't ignore a situation like this.

"All right," I said.

"Okay then. I'll head there after I'm done talkin' here. I won't be long," Teach said before cutting the call.

She must've been talking to King of Tartarus, Benetnasch.

"Persephone, is your Master... Hm?"

I called out to his Embryo using the unit's speaker, but I got no response.

I looked for her using the cockpit's monitors, but she was nowhere in sight.

Well, she had said that she couldn't fight, so it would make sense for her to flee the scene.

Regardless, I had more important matters to attend to.

"Cyco, stay alert," I said. "The man who was with the Murder Princess might come to retrieve her."

"Roger that."

I had to keep an eye on my surroundings until Teach showed up. However, when I started looking around, I noticed that there were a bunch of Masters around White Rose.

One of them — a man with a mohawk — spoke to me.

"Thanks for that. You're the one who Froze her, right?" he asked.

I responded with a nod of White Rose's headpiece and, trying to be Hugo-like, said, "This is one of my Embryo's skills. She will remain Frozen for quite some time."

"Good to know... Should we break her now?"

"...No. My companion will be here soon. She is part of Sefirot. Ace, AR-I-CA."

"The Blue Sky Songstress, huh...? Yeah, it's probably safer to wait, then. For all we know, shatterin' her might just activate her Lifesavin' Brooch and basically just...free her."

...I actually hadn't considered that, I thought. What happened to fully Frozen enemies who had Brooches equipped if their ice was shattered? I hadn't tested that.

"...I will prepare to use the skill again, just in case."

"Good to know. Thanks. Without you here, we'd be... Wait, I haven't introduced myself yet. My name's Mohawk Rock, and I'm part of the local Mohawk League branch."

...I'd guessed as much based on the mohawk alone. For some reason, that clan had branches in every country. Dryfe was no exception.

"I am Hugo Lesseps," I replied. "I am currently independent, but I used to be a member of The Triangle of Wisdom."

"Aha, so you were. Your Magingear's like none I've ever seen, so I guessed you'd have ties there."

"I see... Oh, there is one thing you should know. The Murder Princess did not come here alone. Her companion might come to retrieve her. Could you help me keep an eye out for him?"

"Sure thing. Leave it to us," Rock said before calling out to some other Masters and explaining the situation to them. They soon began looking around for anyone suspicious. He then turned back to me and said, "They are all from our clan. Though, they're hidin' their mohawks. For reasons."

...What is the significance of them hiding their mohawks? I wondered.

"By the way, why's The Blue Sky Songstress here in Cortana? She's part of Sefirot, right? Is it somethin' to do with the mayor?" he asked.

"...I am not at liberty to say, but why are you asking?" I returned. It actually was related to the mayor, but I couldn't exactly say that.

However, I couldn't help but wonder why Rock had posed the question.

"Well, if it's somethin' to do with the stuff the mayor's pullin', I thought that maybe she could help us out. Sefirot is on the president's side, right?"

"Hm?"

"We Mohawk League were asked by Caldina's Administration of Justice to investigate Mayor Douglas Coin. He apparently did lots of really bad stuff, but there was no solid proof for any of it. At least, until some time ago, when someone submitted a letter to the administration describin' a bunch of his crimes in detail. We came here to confirm that... Though, one of our leads — the merchant with ties to the mayor — was just killed by the Murder Princess."

Apparently, the mayor was involved in far worse things than just keeping the Orb for himself.

...And they were hiding their mohawks to be discreet while investigating, huh? I thought.

Well, a bunch of Masters with mohawks would certainly stand out too much. Though Rock, the apparent leader of this group, had kept his mohawk on.

...I really wasn't sure if that was a good idea.

"At the very least, I can tell you that we are not with the mayor, so we might be able to assist." I said. "Though, I would have to discuss it with Tea — I mean, AR-I-CA."

"Well, that'd be great if you do."

"By the way, who was it that submitted the letter?" I asked.

"Oh, that would be my Master Dearest." A third voice joined our conversation. It was Persephone, who'd at some point approached my White Rose without me noticing her at all.

"Persephone, Hugo's thinking 'she's so small I didn't even notice her,'" said Cyco.

"Gngh... Am I truly that tiny...?!" Persephone groaned in chagrin with her hands on her head.

Well, it was less about her size and more about her being in the camera's blind spot...

"I just didn't see you anywhere. Where were you?" I asked.

"I went to retrieve something."

Retrieve? I wondered.

"So, lady, you said that you know who submitted the letter?" asked Rock.

"Indeed I do. It was my Master, King of Tartarus, Benetnasch," she answered as if it was nothing special.

"King of... Damn, so there's three Superiors here? What's going on in this city? Maybe we should've gotten Sec-Gen Omega to come here too?" Rock muttered, saying something quite worrying.

I'd heard that Secretary-General Omega was the Mohawk League's leader and another Superior... Bringing him here would only make things more chaotic than they already were.

Putting that aside, I faced Persephone and asked, "Why did he make the submission?"

"Well, as I already told you, Master Dearest can see ghosts. He gathered information from the spirits of the mayor's victims in exchange for assisting in the exposure of his crimes."

...So that's the situation, I thought.

“He also used the information he acquired to blackmail the mayor,” she added. “‘Please give me the Orb or I’ll report you to the congress’ and all that.”

“...Huh? But he’d already submitted the letter...” Cyco noted.

“To the Administration of Justice, yes...but not the congress.”

...Not lying, but not telling the truth either. This conversational trick was often used to avoid Truth Discernment. My sister was a fan of it too.

Anyway, this meant that the mayor’s misdeeds would be exposed whether or not he gave away the Orb. This Benetnasch seemed to be quite a character...

“Looking at all the grudge in this city, the mayor has gone far beyond all reason,” Persephone continued. “He did not have much time left regardless. The rest of his life will be spent behind bars...assuming he even survives,” she said as she looked in the direction of the mayor’s mansion. “Now, your companion and my Master Dearest should be... Oh dear. This is bad.”

She spoke the last line while looking at the still-Frozen Murder Princess.

A moment later, the twin axes broke out of the ice and flew through the air.

“What?!” A cry of shock escaped my lips. The deadly weapons decapitated two Masters in their path and began to spin around the area.

“It’s an Arms-type Embryo!” a Master exclaimed.

“Tch! They can move around even when she’s Frozen?!” said another. I looked and noticed that the ice statue’s arms were shattered.

This was the price she’d paid to move those axes.

However, the owner’s wounds seemed to matter little to the weapons. They flew around until...

“...Huh?”

...they crashed into the girl’s Frozen frame, shattering it to pieces.

The shards of ice sparkled within the sunlight.

Among those shards were motes of light that were her mortal remains.

Emily had used her own Embryo to give herself the death penalty.

“Sh-She killed herself...?” one Master wondered.

“I guess it’s better than letting us take her out?” said another. “Also, death penalties from losing HP make you drop less stuff than death penalties from using the suicide system.”

With the resurrection timer expired, she’d become bits of light and could no longer be brought back.

"...Oh no," I muttered. I hadn't expected this outcome.

It's in Infinite Dendrogram, sure, but I just pushed a little girl into committing suicide... I'm not sure if I'll be able to sleep tonight, I thought.

...At least this whole problem was solved now.

This was the end of my encounter with the Murder Princess...

"Minus."

...or so I thought.

A moment after I heard a voice speak the word, I heard a powerful sound of something breaking.

I looked around for its source and I soon found it. The Master near me — Rock — now had an axe instead of a head.

It was clearly a fatal wound, and with his head and trademark mohawk destroyed, he quickly dissolved into bits of light.

In his place, there was now only a blood-colored axe, which soon spun and flew to return to the hand of a particular person.

After catching the weapon, she looked around.

It was her. The very same girl who had just received the death penalty — Murder Princess, Emily.

She wasn't Frozen, and she even had the hands she'd lost when her axes had flown away from her.

She stood, unharmed and ready for battle.

"Wh-What's going on?!" a Master shouted.

"D-Did someone use a rez item on her?!" a second Master asked.

"Like hell! You can't use those after the rez timer runs out and they turn into light! And that's what happened to her! There's no way she should've been able to come back from that!" a third one exclaimed.

Indeed, this was impossible.

Reasonably, there's no way this could've happened.

However, I knew things that others here might've not.

I knew of a Master that merged with a kaiju of immense stats.

I knew of a Master that could rewrite the effects of skills to make them far stronger.

I knew of a Master who could see a future others couldn't.

And I knew a Master who could create armies of tens of thousands all by herself.

They...the Superiors could go beyond what was reasonable and make real what should've been impossible.

Knowing this, I understood what was happening here.

"This is the Murder Princess's...her Superior Embryo's power...!"

She could die, only to live again.

◆◆◆

About Youaltepuztli

In Infinite Dendrogram there was a concept referred to as "Resources." It could be described as a kind of "energy" possessed by jobs, monsters, items, nature, and Embryos.

Resource exchanges came in many forms.

When a creature defeated another creature, the latter became experience points that raised the former's level.

Items used the Resources stored within them to activate various skills.

Upon death, monsters had most of their Resources converted into items.

When Masters or monsters died, the Resources that didn't become EXP or items were quickly retrieved by the control AI, and the Resource-less bodies instantly became bits of light.

The Resources retrieved by the AI were used in various ways.

Control AI No. 1, Alice — the one in charge of avatars — used the Resources of destroyed Master avatars to restore them.

Control AI No. 9, Caterpillar — the one in charge of environments — used Resources to fix this or that biome, or to improve the areas around save points.

One could say that all life in Infinite Dendrogram depended on the concentration, distribution, depletion, and growth of Resources.

Naturally, there were also Embryos that used Resources.

King of Destruction's War God Ship, Baldr, and Giga Professor's Magic Beast Factory, Pandemonium, used item Resources to produce ammo or monsters.

King of Crimes' Primordial Shifting, Nu, acquired physical resistance and its well-rounded nature by taking most of the Resources meant for its Master's job.

Emily Killingston's Soul-Eating Axes, Youaltepuztli, was a Superior

Embryo that used Resources far more directly than others.

Their power was simply to reap and store Resources.

Most of the Resources that would have originally become her EXP had actually gone into the axes instead.

Because of this, Emily's level was lower than it should've been, but considering Youaltepuztli's power, that mattered little.

The axes could turn even tian corpses into light and absorb them. The numbers were estimates, but by fully absorbing a level 100 tian, Youaltepuztli would receive 100 resources. Even a normal murder would give at least half of that.

With Youaltepuztli being a deity as well as a demonic figure in Aztec mythology known to consume souls, one could say that this was a fitting power.

However, that was only the first part of what made it such a fearsome Embryo.

Youaltepuztli could use the stored resources to resurrect Emily.

That was the effect of its passive skill, "Survival of the Fittest."

When Emily died, her resurrection timer expired, and her Resource stocks were scattered and drained, they would automatically be refilled to bring her back.

Like the blood of sacrifices made to god, the stored Resources would be used to recreate her avatar the moment she turned into bits of light. Whether it was death by external wounds or the result of some status effect didn't matter at all — Emily would always come back with full health.

One could say that she was doing Control AI No. 1's job for herself, except instantly and without the need to log out.

That alone made her a fearsome foe, but those fighting her would have an even bigger problem...a fatal one, in fact.

Though the process drained the stored Resources...there was no limit to how many times she could come back.

If Emily was level 100, she could come back by draining 100 Resources.

With her now being level 928, the Resource cost for resurrection had increased.

In a way, that meant there was functionally a limit — she couldn't come back once her Resources were depleted.

However, including those she'd just killed, Emily had murdered a total of 36,587 people.

That didn’t even include monsters such as worms.

This was what made this skill such a fatal problem for her opponents.

Just how vast were her stores of Resources? And how many times could she use them to come back?

Even if someone was able to drain her Resources by repeatedly killing her, Emily could replenish her stocks simply by killing any living creature.

This meant that she would never fall before her enemy did.

This was the true meaning behind Rascal’s words.

Murder Princess, Emily Killingston was an immortal Master.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

Death was the end of life — the inevitable fate that loomed large over everything that existed. No matter how good or bad, all things ended the moment death arrived.

Infinite Dendrogram had these so-called “undead,” but those were really just a different form of life — not something that came after a truly final death.

Everything was destined to die, and death was something that could never be reversed.

My unwavering belief in this fact was probably the reason why my Embryo, Cyco, was born with the power to punish those who inflicted death upon others.

However, things seemed to be different for Emily. She’d become bits of light, only to return a moment later.

This girl was clearly above even the temporary death that we Masters had been granted.

Emily...was unstoppable.

“Wh...What...?” said someone nearby. It seemed I wasn’t the only one who was dumbfounded by this.

The Masters who had been surrounding Emily, keeping a close watch out for anyone who might try to help her, seemed to be barely moving even to someone as slow as me.

The absurdity of what was happening had essentially left us frozen in place.

Emily, of course, didn’t care about any of that. Instead, she instantly renewed the slaughter.

A transcendental entity who possessed immense stats and could instantly revive from death... She was easily among the strongest Masters I knew. Even Teach was below her, and on top of that, Emily gave off a threatening aura that rivaled the King of Destruction.

“Ngh...! Target those with more than 10,000 and restart!” I shouted out.

“Roger that,” said Cyco.

It only took me a few seconds to activate La Porte de l’Enfer again, but that was enough for nearly ten Masters to die. She was moving at supersonic speeds, cleaving through them one by one.

I could only see the afterimages left by her attacks, but I could tell that she was committing a massacre.

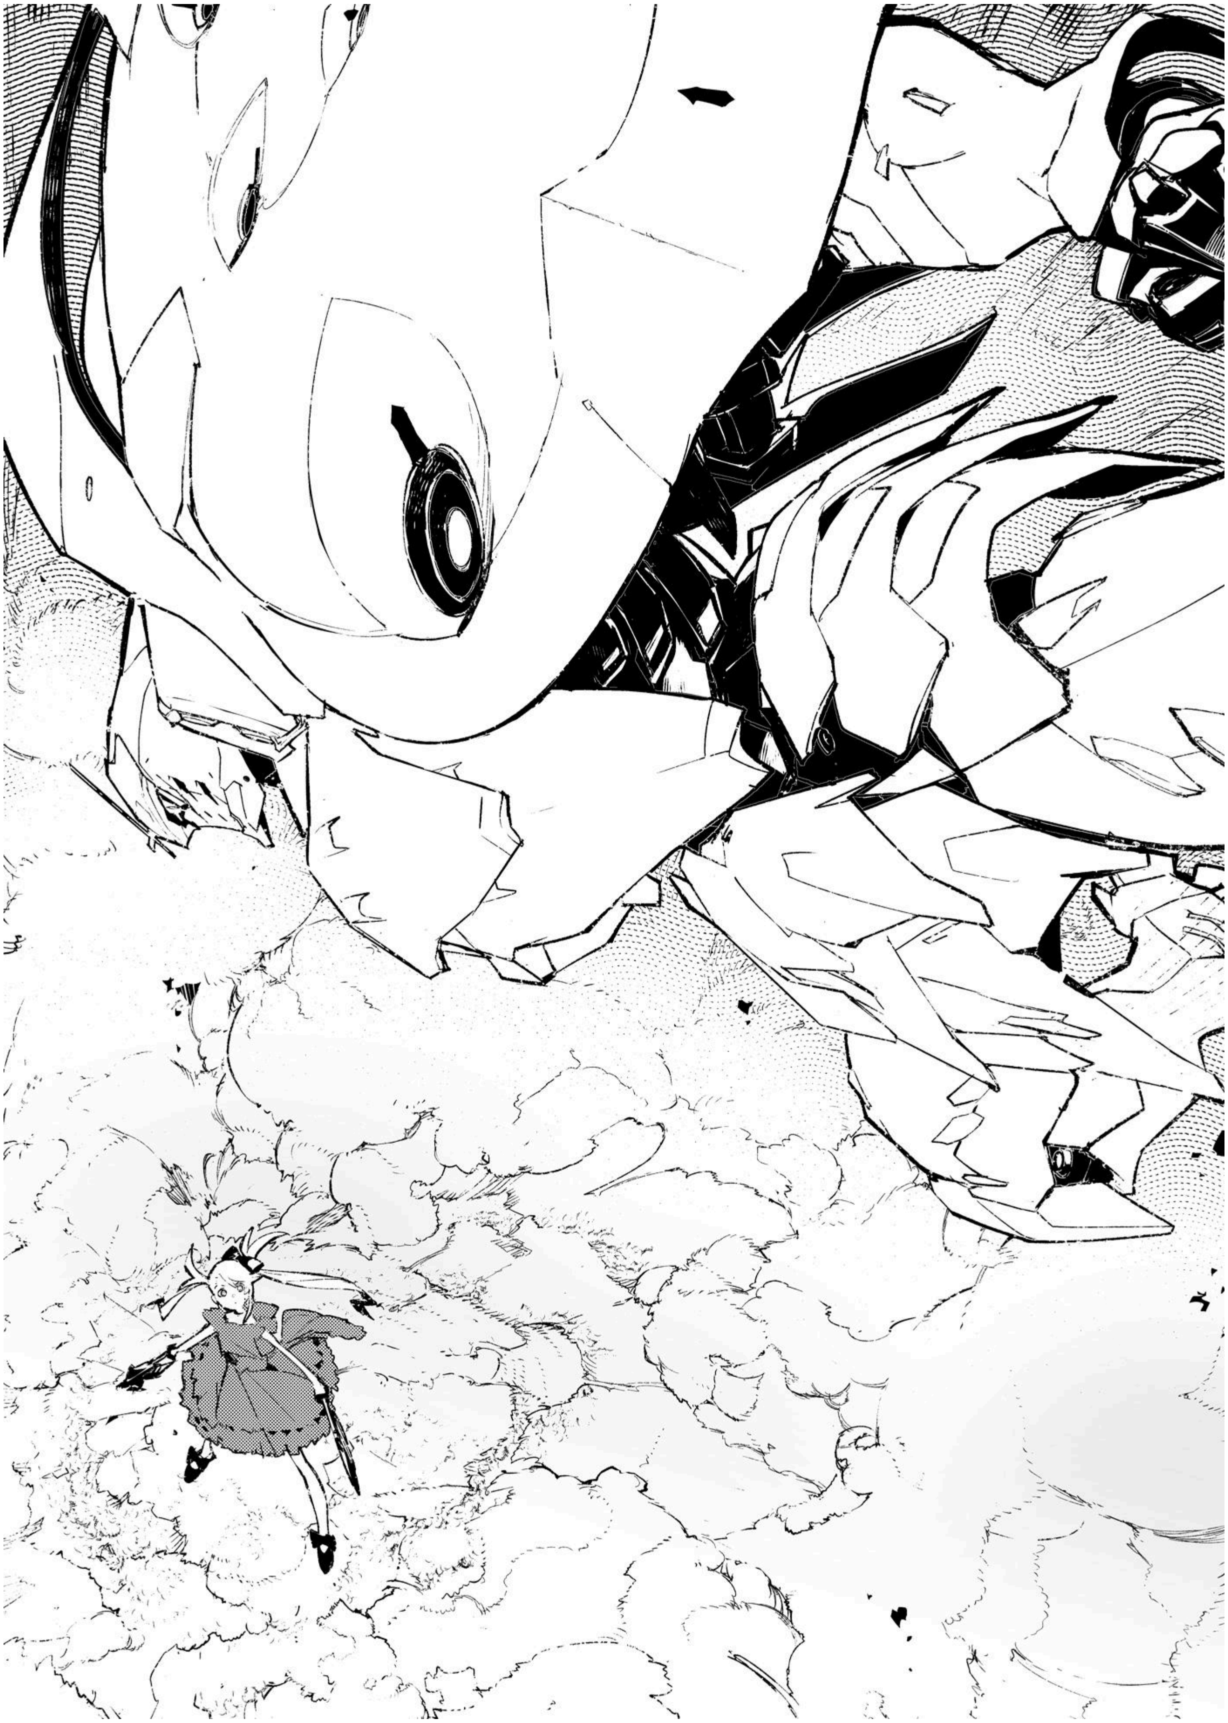
And, for a split second, I felt a chill go down my spine.

Seeing this made me understand that I was a target as well — that she now saw me as an enemy, just like the others.

“La Porte de l’En...?!” I tried to resume La Porte de l’Enfer when I heard the sound of White Rose’s armor being struck, followed by a shock that reached me here in the cockpit.

All the armor made my unit extremely heavy, yet the attack sent it flying backwards, knocking it completely off balance.

“Ugh...!” I used the momentum from that strike to jump and create some distance.



After a moment of floating through the air, the cockpit was shaken by the shock of landing, powerful enough that White Rose couldn't fully absorb it.

"...Ngh."

"Cyco?!"

"I'm...okay. She only threw an axe... It shattered part of me, but stopped at the armor before returning to her," she said.

Thanks to a damage reduction skill, Cyco's frost armor, and the unit's own armor, White Rose, actually boasted the strongest defense of any Magingear.

However, that single thrown axe carried enough power to penetrate it regardless.

"What's the damage on the armor...?" I asked.

"A small dent; that's it," Cyco answered.

That's still damage, I thought.

Still, the Mythical alloy armor that my sister built hadn't been destroyed.

Fran's creation could still stand for now, but it wouldn't last long if Emily decided to focus on it until she tore it apart.

"Where's Emily...?!"

"...There. Frozen," Cyco said. We'd successfully activated La Porte de l'Enfer, Freezing her once again.

However, the axe flew out once more, shattering and reviving her yet again.

Strange as it seemed, she didn't attack me this time either, instead targeting other Masters.

It seemed that she was in a state similar to the one granted by berserk-type skills. I couldn't see any reason or logic behind her attacks.

There was no clear order for whom she targeted either. I was the one Freezing her, but she ignored me in favor of slaughtering other Masters, seemingly at random.

...Maybe it was all about distance and level?

I was relatively low-level and was further away from her than the others, so that might explain why I wasn't high on her list of priorities.

"Minus... Minus..." She massacred Masters, repeatedly reviving herself after either being Frozen by La Porte de l'Enfer or suffering deadly damage from some other Master's ult.

The scene was downright hellish.

"There's no end to this..." I said.

"Do you have any ideas?" Cyco asked.

"...All that comes to mind is destroying those axes."

Those two instruments of slaughter must've been Emily's Superior Embryo. Without those, she wouldn't be able to revive herself.

"...But destroying those is impossible," I added. Just now, one of the Masters had used an ult on one of her axes, clearly aiming to break it, but the weapon hadn't even been scratched. Moments later, it killed that same Master.

Damaging an Arms-type Superior Embryo was extremely difficult. I knew this quite well after seeing how not even Xunyu managed to destroy Figaro's Embryo; Figaro himself could only harm Xunyu's after enhancing the effects of his own Embryo.

It was obvious that White Rose's firepower wouldn't be nearly enough to destroy those axes. That was probably true for Teach too.

Altar's King of Destruction could probably do it...but we didn't even have a prayer of getting his help right now.

"There's nothing we can do..." I said. Ray and that Rook guy could probably find a way to victory in this situation, but not me.

I'm not good enough to stop the girl's killing spree... I thought, with self-derision.

"...And that's acceptable to you?" Cyco asked.

"Of course not! But I..." There's nothing I can do anymore... I can't do anything here that would possibly help.

"Hugo... 'A knight who protects women,'" Cyco silently said.

"...Huh?" I asked, hearing her words clearly. It seemed like her response against my inner whining.

"Cyco? Where did that come from...?"

"That's what you wanted 'Hugo' to be, right?"

"That's..." I said, before trailing off as I pondered her words. That was definitely what I wanted out of Hugo.

I wanted him to be a knight who protected women and defeated any threats to their happiness — the thorn for every beautiful flower. The Machine Knight of Ice and Roses.

That was the image I had for Hugo and the role I played — the hope I had entrusted to him.

"She won't stop no matter what," Cyco said. "She will kill many people, including those you wanted to protect." I listened to her intently as she spoke. "I was born from your desires. Because of this, I will protect you and your wishes," she continued.

Her words made me feel like the frozen armor covering White Rose was actually embracing me.

"Trust me to protect everything. Don't turn your back and give up. Don't look away from your wish."

"Cyco..."

She was named after the frozen hell, but what she'd said warmed my heart like few things could. Her words had reached my very heart, and they had helped me remember a different set of words I'd once heard.

"Stop wallowing in doubt, young lady."

I'd heard that said back when I was so full of doubt that I could neither move forward nor turn back.

It had been spoken by one of Ray's friends — the sharp-tongued boy I hated more than anyone in Infinite Dendrogram.

However, I knew full well that his words had hurt me so much because he was exposing the truth I had been trying so hard to avoid.

Those words had come back to me because I was fully aware of that fact. Even as they hurt me so deeply, his words now served to spur me onwards.

This had also reminded me of a particular scene — the memory of a Master facing an enemy far greater than himself, yet without even thinking of backing down.

"...Don't turn your back, Hugo," I said to myself. Choose your path and move forward, no matter how powerful the enemy may be. Those two would've never backed down in this situation, and neither should you.

"...It's time to choose, Hugo," I reinforced to myself.

Also, right now the circumstances were completely different from what they had been at that time. Back at Gideon, I had been forced to choose between standing against my sister or letting a tragedy happen.

The thing that had filled my heart with doubt was entirely in the past. This time, I only had to choose between fighting or giving up.

When I thought about it like that, it became very obvious what Hugo

Lesseps had to do!

"...All right, Cyco," I said. "Neither I...nor Hugo...will give up!"

"Yeah. Do your best," said Cyco.

I decided to keep moving forward and face this threat. Since that was my decision, I had to reexamine my options here.

"Hmm..."

Back when facing Fran, Ray had supposedly told her something like this: "It means that not even you — a Superior — were able to create a monster that was invincible just because."

That was exactly it — not even Superiors were unbeatable.

Even if they seemed invincible, they must have a weakness of some kind.

Think, Hugo. Her immortality has to have a flaw, I thought.

"...Wait." And then, it finally hit me.

Currently, Emily Froze every thirteen seconds, then used her axes to shatter herself and return from the dead.

The important thing to note was that...she wasn't actually immune to Freezing.

Though she could kill herself to come back from it, La Porte de l'Enfer was still effective at neutralizing her.

"Another thing I've observed is that the power of the flying axes can vary widely..."

Emily's axe-throws were significantly stronger than the flying attacks the axes did on their own. I could only guess that her throws were empowered by Emily's STR, while the axes themselves weren't.

White Rose's armor couldn't withstand the former, but it was strong enough to hold against the latter.

"...Also, her actions after Freezing have already become like a routine." Once Frozen, Emily herself couldn't move, so the axes instantly broke off her hands and flew.

If they were in flight the moment she Froze, they would stop attacking and focus on shattering her. It seemed as though they would do this even if they were close to killing their targets.

That meant that the axes would automatically move to kill and revive Emily the moment she was incapacitated. They had to do that.

"...And if they didn't shatter her, she would still be Frozen."

Her revival needed a trigger — her death. She couldn't come back if she hadn't actually been turned into bits of light.

Emily was immortal because of her deaths.

In that case...!

"Cyco! Use White Rose's second battle mode."

"...The anti-artillery defense thing? You know it's costly, right?"

"My MP wouldn't last long regardless!"

White Rose was a heavy unit with always-active defense skills, making it a real MP sink. The drain on my reserves was even bigger when La Porte de l'Enfer was active.

This was White Rose's greatest flaw, even mentioned in the manual Fran had given to me — it was built for endurance battles but could only be used for a short while.

It was like a tank that quickly ran out of gas.

This could also be said about its synergy with Cyco.

Anyone who'd killed a hundred or more of their own kind would instantly be defeated by La Porte de l'Enfer, but anyone with a smaller number of kills — like that Rook person — would be drawn into a war of attrition.

White Rose's ideal position was that of a unit that defended against the enemy's attacks while slowly suppressing them with La Porte de l'Enfer.

But with my high-rank MP reserves, it couldn't be used for long; unlike Ray with his Grudge-Soaked Greaves, I had no way to make up for this shortcoming.

This was a design flaw of White Rose that I couldn't address at this point, and the second battle mode that I was about to use was only going to make it worse.

I couldn't even keep that battle mode up for five minutes...but it let me do things I couldn't do otherwise.

"In this situation, it's our only choice...!" I said.

"Okay," Cyco replied. I input something into the console to the side of the piloting gear and waited for the right moment.

Emily was currently slaughtering Masters even as she was Frozen and shattered by her axe every thirteen seconds.

There were at most two seconds between the moment Emily was Frozen and the moment she was revived.

Those two seconds would decide everything.

"Cyco! Count down until the next tick!" I barked out an order.

"Eleven, ten, nine...!" She did as told.

However, the next moment...

"Minus."

"Ah...!"

...Emily, still barely visible to me, launched an attack against us in earnest.

I looked around and realized that most of the Masters were already dead.

"Looks like we are her targets now... But...!"

Emily had thrown both of her axes.

They spun in the air as they attacked the other Masters still standing. Emily herself was attacking White Rose with her bare hands.

"Aghh...?!" Her blows were powerful, throwing my unit off balance. They were even more intense than Rook's Demi-Dragon's attacks, and White Rose's frame was starting to creak in agony. This was especially baffling because this unit was far stronger than the one I'd had back then. That meant that Emily's bare fists were worlds above even Demi-Dragon charges.

"Damage on external armor. A crack has formed," Cyco said.

Emily was actually breaking the Mythical alloy armor with nothing but her hands.

"My body too..." she added.

"Cyco, are you all right?!"

"Don't worry...!"

Cyco and White Rose were still somehow withstanding this onslaught.

"We're not...giving up yet!" I declared. We waited out this several-second-long barrage that felt like it lasted minutes, and survived to see the moment come.

"Three, two, one...!"

Cyco finished the countdown to La Porte de l'Enfer's next tick — and once it came, Emily instantly Froze yet again.

"White Rose, purge all armor! Second battle mode!" I shouted. A moment later, all the armor that Emily had cracked and bent was removed.

This wasn't due to her attacks, however — I had done this purposefully.

Cyco quickly transformed into armor to replace the pieces that were detached.

"Axes incoming!" she cried. They had instantly switched from attacking the Masters and were now returning to Emily to shatter her.

However, before that happened, I activated White Rose's final trick.

"Boucliers Planetes!" The axes were on their way to kill and release their Master.

Just like before, they approached Emily — but unlike before, they were reflected by White Rose's armor, now floating around her Frozen body.

The axes couldn't reach her.

"Hugo!"

"We...did it!"

This was White Rose's second defense mode — Boucliers Planetes or "shield planets."

These were floating shields that protected the target from a distance. They were remote-controlled armor-pieces originally designed to protect White Rose from artillery and magic while maintaining distance, preventing the damage from leaking to the main frame.

I had a degree of control over it as well as some automation settings, giving me multiple ways to protect White Rose...or anything else I wanted. Even the enemy.

Emily's axes crashed into the armor over and over again, but without her stats empowering them, they couldn't damage the Mythical alloy, which was just as I'd expected.

They seemed to be automatically prioritizing Emily's destruction, showing no intention of actually attacking White Rose itself. The weapons only continued to repeatedly crash into my shields, unable to break through and kill their Master.

"This...is checkmate," I said.

This was the only way I could win this.

I'd protected her from her flying axes, preventing her death — and with it, her revival.

Ironically, protecting her was the only way to defeat her.

◇

"...Cancel La Porte de l'Enfer," I said. "I'll focus my MP into maintaining Boucliers Planetes.”

“Roger.”

“You get some rest, Cyco.”

“...Okay. I’ll take a break.”

I canceled La Porte de l’Enfer while Cyco, completely drained, transformed from her armor form back into a Maiden.

I didn’t intend to move the unit or use any skills from now on. The MP cost of Boucliers Planetes alone could be recovered using MP consumables.

The Freezing debuff of La Porte de l’Enfer continued even if the skill was canceled. The length of the effect actually scaled with the amount of their own kind the target killed, so as long as no one shattered her, the Murder Princess would be Frozen for days.

She would probably have to log off before it expired, but the Frozen debuff prevented people from logging out.

This meant that she would have to use the suicide system in order to actually disconnect from the game.

Or perhaps her family would start to get worried that she’d been logged in so long and try to remove the headgear, forcefully activating the suicide system.

...At least, I was pretty sure that was how it worked.

Regardless, the suicide system would obviously override her resurrection ability. Otherwise, she wouldn’t have had to use her axes to kill herself, and she would’ve already been revived by now anyway.

That made it clear that this battle was over.

I watched the axes continue their futile attempts at breaking through the shields and killing their Master — their other half.

“...Why?” I peeked at her through the Boucliers Planetes and thought, Why did she massacre all these people?

Of course, I knew that not everyone was a Maiden’s Master like myself.

There were those like Dryfe’s Hell General — people who only saw this world as a game and thought that tians were just NPCs whom they were free to break like any other object.

The Murder Princess’s fighting style was pretty “game-like” too.

Fighting her made me feel like I wasn’t actually facing another human. What I felt was instead the shortsightedness of primitive AI enemies from old games, as well as the calculating coldness of an emotionless machine.

Many had died here, and my surroundings were far more empty than they had been before.

The tians who had populated this bazaar had all run away, while the Masters that had survived didn’t even amount to twenty.

Besides them, there were the tian corpses...or what was left of them, anyway.

This horrific sight made me understand why she was wanted in every country, and why she was one of the most infamous Masters in the world.

“...Why?” I muttered. The girl I’d met at the café didn’t seem like the type of person who was capable of something like this. She’d spoken of other people’s Embryos like they were friends, all smiles.

She had been like a normal, purehearted little girl.

“How did you end up becoming the Murder Princess...?” I asked — but of course, the ice statue didn’t answer.

The battle was over, and the only sound left in the bazaar was the metallic clang of the axes striking Boucliers Planetes.

Chapter Six: The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis

A Certain Place in the City of Commerce, Cortana

Great Soul Daoshi, Zhang Zangqi was overcome with panic.

Through his jiangshi, he'd witnessed everything that had happened to Emily. Upon seeing her break free of the ice for the first time, he'd thought that his worries were over — but when Hugo completely sealed her away, Zhang's fear grew to even greater heights.

But that wasn't the only reason for his distress.

Zhang had placed Drag-Worm Jiangshi on standby outside the city. He'd already sent them to Emily's aid, and under normal circumstances, they'd have already rescued her.

"...No good," he said. As it turned out, the jiangshi had all been intercepted and destroyed before they could fulfill their objective. Through their vision, Zhang saw exactly what had been responsible for this — a soaring Magingear with blue armor.

Luck was against him this time.

The local Drag-Worms were creatures of the dunes, made to travel beneath the dry sands. Because of this, they couldn't reach their top speeds while burrowing through the rich soil around Cortana's oasis, forcing Zhang to make them move above ground for a swifter rescue.

Unfortunately for him, AR-I-CA was heading towards the bazaar at the same time as the jiangshi were approaching. She spotted them immediately and wiped them all out using charged artillery fire from her Blue Opera.

"That must have been achieved by the Dangai Orb I once possessed," Zhang said. "It is a reliable power to wield, but a frustrating one to face."

At the very least, the Drag-Worm Jiangshi were able to keep AR-I-CA from reaching Emily as quickly, so their deaths might've not been completely in vain.

That meant little, however, if she would still make it there first.

Regardless, Zhang had lost the jiangshi he'd planned to fight with, and thus he had next to no chance of saving Emily now.

Despite this, he had no intention of giving up. After all, if Emily was kept locked in stasis as she was, it would be a heavy blow to the organization he now served.

"I must rescue her no matter the cost," Zhang said. He might have lost his jiangshi, but he still had himself.

He'd lost against AR-I-CA even with his Wuxing Jilong and Dangai, so now he didn't even have a hope of defeating her; but he could bring Emily back by merely removing the shields protecting her and letting Youaltepuztli do the rest.

"I will free her even if it costs me my life," he declared before taking a step into the zone where his leg had been Frozen earlier, confirming that the effect had been deactivated. He'd expected as much based on what he'd seen through his jiangshi while watching Hugo's White Rose.

That skill is now inactive, he thought. I suppose it can only be used with that armor.

Knowing that La Porte de l'Enfer wouldn't interfere, Zhang instantly broke into a sprint. He cut a path through the alleyways, rushing towards the bazaar where Emily still stood.

If only something would happen to distract them, he hoped, knowing full well how impossible that was.

Through the eyes of the jiangshi he'd sent to the mayor's mansion, he'd witnessed AR-I-CA and Benetnasch strike some sort of deal, and the necromancer had handed over the Orb he possessed. Zhang couldn't hear their conversation, but he guessed that Benetnasch gave her his Orb in exchange for AR-I-CA letting him take the mayor's.

The Indestructible is far more powerful than the mayor. He will have no trouble taking the Orb, so there is no chance it would cause any kind of worthwhile distraction.

Since AR-I-CA was in a hurry to aid her companion, she'd accepted the deal, but Zhang could tell that she did intend to ultimately take the mayor's Orb away from Benetnasch.

Perhaps if I wait until then... No, even if The Blue Sky Songstress and the Indestructible resume their battle, more Masters would have arrived here by then, Zhang thought. Being a member of Sefirot, AR-I-CA could use the influence of the congress and the president to send requests to the guilds. This would make it easy to find more Masters who could protect Emily until she finally took the death penalty using the suicide system. Some of these Masters would surely have defensive abilities or items better than Boucliers Planetes.

In the worst case scenario, The Earth — another Sefirot member — could come and bury Emily thousands of metels underground.

Zhang would be out of options then, unable to do anything to save her.

I must do something before that happens... What? As that thought crossed his mind, he suddenly stopped running.

This was because his senses as the Great Soul Daoshi picked up something unusual.

"...Grudge? Souls? No...what is this feeling?" Great Soul Daoshi was a job that dealt with death, but Zhang's necromancy was quite different from that of the west.

The jiangshi that he usually used were little more than corpses animated by magic that followed the instructions written onto their Fu. The Fu acted as a kind of replacement soul, so unlike the King of Tartarus or a Lich, he didn't have to deal with souls directly.

But he was a necromancer still, and as such, he could sense souls just like the rest of them.

However, what he sensed now was unlike anything he'd ever felt before.

"...A lamentation?" A souls' lament — a deathly wail that cannot even be classified as an expression of grudge.

It was as though someone was crying out in horror as they watched something happen that could not possibly be undone.

It reached Zhang from the mayor's mansion — the same place where he'd thought nothing more would happen.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

"Heyyy! Good job, Yu!" said Teach, flying in with her Blue Opera. Only a few minutes had passed since I'd trapped Emily. "Whoa. She's locked up gooood. What's with the shields, though? And the axes hammerin' 'em?"

In response to that question, I recalled what had transpired and explained everything to her, along with a description of what Emily's Superior Embryo could do.

"...Endless auto-revives? You gotta be jokin'." she said in shock. "Man, I knew this already, but there sure are a lotta broken Superior Embryos, huh?"

You can basically see slightly into the future. You're not one to talk, I thought.

"Even our Albert can only do that seven times... Though, I guess the revival is more like a bonus for him," she added.

"Teach?"

"Oh, sorry, got a bit off track there."

"So, how were things on your end?" I asked.

"I let KoT have his turn with the mayor's Orb. He said he'll pass it to me if it turns out he doesn't need it. Though, if he does end up needing it, I'll just go and take it from him." Knowing her, none of that was surprising. "Oh, and he gave me a li'l somethin' in exchange," she added.

"That being?"

"The Orb he had. The one that turns water into land. He didn't really seem to need it, so he went and gave it to me, just like that."

Based on what I heard about him from Persephone, I could understand why. The Orb had nothing to do with souls or life, so it made sense that it wouldn't be worth much to him.

Still...an Orb was an Orb. It was Huang He's national treasure and a potent negotiation piece.

"You make it seem like he doesn't gain anything from the exchange," I said.

"Hmm, we agreed that if he passes the mayor's Orb to me, I'll have to do something he wants... Oh no! What if he asks for something lewd?!"

"...You'd probably like that, wouldn't you?" I said. There was no helping this woman.

"So, what're ya gonna do now?" she asked.

"I'll try to keep this girl Frozen until she uses the suicide system to log out," I answered. "With her kill count, she'll probably stay like this for more than a full real life day... We still have to worry about that person who was with her, though."

My words made Teach fall silent for a moment and think.

"I beat some worms on my way here. They might've been with that guy, and there might be more," she said.

I guess we can't exactly sit here and wait, I thought, before pointing at the axes and asking, "Can you break the Embryo, Teach?"

"Nope. As far as Superiors go, I don't have much firepower. And from what I can tell, those axes put toughness above sharpness. You need somethin' very strong to break 'em."

If not even Teach could do it, then there wasn't much we could do here.

For a moment, I considered asking for KoT's help...

"Hm...?"

...but when I looked around, I realized that Persephone was nowhere in sight.

"But...man, this is bad," said Teach. "I don't think the guys who sent her over expected her to get into a situation like this. We might get actual IF members comin' to save her."

"'IF'...?"

"A criminal clan Sefirot scraps with every now and again. Little Murder Princess here is one of them," she explained.

This reminded me of the times I'd heard of the clan while I was still in The Triangle of Wisdom. The rumors about Emily were most of what I'd heard, though.

"The problem is that all official members of the clan are Superiors who'd easily break her out of your ice." That certainly was a problem. "Sechs the 'Dark Core' is in the slammer, so we won't be seein' him, but La Crima the 'Error Source' has the army to do it, while Rascal the 'Ruiner of Legacy' can destroy her along with the entire city."

...Teach, might I ask who thought of those nicknames? It's like they were trying to sound like bad news, I thought.

"Just so you know, these nicknames are straight out of DIN articles. They make Emily's 'Kill Leader' look so simple, don't they?"

...You think so?

"Anyway, since keepin' her here is a bad idea, and we can't have anyone break her out..." Teach said before stopping to think for a moment. "All right. Let's just throw her out then."

"Huh?" I said. I had just heard her say something I couldn't ignore.

"There's a huge patch of quicksand a little bit to the southwest."

“Huh? Umm... Teach?”

“If I dump her there, anyone comin’ to help her won’t be much of a threat, and breakin’ her out while she’s in sand will be kinda hard. It’ll keep her in place even after she’s revived! It’s perfect!”

“Perfect?! Teach, are you listening to yourself?!” I raised my voice. I know I’m the one who froze her, but throwing a girl into quicksand...?!

“So yeah, see ya later!”

“Ah, wai—!” I tried to call out, but she picked up Emily and flew away before I could finish.

The two axes followed after them, but their speed was far below Blue Opera’s and they quickly fell behind.

I could do nothing but stand behind and watch as they disappeared. I’d spent a good while racking my head about Emily and how to deal with her, but now I felt like Teach had rendered it all meaningless.

“...There there,” Cyco said as she consoled me with a pat on my head — though she was still tired and barely able to move.

“Truly, nothing is beyond her. How terrifying,” said a voice coming from behind us.

I turned around and saw Persephone.

“Persephone?” I asked. “When did—? No, where were you?”

“Hmm... In hiding.”

“From Emily?”

“No. From Ace, more like.”

From Teach? I thought.

“From what I could tell, that woman would have murdered me on sight purely to make it easier to take the Orb from Master Dearest,” she explained.

Oh no... After seeing Teach grab Emily and fly away, I could easily see her doing just that.

“So, you finally showed yourself because she left?” I asked. “I’m pretty sure she’ll come back soon.”

“I understand that, but I feel that I must give you a warning.” ...A warning? “Well, the matter of the Murder Princess is solved now, but...” she said with a tired shake of the head. “Something worse will soon show itself.”

Those words were laden with certainty.

"Huh?" Something worse than Emily? "Persephone, what are you talking about?"

"Hm..." She gave no proper response to my question. Instead, she merely looked off into the distance — in the direction of the mayor's manor.

◆◆◆

City of Commerce, Cortana, Mayor's Mansion

"Aieee...hieee...!" Douglas Coin, the mayor of Cortana, was running frantically through his mansion.

"Sir, what is the matt— AAAAAHHHHHHH?!" The maids that saw him shrieked in terror as their eyes fell on his legs, severed by Aragorn and now replaced by countless writhing maggots.

However, he ignored them and continued running, as though unaware of his own state. His destination was the mansion's dungeon — the place where many homeless people and slaves had met their ends, turned to corpses for the mayor's dark ritual.

"I-I just need...to finish the ritual...!" The fear of incoming death made him lose his mind, as well as gave him the strength to keep running.

He didn't want to die.

That was the mayor's main motive, as well as the reason why he now wanted to carry out the ritual of the Orb of De Vermis. This motive, however, had its roots in a time before he'd acquired the Orb at all.

◆

About a year ago, his body had been overcome by severe illness. His old age and the many years he'd spent living large had begun to take their toll on his vital organs and overall health. Life became difficult for him, and the idea that he might die soon became an obsession.

Perhaps because death felt so close, the Mayor had begun seeing visions of the many people he'd tortured and killed in life.

Dying would have meant losing everything he'd attained, and it wasn't clear what would happen after that. Many stories of old said that those who incurred the grudge of others in life would suffer immensely after death.

This had been all but confirmed by the observations of various necromancers.

The mayor had once laughed these stories off, but that amusement had turned into fear as his death drew closer and closer.

After illness had taken hold of him, the mayor's nights had become filled with teeth-chattering terror. He buried himself deep under his sheets, because otherwise he would see things he didn't want to see: his own disease-stricken, dying visage, as well as Fria — the wife of one of his political opponents.

During the mayoral election some years ago, he'd ruined a couple who opposed him by having the man accused of crimes he did not commit. Following that, he took Fria as a slave and eventually murdered her...but now, her face was coming back to haunt him. It was as though she was waiting for him to finally die.

That was far from the only misdeed he'd committed. He'd done many vile things as both a merchant and a politician. He'd even accepted money from the Gouz-Maise Gang that had operated on the border with Altar, keeping the Altarian army at bay and supplying them with magic items in exchange for their payment.

Many children and the people who'd tried to rescue them died as a direct result of his actions, but Douglas didn't care as long as his wealth continued to increase.

He'd been committing such crimes for decades now.

However, as death drew near, he'd begun to selfishly fear the retribution he could face.

These days had seemed endless.

"No... I don't want to die... No... Nooo..." Crying like a child, the mayor had continued to panic over the prospect of his impending death.

He felt that if he strained his ears, he could hear his subordinates and servants talking about what they would do once he was dead.

"I-I... I can't die yet... I don't want to die...!" He'd begun life as a merchant, become a politician, and eventually rose to become mayor of the second most important — if not the most important — city in Caldina. His word in congress carried more weight than anyone's save maybe the president. It would have been accurate to call him the "vice-king" of the union.

However, all the wealth, glory, and power he'd gathered would all vanish the moment he died.

And beyond the grave, there would be nothing waiting for him but the vengeful victims he'd murdered for his own ends.

"Aaaahhhh... Huh?" As the idea of such a future paralyzed him with terror, something moved the sheet that he had pulled over him.

It was the wind flowing into the room.

The window was open for some reason, letting in the night breeze.

"...Ugh!" For a moment, he considered calling a servant to close it, but he didn't want anyone to see him crying, so he decided to do it himself.

His limbs shaking, he took his cane and slowly walked up to the window...and then noticed something odd on the floor.

"...What is this?"

It was a crystalline Orb. Below it, there was a piece of paper saying, "Present. This is what you seek. Place the Orb under the pillow, wish for health and youth, and they shall be yours again."

He looked at the Orb in suspicion, closed the window...and picked it up.

His suspicion was no match for the temptation presented by the Orb and the mysterious letter.

Someone had clearly left the Orb after breaking into his room, but he felt that doing as the letter said was the correct course of action. So, he placed the Orb under his pillow.

"A healthy body...and youth... Heh heh... What am I hoping for...from this thing...?"

He chuckled in self-derision at his own actions, but he still went to sleep with the Orb beneath his head.

And when he woke up the next day, he was so healthy that it would have been hard to recognize him.

The shadow of death that had hung over the mayor before had all but vanished. His face was full of life, and there wasn't a hint of pain or trembling in any part of his body.

The mayor felt freer that day than he had in decades.

"Ha...hah hah hah," he laughed in disbelief. "What...? What is this...?!"

"I-h-a-v-e-m-e-n-d-e-d-y-o-u-r-b-o-d-y-w-h-i-l-e-k-e-e-p-i-n-g-i-t-s-s-h-a-p-e."

"Ah?!" The mayor jumped as an unfamiliar voice rang out in his head.

It wasn't an auditory hallucination. It seemed more like someone nearby was talking to him.

"Wh-Who is there...?! Where are you?!"

"I-a-m-D-e-V-e-r-m-i-s. T-h-e-o-n-e-s-e-a-l-e-d-w-i-t-h-i-n-t-h-e-O-r-b-y-o-u-p-o-s-s-e-s-s."

"What...?"

De Vermis then began speaking about itself.

It revealed that it was a UBM that had been sealed away in the Orb by the Draconic Emperor over six hundred years ago, and that someone had taken it from Huang He and brought it here.

Perplexed by those words, the mayor looked at the letter.

Who, exactly, had left him a national treasure of the Huang He Empire?

He wondered what their goal could've been, and guessed that by giving it to a powerful Caldinian, they intended to spark a war with Huang He.

The idea made him shiver. He wondered if it was best to return it, but De Vermis told him that if he were to let go of the Orb, his body would not stay mended. Without the Orb in his possession, the mayor would revert to his sickly, aging state once again.

Upon hearing that, the mayor remembered the fear he'd felt every night, and he couldn't bring himself to give the Orb up. Ultimately, he decided to keep it himself and hide it from everyone else.

Afterwards, he had some slight trouble proving who he was to his servants. He ended up telling them that he'd "used a special item" — which wasn't the full explanation, but also not a lie in the eyes of Truth Discernment.

After a day of particularly good health, De Vermis spoke to him once more.

"M-e-n-d-i-n-g-y-o-u-i-s-n-o-t-m-y-o-n-l-y-p-o-w-e-r."

"What...?"

"M-y-p-o-w-e-r-i-s-w-h-a-t-y-o-u-c-a-l-l-i-m-m-o-r-t-a-l-i-t-y."

"What?!"

De Vermis then told him of the ritual for immortality.

First, it needed between a hundred and two hundred dead bodies. And second, after they'd been killed, the bodies had to be kept in one place for a certain amount of time.

With that, the preparations for the rite of immortality would be done.

It would come at a cost of many lives, but with the mayor's wealth and power, this was easy to accomplish without anyone being the wiser, especially if he only targeted vagrants and slaves.

"I-b-e-l-i-e-v-e-I-c-a-n-p-e-r-f-o-r-m-t-h-e-r-i-t-u-a-l-w-i-t-h-y-o-u-r-a-i-d. W-i-l-l-y-o-u-a-s-s-i-s-t-m-e?"

"If I do...?"

"Y-o-u-w-i-l-l-a-l-s-o-b-e-c-o-m-e-i-m-m-o-r-t-a-l." Magic and necromancy were real in the world of Infinite Dendrogram; this was a wicked and suspicious offer.

However, the mayor accepted it, mostly because De Vermis had already demonstrated its power on the mayor's own body.

"Immortality... If I become immortal..." If he became immune to death itself, he would never again have to feel the fear he'd experienced when facing the prospect of his own demise.

And there was nothing he wanted more than that.

He accepted De Vermis's offer and began doing whatever was necessary to become immortal.

◆

The one who'd given him the Orb was none other than the sub-leader of IF, Zeta.

She believed that a greedy, influential politician who was on the verge of death would use the Orb in a way that would attract many powerful figures to the city.

In some sense, it went exactly as she'd expected.

But whether the ultimate outcome was something she'd accounted for was another matter entirely.

◆

And so, the mayor arrived at the dungeon — the place of the ritual.

"Hee...heeeee... I am here! I lost them, and I made it!" he said out loud. The dungeon was full of bodies — all belonging to the nearly two hundred people he'd killed.

Despite that, the place did not smell badly at all, strangely enough.

All the corpses looked fresh, and even the wounds that had caused their deaths had stayed as clean holes in their flesh.

The mayor took out the Orb of De Vermis and said, “Now! Start the ritual!”

“T-h-a-t-I-w-i-l-l.”

A moment later, the mayor’s hand moved against his will and threw the Orb to the floor, shattering it.

“...Huh?” The mayor had no intention of doing that, but he had thrown the Orb on the ground as though spurred on by some unknown force inside him.

The UBM-sealing Orbs, created by the greatest Draconic Emperor in history, were potent treasures that allowed the holders to wield the powers of the UBMs within, but that didn’t mean that the orbs themselves were difficult to break. Just a few years ago, an Orb in a certain land was shattered, releasing the UBM within.

And here, it had just happened once again. The Orb shattered, releasing the sealed UBM — a small fly.

It seemed hard to believe that this pitifully small creature possessed immense power, but it was undoubtedly an Ancient Legendary UBM — The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis.

“This is the first time we have faced each other like this, is it not, Douglas?” De Vermis spoke to the mayor with a voice far clearer than it ever had before.

The mayor, however, said nothing in response. He did not even move from where he was standing, for he was too shaken and overcome by terror.

“E-Eek...!”

All their exchanges thus far were based on the premise that De Vermis was sealed in the Orb and could thus be controlled.

But now it had been released.

A tian facing an unbound UBM was a death sentence.

Thinking that he’d been simply manipulated into freeing the UBM, the mayor almost despaired...

“Please do not be afraid. I have no intention of harming you.”

...but De Vermis spoke to him in a gentle tone.

“What...?” the mayor said.

“As I said, I will now perform the rite of immortality. As a friend, you will be part of it. Let us live together, eternally."

There was no hint of malice or deceit in that voice. De Vermis just saw the mayor as a friend and wished to grant him immortality.

Realizing that the UBM had nothing but good intentions, the mayor relaxed.

"I-I see! Then let us complete it before King of Tartarus comes."

"That would be for the best. Let us begin."

A moment after De Vermis said that, the corpses lying in this room began to move.

The remains of the slaves and beggars killed by Douglas's private soldiers began to rise, with bodies so healthy-looking it was impossible to believe they were actually dead.

"The corpses...!" the mayor cried.

"They are not corpses. They are alive," De Vermis insisted.

"...What?"

"Oh, I suppose I should explain. The fragment that I created when I mended your body had a limited ability to speak, so I could not convey all of the information to you. I will tell you about it now while I create the immortal body."

De Vermis's words raised some questions in the back of the mayor's mind, but before he could ask them, the UBM began explaining its abilities.

"My power is called 'Reinvigorating Rebirth.' It is a skill that targets flesh, bones, and organs damaged by wounds or illnesses and replaces them with fragments of myself."

"Hm...?"

"The fragments act exactly as the organs they replace, and they also improve anything that passes through them. Blood, for example. Additionally, since they have the power to grant vitality, anything that has part of its body replaced by my fragments becomes even healthier than they were before. This reinvigoration is perpetual and does not degrade with time, making eternal life possible. Even if ninety-nine percent of such a body is destroyed or burned, the damaged cells can be replaced. Oh, and since your entire body was so decayed, a very large amount of you was replaced, which greatly improved the effect and made you look far younger."

"Wait, what are you saying? I..."

"To put it simply, I use the failing parts of others' bodies to create fragments of myself. Those fragments then make their bodies healthy." With that simplified explanation, the mayor finally understood how De Vermis's power worked.

However, he now had another question.

"What do you mean by 'fragment?'" he asked.

The best answer to that question was no doubt the mayor's own legs, replaced by countless maggots.

However, De Vermis didn't point that out. Instead, the mayor looked at the walking dead surrounding him.

The corpses that the UBM had said were alive gathered together in one place and began to collapse there. As they fell, they looked unnaturally limp, as though they had no skeletons or joints.

And from the many holes all over those bodies, innumerable amounts of maggots began to pour out.

"Those are my fragments," said De Vermis. Upon seeing that, as well as noticing the maggot-legs he now possessed, the mayor was completely unable to speak.

However, De Vermis continued talking, ignoring the mayor's emotional state.

"The bodies of people dying from heart and lung failure are the optimal bases for the creation of my fragments. First the killing wound, then the dying brain cells, then the decaying body... I can replace them in that order."

The UBM was speaking as though none of this was remotely out of the ordinary.

"I would have preferred to keep replacing parts for a few more days and increase the number of fragments, but now that there is someone who would take my power away from you, this seems to be the best I will be able to do." The maggots overflowing the pile of bodies were now leaving behind the parts they hadn't replaced — the cells that were still alive — like food they hadn't had time to eat. The writhing mass then began to gather into a single place.

These maggots born from human bodies might've been made of human cells, but they were clearly not human.

The maggots abandoned their original form as disparate parts of many corpses and began to gather and assume a different form.

Maggots born from certain corpses became fingers, others became toes, and the majority of the creatures merged together into a most fitting shape — a maggot.

Born from nearly two hundred corpses, the writhing bugs created a freakish form akin to a giant maggot with multiple sets of human limbs — a sight most ordinary humans could scarcely bear to look at.

Perhaps if it were some sort of artificial creation, it wouldn't weigh so heavily on an onlooker's sanity. However...it was alive. It pulsated as a single creature.

The maggots born from the corpses became a new shape...a new life-form.

The sight was unbearably repulsive. If the wicked dead were given a choice between this and hell, most would certainly pick the latter.

Perhaps if Ray Starling or Hugo Lesseps had been there, this creature would remind them of the great manifestation of grudge — The Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

However, the essence of this creature was nothing like that at all. In fact, it was completely the opposite.

Gouz-Maise was an undead — a mass of corpses animated by grudge — while this was a creature whose living cells had turned into maggots that kept them alive.

Sooner rather than later, the tiny fly that was the heart of De Vermis approached the mass of maggots.

It welcomed their father and entrusted the entire body to it. Then, the giant gathering of nearly two hundred corpses-turned-maggots were now De Vermis's body.

"...Ah, ahh...ahhh?" As the mayor stared at this bizarre scene, he felt something tickle the inside of his ear.

He put a trembling finger inside, and when he pulled it out, there was a single maggot on it.

"...Ah? Ah...?! AAAAAAHHHHHH?!" Just like that, the mayor realized that the voice of De Vermis had not been actually ringing inside his mind — this maggot was whispering it directly to his eardrum.

"I used my fragments to make your body accustomed to me." De Vermis spoke calmly, ignoring the mayor's disgusted writhing on the stone floor.

"Unlike other flesh, you will live with me until your final cell vanishes. I have you to thank for being outside again and for helping me create a body so swiftly. You have my endless gratitude."

And so, with pride, confidence, sincerity, and a gentle tone...

"So...let us live a life eternal."

...De Vermis spoke these words.

"Y-You mean that...you...?" the mayor muttered in disbelief.

What terrified the mayor the most was that De Vermis was no doubt expressing its genuine goodwill and gratitude. It truly wanted to live a life eternal with the mayor, because it wanted nothing but the best for him.

However, "life" in De Vermis's mind was a thoroughly inhuman existence.

To this being, "life" was transforming human cells, so they would be reborn and kept alive forever.

Thus, The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis's power, was exactly as it was rumored to be.

It did indeed give the user "a healthy life, and then a new life eternal."

What the description did not convey was that this "new life eternal"...was a life as a maggot.

"Aaahhh! AAAAAAAAAAGH!"

The mayor finally realized that the thing being created here wouldn't be anything as simple as a flesh golem.

It would be a mass of maggots that would not even be capable of dying.

"Please relax. You will feel no pain. It might be bewildering at first, but I am sure it will please you," said De Vermis with nothing but honesty in its voice.

However, the mayor shook his head and wailed.

"NO! THIS IS NOT WHAT I...!"

The lives of the living and undead were different. The lives of multicellular and unicellular organisms were different.

The mayor hadn't thought for a moment that the immortality he would be granted would be as different from human life as that.

Where would the soul go when one became a part of such an undying body?

What if it became forever sealed away, trapped and unable to escape?

The mayor looked at the mass of maggots, hoping to see at least one silver lining, but there wasn't even a hint of humanity in any of the human-born maggots forever crawling within it.

And that was the mayor’s future.

“NOOOOOOOOOOOO!” Upon realizing this, the mayor lost his mind and began to wail and tried to escape the dungeon. In his mind, even capital punishment was better than this.

However, it was too late. With most of his body replaced by De Vermis’s maggots, the UBM was able to force him to turn around and walk towards the wriggling mass.

Starting from his fingers, his body was slowly disassembled. Slowly, he was made part of the whole.

“NO! NOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOO!”

Overcome by despair, he wailed again and again as De Vermis took him in.

Right before he was consumed...

“I beg...you...please...kill...meee...”

...his final words were truly ironic for a man who had clung to life so fiercely.

With the mayor assimilated, The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis was complete. It broke the restricting ceiling above and began rising to the surface. After all, it had been formed earlier than planned. It still needed to find more bodies to bring into the fold.

Chapter Seven: Standing and Indomitable

City of Commerce, Cortana, Mayor’s Mansion

Benetnasch noticed the anomaly soon after he finished negotiating with AR-I-CA.

He possessed skills that gave him sight of the surrounding souls and grudge. Walls and similar kinds of barriers meant nothing before those skills, allowing him to clearly see the souls beneath the mansion.

That made it easy for him to understand that the nearly two hundred souls gathered here were now wailing. The sensation froze him in place.

“What troubles you, my friend?” Aragorn asked as he was busy breaking through the mansion’s many walls.

“...This is really bad,” Benetnasch said with a shake of his head and with frustration that was quite out of character for him.

A moment later, a gigantic pale arm broke through the floor in front of them, soon followed by five more. These limbs then flailed about, grasping at any piece of the mansion they touched. Under the creature’s immense weight, the building quickly began to collapse.

“In me, my friend!” Aragorn called.

“...Yeah,” Benetnasch said, jumping inside the skeletal dragon’s ribcage. Aragorn then rushed back to the garden, pulverizing any walls and pillars on the way. By the time they were out, the mansion had collapsed completely.

Benetnasch gazed at the dust-shrouded remains, saying not a word. One didn’t have to see souls to know the fate of the servants who were still inside.

“Below!” Aragorn said right before the six arms that destroyed the building pulled on the rubble, lifting up and revealing the creature’s full form — that of a maggot with human limbs.

The maggot was larger in size than even Pure-Dragons; it possessed six long arms and so many legs that they were hard to count. Every inch of it was made of tiny maggots.

It was so disgusting that the sight alone would break weaker minds.

Still, it wasn't difficult for Benetnasch to understand what he was looking at.

"My friend, is this...?"

"It looks like the sealed UBM has been released."

"The Orb held this enormous mass of maggots? How repulsive."

"No," Benetnasch said with a shake of his head. "This body is made of living humans."

"...What?" Aragorn asked in shock. The necromancer hadn't witnessed the moment De Vermis's current form was created, but he could see souls, and he saw the many souls trapped within the maggots that composed the creature.

While talking to Hugo, Persephone had explained the relationship between souls, minds, and bodies using ice, fluid, and a cup as their respective parallels. She had primarily focused on the effect that boiling grudge had on souls and bodies, but that wasn't the only way the relationship could go sour — the flesh could affect the soul and mind, as well.

When put in a repulsive vessel far unlike the original, souls and minds would be tainted just as drinks poured into lead cups became poisonous.

In this case, De Vermis was the lead cup.

Though the people used in its creation had had their cells replaced by maggots, they were still alive. They had died once, but their souls were trapped inside their bodies. Since they still lived, they couldn't even be melted away by grudge and vanish.

Because of this, to be one with De Vermis was a fate worse than undeath.

"Truly, this is not enough," said De Vermis. "Eternity requires more power and volume."

The human-maggot mass then used one of its six arms to pick up the corpse of a maid who had died in the mansion's collapse and crushed the body with its hand, mangling the flesh both inside and out.

Starting with the damaged cells, the destroyed corpse then began transforming into writhing maggots, all of which were absorbed by De

Vermis to make it grow in size.

"My friend, this creature..." said Aragorn.

"I thought it was strange when I saw the mayor grow those 'legs,'" Benetnasch replied. "Even if that UBM could use its powers from within the Orb, it couldn't have possibly gotten its egg-laying organs outside to infest the mayor like that. It makes sense now. The maggots weren't born..."

"...but transformed," Aragorn finished the sentence. "So it used a skill to turn the body of that lowlife into maggots."

"...That is probably how it made him healthy too," Benetnasch added. "I guess maggot therapy exists in real life, but this is just..."

Disgusting, he finished in his head.

That judgment wasn't just based on its appearance or nature — it was the fact that it trapped souls.

The transformed cells continued to live as maggots, and as living creatures, they bound the souls they had once possessed as human beings to them. Forced into such a form, these once-human souls and minds would eventually become those of maggots.

Benetnasch had already noticed such changes begin to take root in the mayor when he'd met him at the entrance. Merging with De Vermis had only accelerated the process, and that was exactly why Benetnasch called it "really bad."

The souls trapped within were wailing, lamenting the fact that they had been made inhuman and could no longer die as people.

"...Deadly Explosion." Benetnasch unleashed a spell. With everyone in the palace now dead, he didn't have to worry about killing anyone, so he decided to use the High Necromancer's ultimate job skill on the immense amounts of grudge accumulated by the mayor's deeds.

The heart of the explosion was the basement, where the grudge was densest, and the fires produced easily consumed all of the mansion's rubble. The blast even tore out the trees in the garden, sending a giant pillar of flame into the sky.

The firepower of this attack matched that of the Baolongba once used by Master Jiangshi, Xunyu.

"My friend..."

"...I'm seeing it myself. No need to say anything."

Even the immense flames of the Deadly Explosion couldn't burn up De

Vermis.

The spell would've surely scorched even Pure-Dragons with high fire resistances, but the mass of maggots came out of it unharmed.

Great amounts of its body were left Charred, but the blackened bits quickly became white again as they were replaced by new, healthy maggots.

This was what made De Vermis's Reinvigorating Rebirth so terrifying.

What this power did was replace damaged cells with maggots — its fragments — which made it possible for De Vermis to fully heal itself by simply replacing its own damaged cells with writhing new growth.

"UBMs are always such unreasonable foes..." said Benetnasch.

"Truly," Aragorn agreed.

"...You should know that you weren't any better."

Though the Charred bits were quickly healed, the Deadly Explosion had actually completely blown away a portion of De Vermis's total size, cells and all, which manifested as damage dealt to it.

However, that hadn't accounted for even a tenth of its total HP.

"I do not suppose you can use that again?" Aragorn asked.

"Nope. That blew away all of the grudge around the mansion," Benetnasch replied. Deadly Explosion was a spell that transformed grudge into firepower, making it a one-time spell that could only be used on large accumulations of grudge.

If he'd carried around Crystals of Resentment like Gouz-Maise the Lich, that would have been a different story, but those items were directly opposed to Benetnasch's goals. Obviously, he would never carry any.

"The only way to defeat it is to destroy it utterly, with not a trace left," said Aragorn. "What a menacing creature. It must be near-Mythical."

"An upper-Ancient-Legendary-tier, then..." said Benetnasch. "Wouldn't that make it stronger than you, though?"

"I am confident I was a match for it in sheer status, though compatibility is so heavily against me that I could never defeat it," Aragorn concluded, after spending a moment analyzing his own powers compared to those of his opponents.

"...Well, slicing probably wouldn't do much to it," Benetnasch agreed.

While they were having this exchange, Masters from all over the city were starting to gather, likely to investigate the source of the flame pillar.

Upon seeing the words "The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis" over the large maggot's head, they all recognized it as a UBM and mobilized to destroy it.

Some were shocked by Aragorn's appearance and prepared to fight him as well, but they quickly realized he was a Master's undead minion and immediately shifted their attention back to De Vermis.

"Hmm... For a city of such a scale, few enough Masters have gathered here," Aragorn observed.

"Based on what Persephone told me, the Murder Princess caused some trouble at the bazaar... I imagine that many got the death penalty trying to deal with her."

"The girl who shares a clan with that tomb raider? Well, I cannot imagine any ordinary Master being a match for her."

"...I hope she isn't as fearsome as Rascal, at least." While their conversation continued, more and more Masters gathered and focused their fire on De Vermis. The UBM had no proper defenses or resistances, so all the spells, slashes, and debuffs hit it with full effect...only for it to recover from them moments later.

Any part burnt by a spell was fixed in the same way as the parts of its body Charred by the Deadly Explosion.

The weapon attacks only briefly parted the wriggling mass, and any individual maggots that were severed were quickly regenerated.

And then, the maggots afflicted by the debuffs were instantly replaced by new, healthy ones.

No matter what was done to it, De Vermis instantly regenerated itself back to a state of perfect health.

Those with Reveal would notice one other thing — the UBM's SP did not decrease no matter how many times it restored itself.

This was the second thing that made Reinvigorating Rebirth so fearsome.

It was a skill that not only didn't cost SP — it continuously increased its SP reserves.

De Vermis could heal itself countless times and never feel fatigued because of it.

In fact, the fatigue could actually worsen the "cells," causing Reinvigorating Rebirth to replace them yet again.

The skill kept De Vermis in good health forever, no matter what.

Its lack of defenses or resistances was not really a problem for it — any damaged parts would simply be replaced.

“Its HP is measured by volume, like that of a slime. And it can regenerate...no...rebirth itself without limit,” said Aragorn.

“That reminds me of what Persephone said about the Murder Princess,” said Benetnasch. “Apparently, she can revive herself over and over again... She should’ve been here to fight De Vermis.”

“...That would no doubt have been a sight most hellish.” As De Vermis healed all and any wounds inflicted upon it, unrest spread among the Masters.

Some had actually used ults that matched or even surpassed Deadly Explosion, but the UBM had recovered even from those.

And once it was done weathering all of the attacks, De Vermis went on the offensive.

It held the palms of its six arms towards its surroundings.

“Initiating parallel offensive magic. Firing,” it said, releasing countless offensive spells.

Lightning, fireballs, ice lances, wind-blades, earth spears, and light rays rained down on the surrounding Masters.

They were all spells known by the owners of the bodies that now composed De Vermis. Since most of them had been slaves and vagrants, this magic was obviously very basic. Their power was minimal individually, and though the UBM could release them as a barrage, they merely scratched the veteran Masters here.

But that wasn’t a problem, for a scratch was all that it needed.

“Heh! That barely qualifies as damage!”

“Looks like this UBM’s hard focused on health and regeneration. It doesn’t look any weaker than before, but if we keep going— hm...?”

The Masters fighting De Vermis suddenly realized that something wasn’t right.

Parts of their bodies were itchy, as though something small was crawling on their skin.

They looked at the source of that sensation — the minimal damage done by the creature’s spells — and saw countless wriggling maggots.

“A-AHHHHHHHHHHHH!”

The Masters’ screams resounded throughout the area. Who could blame them? This was an event that defied logic.

The crawling maggots used their tiny mouths to bite into their flesh, which then turned into more maggots.

"You little...! Damn it! I'll smash you all!"

Some crushed the maggots crawling over them, while others killed them with fire, but the crushed or burned maggots were quickly reborn into healthy ones.

Even worse, the wounds they inflicted upon themselves in the process only became more maggots.

This was the third factor that made Reinvigorating Rebirth so fearsome, and it was no doubt the most terrible thing about it.

It allowed any wounds within a radius of three hundred metels to be turned into maggots.

The Masters present screamed in disgust and fear at the sight.

Even the falls and crashes caused by the panic created minor wounds that quickly became sources of even more maggots.

"Fresh maggots out of its own wounds as well as out of the wounds of others. Its volume cannot be reduced by harming it, yet it can turn its opponents into itself," Aragorn noted.

The Masters were unable to fight it any longer.

Even through the pain they were experiencing, they could still feel the maggots crawling all over them, slowly conquering more and more territory in their bodies. A single wound was enough for Reinvigorating Rebirth to create a swarm that would encroach over the body for as long as De Vermis was within range.

Some Masters almost instantly used the suicide system, but no one could blame them for that.

"It is best for you to avoid any attacks at all, my friend," said Aragorn. "Use me as your shield and do not stop channeling your Necro Effect."

"I understand," said Benetnasch. Aragorn was tough, but he couldn't prevent any and all damage from reaching his necromancer. The wounds Benetnasch received were slowly being replaced by maggots, all of which died a moment later.

This was because of a buff available to the necromancer grouping, Necro Effect.

It created a weak contact-based instant kill effect which killed all maggots on Benetnasch as soon as they appeared.

Its flaw was that it only worked on the weakest of creatures — but fortunately, the maggots were exactly that.

“...By the way, are you affected by this? You’re all bones.” Benetnasch asked.

“I believe it only replaces parts that receive damage or are afflicted by disease. It seems it does nothing to flawless bone. I do not rot, after all.”

“...Then I guess zombies wouldn’t be very useful here. And the parts where you’re damaged are actually being replaced... I guess there is the possibility that it can replace any creature even if they have no flesh or bones.”

Benetnasch and Aragorn had been calmly conversing and analyzing De Vermis ever since it appeared.

Even when their surroundings were flooded with panicked screams, their minds remained as serene as the surface of a still lake.

This didn’t mean that either of them — or at least just Benetnasch — had superhuman mental fortitude though. He was merely used to such hellish battles.

“Anyway, we have enough grudge again, so...there you are,” Benetnasch said. Still using Soul Sight, he looked at the mass of maggots and found the soul of De Vermis’s main body.

He then used his skill as King of Tartarus to focus the grudge created by the trapped souls and the terrified Masters into a single spot...

“Deadly Explosion.”

...and incinerated the fly that was the original De Vermis.

With it gone, De Vermis froze in place...

“Did it work?”

“...Doesn’t look like it.”

...only to resume moving a moment later.

The fly was the main body, but not the core.

Even with that initial fly-body gone, De Vermis as it was now was a gathering of maggots. The only way to win against it was to destroy it completely.

“It doesn’t seem to have a physical core. The soul is still there,” said Benetnasch.

“So the only way to defeat it is to annihilate the entire mass outright,” said Aragorn. "I see we shall have to work our fingers to the bone."

"...Is that a joke?" Benetnasch asked, his face serious. "Anyway, I can see why Huanglong...that Draconic Emperor sealed it away. It seems easier to do that than to actually destroy it."

While saying that, he considered another possibility.

Or maybe he thought that it was better to seal it away in order to later release it in enemy lands as a bioweapon? I mean, if he could seal it, he probably could've overcome it a second time.

Ironically, it had been stolen by a third party and had now been released in a major city of a potential enemy country.

"To my knowledge, the only dragons that can conquer this foe are the king of all skydragons and the long-missing Extinction Dragon King...as well as the Gloria whose name I have heard spoken in rumors," said Aragorn.

All three were Mythical or higher in status and excelled at wide-scale extermination.

No Masters here had such power at their disposal...

"So, my friend...what shall we do?"

"...If burning it all away is what it will take, then I will make it burn."

...but Benetnasch had a means to deliver what was necessary.

"For better or worse...I know some people who have enough firepower."

"...Them, eh?"

"Yes. Though I'll have to meet up with Persephone, make sure the area's evacuated, and get approval. Doing this won't be good for Cortana...but I guess that all actually depends on how the negotiations with her will go."

Benetnasch recalled the sky-blue Magingear he'd fought not too long ago, and it made him a bit uneasy. It was hard to imagine that Caldina would ignore this problem for long, however. They would likely accept Benetnasch's help simply because he could take care of it faster than anyone else.

"Something needs to keep the UBM occupied during the evacuations and preparations."

"I will gladly take the role...is what I would like to say, but separated from you, Necro Effect would expire, exposing me to the possibility of becoming sustenance for the maggots."

"Yeah. That's why whatever's buying us time...must be something that cannot be damaged," Benetnasch said as he took hold of something under his clothes. "The only one we can count on...is him."

"Good grief...so you will end up using it regardless." This was the thing he'd almost used while fighting AR-I-CA — a strange pendant that looked like the lower half of a gargoyle.

"Since the last time we used it, I've taken every chance I had to pour MP into it. Now it has 6,000,000...which should be enough to keep it active for at least half an hour."

"...As expensive as ever, that one."

"He's worth the price, though, and there are some things only he can do, so..."

Benetnasch held the pendant and raised it in front of him.

Then, he called out, "Awaken, Standing and Indomitable: Greatest Bottom!"

Light enveloped the accessory and...

◇◆

As De Vermis attacked the Masters and turned them into maggots using Reinvigorating Rebirth, it thought that things were proceeding smoothly.

Even now, the UBM was swiftly growing in overall volume.

This was done through the same Reinvigorating Rebirth skill. It simply transferred any of its fragments that left its range back to the main mass. Because of this, even if the injured Masters who were being consumed by maggots managed to escape, the fragments created from their bodies would always return to De Vermis.

From a purely animalistic perspective, the right thing to do might've been to let the Masters run with the maggots to spread itself far and wide and expand its territory.

However, that wasn't what De Vermis thought was the best course of action. Its optimal scenario was one where it turned more and more creatures into fragments, so that they lived forever in De Vermis's collective existence. In this UBM's mind, that was an act of goodwill...even if other creatures saw it as a violation of their very being.

Since fragments that left the effective range of Reinvigorating Rebirth couldn't be replaced and would die if they were further harmed, De Vermis found it only natural to retrieve them.

However, it would be a mistake to think mankind ought to be thankful for its non-expansionist inclinations.

After all, as it grew, so did the range of Reinvigorating Rebirth.

The size of the body it originally planned to have was three hundred metels, but if it grew beyond that, the effective range would grow as well. It grew slowly, but if it was able to do so unimpeded, there was no telling how vast De Vermis could become.

Perhaps it could one day cover an entire country.

“Not enough...” De Vermis said as it looked around for more food to turn into maggots.

The fear of the writhing monstrosities and the futility of fighting this foe had caused most of the nearby Masters to flee, and the UBM did not appreciate that.

It did not enjoy having fewer creatures to share its life with.

That was why what it saw next made it immensely happy.

“This is...”

It was a gigantic silhouette.

De Vermis could sense and understand that the thing before it was a powerful being, but at the same time, it was glad that it would be able to corrupt something so large. That would no doubt help it grow, after all.

Following those thoughts, De Vermis attacked it with magic — a focused onslaught of countless offensive spells.

It was hard to withstand the barrage unharmed, and even the slightest scratch would be enough for Reinvigorating Rebirth to start replacing the injury with maggots.

No one could escape it, no matter how strong they were.

“Hm...?”

That was why De Vermis was puzzled. Despite the many attacks it had just unleashed, it couldn’t feel the ability activating on its target.

That could only mean one thing — the target wasn’t even scratched.

“...Who are you?” it asked.

There was no response.

There couldn’t be a response, because it had no mouth.

No eyes, no ears, or even a head.

No arms, no torso, and no heart.

It was nothing but two legs and a tail, standing tall before De Vermis.

The silhouette was a lower half, shining in a way similar to, but unlike, silver.

It was the gigantic, fifty-metel-tall bottom half of a gargoyle.

A loud hum resounded throughout the area. It wasn’t caused by a mouth of any kind, but by the massive tail it was swinging.

The tail was vibrating at immense speeds, stirring the air around it.

Despite not having eyes, it flawlessly pulverized the six arms extended towards it with a single swing of its tail.

Those six arms were instantly reduced to bits smaller than grains of sand. This was achieved by the gargoyle’s Hyper Vibration offensive-defense skill, which thoroughly destroyed anything it touched.

De Vermis focused and quickly regrew its six arms before resuming its offensive magic barrage. However, once again, none of the spells did any damage to the gargoyle. The countless magic attacks were negated by a skill which made it immune to offensive magic.

Realizing that, De Vermis then tried to attack the legs, which weren’t vibrating like the tail.

But no matter how hard it tried, all the damage its arms might’ve done was negated by the gargoyle’s immense defense and damage-decreasing skills.

The creature rendered all of its attacks impotent.

“Just...what is this?” De Vermis asked.

The bottom half of the gargoyle statue had no mouth with which to respond. However, words weren’t needed for anyone who witnessed it to know its power.

A body made of a Superior Metal that surpassed even the Mythical Hihi’irokane.

An offensive-defense skill that easily pulverized the attacks of an Ancient Legendary.

And finally, an overwhelming aura that surpassed the one possessed by De Vermis itself.

This was the creature summoned by the Superior MVP reward once acquired by King of Tartarus, Benetnasch.

This was the creature only barely defeated by the combined efforts of the King of Beasts and King of Tartarus.

This was the strongest gargoyle in Infinite Dendrogram...and the first SUBM. The “Lone Yet Unmatched, Greatest One.”

Or, at least, one half of it.

Prologue: Another First Choice

March, 2044, Benetnasch

A girl had starved to death right before my eyes.

My memory of the events that followed that was hazy.

I remembered screaming at the top of my lungs, then frantically logging off and rushing into my bed, my blanket covering me like the overwhelming regret I felt.

Many questions raged in my mind as I lay there. Why did I pick Caldina? Why did I choose realistic visuals? Why did I walk down that street at all? Why...why did I ever pick up Infinite Dendrogram?

It was supposed to be a game, nothing more. A realistic game, but a game nonetheless.

But to me, it was just...too real.

I'd been utterly convinced I'd stepped into a desert city, despite never having been to any place like that in my life.

...And it had made me feel that I'd actually witnessed a child starve.

The moment of her death came back to me every time I closed my eyes.

"Why...? Why did that...?" I couldn't wipe away that memory no matter how hard I tried.

It was the first time I had ever seen such a cruel death. The shock and regret I felt stuck to me like tar.

I relived the moment in my mind over and over. I even felt the sensation of that bit of food she'd so desperately wanted before dying as it slipped from my fingers.

"If only I could...at least..." If I had been able to give her that snack, perhaps my regret wouldn't have been so deep.

But that was no longer a possibility.

I couldn't undo the past.

The dead girl couldn't come back to life.

Her untimely, unjust end haunted my memory.

"It's a game...just a game...but..." A character in a video game had died — that was all there was to it.

But my heart just couldn't let it end at that.

I continued to cry and wallow in regret for hours.

But then, I thought of one thing more.

"...A funeral...for her."

I couldn't change the fact that the girl was dead, but I found hope in the idea that I could ease my regret if I set some flowers on her grave and said a prayer for her.

"I should...prepare some snacks too..." With my hands still shaking, I picked up Infinite Dendrogram's headset and logged in once again.

◇

The time that had passed in the game was three times what had passed in real time.

It was currently the dead of night, and since there weren't as many lights here as there were in real life, the city was dark. I hadn't logged out far from the alley where I'd found the girl, so I was able to return to it in no time.

"She's not here... Well, of course she isn't."

The girl was nowhere to be seen. I could only guess that she had been taken and buried by her family, or the church if she had no relatives.

In that case, I had to at least put some snacks on her grave and give her a prayer.

To find out where she was buried, I spoke to the nearby patrolman.

"Excuse me," I said.

"Hm? What is it, Mr. Master?" he asked.

"Umm, I would like to know where to find the grave of the child who was here."

"Child? Whose child?"

"It was a girl who died in that alley over there..."

"...Oh. Orphans who die in the streets are buried on the outskirts of the city, to the north."

"Th-Thank you!" I expressed my gratitude before rushing off.

"But it's best not to go ther—"

I couldn't fully hear the voice behind me.

I went to the north of the city and, eventually, found the location. It was over ten minutes by foot away from the gate.

There, out in the sands, stood several large areas enclosed with pitiful fences.

They looked like the fences around graveyards, but these areas were anything but.

There were no gravestones, or even graves, for that matter.

There was nothing but piles of corpses.

Lying atop the dry sands, there were parched and mummified corpses, skeletal corpses whose flesh had been consumed by insects, and fresher ones that were still being feasted upon — all thrown together to create an imposing mountain of death.

“...Egh...” Before I knew it, I was vomiting.

The fear I felt and my confusion at how such a thing could be allowed to exist overwhelmed my mind like a raging torrent.

“...Huh?”

And then I noticed a sign next to the entrance.

It said “Homeless Body Disposal.” Below that, there was an explanation:

“Because there are no places in Cortana where the homeless who are unable to pay taxes may be buried, and because there are no funds to cover the fuel expenses of cremation, they are to be left here so that the elements and/or the local wildlife may see to them.

—Mayor of Cortana, Douglas Coin”

Because of the nearby save point and oasis, Cortana was a flourishing city in spite of its barren surroundings. However, its area was limited, and unlike large cities in the other countries, it couldn’t expand much beyond its current size.

Because of this, even burial space was in short supply, and with Cortana being the city that exemplified Caldina’s ideal of “money makes the world go around,” money was required to procure a grave plot. Street urchins couldn’t possibly pay the fees, so they were all thrown outside the city, as though the expenses of even burying them in the sand were too great for the authorities.

I spent a good while standing before the “graves”...the corpse-piles, saying not a word. I could read the explanation on the sign just fine. The auto-translation feature made it easy.

However, I couldn’t understand it, no matter how hard I tried.

My mind grasped the meaning, but my heart could not.

There was reasoning behind these actions, but it still didn’t make sense to me that someone would actually act like this. My society in the real world would give a proper burial to even the most unfortunate.

This felt less realistic than anything I’d experienced since I came to Infinite Dendrogram.

“...Ah.”

I gasped as I finally saw it.

At the top of the pile, on a corpse that was mostly bone, there were remains that still had skin and hair on them — and the body of the girl that had died right before my eyes.

I froze in place. I’d come here to give her a prayer alongside an offering of flowers or snacks.

But now, I couldn’t even do that much.

Falling to my knees, I looked away from her.

“Huh...?” And then, my vision stopped on a different sign.

It said, “Anyone is free to take the corpses, but bringing people back to life using Necromancy is forbidden within the city walls.”

The first half of the sentence shocked me. The idea that anyone could just take the corpses, though, felt apt for this inhumane place. Considering it would make space for more corpses, you could even call it “rational.”

That aside, though...

“Necro...mancy? Bringing people back to life?”

Those words implied that it was possible for dead people to live again.

Wait...perhaps it was possible? A world with magic may have resurrection spells, after all.

“A-Ahhh...” But bringing dead people back using magic was immoral. At the very least, it would stand against the faith I’d followed until now.

But if...if it was something I could do...

If it was possible...

“And if it...made this regret go away...”

...Then morality be damned. Just let me do it!

The moment that thought crossed my mind, my left hand began glowing purple...

"Very well. Then that shall be my nature."

...and an unfamiliar girl appeared at my side.

"...Huh?"

The best word to describe her was "purple." She had purple hair and wore a purple gown in the style of ancient Greece.

Her eyes, though, were a different color — a deep, striking black.

"Who...are you?"

"My name is Persephone. I was born of your flesh, soul, and the lamentation of your heart. I am your Embryo — a Type Maiden-Castle/Territory."

"Perse...phone?"

"I am pleased to meet you, my Master," said the girl with a ladylike bow. She shared a name with the queen of the underworld and was, apparently, my Embryo.

"So, will you use my power this very instant?" she asked.

"Power...?"

"Mmhmm. I am able to bring this girl back to life."

"...REALLY?!" I exclaimed. I'd grabbed hold of her shoulders before I even realized it.

"Though I am but a hatchling in my first form," she went on. "To resurrect someone, I need their fresh body, and the time they will be alive is brief."

"What do you mean...?"

"I can bring her back...for a mere three minutes."

I needed a while to process those words.

"Three...minutes." That was barely any time at all. It barely compared to the amount of time the mythological Persephone had offered Orpheus when he descended into the underworld to fetch his wife back to the land of the living.

It was so little time, in fact, that rather than bringing her back only to die again minutes later, it was perhaps better to just leave her as she was now.

But...three minutes...

That was enough to...

"I..." The bag of snacks I'd been holding made a rustling sound as it shifted in my hand.

And then, I made my choice.

Chapter Eight: The Tartarean Possibility

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

Drawn by the pillar of fire, I'd arrived at the mayor's mansion to witness a battle between two giant beings.

The pale maggot creature used its six arms to cast spells, while the countless maggots composing its body tried to bite into its opponent.

However, the silvery creature that looked like only the bottom half of something...was completely unaffected.

It used its tail to pulverize the maggot monster, and the creature's attacks didn't do any damage to it at all.

However, the same could be said about the writhing mass it was fighting — it instantly recovered from any and all damage done to it.

An amalgamation of maggots that negated all wounds, and a leg-and-tail creature that didn't receive wounds in the first place. They both tried to defeat each other, but neither of them could do anything to hurt the other.

I felt like I was watching a scene from that mythological afterlife where battle never ended.

And, of course, it reminded me of Emily.

"...Cyco, what's the number on them?" I asked.

"Zero for both. The legs are a summon, while the maggot...doesn't kill anyone."

...So La Porte de l'Enfer wouldn't work on either of them, I thought.

"Hmm... So Master Dearest summoned Greatest. Well, that is no doubt the optimal choice to buy time against the creature," said Persephone, shifting my attention away from the eternal battle.

"You know them?" I asked.

"Yes. The lower half is...well, to be concise, a monster Master Dearest summoned using an MVP reward. Its name is 'Greatest Bottom.'"

"So that's KoT's..."

An MVP special reward could only have come from a UBM. With the text above the maggot creature saying "The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis” in UBM nomenclature, one could say that this was truly a battle between UBMs.

“He seldom uses it, however,” Persephone continued. “It is quite costly, after all. Master Dearest is a caster Superior Job and he charges the MVP reward whenever he finds the time — but even with that, it cannot fight for long. And it is not even as powerful as the original.”

“The original?”

“As you can see, it is nothing but a lower half. Were it whole, it would be able to defeat this De Vermis creature, but with the upper half taken away, Greatest Bottom is only legs and a tail with defensive skills. It could never be defeated, but it could never defeat this foe, so this would no doubt continue without end. No... Seeing as it would not last long, we are at a disadvantage.”

I assumed that she was simply saying that it was weaker than it had been as a UBM. But...what did she mean by the upper half being “taken away?” It was like she was implying that the upper half was actually owned by someone else now.

But UBMs who split MVP rewards were...

“Persephone...!”

My thought was cut short by the voice reaching my ears. I turned towards its source and saw a skeletal dragon rushing forward with a thin man enclosed inside its ribcage.

The skeletal dragon was unfamiliar, but I knew the man. It was the same person I’d seen several times back at the Triangle of Wisdom’s HQ — King of Tartarus, Benetnasch.

“Oh, Master Dearest,” said Persephone.

“So this is where you were,” said KoT. “And you are...the Triangle of Wisdom’s...?”

Apparently, he remembered me as well.

“Hugo Lesseps,” I said. “I am with Teach— I mean Ace, AR-I-CA. I know about the Orbs and your negotiations with her.”

“I see...”

“What is that maggot creature?” I asked.

“...To be brief, this is the result of the mayor’s Orb breaking and the UBM within being released.”

“Huh?!”

“By the way, since you’re with her, I don’t suppose you would have any means of contacting her? There is something I must tell her.”

“J-Just a moment,” I said before opening up White Rose’s cockpit, turning on the comms, and connecting to Teach’s Blue Opera.

The King of Tartarus then explained the situation to her.

“...And now it’s gradually growing in size. Ordinary attacks are ineffective; the only way to defeat it is to completely incinerate the entire surrounding area.”

“...You can’t be serious,” Teach said from the other side of the comms unit, her voice like a groan. “I just finished disposin’ of the toxic stuff and I’m headin’ back and...yep, I see it. Boy, is that gross. And then there’s the thing that’s just legs and tail... Hey, KoT, is that...?”

“No comment.”

“Oh, okay then... Here goes nothin’.”

A moment later, a melodic engine sound rang out and a pale blue combat unit sped through the evening sky above.

Blue Opera then fired shells at De Vermis that crackled with lightning, but the monster simply ignored them, repairing the damage just moments later.

“Well, this is hopeless,” Teach said. “I can’t win against these types.”

“...Aren’t you a little quick to give up?” I asked.

“Hey, I was chosen for the Orb-gatherin’ precisely because my firepower isn’t too over the top! Big guys who regenerate are a job for Fatoum, Albert, the money-brain, or the bitch!”

...Who were those latter two? I wondered.

“Would they make it in time if I called them now...? They’re either at the capital or on the borders to other countries...and they’re slow as hell... Ugh! Losin’ Cortana would be real bad even for Caldina!”

This city was the starting point for Caldina’s Masters. If it was destroyed, the country would basically lose its entrance.

Not many Masters would want to start the game in a ruined city, after all.

Even ignoring all of that, Cortana was the heart of Caldina’s commerce. Losing it would be a major blow to the country’s economy.

“Ace, I have a proposition,” said Benetnasch.

“I’m listenin’.”

"If you accept three conditions, I will defeat this UBM."

"...Hmm?" Teach thought for a moment. "I see. So you have someone who can deal with this?"

"...Oh, you were aware of my ultimate, huh?"

"So name the conditions."

Teach didn't seem to have any doubts that KoT could do what he said.

"The first condition concerns the UBM's defeat itself. My method will make it impossible to give you the Orb if I didn't need it myself, as we agreed previously."

"Fine by me. Next."

"Second...we agreed that you would do me a favor when I gave you the Orb. I want it done regardless."

"I'm gonna need the details."

"If you find any items or information relating to grudge disposal or 'healthy revival' of the dead, I want to know about it."

"You're not gonna ask me to actually give you the items or the info?"

"No."

"Hmm...? Well, that's fine too. What's the last condition?"

"That would be..." Benetnasch said before pausing for a moment, as though hesitating to actually speak it out loud. "Permission to annihilate anything within a six hundred metel radius of De Vermis, part of Cortana included."

...I could see why he'd hesitated. That was an outrageous request.

"Of course...I would only do it after an evacuation," he continued. "My summon is buying the necessary time, so it should be doable. If possible, I would like you to help with it as well."

"I see... 'Annihilate,' though...really? Whatever you're plannin' to use has gotta be somethin'."

"...So, do I have your permission?"

"One moment," Teach said, and then I heard some rustling at the other side of the comms. "Ah. Hello, Madam— I mean, President. Yes, it's me, AR-I-CA. There is a problem with the Orb retrieval and... Huh? You already know everything? Just how much do you see? Are you actually Laplace's demon or something? It's in your name, so..."

I could tell that she was talking over comms with someone else.

"Okay then. Hey, Benny."

...Benny? That seemed like a weird thing to call him, but KoT didn't seem to mind at all.

"Yes?" he said.

"Just to check, is the mayor dead?" Teach asked.

"...He was consumed by De Vermis."

"All right, we'll just treat him as dead, then."

...I felt like I just heard a pretty grim exchange.

"Here's the results. You're good for the third condition. With the mayor dead, Prez used her emergency authority to give you permission. Her exact words were 'I will not hold you liable for any fatalities or property damages. Please thoroughly eliminate the threat of De Vermis from Caldina.'"

"...Understood."

...Fatalities or property damages, huh?

"Teach, I..."

"So, Yu, let's check the area around that thing for anyone who didn't get away yet!" Teach began to speak as though she knew what I was gonna say.

"...Yes!"

"So yeah, we'll be doin' that, but when are you gonna do your thing, Benny?"

"...I can keep up the summon for at most fifteen minutes and a half more, so... I'll use it after exactly fifteen minutes have passed."

"All right! Let's go, Yu!"

"Okay!" I moved White Rose — with its armor stored away to make it lighter — to go around and search for people in order to aid the evacuation.

...Though, I couldn't help but wonder what Benetnasch had that could defeat that UBM.

◇◆◇

City of Commerce, Cortana

After seeing off the two Magingears, Benetnasch rushed into the six hundred metel radius, deeply lost in thought.

"You seem to be shocked that the 'new life eternal' is not what you hoped it would be," his Embryo spoke to him.

"...Persephone."

Aragorn was busy watching for anyone who could interfere with the use of the skill, so Benetnasch and his Embryo were the only ones talking.

"That is why I told you not to rely on those accursed Orbs. If mere UBMs can hold the miracle you seek, things would have taken a turn for the better far earlier. Or perhaps a turn for the worse."

Benetnasch listened to her admonishment before slowly turning to her and asking, "Did you...know what De Vermis actually was?"

"Of course I did. I'd heard about it, after all. I knew full well that UBM was the sort of thing you hate the most — that which changes the meaning of death."

While talking to Hugo, Persephone had said, "That makes this city a true crucible of death. One who transcends death, one who mass-produces death, one who changes the meaning of death... Certainly this is not the result of deliberate meddling, but it is no doubt interesting."

"One who transcends death" referred to Benetnasch and Persephone.

"One who mass-produces death" was obviously The Murder Princess, Emily. Though if Persephone had truly understood her power, she might've said that she transcended death, as well.

And the "one who changes the meaning of death" was De Vermis. It transformed humans into maggots, even claiming their very souls. The way in which it ended people's lives as humans while still keeping them alive no doubt fit Persephone's description.

However, it was something she could only say if she had known of De Vermis's power.

But back then, not even the mayor — the owner of the Orb — knew about this.

"Why—?"

"Don't ask me why I did not tell you, Master Dearest. You would have wanted to confirm it yourself even if I did. You never stop grasping at straws, after all."

Benetnasch had no response. Her words were a knife sharpened by truth, and they cut deep into his heart.

"I will say the same thing I have said a thousand times — you are drowning, dragged down by countless weights. You could easily swim free if you cut them off, but you cannot, so you suffer without end."

"Even so, I..."

“I know full well. I was born from you, after all. But as the first weight you must cut off, I must keep saying this over and over,” Persephone said before resting her forehead on Benetnasch’s back. “What you wish to accomplish is a true miracle. Even if I went beyond the seventh form, there is no guarantee what you desire will ever be possible.”

“I know...”

“I wish for you to be happy. I wish for you to forget me, this world...everything that gives you all this pain and suffering...and return to a proper life on the other side.”

Silence.

“But of course, you would not do that...would you?”

“...No,” Benetnasch said before turning around and laying a hand on Persephone’s shoulder. “I won’t deny that I’m hurting and suffering... I know that this way of life restricts me.”

Persephone’s expression became cloudy for a moment.

“But...I freely chose...to be bound in this way.”

“Master Dearest...”

“I can’t forget anything I’ve seen, and there’s no way I can give up now. As long as I am me...I will keep taking the liberty to choose this way of life.”

Those words came out with a certain resolve. It was a resolve forged years ago — a will that had faded and been damaged since then, but had never once broken.

Persephone knew the significance of this better than anyone else. The words made tears well up in her eyes, but she quickly wiped them away.

“I see. In that case, there is only one thing for me to do. As the one who carries your wish, I will give my all,” she said as she grasped the hand over her shoulder.

“...Thank you.”

“For now, we must annihilate De Vermis,” Persephone said as she let go of Benetnasch’s hand and turned to face the UBM. “It is time. Master Dearest, the ultimate skill. Queen of the Afterlife, Persephone, stands by her dearest King of Tartarus, Benetnasch, to give her all to destroy this living hell.”

“...Please do, Persephone.”

Persephone called out to him, and Benetnasch responded with an awkward smile.

He then reached into his inventory and took out an item — a Legendary MVP special reward — before giving it to her.

With the item in her hands, Persephone nodded. “This should suffice. It will not be long...but long enough for the single attack we need.”

At those words, she raised the special reward upwards.

“Now...Master Dearest! I will build the gate!”

“...Yeah. I’m counting on you!” And so, Persephone...

“Here and now, I devote this treasure of a creature so many dread...”

...began to sing.

“This will become the gate to the realm of the dead.” Her voice was her own, but it seemed to echo as though many unseen voices were singing along with her. As they resonated, the MVP reward in her hands transformed into bits of light... It lost its Resources and vanished.

“It will be a door to the chamber of repose within me.”

The moment the reward dissolved into its Resources, a giant gate appeared before Persephone.

“Here these souls will make their triumphant returns.”

“Glory consumed by the past like a parchment burns.”

The form the gate took on was a purple triumphal arch. Though it did not resemble the great arch in real-world Paris, its splendor made it an apt comparison.

“Be that as it may, they shall cross through time,
And once again wield what they had in their prime.”

As Persephone’s song continued, a film of light appeared within the gate. Its colors were innumerable, and it soon covered the entire inner side of the structure.

“...It is prepared,” said Persephone, seemingly exhausted.

“Yeah...” Benetnasch replied as he put his hands on her shoulders to support her. “...Fourteen minutes and a half.” He whispered the time that had passed since he’d told Hugo and AR-I-CA of the time limit.

Thirty seconds left. As far as Benetnasch could see, with the exception of those trapped by De Vermis, there were no living souls in the immediate surroundings.

And so, the time came. Benetnasch canceled the Greatest Bottom summon, making it vanish and become bits of light right before De Vermis’s eyes.

“Hm...?” De Vermis was confused by a powerful enemy just disappearing suddenly, but didn’t think too much of it. The only thing that mattered to it was increasing the number of its fragments. With all living creatures in the area gone, it had to find new bodies it could transform into itself.

However...

“...What is that?” Almost before De Vermis realized it, a strange purple gate appeared far outside of its skill’s range. Busy with Greatest Bottom, it hadn’t noticed the structure being built, but it was sure that it hadn’t been there before.

However, when it saw the film of light appear...

"Ah..."

...De Vermis became afraid of something.

That was a feeling it shouldn't have possessed.

It felt as thought it was staring into an abyss — a vast nothingness directly opposed to the eternal life it desired.

Instinctually feeling that it had to destroy the gate, De Vermis rushed forward.

However, it was too late, for the preparations were already done.

"Gate to the Afterlife — Persephone..."

Despite still being far away, De Vermis felt like it could hear those words clearly — Benetnasch activating his Embryo's ultimate skill.

A moment later, the gate's light intensified. It began to shed a radiance that seemed otherworldly.

King of Tartarus, Benetnasch and Queen of the Afterlife, Persephone.

Those who knew their power might call them either "Indestructible" or "Witching Hour."

"Indestructible" because he had transcended ultimate destruction — what he had wouldn't remain even if the flesh decayed away — and "Witching Hour" because it referred to a time when you could encounter something you should have never been able to encounter.

Once they had used their ultimate skill, those around them would encounter something truly impossible — something that surpassed the demise of flesh and the ravages of time.

The shining arch of triumph...

"Amber Abyss Squadron!"

...allowed an amber metal dragon to fly once again.

◇◆◇

About Persephone

In Greek mythology, Persephone was the wife of Hades, the king of the underworld.

The most famous tale about her concerned her marriage to Hades — said to be the beginning of the four seasons — but the second most famous was that of Orpheus the musician.

Orpheus traveled to the realm of the dead to bring back his deceased wife. He played an indescribably beautiful song on his lyre that charmed all the residents of the underworld and eventually reached Hades and Persephone.

His music made Persephone weep, and she begged Hades to help Orpheus.

The singer was then allowed to take his wife back to the realm of the living, but only if he did not turn back to look at her the entire way out. If he did, she would have to stay in the realm of the dead.

In the tale, Orpheus looked back right as he reached the edge to the realm of the living, sending his wife back to the realm of the dead.

His dead wife returned to life for a single moment, only to be sent back, and that was where the story usually ended.

Having been based on a character from this myth, Persephone had an ultimate skill that worked in a similar way.

Queen of the Afterlife, Persephone was a Type Maiden-Castle/Rule.

Her ultimate, Gate to the Afterlife — Persephone, was a skill that momentarily brought the dead back to life.

It used Resources to create a gate for the dead to pass through, then brought the souls resting within Persephone back as they had been in their prime.

Persephone was able to bring the dead back to life using only their soul — something that normally could only be accomplished by the Skydragon King, Drag-Heaven.

She summoned the dead at the peak of their living power — exactly as they had been during the best times of their life, even including their equipment. It could be the famed heroes of ancient times, entire parties of champions, or even powerful monstrosities of old. The total power of the summoned souls determined the Resources needed, but they would come back no matter what.

However, this wasn’t a power that gave full control over the dead.

Anyone Persephone brought back wasn’t bound in any way, and they could use their resurrected bodies as they wished. They could be at odds with Benetnasch and perhaps even attack him.

That was why he connected with all the departed souls he summoned — for if they didn’t share Benetnasch’s will, they would not assist him.

The ones summoned now were no different.

Benetnasch had helped these souls once, and they were now resting within Persephone, ready to share the necromancer’s will when they were needed.

And so they were called, here and now.

Neither he nor they wanted to see people be consumed by the living hell of De Vermis, so, having crossed a time of two millennia, they now flew through the skies of today.

◇◆◇

City of Commerce, Cortana

The purple gate shone, and a giant silhouette flew out from it — a mechanical dragon, covered in amber armor.

It was a weapon, operated by the four people inside.

The creature was in fact a Prism Dragon, and its name was “Amber Abyss” — the same superweapon of the pre-ancient civilization that had fought against the Incarnation of Armaments and vanished.

And now, Persephone’s power had brought it back, along with the soldiers who piloted it.

“Captain, we have exited the gate without issue. Analyzing the environment.”

“Keep an eye on the radar and fly towards the sky. Enter the Abyss Cannon firing sequence. You have a grasp of the situation, right? You better not fire it anywhere near the unevacuated areas!”

“Of course I won’t! Sure, it’s been two thousand years, but I haven’t forgotten how to use this!”

“Heh. You never change, sublieutenant.”

The revived dead were talking within the cockpit of the Amber Abyss. Since they had been kept within Persephone, they already had a full grasp of the situation here.

“Captain, the sublieutenant here sure seems fired up. I guess this is his chance to thank Mr. Benetnasch for confirming that his wife and kid survived and for looking into his descendants.”

“Th-There’s that, yes... But I’m also happy that I can fight for people again.”

“I understand...” said the captain as he looked down at the city and the disgusting creature that was De Vermis. “Our contract with King of Tartarus, Benetnasch says that we are to lend him our power when he fights monsters that endanger humans, the Incarnations, or the Extra-Continental Vessel. I believe this situation isn’t in conflict with that. Any objections?”

No one said anything in protest — their will was united.

“In that case...Amber Abyss Squadron, commence the mission!”

“Roger!” Amber Abyss suddenly stopped gaining altitude and stopped at one point in the sky.

Its metal head moved, targeting Cortana...specifically, the ruins of the mayor’s mansion.

“Prism Dragon No. 1, Amber Abyss, set the firing point.”

“Prepare to fire the Abyss Cannon. Pinpoint the radius of the attack. Fire at 20% energy.”

“Roger! Entering Abyss Cannon firing mode!”

The Prism Dragon opened its maw towards the surface.

Immense amounts of energy gathered in its mouth, but since it only needed a fraction of its total power, it was quickly ready to release.

“Energy at twenty percent...charging complete!”

“Abyss Cannon... FIRE!”

Thus, the compressed magical baryon acceleration cannon installed in its maw fired for the first time in two millennia.

◇◆

De Vermis couldn’t even begin to understand what the gate or the amber dragon were. However, it felt immense fear that drove it to desperately crawl away.

Alas, its running ended before it could even cover a few dozen metels.

De Vermis looked upwards and saw a giant orb of flame. Released by Amber Abyss, it warped the very air with its immense heat as it flew...and hit the ground close to De Vermis’s body.

“Hn...?!” The heat turned the air into plasma, evaporating the ground below and causing the UBM to let out a soundless scream. The maggots all over shrieked in pain, but without any air to carry their silent voices, no one could possibly hear them.

De Vermis had Reinvigorating Rebirth, but it wasn’t fast enough to replace the volume it was losing to this heat.

Its maggots were not just being burned, but obliterated without a trace.

Quickly losing parts of itself, De Vermis tried its hardest to survive.

The UBM pushed Reinvigorating Reincarnation to its absolute limit. It managed to endure by using the cell-to-maggot transformation it had used when the mayor lost his legs — continuous reincarnation that ignored the law of conservation of mass.

Using the skill caused immense pain, but it did not care about that. In fact, the pain of the skill was nothing compared to the pain of the fires burning it.

Loss of...whole... Calculate...healing... Must...bear...it... Despite losing immense amounts of volume, De Vermis didn’t give up on survival.

However, the next moment, the Abyss Cannon showed its true power.

The magic core within the orb of flame was released in a burst of heat.

Half of the magic released remotely activated a gravity spell. The rest of the magic became more heat, all of which was drawn downwards into the newly spawned epicenter of the gravity spell.

The result was a pit that trapped heat, and a gravity well that would not let the target escape.

Anything caught within would be trapped and thoroughly scorched.

This was the true power of one of the pre-ancient civilization’s strongest weapons — the Abyss Cannon.

Even greater shock overcame De Vermis. It beheld a meltdown leading straight into an abyss.

The UBM burned within the pit, sinking deeper into the ground with every passing second. The maggots that the orb of flame had missed returned to De Vermis while it sank several hundred metels into the ground.

The heat grew ever greater, burning the UBM with an intensity that soon surpassed the speed of its healing by a wide margin.

As all the maggots composing its body burned, De Vermis began to feel true fear.

I...I... Douglas... We... Eternal... A new life... ETERNAAAAAAAALLLL! Then came the final magic installed within the orb of flame — an immense explosion.

A few seconds later, a pillar of fire rose from the pit where the UBM was caught, scorching the last of the maggots.

Buried in a fiery grave, De Vermis's life eternal was burned away to nothing.

Prologue: Another Starting Point

March, 2044, Benetnasch

The girl's corpse lay before me.

But unlike my previous encounter with her, there was peace in her expression.

She'd been brought back. She seemed to have no memory of dying, so she was simply reaching for me just as she had before her first death.

This time, I was able to give her that snack.

She ate it as if it was the most delicious thing in the world.

Persephone noted that this had perhaps satisfied her one and only regret.

Crying, the girl ate up every scrap of food I gave her...only to die again three minutes later.

I...didn't know if I had done the right thing.

I'd brought her back solely to do away with our shared regret, as well as my own fear...only to let her die again.

Her last words were "I never thought I'd ever eat something so delicious. I'm so glad I could be here for this!"

Words that made it seem like she was born just to eat those simple snacks.

Words that made it seem like nothing in life had ever made her happier.

She left behind those words...and died again.

"In what world can you be all right with a life like that...?!" This cry escaped my lips as I looked at her tear-smeared, joyous face.

Was this really salvation?

"...Anyway."

Anyway, I would never forget what happened today.

And I would surely never log in to Infinite Dendrogram ever again.

"...Ah."

As I prepared to log out for good, Persephone opened her mouth to say something.

I turned around and saw her there with her hand meekly extended towards me, saying nothing more.

I didn't know what was on her mind. I knew barely anything about her. I only knew that she was my Embryo and that she had brought a girl back to life, if only for three minutes.

Perhaps it was because of her that I was able to get rid of these regrets. If so, then I ought to be grateful to her.

With that in mind, I prepared to log out...

"Hm...?"

...but then I remembered something I'd heard.

Embryos were things that evolved.

Right now, Persephone could only bring someone back for three minutes. She had just been born, after all.

But if...

"My Master?"

"...Persephone, I have a question for you," I said as I looked into her deep black eyes. "Will the time limit on the resurrection disappear if you evolve?"

"Ah...!"

Embryos evolved. Because of that, it seemed that she might be able to evolve past this limit.

"That...is a possibility."

"I see..." Upon hearing my response, Persephone grimaced.

What expression was I making? Was I laughing? Crying? Or showing regret for having asked such a thing at all?

It didn't matter to me.

All that mattered...was that there was a possibility.

"This world probably has tons of children who died like she did," I said, calling Infinite Dendrogram a "world" as though it was natural. "Probably a great many in this city alone...unfortunate urchins who die without even knowing what a helping hand looks like. Children who die without knowing even the smallest joys, like enjoying a snack."

I didn't know anything about this world. I couldn't have imagined that it would be filled with so much misfortune.

I found this world so unfair I couldn't stomach it.

"But...the girl looked happy. She felt saved in the end... That's what I want to believe."

“Mhm. Now you can proudly return to your world and...”

“A single child, out of all the unfortunate children here...” She was the only one who’d been saved.

But that wasn’t enough.

I wanted to turn all of this around.

“...What are you saying?” Persephone asked, her face full of fear.

“For now, it’s just three minutes.” I grabbed her shoulders and spoke of what could be possible for us. “But if you evolve and grow stronger, if your power grows beyond this...we may be able to save all the children who died just like her and give them a full second life.”

“You...!” The salvation of all unfortunate children who met untimely deaths — realistically thinking, it was impossible.

However, she had already done the impossible once.

Perhaps if I saved every child, this profound distress that made me want to bash my head against a wall would disappear? No — it clearly would.

“That is a miracle beyond the reach of mankind...! It is far too outrageous. There is no guarantee that it would be possible even if I became a Superior Embryo...or even something beyond that!”

“There is no guarantee...but it isn’t impossible.”

“Merely trying to achieve it is ludicrous! You should abandon this world and return to the other side!”

“I...can’t do that...” I’d learned too much.

I realized that this world had misfortunes that I couldn’t tolerate no matter what.

I would save the souls of dead children until I was satisfied.

Otherwise...the wound in my heart would never heal.

Therefore...this is the path I would walk.

“Let’s grow strong — you and me, together. If we keep growing stronger, we will eventually reach what we want. That’s what this world is about...right...?”

Silence. Persephone seemed to be thinking about something.

But then, she briefly closed her eyes and...

“...Very well.”

...nodded.

That made me very happy. With this...I wouldn’t have to give up.

“...Let’s keep going,” I said. “So that we may fulfill our desire...”

“...Indeed,” she said. “Let us pray that our hopes will one day come to fruition.”

And so, we made a promise to each other.

“We will bring back all unfortunate children from death...and give them full, happy lives.”

Together, we would fulfill this grand desire.

This was our true starting point.

Epilogue: Two Worlds, Two Mes

City of Commerce, Cortana

[The UBM, “The Rebirthing Infestation, De Vermis,” was defeated.]

[Selecting MVP.]

[“Benetnasch” was selected as MVP.]

[“Benetnasch” is presented with an MVP special reward — “Rejuvenating Grubwear, De Vermis.”]

Following that message, white boots dropped in front of Benetnasch.

Benetnasch had no attention to spare for them. He was focused on the scorched hole that De Vermis had vanished into.

The heat it created had reached Benetnasch, but the effect of the flame pit on the surface of the earth was minimal. Abyss Cannon was a weapon that could compress and focus its firepower, so it hadn’t delivered any life-threatening damage to anyone outside the established radius of six hundred metels.

Within the radius, though, some of the buildings had collapsed, while the ones next to the fiery pit were on fire.

The destruction in that particular area was devastating in its own right — and it was a kind of devastation that had already been caused by someone, somewhere, at some time.

Gate to the Afterlife — Persephone was an ultimate that could bring back any tians and creatures that had lived in the past and release them as they were in their prime. This meant that it could bring back long-forgotten devastation that was beyond the power of Masters.

His skill was rightfully feared because of it, but Benetnasch wasn’t one to care about what people thought.

There was only one thing in his sight, after all — his desire and the path leading to it.

“Hm. The skill on the reward is a lesser version of the original,” said Persephone.

She’d picked up and examined the boots before Benetnasch even looked at them.

"It transforms the wounds of the wearer into maggots, which in time become like the original skin, flesh, and organs. It also gives SP cost reduction and automatically restores it when worn. Not bad at all, but..."

Silence.

"...it goes against your tastes, so I will only treat it as a Resource for my ultimate skill."

The purple gate created by Persephone was already turning into bits of light. The Amber Abyss Squadron had also transformed back into souls and returned to rest within Persephone.

"So, what do we do now? Should we meet up with Hugo's group?" Persephone asked.

"...No, I'll log out for a bit," said Benetnasch. "I'll come back in about an hour and then we'll go undercover and travel to Melkava. We can't keep Vina and Trim waiting too long."

"Ohh. Well, you did say that you didn't want them to see this city."

The names Benetnasch spoke belonged to children he'd saved.

"Saved" was a relative term, though — he'd merely brought them back as undead after they'd died in a particular tragedy.

In a way, it was him grasping at a possibility again.

But as he was now, this was the most he could do, and even that came with many conditions that had to be fulfilled.

Thus, he hoped that would not be the case in the future.

"Yeah. I need to hurry back to them."

"But what of the information you are meant to receive?"

"...Knowing Sefirot, they can contact me no matter where I am. I don't think I need to give them an address or anything."

"That is true."

Benetnasch then opened the menu and logged out.

◇

Coming back to reality, Benetnasch — or, rather, the person who played him — opened his eyes to see the ceiling of a lightless room.

It was particularly dark because of the rain outside, and with the curtains closed it was hard to tell if it was day or night.

Then, with a hand as brittle as a dry twig, he picked up his mobile device.

There was a missed call and a voice message from his mother; after listening to the latter, he sent a message saying “I’m okay. Don’t worry about me.” Then, a moment later, he added “I’m sorry I can’t come back home for spring break” before sending it off.

Spring break didn’t actually mean much to him.

After all...he almost never actually attended the college he’d enrolled in last year.

With the message sent, he stood up, revealing legs so thin that anyone looking at him would worry about his health.

He went to the bathroom, showered for a moment, then went to his fridge to take out a tube of nutritional food and mineral water before wolfing it down as though it was a chore just to nourish himself.

He then went back to bed, put on Infinite Dendrogram’s headset and logged back in.

Once again, he returned to that world as King of Tartarus, Benetnasch...abandoning reality...and abandoning his flesh.

◆◆◆

Southwest of the City of Commerce, Cortana, Large Quicksand Patch

Some distance from Cortana, there was a giant patch of quicksand that had existed for over a hundred years now.

It had a diameter of three hundred metels, and it was said that nothing ever escaped from it.

It seemed like an antlion pit, and that was actually a very apt description.

It was the habitat of Sandhole Worms — Pure-Dragon-tier monsters that looked like antlions and possessed a skill that created quicksand.

As a secondary effect of the environment control AI’s save point, Sandhole Worms and other wild monsters were instinctively unable to come too close to Cortana.

Because of that, this patch of quicksand was right outside the save point’s monster-repelling radius.

Neither skilled Masters nor the Drag-Worms that made the desert their home could come out of this quicksand alive or overcome the many Sandhole Worms here. Being so close to Caldina's starting point, this quicksand served as a newbie trap like Altea's Old Reve Orchard, but even more dangerous.

However...

"GYUAWAAAAHHHHH...!"

...the quicksand was now vanishing, accompanied by the death-screams of the Sandhole Worms within.

The antlion-like creatures occasionally stuck their heads out, but the bodies under their armor twisted and shrank as though being dried out before sinking back into the sand.

This continued for hours, and eventually, the screams of the Sandhole Worms stopped.

With the monsters gone, the environmental effect they were maintaining vanished, and the century-old patch of quicksand became normal desert again.

Then, from the depths of the pit, a small girl's hand peeked out. Clutched in that hand was an axe, which used its skill to raise her out of the sand, revealing her entire form.

This figure was none other than Emily. Though her clothes were covered in sand, she was in perfect health. There were no wounds on her, and she wasn't Frozen anymore.

After Hugo had Frozen her with La Porte de l'Enfer, AR-I-CA had thrown her into the quicksand here.

However, the Sandhole Worms within had shattered her Frozen body, activating Survival of the Fittest. She had then proceeded to kill all the Worms attacking her and turn them all into Resources, which was quite a struggle.

Being an immortal Superior, Emily was ultimately able to escape this death-pit.

Silence. Having just come out of the quicksand, Emily looked...very discontent.

In her killing mode, Emily wasn't supposed to show any emotion — but now, as though profoundly angry about being thrown into quicksand, she was displaying extreme hostility.

"Bad." Still visibly upset, she actually said something that wasn't "minus."

She stood in place, holding Youaltepuztli in her hands...

"..."

...then suddenly looked at the sky.

It was already past sunset — well into the night. As though confirming that, Emily looked ahead — to the city of Cortana away in the distance.

She then raised up the axes in her hands...and crossed them.

This was a preparatory motion for a skill that not even IF members were aware of.

It was impossible to communicate with Emily when she was in her killing mode, while the normal Emily never spoke of her powers to anyone — assuming she was even aware of them.

Even her own allies at IF didn't know the true extent of Emily's abilities. Perhaps this was only to be expected, considering that nearly all of them had aces up their sleeves that they concealed even from their own clan members. The one exception was Gerbera, who proudly flaunted the effects of her ultimate skill.

Because of this, most IF members assumed that Emily's immortality was the result of a passive ultimate Embryo skill.

However, Survival of the Fittest was a standard passive skill.

Her ultimate was something different.

"Harvest..."

And now, she was preparing to use it — the wide-scale extermination ultimate that could easily destroy an entire city-state.

"...Night..."

A calamity unlike any other before was about to hit Cortana...

"...Youaltepuzt—"

"Emily! Are you okay?!"

...when suddenly, the worried voice of Zhang reached Emily's ears.

Silence. The moment she heard the voice, Emily lowered her hands, and both of the axes returned to their crest.

Emily turned around...

"Mr. Zhan? What's wrong?"

...and faced Zhang as normal Emily, speaking to him in a childlike voice.

"Forgive me for taking so long. After The Blue Sky Songstress picked you up, I lost sight of her. I ran all around Cortana's outskirts."

"Hm...? I...see?" Emily said, tilting her head as though clueless what he was talking about.

She then staggered for a bit before leaning on Zhang.

"Emily?"

"...I'm kinda tired. Emmie wants to sleep..."

And just like that, the girl fell asleep.

Zhang was slightly perplexed for a moment, but he picked her up and left the pit where the quicksand used to be.

After that, he took out the small sand-boat given to him by Rascal from his Garage and left Cortana, taking care not to be seen by AR-I-CA or others.

Once they were some distance away from Cortana...Emily logged out for the day.

◆

Emily opened her eyes.

After logging out, she left her bed and walked around her room on bare feet.

With the exception of the hospital gown she was wearing, she looked exactly as she did in Infinite Dendrogram.

She did seem to be one or two years older than her avatar.

Suddenly, the automatic door to her room opened up, admitting a nurse wearing a white coat.

"How are you today, Emily?"

"Hmm...good!"

"I see. Anyway, I'll bring you dinner soon, okay?"

"Okaaay!" After seeing off the nurse, Emily looked around her room — a pure white sickroom. She then dragged a chair close to the window, climbed on it, and looked at the scenery outside.

The cloudless sky showed the moon and its beautiful patterns. The veil of night had fallen over the nearby forest, and she could hear the hoots of the owls there.

All by herself, she looked through the grated windows at the night scenery outside.

It was unclear if she was satisfied with what she saw, but she climbed off the chair and returned to bed, sitting atop it and waiting for dinner. She was well used to the meals served at the psychiatric hospital by now.

"Today was so fun too..." she said as she recalled walking around with Zhang, eating ice cream at the café, and looking around the bazaar — nothing more than that.

She would pay no attention to the time she'd apparently lost.

It was only the fun times that ever stayed with her.

"What should I do tomorrow?"

Like any innocent child, Emily wondered what the next day would bring.

◇◇◇

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

The amber-colored dragon summoned by KoT instantly ended the battle.

The UBM was purged by the dragon's flames, concluding all that had happened in Cortana that day.

As a new day dawned, the city began to relax.

Teach had contacted Caldina's capital and called for aid. They had already arrived and were working to get things under control, assisting the people who were injured or lost their homes in the chaos. They'd also declared that due to the mayor's death, Cortana would be briefly put under the direct control of the congress, and they prepared to investigate those who had close ties with the late mayor, among other things.

The happenings here had caused quite a stir, but they weren't anything particularly damaging in the long term, especially compared to what would've happened if De Vermis had been allowed to grow — Cortana could've been destroyed entirely.

I was also told that if the burning pit created by the amber dragon had connected with Cortana's oasis, it might've caused a steam explosion that would've wiped out the entire city.

Benetnasch had probably accounted for that when picking the "six hundred metel" range, but I couldn't help but notice how desperately the Masters and tians handling the aftermath worked to cool the burning pit.

I would've liked to help, but unfortunately, La Porte de l'Enfer didn't work on objects, so I had to leave it all to them.

"...Benetnasch, huh?" I hadn't seen him, Persephone...or Emily, for that matter, since my last encounters with them.

They might've left the city without anyone noticing. I wasn't completely certain, but I was pretty sure that Emily hadn't been sent to the gaol either.

There was a chance that I would meet them again someday.

With those Superiors gone from Cortana, Teach — the one who was still here — seemed to be extremely busy.

In spite of it all, she was Sefirot — a Master given special privileges by the president herself. It was expected that she would have a lot to do.

Appearances aside, Teach was actually pretty hardworking, so she must've been really busy right now.

...If only she were this dedicated in her personal life. I could respect her without any reservations.

"I see a lot of words like 'in spite of,' 'appearances aside,' and 'if only' in your mind."

"...Well, it is about Teach, you know?"

As for me and Cyco...we weren't citizens of this country, so we couldn't actually help that much. At most, we would occasionally dispose of some rubble using White Rose. But with many Masters gathering to help, it was already done.

Now, I was just waiting for Teach in a café, just like I had yesterday.

In silence, I pondered a variety of things.

Back in Hermine, the matter of the Orb had been accomplished with few casualties, but here, many people had died.

Emily was supposedly here because of the Orb, and she'd killed a number of people. Investigations also revealed that the mayor also murdered many for the power of the Orb.

And we obviously couldn't forget those that died after De Vermis was released.

Yesterday might have marked the end of an entire major city...but that wasn't even the last of the events surrounding the Orbs.

Teach now had two of them, while one had been destroyed at the mayor's mansion, leaving a whole four more of these Huang Hean treasures scattered across the continent.

I didn't know if all of them were in Caldina, but Teach had said something terrifying about them: "I did some extra lookin' up and it turns out that one of the seven stolen Orbs has somethin' worse than a Mythical."

A UBM that surpassed Mythical in status.

That could only mean that a creature more than a match for a SUBM was now in someone's hands, lying dormant in its Orb, always on the verge of being released. Seeing the kind of trouble an Ancient Legendary like De Vermis had caused, I didn't even want to imagine what that one would do.

However, I wouldn't hesitate to prevent that from happening.

I was basically dragged into this Orb hunt, but if it would prevent incidents like this one, I would see it through to the end.

Abandoning it...would it make it hard for me to sleep at night.

"Yu! Cy! Kept ya waitin', huh?"

As that thought passed through my mind, Teach entered the café.

"Teach, good work with every...thing... Teach?" I tried to express my respect for the hard work she'd been doing, but then I noticed something on her neck.

"What is iiit?"

"You have more hickeys than before."

"Ah," she said, putting her hand on her neck.

Other side, I thought. Actually, there's some on both.

"...Teach?"

"Ah hah hah. Well, you know the maid I told you about yesterday? The one who was gonna poison me?"

"Yes." The one she was pillow-talking with straight until dawn.

"It turns out she was staying at the same inn as me after that. She wasn't there when the mansion went down, so she was perfectly fine."

"That's a...silver lining on a dark cloud, as they say."

"What dark cloud? It's all clear skies for her! You should've seen how happy she looked while she was sleeping!"

"Teach...?"

"Well...I met up with her after the whole thing yesterday and she was pretty freaked out. I mean, think about it, her workplace got blown apart and her boss and colleagues all died! Anyone would panic!"

"And...?"

"I spent the whole night comfortin' her."

...Silly me for ever thinking she was hard at work. I want my respect back, I thought.

"I hope you die," said Cyco.

"I'm gettin' some déjà vu here!"

Thanks to her, the worries I had just moments ago were blown away. Did she have a natural talent for destroying my inner conflicts?

That aside, there was something I had to ask her now. It had been bothering me since yesterday.

"Teach," I said.

"What is iiit?"

"Yesterday, you fired lightning shells at De Vermis... Wasn't that the power of the UBM Orb you retrieved last time?"

"ACK?!"

...She actually said that. With her mouth.

"Didn't you say that you passed it over to a courier?"

"Uhh...yeah. That's what I told you, but..."

"...Teach?"

She reached into her flight jacket's inner pocket and...took out the Orb before putting it on the table.

"I actually had it this whole time... Ah ha ha."

"...You could've just said so."

"You lied to your disciple. How awful," said Cyco.

"Ughh...?! I-It wasn't my idea! It was all old man Grand!"

What did she mean by old man Grand?

"It's a long story, but..." she began, launching into her explanation.

◇

After retrieving the Orb at Hermine, Teach had apparently contacted the capital with a comms device.

"So yeah, I got the first Orb. Can ya send someone to take it off me?"

"Impossible."

And just like that, she was denied a courier.

There were multiple reasons for this, apparently.

First of all, Orbs weren't items that could be placed in inventories. That meant that Masters left them behind when they logged out, making them a bad choice for carrying them. Even if they were put up to the task, there was a chance that greed would get the better of them and they would make a run for it with the Orb in order to have the special reward for themselves.

The only Masters who could be trusted with the Orbs were other Sefirot members, but the only one of them who was both fit for courier work and wasn't too busy was Teach herself.

Tians weren't a good option either, though, because Caldina didn't have many that were powerful enough.

Almost none of them could stand their ground against pre-Superior or greater Masters, and if someone learned that a tian was carrying the Orb, it was likely that powerful Masters would attack them and take it.

By process of elimination, the most powerful and reliable courier was Teach herself.

However, she also couldn't stay logged in all day and night long, so just about anyone could take the Orb from her by simply picking it up from where she logged out.

If someone found out that she was still holding it, she would certainly be targeted somewhere.

Thus, the first thing she had to do was lie to me — her only companion — by telling me that she didn't have the Orb.

Neither I nor Cyco had Truth Discernment, and Teach already knew that.

Telling us that the Orb was "with a courier" was also a very deliberate act.

It was possible that someone could attack me while Teach was logged out and interrogate me about the location of the Orb.

If I truly believed that the Orb had been passed to a courier, Truth Discernment would detect that as a true statement.

The same would be true if anyone had asked me if the Orb was in Ace's possession.

Because of this, anyone who tried to get information from me would end up searching for a fictional courier.

Apparently, this trap that turns the useful Truth Discernment skill against the user was thought up by the person Teach had called "old man Grand" — King of Toys, Grandmaster — and Teach had put it to use right away.

As for how Teach had dealt with having to log out with the Orb in her possession... Well, she simply buried it in the sand of the dunes or the dirt of the cities after attaching a simple transmitter to it. Trapping it was an option, but that would make it discoverable using the Trap Perception skill.

Since I'd truly believed Teach's words, this whole "courier" thing had been a good decoy.

◇

"...But now we know that you still have it," I said.

"Uhh, yeah," Teach said. "But that's not a problem anymore."

"What do you mean?" I asked. In response, Teach put a map window on the table, expanded it, and pointed at it before saying, "Drag-Nomad is close to Cortana now. With Blue Opera, I can make it there within the day and give Prez both of the Orbs I got."

I see. With the courier work nearly done, there was no harm in telling me the truth now.

"So yeah, I'll be flyin' there soon. There's a buncha stuff I gotta do there, so you'll have to wait for me here in Cortana, okay?"

"Okay. I have school anyway, so in a way, this is good timing."

I can still stay here for about six hours of Dendro time, but if I don't have anything to do, I might as well log out now, I thought.

"Oh yeah. School," said Teach. "Man, I'm unemployed myself, so I kinda forget that you're busy."

...How am I supposed to respond to that?

"By the way, Teach," I said.

"What is iiit?"

"You're not hiding anything else from me, are you?" The first Orb-related incident in Hermine, the secret courier work... I felt like Teach had been hiding things from me ever since we'd met.

So, wondering if there was anything more I didn't know about, I posed that question to her.

In response...

"I am."

...she casually responded in the affirmative.

"Of course you are..."

"Yep. But it's got nothin' to do with Orbs. You can trust me on that."

"...What is it about, then?" I asked, slightly exasperated.

"About me, you...and Fran, I guess."

...I certainly didn't expect to hear my sister's name there.

“Is this—?”

“Uh, nonono,” she cut me off. “I can’t tell you now, but...you know what?” She folded her arms and seemingly thought about something for a moment before saying, “I’ll tell you either when you get a Superior Job, or when Cy becomes a Superior Embryo.”

“...What’s with those conditions?” The former was only achievable by the first person to make it to each job, while the latter had yet to be accomplished by even a hundred players in the whole world.

“That’s way too hard.”

“You think so? I’m pretty sure you and Cy will get there eventually,” she said with an amused smile. “So do your best, okay? I’ll be waitin’.”

Her heterochromic eyes were fixed on me, looking as serious as she could get.

◇

After that, I parted ways with Teach and logged out.

After taking off the headset, I heard songbirds singing as dawn broke.

Looking at the time, it was past five in the morning. There were two hours left until breakfast at the dorms, and three until classes began.

I could have taken an hour-long nap, but a good shower to wake me up was probably better than a lackluster sleep.

I took off my clothes and entered the bathroom attached to my room. Using the panel on the wall, I turned on the shower and stood beneath it.

I was glad that we didn’t have roommates here in Lorraine’s Girls College — I might’ve woken mine up with my showering.

“Ahh, I needed that.” After cleaning myself, I dried my hair and body before changing into the school’s uniform.

There was an hour left until breakfast, so I used the time to go through the texts that would come up in today’s classes.

Even with that done, I still had some free time, so I looked at some video sites for the first time in a while and...

“...Ah.”

...there was a video called “Hell General, Logan Goddhart gets REKT!” in the rankings for the gaming category.

Uploaded several days ago, it showed how the top player in Dryfe’s duel rankings had lost against an Altarian newbie...him.

“...He’s the same as ever.” Watching him fight Hell General in the video reminded me of his battles against Gouz-Maise...and Fran.

Earlier, remembering those things made me feel both longing and guilt. But now, I felt a bit proud... I could look straight at that video without feeling bad in any way.

It might’ve been because I — Hugo — had chosen to stand up to impending doom just like he did.

“It would be great to talk to him about the recent happenings someday.” That day, before we faced each other, we’d met up at a café and had this exchange:

“All right, then. Guess this is goodbye for now. Oh, should we add each other on the friends list?”

“...Not now. Let’s do it next time we meet...or the time after that.”

I’d said that because I knew that we would be enemies “next time” and that if we were to become friends, it would necessarily be “the time after that.”

We hadn’t met again after our meeting as enemies.

I didn’t know if he still saw me as an enemy or if he believed we could still be friends — but personally, the next time we met, I wanted to make it up to him and, if possible, be on good terms again.

“I guess it might depend on his relationship with my sister... Ah.” As I said that, I noticed the name of the person who had uploaded the Hell General video.

It was easy to guess who it was...

“...I see she’s still sour.” Apparently, my sister was still stuck to him like slime, gathering info about him using methods that were basically stalking.

She must’ve gotten the footage through all of that, and it showed me just how obsessed she was.

Thinking of their relationship, I grew slightly exasperated and let out a sigh.

“Yuri! The cafeteria’s about to open up! Let’s go!”

That was when a friend — Sonya — came to invite me to eat breakfast together.

“Okaaay,” I said as I closed the video site.

It was time to put aside the Orbs, KoT, Emily, and Teach, as well as Fran and Ray.

There were many problems in Infinite Dendrogram, but they would have to be dealt with later.

The Machine Knight of Ice and Roses, Hugo Lesseps would have to rest for a moment. Until today's classes ended, I would be Yuri Gautier — a third-year middle school student in Lorraine's Girls College.

I was both Hugo and Yuri — and without either, I would be no one.

"Yuri?"

"Comiiing!"

Called by my friend, I left my room and took a step into a life as Yuri.

To Be Continued in the Next Episode

Afterword

Hello dearest readers! I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

Thank you for reading volume 16 of Infinite Dendrogram. This one took a step away from the stage where our protagonist, Ray, resides and instead focused on the story of Hugo, who is currently traveling around Caldina.

An important figure that has appeared in this volume is the Superior he met — King of Tartarus, Benetnasch.

As you may have noticed from the similarities between the wonderful covers Taiki drew for volume 1 and this one, he is a reflection of Ray.

You can see it in their positioning next to their Embryos, but if you look at the backgrounds, you will notice that while Ray is in front of “the kingdom they would now live in,” Benetnasch is in front of “the arch through which the dead may return.”

Their very natures are opposed, as well.

Ray stands in the path of tragedies and gives his all to keep hope alive.

Benetnasch follows after tragedies and fathers hopes that have already died.

Nemesis carves a path through the present using the pain of the past.

Persephone revives the past in its entirety and brings it into the present.

The time when they would face each other is still in the distant future, but it is my hope that the day will come when I will be able to let you dear readers witness it.

Now, enough about volume 16 — it is time to talk about the next one.

We have been on this journey for a whole 16 volumes now, and over a dozen releases of adaptations of the web novel. But with volume 17, the Infinite Dendrogram light novel will finally...

...get its first volume of all-new original content!

Did you think I was going to say it was ending? It most certainly will not! It will go on!

Up until now, I have been making edits and additions to the light novel to make it worthwhile for both the light novel readers as well as those who have been following the web novel, and I also wrote an all-new five-hundred-page bonus novel for the anime release, but now, the light novel series itself will get a full release of all-new content — a volume that isn't even partially an adaptation of the web novel.

I must admit that writing it makes me tense in a way I usually am not, but please do look forward to it, as I will do all I can to write the best draft I am capable of.

Additionally, last month marked the release of Crow Record volume 4 in Japan — the final one of the spin-off.

Just like the previous one, it comes with a bonus short story, so please do pick it up if you are so inclined.

I must say that working on Crow Record has been a very positive experience for me.

I was especially happy with how charming and expressive La-na made the new characters, Max and Shion.

Crow Record may be over, but please do read through it if you can — now is the perfect time to do so.

Please continue supporting Infinite Dendrogram.

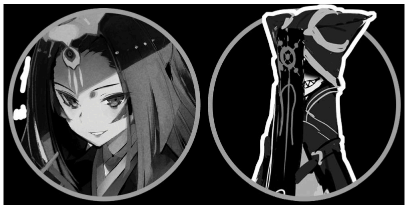
Sakon Kaidou



Xun: "Hm? Ohh, right. The after-aftErword. I'm 'Xun,' shOrt for 'Xunyu.'
Fox: "And I'm the 'Fox,' Tsukuyo Fusooo!"
Xun: "...Huh? I'm jUst with yOu this time?"
Fox: "Yep. We only got one page left. It's not enough for more than two, so it's just you and me, sweetie."
Xun: "...Well, whatEver."

Fox: “You seem a little bothered by something. What’s on your mind?”
Xun: “Oh, I just wondEr what the author meant when he sAid that it’s the perfect chance to reAd Crow Record. Why’d he, of all peoplE, emphasize somethin’ like thAt?”
Fox: “Oh, thaaat? I’ll just tell you along with the announcement. VOLUME 17 IS SET TO COME OUT IN NOVEMBER! THE MAIN CHARACTERS IN IT WILL BE RAY AND THE CROW RECORD GANG!”
Xun: “...So that’s whAt that was about! It’s just mOre direct markEting!”
Fox: “If any of you haven’t read it yet, go pick it up! It’s both a good read and good prep for the next voluuume!”
Xun: “I now understand whY you’re the one doin’ this afterwOrd...”

Bonus Short Stories

Pandemonium

2044

This was back when Triangle of Wisdom was just another one of the many crafting clans in Dryfe. In their wooden shack — the workshop where their few members were trying to make humanoid robots a reality — there currently stood just two Masters.

"Hey, Fran, there's somethin' I've been meaning to ask ya."

"What is it?"

The two people speaking were the clan's test pilot, AR-I-CA, and the clan's leader who also served as their project supervisor, Franklin. Since they were the clan's top pilot and engineer, they often conversed with each other, sometimes alone and sometimes joined by the clan's accountant — a lady named "Hohlheim." When there was no one but the three of them around, Franklin spoke in a manner quite similar to Francesca's; their conversations covered many topics ranging from work to completely random things, and this was yet another such exchange.

"It's about the monsters ya make with your Pandemonium. Do they count as undead?"

"Hm...? Ohh, you mean, since I use monster materials? As in...corpses?"

Pandemonium was, of course, Franklin's Embryo — a factory that produced monsters based on the materials placed into it.

It grew larger with every evolution, and was now so large that he had to go out of his way to find a flat expanse of land with no people around to summon it.

If it was this huge in its fifth form, it was hard to imagine how big it would become as it evolved.

Since Franklin could be attacked outside of Vandelheim, producing monsters was now a stressful affair. At that time, he wondered how much a patch of land near Vandelheim would cost, wishing that Pandemonium could walk or at least be cloaked.

As shown by history, by mid-2044, the clan ended up becoming large enough for them to buy the needed land, and when Pandemonium evolved into its seventh form after the turn of the year, it gained optical camouflage as well as legs.

"I know what you're trying to say, AR-I-CA," said Franklin. "Pandemonium makes monsters from monster bones and dead flesh, and you want to know how and why is that any different from the creation of undead like skeletons and zombies."

"Yep-yep," said AR-I-CA, visibly happy that Franklin had instantly understood her.

"The difference is in the creature type and creation," said Franklin.

"...Hmm?" AR-I-CA raised an eyebrow. The answer was not quite what she wanted to hear, but from Franklin's perspective, there was no better way to put it.

"Making undead involves this energy called 'grudge,' but I really don't know much about it yet," Franklin continued, admitting that the details were currently beyond him. "And even if I wanted to find out more, we don't have any Necromancers in our clan."

"...Well, they don't seem like the type to care about robots. Hell, I don't think we got a lot of 'em here in Dryfe to begin with."

"Mhm. I'll probably never get involved with them, anyway."

That eventually turned out to not be the case. Franklin would eventually hire King of Tartarus to help in his attempts to develop grudge engines, and that same grudge would be the reason Ray Starling would eventually shatter his plans. This dark energy would eventually affect Franklin's life much more than he could have ever imagined on that day, conversing casually with AR-I-CA.

"So what are your monsters, anyway?" AR-I-CA asked.

"Well... Do you know Frankenstein; or, The Modern Prometheus?"

"Mhm. I do."

"Without getting into specifics, the monster in that novel was made by gathering parts from other creatures, combining them to create a body resembling the animals the materials were sourced from, and bringing it to life. That's more or less what I do."

"Isn't that like a flesh golem? As in, an undead?"

“My monsters don’t have grudge, or even a soul. They just have some directive programming ‘burned’ into their brain cells... Which sort of makes them more like robots made of flesh. Oh, but...”

“‘But...?’”

“If I use lots of material from undead, I can make undead out of the residual grudge.”

“It all depends on the mats, huh? So you can make anythin’ the mats let ya make?”

“That’s mostly accurate. I definitely can’t make angels, though. The creature type has an entry in the info menu, but there has never been even a single sighting. I can’t make a creature type without the necessary materials.”

Even if creatures of the angel type did have a habitat somewhere, it’s location was completely unknown.

“Angels, huh...? I wonder if they’re winged and naked! You think they’re kinda horny too...?!”

“...It’s very obvious what you’re thinking, but if succubi wear clothes, I’m pretty sure angels would too.”

Slightly shocked by his friend’s blasphemous words, Franklin brought up a familiar comparison.

In the country of Dryfe stood the created dungeon called “Lust-Devil Palace.” Home to many succubi-like creatures of the devil type, it was a treacherous place no one had cleared yet in spite of the many Masters who had repeatedly tried to do so — and the reason behind their dedication should have been obvious.

It was also worth noting that, since necessary materials harvested from succubi were reasonably available on the market , Franklin could, if he felt like it, actually make that type of monster himself.

“Lack of materials is the reason I never made yokai, either.” Franklin continued. “I heard there’s plenty of them in Tenchi and Huang He to the east, but you never see them here. I’d have to import the materials to make them, but I need a lot to make a monster, so I can’t even imagine how much that would cost...”

“For somethin’ that looks like it can do anythin’, Pandemonium sure has a lotta limits...” AR-I-CA commented.

The Embryo seemed to have a high degree of freedom, but since it depended on the materials provided to it, Pandemonium ultimately had many restrictions. One could say that it was the pinnacle of Embryos that relied on external Resources.

As they talked about monsters and Pandemonium, AR-I-CA began wondering about something and asked, “By the way, Fran, ya compared yourself to Frankenstein, didn’t you?”

“I did.”

“Frankenstein’s monster learned human words and culture, didn’t he? What would you do if the things you made gained intelligence or self-awareness?”

If that were to happen, they would stop being “biological robots” and become “living beings.”

AR-I-CA wanted to know what Franklin would do if that possibility existed.

“I go out of my way to make sure that doesn’t happen,” Franklin said, his eyes slightly colder than before.

“That so?” AR-I-CA said, choosing not to ask for an elaboration.

Embryos were mirrors of their Masters. If Pandemonium was a reflection of Franklin’s true nature, AR-I-CA had no intention of prying any further. She could tell that — just like her own eye — Franklin had some baggage best left untouched.

They both had told each other about certain aspects of their real lives, but neither of them tried to tread on the other’s deepest secrets.

“There’s tons of stuff involved, huh?” AR-I-CA said.

“I would say so,” nodded Franklin.

They enjoyed and found comfort in each other’s presence, but never overstepped each other’s boundaries.

This friendship of theirs continued for a long time...

...Right until the day AR-I-CA ruined it all.

Bar Chatter

February, 2045, The Tetragrammaton

Illegal Frontier, the criminal clan. Being a group that boasted only wanted Superiors as official members, it was no doubt one of the strongest forces in Infinite Dendrogram.

Their headquarters was the amphibious battle cruiser called “The Tetragrammaton.” Inside it there were rooms for every member, as well as a number of recreational facilities.

“Heh heh! This is the luxurious grown-up life!”

Inside one such facility — a bar, to be exact — there stood Gerbera, holding a cocktail glass and posing in a manner she believed to be mature.

She was underage, however, so the drink inside was non-alcoholic.

Next to her, not saying a word, was one of the clan’s sub-leaders, Rascal.

He’d come here first and had been unwinding with a few drinks, but then he was joined by Gerbera and Emily, both of whom were strangely excited.

Rascal could only assume that they were in the middle of exploring the battle cruiser.

“It’s shoo tasty!” Emily said, drinking her orange juice float.

“It really is!” said Gerbera. “This bartender is quite skilled. I feel like this might even actually get me drunk!”

Like hell it will. It’s non-alcoholic, ya dumbass, Rascal thought.

The bartender, as it happened, was an Idea made by La Crima.

“Heh heh... This booze is making me feel like talking about my past... Wanna hear a story?”

“Tell me tell me! I love you, Gerbera!”

I’m glad they’re gettin’ along, but what if this dumbass turns out to be a bad influence on her? Rascal thought, beginning to worry.

“Very well — then I shall tell you the take of how I stole a national treasure from Caldina!” Gerbera said proudly before beginning to eloquently describe her endeavor.

Seriously? You’re gonna boast about your dirty deeds? Rascal thought with a sigh.

None of what Gerbera went on to say was a lie. She’d indeed used Alhazred’s cloaking ability to steal one of Caldina’s national treasures. The problem was that she’d neglected to consider that the item would have a transmitter on it, and she was chased down by the authorities the moment her ult expired.

“They sent skilled pursuers after me, but I was able to escape with my ult. They couldn’t keep on chasing me after I dropp— let go of the treasure! I came out on top! I was the victor!”

It was obviously a defeat, but in her mind, she was the one who had prevailed.

This was how Gerbera was at that point in time. Rascal had acknowledged her as almost offensively stupid, but still accepted her into the clan because of her Superior Embryo's abilities. A small part of him was actually starting to regret it.

"Wow, Gerbera! I thought you could only make sweets!" Emily said, clapping and clearly not fully understanding what she had just heard.

"Yes! Praise me more!" Gerbera declared proudly.

Rascal looked at them, not saying a word. Being a guardian-like figure to Emily even in real life, he had actually begun to worry that Gerbera could be a bad influence on Emily in a way unrelated to her illness.

Following this, Gerbera was sent on a certain mission to Altar...

The End

Similarity

Armored Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

While looking around Cortana, I'd chanced upon Persephone — King of Tartarus' Maiden Embryo.

Back when the pair had been collaborating with the Triangle of Wisdom, we'd met several times, but we never properly talked to each other. Now that I finally had a chance to do so, I couldn't help but notice something.

"Hm? What's the matter? Is there something on my face?" she asked as I looked at her.

It wasn't anything on her face, though — it was actually her face itself. Though her apparent age, hairstyle, hair color, and clothing were different, her face was much like that of Ray's Nemesis.

At first, I thought my mind was just playing tricks on me, but the more I talked to her, the more aware I became of the similarities between them.

I hadn't felt this way when I'd first met Nemesis, but having had a good number of conversations with her, I could now clearly see that she and Persephone had much in common — so much, in fact, that they seemed like sisters.

"...Maybe Persephone's Master is actually Ray's brother?" Cyco commented telepathically.

If siblings ended up having similar Embryos, you'd have ended up looking like Pandemonium, I thought in response.

"Huh...? That'd be scary as hell..."

Also, Ray already has a brother — KoD. His Embryo is nothing like Nemesis.

"I see you are busy thinking or possibly conversing by telepathy, but I must say that this silence is quite alienating..." said Persephone.

"Oh... Sorry about that," I said. "I know of this Embryo that is much like you...and I was wondering why you are so alike."

"Oh? An Embryo like me?"

"Do you have any idea why Embryos might end up looking similar?"

"Well, there are two hypotheses," she said as she held up both of her index fingers. "The nature of an Embryo depends on the nature of its Master. Their lives, preferences, their strong yearnings...Embryos pick up various things about their Masters and reflect them, gaining powers accordingly. In the same way, it is possible that the nature of the Master may influence the shape of the weapon, as well."

"So, you are saying that King of Tartarus and Ra— the Master I know have a similar nature?"

"You are the one who knows both of them. That is up to you to decide."

I fell silent and thought about KoT and Ray.

They were both Maiden Masters and seemed to have a tendency to burden themselves with the lives of others.

However, when I compared their expressions as I remembered them, I could see nothing in common.

Alike, yet completely opposed — that was the impression they gave me.

"...And the other hypothesis?" I asked.

In response, Persephone lowered the index finger on her right hand and said, "The abilities of an Embryo depend on the nature of its Master. However, there is a possibility that at the very beginning, one particular difference may depend on an external factor."

"That difference being...?"

"The visage. Or overall appearance, if you prefer," she said, using her left index finger to point at her face. "Offspring resemble their parents. This is natural for animals with genetics. The information comprising us, on the other hand, comes from our Masters, meaning that our powers cannot be determined by anything but their nature. However, the ‘vessel’ that is to be filled with this information exists before it meets its Master.”

“The zeroth form...”

“Indeed. There is no difference in power between zeroth forms, but if zeroth forms born from the same parent become the same type of Embryo...perhaps they would be alike in appearance or shape.”

In that case, Nemesis and Persephone were...

“Heh heh. That’s quite enough time spent on mere speculation, especially when it cannot be proven. It’s no better than nonsense. Although...” Persephone said, falling silent for a moment and then whispering, “An Embryo that shares my likeness... Perhaps I may one day encounter her?”

Her words were like a premonition of something in a distant future.

I couldn’t help but notice that instead of “I would like to meet her,” she said “Perhaps I may one day encounter her.”

The End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters of series like this by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 16
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Sarah Tilson

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2021 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2021 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki

All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2021 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2021 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

Ebook edition 1.0.1: January 2022
Premium E-Book

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
17. White Cat's Cradle

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

Infinite Dendrogram

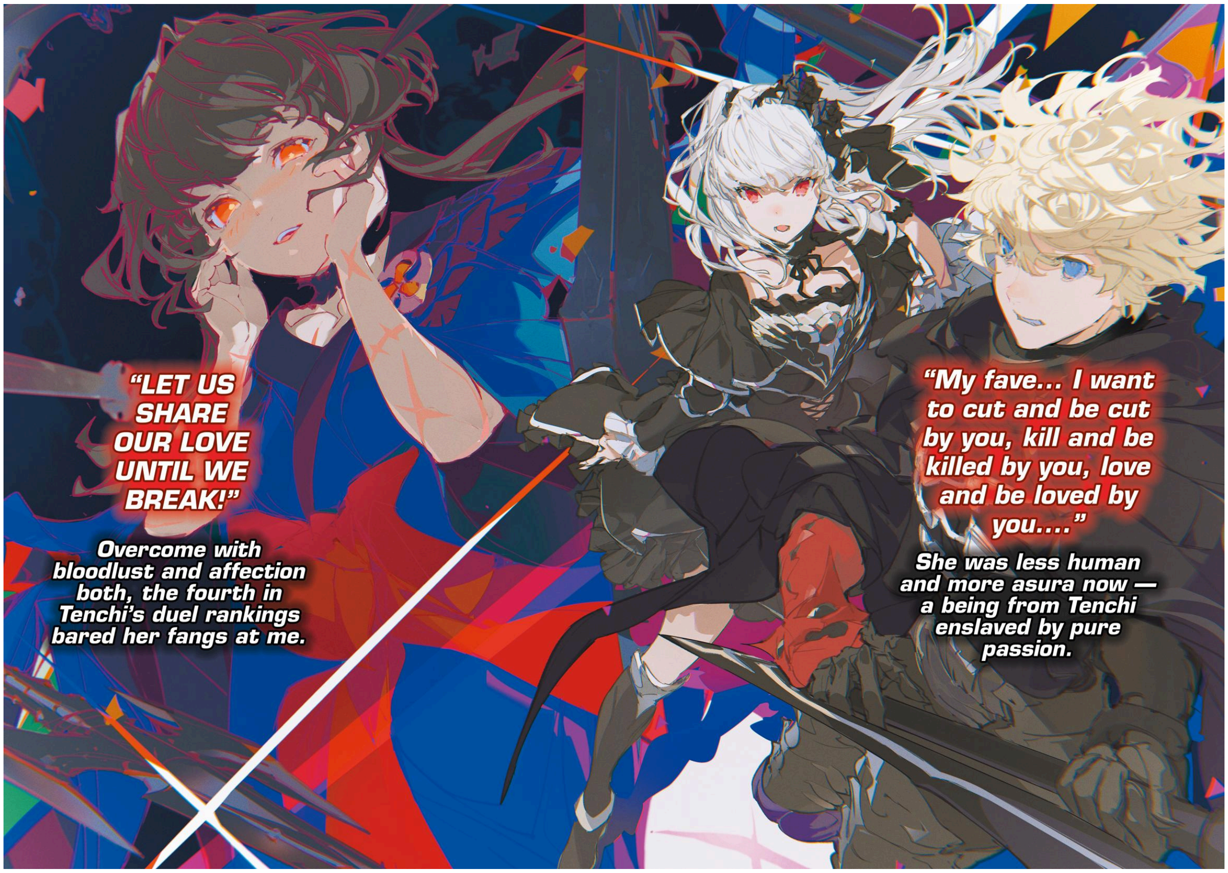
17. White Cat's Cradle

Infinite Dendrogram

17. White Cat's Cradle

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



"LET US SHARE OUR LOVE UNTIL WE BREAK!"

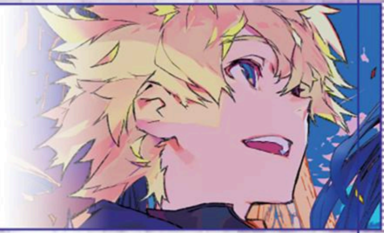
Overcome with bloodlust and affection both, the fourth in Tenchi's duel rankings bared her fangs at me.

"My fave... I want to cut and be cut by you, kill and be killed by you, love and be loved by you...."

She was less human and more asura now—a being from Tenchi enslaved by pure passion.

Character

Ray



Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

A college freshman who gets caught up in various incidents within Infinite Dendrogram. Though he is generally mild-mannered, he has a strong will that causes him to fight for his goals and never give up on them.

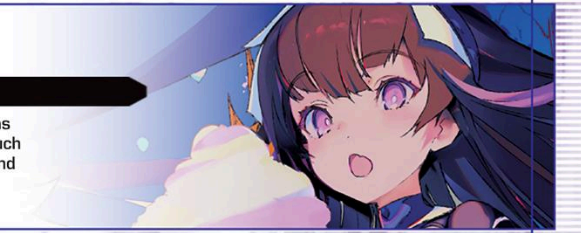
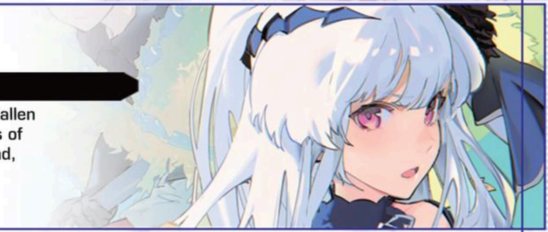
Nemesis



Nemesis

Ray's Embryo manifested as this girl. Nemesis acts as Ray's weapon by taking up the form of armaments such as a greatsword, halberd, shield, pinwheel, mirror, and twin swords. She is also a notable glutton.

Juliet



Juliet/Juri Kurosaki

The fourth in Altar's duel rankings and bearer of the Fallen Knight Superior Job, she fights by wielding many kinds of curses. Her manner of speech is difficult to understand, but Ray somehow has no trouble with it whatsoever.

Chelsea

Chelsea

The eighth in Altar's duel rankings, she is Juliet's closest friend. Her luck with men is so abysmal that her love life is DOA. Originally from Granvaloa, Chelsea's main job is Grand Pirate.

Max

Great Genocide Max

Another girl in the Altarian duel rankings. She challenged Juliet and was defeated, leading to her becoming Juliet's cutesy clothing dress-up doll. Before coming to Altar, Max was a Master from Tenchi.

Shion Manjushage

Shion Manjushage

The thirteenth in all three Altarian rankings: duel, kill, and clan. She loves ominous things to the point of being dubbed "The Misfortune Collector." Shion also insists that she is Juliet's rival.

Table of Contents

Cover
Color Illustrations
Prologue: At the Water's Edge
Chapter One: The Invitation
Interlude: Outside and Within
Chapter Two: The Rules
Interlude: The Strongest Pieces on the Board
Chapter Three: The Dark Knight, the Nukenin, and the Fallen Angel
Chapter Four: Another Team Up
Interlude: The Scorpion, the Axe, and the Costume
Chapter Five: The Asura
Interlude: The Ranker Known as Chelsea
Chapter Six: The Asura and the Hunter
Interlude: The Crawler-Riders, the Magic-Spinners
Chapter Seven: A Hint
Interlude: Blade-Dance
Chapter Eight: To Beat the Invincible
Chapter Nine: Invincible Versus Invincible
Chapter Ten: Event Cleared
Chapter Eleven: The Knight and the Asura
Chapter Twelve: The Promise

Epilogue

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue: At the Water's Edge

March, 2045, A Certain Place in Infinite Dendrogram

A silent shoreline stood beneath the veil of night.

Unlike its counterparts in reality, this sandy beach was completely free of garbage, and the way the moonlight fell upon the rolling waves perfectly captured the essence of what a night should be.

Some distance away, there was a seaside path with not a single pebble on it, flanked by trees that were similar to pines. As a whole, the entire scene looked stunning—a truly otherworldly sight.

It would've been perfect if it weren't for the single person who spoiled the image slightly.

Sitting on the sand as though they had fallen backwards in surprise, they looked ahead with eyes wide open.

However, there was nothing there besides a couple of dents in the sand.

Gradually washed away by the coming waves, these two sizable depressions were spaced apart as though some gigantic, unseen figure was simply standing there.

"...What do I do?" A voice cut through the silence of the night.

The voice belonged to the person sitting on the sand, their words seemingly an expression of panic and confusion at having "messed up" in some way.

Alas, there was no one there to help them with their predicament, and the panic ultimately drove them to flee, leaving only the gorgeous evening scenery behind them.

When the next morning came, the fact that there was nothing there shook the locals, as well as the entire country.

Chapter One: The Invitation

Scout, Ray Starling

Infinite Dendrogram was a VRMMO in the action-RPG genre.

Apparently, the standard activities here consisted of taking on monster-hunting quests from the Adventurers' Guild, delivering packages, or perhaps engaging in crafting.

Using the word "apparently" implied that none of this had anything to do with me, but that was the thing—my activities here were far from standard.

First, I'd gone to search for someone, taking me to a dungeon out of my level range; then I tried to level like the newbie I was, only to get PK'd. After that, I took a delivery quest, only to run into a UBM on the way and, by complete chance, I ended up fighting the kingdom's most infamous bandit gang and the UBM they spawned. Right after that I got caught up in a Superior's act of terrorism, and he actually targeted me specifically—and just when I thought I was finally going to get some time to chill, I was kidnapped by another Superior. Then I escorted a boy looking for his dad, only to end up fighting a flying UBM that happened to awaken at the same time, and when I went to get a job change, I ended up running into yet another Superior—and an ancient superweapon. When I tried to relax at a festival in my hometown, I ended up fighting a pre-Superior who planned to stir up trouble by meddling in someone's love life. Most recently, I took on a bodyguard role for the peace talks between Altar and Dryfe, only to fall into Dryfe's trap and end up fighting one of the Apices of all Masters.

Yeah... Even I could tell that my activities here weren't exactly conventional.

"With all that in mind, though...things are kinda chill right now," I said.

"Consider the scene before you, and think if that description is truly fitting," Nemesis retorted.

There were currently scores of wooden golems burning to cinders in front of me. The source of the fire was the Purgatorial Flames from my left Miasmaflame Bracer.

I was currently in a forested mountain region, tossing flames onto an army of wooden golems. I couldn't blame any clueless onlookers for thinking I was just a pyromaniac.

As to how I ended up in this situation, well...

◇

It was April 18th—a Tuesday. Several Dendro days, as well as real-life ones, had passed since the chaotic peace conference.

Having come back from college, I logged in as I'd always done.

Because of various things, I hadn't yet returned to Gideon and was still at the capital, Altea.

I first hit the shops to replace my broken gear and stock up on consumables. Then, it was time to do some leveling. I may have had a unique Embryo that allowed me to turn the tide of difficult battles, but to grow stronger in the proper sense, I needed some levels.

"We are still lacking in raw power, after all," said Nemesis.

"Yeah. We just learned that the hard way."

Our clan had fought King of Beasts—the Physical Apex—and despite all our combined efforts, we didn't manage to come out on top.

I was told that Azurite herself would've been in danger if it wasn't for Fuso's negotiations.

"If we'd just had a little bit more power back then, we might've been able to seize a different possibility," I said. "We really need to level up so that we can reach them next time."

"Indeed!" Nemesis replied.

And so, with renewed resolve, I switched my job back to Scout so I could finally max it out. Then I figured that if I was gonna be leveling, I might as well kill two birds with one stone and do a hunting quest at the same time. I couldn't team up with my clan members because of time differences or in-game distance between us, but I figured I could handle the quest solo or just get a temporary party together.

I headed to the Adventurers' Guild, checked the catalog, and found a quest that was just perfect for me—a large-scale quest for the elimination of a monster type that had suddenly grown in number.

It was the kind of quest anyone could pick up, and the reward was based on how much you contributed to the extermination. The location was between Altea and Gideon—the now-nostalgic Sauda Mountain Pass.

The targets were the boss monster known as “Afforest King Golem” and its related species, the Planting Golems.

Afforests weren’t UBMs, but just like Goblin Kings and King Basilisks, they were always seen as major threats and targets for immediate elimination. Apparently, they were a troublesome monster type that appeared in fertile wild areas and incessantly spawned their kin—the Planting Golems—recklessly draining the land’s nutrients in the process.

Normally, they wouldn’t be somewhere like Sauda Mountain Pass, but recently, there had been an increase in dormant UBMs like Monochrome suddenly awakening, which had led to major disturbances in monster habitats all over.

It was kinda like how the lab coat maniac messed up the ecosystem around Gideon...but worse, since we now had a high-level boss monster and its kin making themselves cozy around the main path linking Altea and Gideon.

With the current situation in Altar, it would be pretty bad if this trade route was disrupted, so the authorities of both cities had teamed up to create this large-scale quest.

◇

And so, we were now here, exterminating the Planting Golems.

“...Live trees aren’t supposed to be this flammable,” I said.

“Might this cause a forest fire...?” Nemesis asked. Being monsters, the golems themselves disappeared the moment they died, but since their loot was wooden, their fires continued to burn.

I really didn’t wanna follow in Shu’s footsteps and create a scorched wasteland...

“Hey, should I be worried about this?” I asked as I looked at the flaming golem loot.

“Nope! I’ll put ’em all out!” I heard someone say, right before a mass of water crashed onto the burning remains.

The flames were silenced, preventing them from lighting the surrounding trees.

“See?” the person said, giving me a thumbs up. They...or rather she was a baby-faced girl in a pirate hat, and her name was Chelsea. She was an Altarian duel ranker in the eighth spot as well as a sparring partner of mine, and we were currently doing the same quest.

“If you just break or cut ’em up, these things just grow back from whatever’s left,” she said. Now that was obnoxious. I could see why they had been targeted for elimination. The damage they were capable of doing to local towns and villages was something else.

“I’m useless against them, so I’m glad we have you and your flamethrower here,” Chelsea added.

“Right back at you. I’m glad we have you too,” I said. This was an impromptu party, but she and I actually made a good team.

It was because of her that I could use Purgatorial Flames like I was. If I couldn’t rely on anyone to put the fires out, I’d have had to fight these things using Nemesis and her skills, which wouldn’t have been very efficient.

“Lemme check if they found it yet,” Chelsea said before using Telepathy Cuffs to contact our other party members.

I’d joined this party after running into her group by chance while doing this quest. On the party window, I could see the main stats and names of the other two members—Juliet and Max.

Chelsea and I were the only ones here. Juliet was using her wings and Max was riding her Type Sentinel Embryo to patrol the area and look for the Afforest. Since it was the source of these golems, this quest wouldn’t end until someone defeated it.

But since we had Juliet the Black Crow—fourth in the duel rankings—I was sure that we’d—

“Ray! They found it! It’s past the ridge, to the east of here!” Chelsea said, cutting my thought short.

“All right! Hop on Silver! We’ll get there by air!” I said. Just as I would expect, they’d located the monster.

Some time later, we arrived at the spot...

“UuuUrRrraaArrrrgHhhh...”

...where we saw a giant golem made of dirt and roots, with nearly a hundred trees growing out of its back.

“...Damn, it’s huge,” I said. Maybe I shouldn’t have expected anything less of a “boss monster.” It wasn’t as large as Leviathan, but it easily surpassed sixty metels, easily putting it in the “kaiju-sized” category.

Though, it was weird that something this big had gone unnoticed until Juliet spotted it...

“Julie! Where was this thing hiding?!” Chelsea called out to Juliet, who was currently flying around Afforest.

The Fallen Knight fired a dark magic spell at the monster before saying, “The wood itself stirred. Thus did the mind’s eye perceive from my skyward vantage.”

Oh, so that was how it was. Basically, “It was hiding in the ground, disguised as the forest itself, and moved along with the terrain. I could see it moving from the sky, but it must’ve been hard to spot from the surface.”

“...That translation is nearly thrice the length of what was actually said,” said Nemesis.

“Anyway, this is the real deal! Let’s chop it down!” said the other duel ranker present, Max. She was riding her bear-like Sentinel with countless blades growing out of its back. “Maddened Blade, Sip Their Blood—Ipetam!”

Following Max activating her ult, the blades on Ipetam’s back were released. They then spread out in the air around Afforest before flying straight towards it.

The dozens of blades pierced into the giant golem’s body, but...

“Ngh...! It barely did anything!”

...just like Max herself had said, the giant mass of trees and earth was largely unaffected.

“I’ll do it up close and personal, then...!” she then said as she used Laser Blade—the Swordmaster job skill Azurite had used. But since the blade was sized for a human, the damage to Afforest was minimal. “Damn it!”

“Don’t rush it, Maxie!” said Chelsea. “You’re specced against people, not monsters!”

“I know th— Don’t call me that!” retorted Max. Despite talking like a rowdy tomboy, Max was wearing a frilly dress. I thought she looked good in it, but when I’d actually said that to her once, she got mad at me for some reason.

“Whoa!” I cried out as a shadow fell over me and I made Silver back away.

A moment later, a leg the size of a building crushed the place we had just vacated.

“Don’t think we’ll go down without a fight!” I said as I aimed my left Miasmaflame Bracer towards the wall-like limb and showered it in Purgatorial Flames.

The superheated fire lit up Afforest just like the golems it had created...

“...High Fire Resistance.”

...but then, a veil of light appeared around it, greatly weakening the flames.

“That’s the skill B3 used...!” Back when we were fighting Monochrome, B3 had used this skill to weaken the heat and flames from its beams.

“Oh, right! Ray! Normal high-rank bosses aren’t like UBMs!” Chelsea called out to me.

Normal high-rank bosses... This was actually my first time fighting a monster like that. So far, I’d always ended up facing stronger Masters or UBMs...

“Unlike UBMs, they almost never have broken one-of-a-kind skills, but they get a bunch of utility skills! Figaro said that lots of them are stronger than some weaker UBMs!”

“I don’t think I know what a ‘weak UBM’ looks like!” I said. Still, I got the gist. This thing not only had stats to match its size, but also possessed a defensive skill that let it overcome its weakness to fire.

I looked and noticed that the wounds opened by Ipetam’s blades were closing, meaning that it probably had Auto Restoration as well.

“...Not being unique doesn’t make it a pushover, huh?” I said. Maybe this monster was nothing compared to my last big enemy—KoB—but it still far surpassed me in power.

The four of us were going to have to combine our efforts if we wanted to seize victory.

“Though the barrier stands vast and impenetrable, the champions arrayed against it act as one.” Juliet had basically read my mind and said, “This boss is very big and strong, but let’s work together and do our best to beat it!”

“Yeah! Let’s do this!”

And so, we all faced the Afforest King Golem.

◇

“We...won...” I sighed.

“The battle was more intense than I expected...” said Nemesis. It sure had been.

The battle had lasted nearly an hour and cost us all of our Counter Absorption uses as well as nearly all the grudge in my Grudge-Soaked Greaves.

At one point, Afforest had used a Purge Treant skill to create a tough golem army, then used Geo Drain to make the land wither and restore its own HP. After that, it had absorbed sunlight to attack us with Glint Pile, which was a high-rank ultimate job skill.

“Would you not say he was stronger than Gardranda and Gouz-Maise were at the time we fought them?” Nemesis asked.

“...Well, we beat those guys before they could mature.” Having just been born, Gouz-Maise was almost completely out of grudge, while Gardranda as I could summon her now was probably stronger than this boss—if she didn’t have a time limit, anyway.

Regardless, Afforest King Golem was really tough, and I could easily see what Figaro had meant.

As for how we beat it...Chelsea bound it using her Golden Bull Tsunami—Poseidon, then Juliet shattered the hardened chest-piece using her Corpse-Eating Bird—Hræsvelgr, then Max rode Ipetam close to the chest to tear it open. I finished it by using Vengeance on its core.

But man, if regular high-rank bosses were this tough and there were so many of them...wasn’t Dendro’s natural world just a little too terrifying?

“What about the remaining golems...?” I wondered.

“Leave them to the other peeps who took the quest,” said Chelsea. “We took most of the reward with this one. Anyway, I’m gonna open the loot now.”

“Yeah... Wait, ‘Open?’” I said in wonder, glancing over and noticing she was holding some sort of treasure chest. “‘Treasure Coffer of the Tree King’?” I read its name.

Oh, right. This was how normal boss monsters dropped their loot. I almost never fought them, so I’d completely forgotten about it—and this one in particular was bigger than any treasure chest I’d seen so far.

"After a savage battle, a pure droplet of salvation. (It was strong, so we'll probably get something good from this!)" said Juliet.

"I did some research on the Editing Division's site and they said that these boxes can give items you can exchange for money, a staff, or a shield—both of which will be made of wood," said Chelsea.

"...A wooden shield? Sounds like it'd burn easily," said Max. Overall, though, the girls seemed pretty excited about what they might find.

"The guild will reward each of us based on our contributions, so this is like a bonus," said Chelsea. "But since none of us use staffs or shields...we'll probably just sell them and split the money. You okay with that, Ray?"

"Yeah. Fine by me," I replied.

Chelsea had experience as the leader of a fairly prominent clan, so she immediately knew how to handle this loot. As the leader of a clan ranking second, I had much to learn from her.

So far, the only quest we'd taken as Death Period was our peace conference bodyguard duty. It'd be great to find more activities for us to do as a clan.

"All riiight! Here I gooo!" Chelsea said, her eyes shining as she vigorously threw open the chest.

At its bottom, there was...nothing but four pieces of paper.

"...Wha?" The unexpected items made Chelsea freeze in shock.

The rest of us were surprised too. We all stared at them like we'd never seen a piece of paper before.

"Hm...? They have names on them," I said. The pieces of paper all seemed exactly the same except for the names written on them.

I reached inside to get a closer look and picked up just one of the four—a ticket with my name on it, saying...

Anniversary Participation Ticket: This is an invitation to the developer-organized special event, The Anniversary.

If the owner of this ticket is online at the midnight of April 20th, JST, they will be transported to the designated event area.

This ticket can only be used by "Ray Starling."

"A special event...? The Anniversary?" I said, confused. It seemed like a strange time to be having any sort of anniversary.

"Ohh! I get it! These are for an exclusive event... YAY!" Chelsea cried as she unfroze, her eyes shining brighter than before.

"Exclusive?"

"A feast solely for those chosen by fate, obtained only through trials unnumbered and pursuit most relentless. (An event you can only participate in if you randomly get the ticket for it from a boss or a dungeon chest. They're very rare!)" Juliet explained.

"Ohh? And we went against the odds and got them, huh?" I said.

"Luck must have been on our side," said Nemesis. "...Not that I understood what Juliet just said."

A dev-organized event, though...? I thought.

"The Clash of the Superiors, Windstar Festival, Love-Duel Festival, and the tournament that's gonna start this weekend were all organized by tians, so this dev thing is kinda new to me."

"Most dev events are just seasonal things where you get special event monsters and stuff. These exclusive events are very exclusive, but as far as I know, their rewards are great too," Chelsea explained.

Well, I now understood why her eyes had lit up like that.

"The feast's appointed hour draws near. Will fate bring us champions together once again? (The day of the event is close... Will you all make it?)" Juliet asked.

"Well...yeah, I'm good for it," I said.

The event started at night, so I felt like it might impact how I felt the next day, but that wasn't a deal-breaker.

"I'm a-okay for it too! We're going to an event together! Let's form a party! And if it's an all-out battle royale, let's gank everyone!" Chelsea said with obvious joy.

"Heh! Sounds like a good time!" Max said, clearly excited.

"...I'm so glad," Juliet, standing by me, whispered silently, but not silently enough for me to not hear it.

I turned to her and asked, "What's wrong?"

"Ah!" she yelped in surprise before falling silent for a moment, then saying, "Umm... Chelsea's having a good time...so I'm happy for her...things have been pretty rough for her."

"...Ohh," I said. That was certainly true. Chelsea was met with a bunch of misfortune recently.

First, the clan she led collapsed because of a twenty-fold cheating scandal that she wasn't involved with in the slightest (worth noting that it had been exposed by King of Light, F). Then, she'd taken a bodyguard quest to rebuild her confidence, only to get PK'd by The Rabbit, Chrono Crown.

Talk about kicking someone while they were down.

But now, having scored a ticket to an exclusive event, she was extremely happy. I could understand why a close friend like Juliet would feel glad about it.

"Let's hope the event's good, then," I said.

"Yeah... It should be...fun," said Juliet.

"Hm...?" Something about Juliet caught my eye again. It seemed like she was worried, but this seemed different from her concern for Chelsea.

"Is something bothering you? I'll hear you out if you want."

"Ah?! N-No! Nothing's worry...ing... Ngh..."

She hastily denied it at first, but then slowly put on a troubled expression before looking at me with resolve in her eyes.

"U-Umm... Ray...you're...in college, right?" she asked.

Now that was a question I didn't expect.

"Yeah. Starting this year, anyway," I answered.

"...Was it hard to study for the exams?" Wondering why she was asking that, I went ahead and answered honestly.

"Well... Yeah, I guess you could say it was hard. I had to cut off basically all my entertainment and I studied pretty much nonstop starting the summer of my second year in high school. My brother kept inviting me to Dendro all that time, but I couldn't even think of starting it."

"...I...see," Juliet said. For reasons I couldn't understand, she looked downcast.

I wanted to listen to her worries, but it seemed like I'd only added to her uneasiness.

"Juliet?" I asked.

"I'm...fine... Yeah... I'm fine."

I wasn't able to ask anything more before we split up and I logged out for the day.

◇◇◇

Reiji Mukudori

It was noon on the next day, April 19th.

I was in my college's cafeteria, sandwich in one hand, mobile device in the other. Displayed on the device's screen was the site of the Editing Division, showing info about the exclusive event I'd be attending tonight.

There had been a bunch of such events so far, and they seemed to be different every time.

What they had in common was that you got tickets for them as rare boss loot or from chests in created dungeons, and that there were no tians involved at all.

The participants were transported to special areas like abandoned islands or unique dungeons and had to fight or cooperate with other Masters—or monsters—to come out on top.

I appreciated the fact that I wouldn't have to worry about the safety of any tians.

...I felt like I had to do that in every single incident since Milianne's.

Thankfully, the Altar-Dryfe situation had calmed down a bit after the peace conference. Thanks to Fuso, even KoB, the person we were most worried about, couldn't do much against us right now.

It was currently peaceful, so I felt like I could participate in this properly game-like event without worrying about anything else.

I was confident I would get to enjoy this with a clear mind.

"Rei, what're ya lookin' at? A porn site?"

"Natsume... Is that really your first guess?" I was just sitting here, embracing the joy of getting to participate in a normal game event for once, only for a fellow freshman—Soprano Natsume—to come by asking slanderous questions.

"I mean, you look really chill. That's not like you. You okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?" she said, quickly making a cat's cradle butterfly and extending it to me.

"No," I said. I couldn't even comment about her cat's cradle obsession at this point. "And what do you mean it's not like me? I can't relax now?"

"I mean, you always look so concerned. It's like troubles and worries are part of your personality."

...I couldn't deny that.

"...I'm checking the Dendro wiki now. See?" I said, showing her the page I was looking at, proving that I wasn't on some inappropriate site.

"Ohh? Ohh. Hm?" Natsume put a hand to her cheek, the one that had a bit of face paint on it, and tilted her head slightly. "Exclusive events?"

"I got a ticket in Dendro, so I'm looking up what I'm getting myself into."

"Seriously? You too?"

"'You too?'" I echoed.

She put away the cat's cradle, took out her phone, and showed me a picture.

It seemed to be a CG-style Dendro screenshot and...

"...A ticket?"

...it displayed a ticket just like the one I'd received.

The name was blurred out, probably for privacy reasons, but there was no doubt that it was the same item.

"Yep! I got a ticket too, and I'm on an event high tonight!"

"Oh? We might see each other there, then," I said.

I was in Altar while Natsume was in Tenchi, meaning that there was an entire continent between us. Since Dendro had no fast travel, clearing this distance and meeting up was difficult for us, but since all the event participants would be transported to one place, we actually had a chance of seeing each other tonight.

"Wow! Wait, your Ray is famous! If we meet there, please lemme take a screenshot with you! No wait—you know what? Let's do the event together!"

"Yeah, sure. But only if it allows co-op," I said.

This was making me feel kinda awkward, but it was a rare chance to play with a fellow UTokyo freshman, so I ignored it.

With me, Juliet, Chelsea, and Max, we still had room for her in the party.

"YAAYY! I can't wait for tonight!" Natsume said with a joyous expression...all while doing high-speed cat's cradle for some reason.

"What's up with you two?" someone besides us asked.

"Oh, Fuyuki. We—"

"Rei and I are gonna spend all night together!"

"HUH?! Since when do you two have that kind of relationship?!"

"What she said isn't wrong, but not right either!" As I cleared up his misunderstanding, the lunch break came to an end.

...Damn. I’d forgotten to ask for Natsume’s avatar’s name.

Interlude: Outside and Within

Reality, Kurosaki Household

On the evening of April 18th, Juri Kurosaki—Juliet's real-life counterpart—came back home thoroughly excited to go on a quest with her friends Chelsea and Max.

"Hm-hm-hmm..." Juri silently hummed a tune. In Infinite Dendrogram, she may have been the famous Altarian duelist, the "Black Crow," but in reality, she was a fairly normal—although perhaps a bit introverted—second-year middle schooler.

Through her avatar in Dendro, she was able to express her eccentric style and worldview to the fullest, and nothing was more fun for her than entering that world and going on adventures with her closest friends.

"I'm baack!" Juri cried in high spirits as she entered her home and rushed to her room.

"Welcome back," her mother replied. "Juri, I need to tell you something. It's about your tutor."

"...My what?"

"You'll have one starting the day after tomorrow. I think it would be really good for you to learn from someone who passed the UTokyo entrance exams on their first try."

Hearing those words made Juri's heart skip a beat.

A full day had passed since that sudden announcement; it was now April 19th. Juri returned from school in a completely different mood than she had the day before.

The cause of her dampened mood was all the things she'd heard from her mother and Ray.

"Ughh..." She let out a sigh as she flopped facedown on her bed.

Her mother had told her a while ago that she would find her a tutor when she entered her second year of middle school. Juri had been able to avoid getting one during her spring break, but it was now over halfway through April. She couldn't push it back any further.

Her grades were neither particularly good nor particularly bad, but knowing how intense high school exams could be, it was a good idea to start studying now. Juri herself understood that.

She still found it hard to accept, though, because lessons with a tutor would take up time she could otherwise spend having fun with her friends.

Time in Infinite Dendrogram passed three times as quickly as it did in reality, meaning that every hour spent with her tutor would be three fewer hours spent with Chelsea and the others.

If the tutor only took up a small part of her week, that would be okay. But what if the tutor was strict and made her spend most of her free time on studying?

What if they put a limit on her Dendro playtime—and her mother agreed?

What if...she ended up like Ray and had to quit Infinite Dendrogram entirely until her exams were finished?

In that case, the upcoming event might be her last chance to play with the others for a very long time.

“Nhh...” Lying with her face buried in her pillow filled her head with all these negative thoughts...

“Ngh!”

...but after a moment, she roused herself and got up from her bed.

There was nothing Juri could do about the tutor at this point, and there was no telling how things would change tomorrow. So, she gathered her resolve and decided to prepare for whatever might come.

She turned her thoughts towards the event, dedicated to enjoying it to the fullest.

◇◇◇

A Certain Place in New York

It was late at night on the east coast, but Chelsea was wide awake.

Unable to sleep, she was sipping on brandy while sorting her Infinite Dendrogram photo collection.

In it, of course, were photos of the clan she’d recently lost.

“...Haah,” she sighed. Chelsea never would’ve thought that the clan that had lasted since their days in Granvaloa would collapse because of a twenty-fold cheater...who hadn't even tried to go for her.

"And these were the same people who joined me instead of staying in Granvaloa..." she said, gazing at a photo from her clan's golden age.

Back then, the clan had been over twice as large as it had been just before it disbanded, and it had been a well-known entity among all Masters of Granvaloa. Chelsea looked through the photos—among them a shot of her standing with a girl bandaged like a mummy—and said to herself, "I can't even say anything to Leon anymore... I'm just like his Eldridge."

Those were both the real and in-game names of a friend. When that thought had passed, she resumed organizing her photos chronologically until she came across her first photos from Altar.

I kinda remember having a hard time getting used to Altar's dueling rules, she thought.

Duels in Granvaloa were different than in other countries. While Altar, Dryfe, and so on had 1v1s, Granvaloa's duels—if they could be called that—were naval group battles.

Since the victory conditions were so different, as a new Altarian Master, she had a lot of trouble standing out at first. Still, she'd gained a friend and rival in Juliet, so she'd been able to enjoy herself in spite of that.

"...Ah," she murmured as she noticed a photo showing her and three of her friends after they'd won an event in Gideon called "Water Survival."

This reminds me that I haven't shown it to her yet, she thought. Chelsea's fighting style had changed since she'd moved from Granvaloa to Altar, and since she hadn't acquired a Superior Job yet, the height of her power was actually in the past now—before the move.

Looking back on the past as she was, Chelsea couldn't help but wonder what would happen if she were to face her friend using her previous fighting style.

If I get the chance in today's event, I should probably try that...or maybe I should just try it no matter what, she thought.

"Anyway, that's it for the photo sortin'. I'll go get some shut-eye." On the east coast, the event would start on April 20th, at 11 in the morning. She really ought to get some sleep for now.

The device Chelsea left behind still showed the many photos she'd just been sorting.

Among them was one shot of a vast naval battlefield, with her own pirate ship involved in the fray. Her vessel leisurely floated through a stretch of ocean crowded with wooden debris—the remains of over a hundred other ships.

This had been the result of a certain battle royale event in Granvaloa—a feat Chelsea had achieved in a time when she'd been called by a different nickname.

◇◆◇

Control AI No. 13's Workspace

"An eveeent, an eveeent! So much to dooo, so little tiiime, but I'll dooo what I caaan..."

In a space filled with countless floating screens, a number of cats dressed in clothing—all of them Cheshire—were singing as they worked.

Some other Cheshires were visible on the screens, as well. They were someplace far away, burying stone slates with something written on them.

Each cat looked both busy and happy at the same time.

"I see that somebody is hard at work."

"Wooow! You sure are busy, Cheshy!"

Two other entities entered the space and spoke these words.

Both of them were control AI No. 11—Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

"Yep. After all, this event's my ideaaa," said one of the cats.

"I handle miscellaneous chores, so I sometimes take charge of eveeents," said another.

"Gotta work haaard!" said a third. Perhaps because this multitasking forced him to distribute his processing power, the Cheshires spoke in a manner that was somewhat...slower than usual.

"Well, we will leave most of this event to you. Although..." said Tweedledum.

"Ain't this event a bit easyyy? And doncha think you're abusin' your authorityyy?" continued Tweedledee.

"Ngh," the Cheshires let out as all of them stopped what they were doing. "I mean...I want this event to be fun...and I got Alice to cooperate...a-and I asked you to give out the tickets, just like you always do..."

While Cheshire was in charge of miscellaneous tasks and chores, the twins were the control AI who handled events. As well, they were also the AIs best suited to selecting the people who would participate in them.

"Yes. Once again, we have focused on Masters with sixth-form Embryos."

"Yep! The main point of these events is to get more Superiooors!"

The goal of Infinite Dendrogram's control AIs was to increase the number of Superior Embryos. The means to achieve that were many and varied, ranging from UBMs from Epic to Superior, as well as the presence of powerful dev-side Masters like Tom Cat or Chrono Crown.

This event was another means to that end.

"Well, I knew it'd be like thaaat," said Cheshire. "But we've held a lot of events with pre-Superiors and not many of them evolved, you knooow?"

"Indeed," said Tweedledum as he adjusted his glasses.

"That's whyyy, to spice things uuup, we got participants from a wider range of fooorms!" added Tweedledee as she spun around with her eyes closed. Though their actions were very different, both of them had confident smiles on their faces.

"...You mean like Ray? He just recently became high-rank, didn't he?" Cheshire said, remembering a familiar name that had recently gotten onto the list—one of the Embryos that was on it despite not being in its sixth form. "Or do you mean...?" he added. There was an entry on the list simply called "Top Secret"—a participant not even Cheshire himself knew anything about.

"You will find out when the event begins," said Tweedledum.

"It's gonna be sooo exciting!" said Tweedledee.

Cheshire looked at them in silence. While the twins may have seemed like polar opposites, they were actually one single Infinite Embryo. On top of that, they were perhaps the most dedicated of all the control AIs to the cause of creating Superiors, and that was exactly why Cheshire couldn't help but worry about what they were planning to throw into this event.

...This reminds me of the Love-Duel Festival, he thought. Though I guess it's not quite as big a deal.

Thanks to the twins causing Hannya to lose it, Gideon had yet again been brought to the verge of destruction.

However, in this event, there was no possibility of tian casualties. After all, it would take place in a special area meant specifically for it.

On an isolated island, far from the continent, the Masters would take part in a battle royale.

Chapter Two: The Rules

Paladin, Ray Starling

With college classes over for the day, I finished dinner and logged in to Dendro.

It was evening in real life, but here it was still just past noon.

“The event will begin soon, but we seem quite well prepared,” Nemesis said, glancing at the consumables and such that filled my inventory. I’d done various things in preparation for the event. Yesterday’s quest had given me some Scout levels, and today I’d switched back to Paladin so I could use more of my skills. “It is a shame, though, that your armor could not make it in time,” Nemesis added.

“Well, this’ll have to do for now,” I said. The VDA that B3 gave me had been completely destroyed at the peace conference, and the replacement I’d ordered hadn’t made it in time for this event. Left with no choice, I just bought some decent armor I’d found in a shop.

It seemed like a bit of a waste, but I had the money, so whatever.

“So, what have you learned about events such as these?” Nemesis asked.

“None of the previous ones had the same name as this one,” I said. “They were all totally different from each other too. There’s been battle royales, puzzle competitions, monster hunts, and so on... Like Chelsea said, the rewards were often rare items, including consumables that give you levels.”

There were even items that instantly max out low-rank jobs, which is pretty attractive for a guy whose build is incomplete, I added in my head.

“So that is the situation,” said Nemesis. “Well, regardless, you should try to enjoy this without fretting about much.”

We spent the daylight hours preparing, and soon enough, night fell in Dendro.

The moment it was time for the event to begin, we were whisked away from the capital and transported somewhere else.

◇

The very next moment, I found myself in a vast, white space.

Looking around me, I saw other Masters; more and more appeared as I watched.

"Huh... So this is how these things go," I said. Figaro, who'd started out in Legendaria, had told me of these "Accident Circles" that occasionally sent people to other places, sometimes across insane distances. Perhaps this was how one of those felt?

"Is that...The Unbreakable?"

"The newbie who faced off against just about every Dryfean Superior...?"

"Heh heh heh, imagine the rep you'd get for kickin' his ass..."

"Come on, you can't be that proud of beating a guy who's not even maxed out. We should wait a bit."

"True that."

Some of the other Masters talked amongst themselves while staring straight at me. I recognized none of them, and many of them were equipped with gear that looked totally different from any of the items I usually saw.

They must've been from places other than Altar or Dryfe. The eastern-style clothing on some of them particularly stood out.

Wait, I gotta find Juliet's group and... What does Natsume's avatar look li—?

"There you are!"

My thought was cut short by someone calling out. I turned to the source of the voice and saw...

...a ponytailed woman dressed in a vividly colored kimono.

The upper and lower halves of her clothing were unbalanced—the top had long sleeves, but the bottom was just a miniskirt. Overall, it seemed very cosplay-like.

She pointed at me, a smile spreading across her face that was decorated with a spot of paint.

Wait, I thought. Face paint?

"Found ya, Raaay! Man, seeing the real deal, your set's so dark and shadowy! The boots and coat alone make it a total home run at dark-iness! I'm loving Nemesis's 'blali' thing too!" the woman said as she approached me and slapped my back a few times.

"It has been quite some time since someone called me that," said Nemesis, her eyes becoming distant.

Anyway, it was fairly easy to guess who she was at this point.

"...Are you Natsume?" I silently asked. In response, she took out some string from her sleeve and said, "You okay? Wanna play some cat's cradle?"

...Yep, that's Natsume.

"Oh, and call me 'Alto' here!" she added.

"Sure thing," I said.

"Hm, so you are Ray's friend from school. A pleasure to meet you," said Nemesis.

"Same here, Nemmy!" Alto greeted her with a peace sign and a wink.

On her raised right hand I spotted a Jewel, so she probably used a tamed monster or two.

"Alto," huh? I thought. From Soprano to Alto... How straightforward.

"Not as straightforward as you, I would say," Nemesis commented. "Your name is practically the same both here and there."

...You got me there.

"Wooow, she makes quips! That's sooo cool! Maidens are so awesome—I'm kinda jealous! My Embryo isn't cute or anything like that, so I can't make outfits to match it."

"...Wait, your words imply that my apparel is on the same level as Ray's. How can you even say that?!" said Nemesis.

"Huh? Speaking of which, your armor is different than it was in the Hell General vid," Alto commented, pointing at my clothes and ignoring Nemesis.

“That gear broke, so I’m making do with this for now,” I said.

“You gotta be more prepared! I didn’t even log in until I finished all my prep for my part-time job!”

“Part-time job?”

“Haven’t you got one? People are crazy for UTokyo’s tutors and stuff, y’know?”

“Well, I’m all right as far as money goes...”

“Oh, how I’d love to be able to say that!”

Living in one of Shu’s apartments meant I had no rent to pay, and my tuition and other college-related expenses were covered by my parents. I had an allowance on top of that, and since most of my free time was dedicated to Dendro, it was more than enough for me to get by.

...Though, thinking about it now, it might’ve been a good idea to start saving up. With Rook and Figaro being from the UK, I could totally see myself wanting to fly there for an offline meet-up or something.

“Ah, there you are, Ray. Is this somebody ya know?” a familiar voice said.

I turned towards the source and saw Chelsea with the others...including someone who wasn’t with us when we’d gotten the tickets.

Next to Juliet there stood a woman dressed all in black. Her outfit looked very much like a mourning dress. I’d seen her in a couple sparring matches with some of the rankers I hung out with, and if I recalled correctly, her name was “Shion Manjushage.”

“Yeah, she’s a friend from my college,” I said.

“I’m Alto! I hope we get along! Wanna play some cat’s cradle?”

“Aha hah hah... I don’t think so.”

...Natsume tries to play cat’s cradle even with people she just met? I thought before saying, “Alto here happened to get a ticket too. She usually plays in Tenchi, but since this is a good opportunity, she wants to handle the event with us. Can she join the party if it’s co-op?”

“Well, we just met up with Shion too. That makes six people total, which works out just fine,” Chelsea said, and the others nodded.

“...This gathering...’tis truly fate,” said Juliet.

“Excuse me?” Alto said, raising an eyebrow.

“She’s saying it’s fine by her,” I said to her. She didn’t seem to have caught Juliet saying, “Let’s have fun together.”

Speaking of Juliet...I couldn’t help but feel that she seemed different than usual, just like she had yesterday.

“Ohh, that’s good to hear,” said Alto. “By the way, Ray, you’re basically in a harem party full of pretty girls. How’s that make you feel?”

“At peace...”

“WOW! What a total chad thing to say!” The fact that I wasn’t with Milianne, Louie, Azurite, or anyone else I had to keep alive at all costs really did make me feel more relaxed though.

With the introductions done, the only thing left was waiting for the event to start.

“Man, there sure are a lotta people here,” said Max.

“Seriously,” I said as I looked around the empty white space. At a glance, it seemed like there were at least three hundred Masters here. It was hard to tell what the people in the distance even looked like.

“You might not be the only rankers here,” I said to Juliet’s group.

“Hey, don’t act like you’re not second in a ranking,” Chelsea retorted.

“Well, that’s for clans. It doesn’t say much about my personal power level...” My battle style is still far from reliable, I added in thought.

“You should start dueling,” she said. “Be like me or Shion and take a spot in both the clan and duel rankings.”

The clan that Chelsea had recently lost was one of the kingdom’s top thirty clans, while Shion was an interesting case, being thirteenth in all three rankings—duel, clan, and kill.

“By the way, Shion...how’d you get a ticket?” I asked. She hadn’t been with us on the quest yesterday, so I was curious about it.

“Well, I obviously got it in the gacha! I’m actually quite surprised that all of you were able to get one as well! How many times did you pull?”

“Gacha?” Juliet’s trio all said in unison, clearly confused.

I, however, fully understood what she was talking about. It had to be the thing I’d gotten Silver from and had been visiting fairly regularly—the gacha machine at Alejandro’s.

So the tickets could come from the gacha too, huh? If I’d gone to pull from it after getting mine, I might’ve gotten a dupe, just like I had with the Exploration Permit.

...I haven’t pulled it in a while, though. I really wanna do it now, I thought.

“You have quite the distant look on your face,” said Shion.

“Please do ignore it,” said Nemesis. Soon after that, a rather old-timey chime rang out throughout the space.

“Oookay! With thaaat, all the currently online participants have been transported heeere! From this moment ooon, no one else may joooin!”

The sound was followed by words spoken in a familiar, drawling voice. It seemed to have been spoken through a megaphone, but it was no doubt the same voice I’d heard during character creation and in the wasteland that used to be Noz Forest.

A moment later, the lights—assuming there were any to begin with—went out, plunging the space into darkness.

Then, after several seconds, a single bright beam like a spotlight focused on a space in midair. There I saw Cheshire, standing on a floating platform while wearing a tuxedo—his formal wear, I assumed.

“Welcome, everyooone! Thank you for participating in today’s event, the Anniversaryyy!” Cheshire said with a bow. His proclamation was followed by the sound of many photos being taken.

There must be some Cheshire fans here, I thought. Or maybe just cat lovers.

“I will now explain the ruuules, so please keep it down for a momeeent,” said Cheshire, prompting a large flat hologram screen to appear in the air. It displayed a photo of a circular island surrounded by empty ocean.

The island featured forests, mountains, and rivers, but I didn't see a single sign of civilization. It seemed like the perfect example of an uninhabited island.

"This will be this event's areaaa. The island, I mean, as well as the area five hundred metels above it and twenty metels into the surrounding sea. Touching the barrier around this zone will disqualify you, so be caaareful."

The screen then displayed the boundary exactly as Cheshire described it.

I didn't see myself wanting to get away from the island, but I'd have to be careful not to ride Silver too high.

Juliet was nodding in understanding. She had wings she used to fly around, so she was probably thinking the same thing as me.

"Your goal is the gate at the peak of the mountain at the heart of the islaaand," Cheshire said, making the screen display a large gate. It had no doorknob or anything like that, but there were eight strange sockets on it. "As you can see, the gates have sockets that are meant for keys. These keys drop from the event monsters scattered all over the islaaand," he said, taking out ten plate-like objects and holding them like cards.

...How does he do that with those cat paws? I wondered.

"The keys are plates that each have a number from 0 to 9 on theeem. The gate opens when you put them in the sockets to make the correct eight-digit number. Hints for the answer are scattered all over the islaaand."

So we were meant to defeat monsters, gather the plates, and input the correct answer at the goal.

It seemed like a very "adventure" kind of event, mixing both monster hunting and riddle solving.

"Attention!" Cheshire exclaimed as he made the plates vanish, held up his equivalent of the index finger, and looked over the participants. "If you put in the wrong answer, the plates you used will disappear and be transported to a random place on the island, and you'll be forced to climb the mountain all over again."

That also meant that even if you put in the wrong answer, you could still gather the plates again and climb up the mountain for another try. I had Silver, so climbing mountains wouldn't cost me that much time. If we did this as a party, then between my Silver, Juliet's wings, Max's Ipetam, and Shion's "Prism Crawler," as I believe it was called, we wouldn't have any trouble getting around.

“Also, this event comes with a little bonus,” Cheshire continued. A bonus? “Instead of getting the death penalty, the players who die in this event will simply be teleported to their save poooints.”

“Wait, seriously?” Those words escaped my mouth, but who could blame me.

